Question. During the existence of the rebellion and up to this time were you a friend of the Government or not?

Answer. On account of my sentiments during the war I have been denounced as a black Republican; but I am a Union man, and always have been.

The testimony of L. B. Hunt, the registrar of district No. 7 of Callaway county, is as follows:

Question. In the discharge of your duties as registrar were you threatened, intimidated, or interfered with in any way whatever by citizens of your township or any other township?

Answer. I was not, sir.

Question. Did you, as registrar, comply with the laws and constitution of the State, and enforce the same in letter and spirit?

Answer. I did, according to my understanding of its requirements.

Question. Did you register any citizen whom you did not think was entitled to vote under the law?

Answer. I did not.

Question. Did every citizen who registered as a qualified voter take the oath of loyalty?

Answer. They did, sir.

John Yount, of Callaway county, and one of the registrars, gives the following testimony:

Question. Were you in any manner threatened, intimidated, or interfered with in any way?

Answer. No more than with lawsuits.

Question. Did many persons threaten you with lawsuits?

Answer. Not many. Some men took me aside and told me if I did not register without asking so many questions I would be sued. No man told me he would sue me but Robert C. Irvin; but he was afterwards registered, and no suit has been brought.

Question. Did you not, after the registration had progressed one or two days, make a voluntary affidavit that you were not disturbed?

Answer. I made a statement that I was not afraid of the people of New Bloomfield or of the township.

Question. Did you make a legal registration of your township as required by your oath of office?

Answer. As legal as I could.

John K. Boyd, one of the registrars of Callaway county, testifies that the registration was conducted quietly and peaceably, and that there was no disturbance of any kind.

George A. Moore was registrar of district No. 6, of Callaway county, and his testimony is as follows:

Question. Were you in any manner threatened, intimidated, or interfered with during the discharge of the duties of your office?

Answer. I was not.

Question. As such officer did you comply in letter and spirit with the registration law?

Answer. I did, to the best of my knowledge.

Question. Is the certificate of William H. Thomas, supervisor of registration, as set out in the answer of Mr. Anderson, contestee, [and which was read to the witness,] true or false, so far as your district is concerned?

Answer. It is false in mine.

Question. During the war were you a Union man?

Answer. I was.

There are a large number of other witnesses, who were not officers of registration, who give similar testimony. I want, however, to refer the House to the testimony of one of the registrars setting forth a different state of facts, for the purpose of showing what were the kinds of threats which were made, if any were made. The testimony of James E. Turley is as follows:

Question. In your examination in chief you state that after you signed the certificate to your registration you heard things which if you had known before you would not have signed it. State what these things are, and by whom said.

Answer. I stated yesterday that I did not sign the certificate, as the book shows; it was an omission; I intended to sign it. I heard that I had registered men who had been in the rebel army.

Question. What things were these, and who told you?

Answer. The assistant provost marshal told me; his name was J. D. Golley. He told me that Charles Tarr was in the rebel army, and I had registered him and I expect he voted.

Question. What other things did you hear?

Answer. That is enough, sir.

Question. Did you hear anything else?

Answer. If I did I do not know whether it was true or false.

Question. Did you hear that you registered any other man besides Tarr who was in the rebel army?

Answer. No, sir.

Question. You say that there was intimidation against you by fear of being interrupted. What interruption did you fear?

Answer. I feared that on account of a meeting of confederate soldiers in Fulton on the third day of my registration, to decide whether they should vote independent of the registration or not—I thought I would be interrupted in the discharge of my duties. They went and did nothing, and my fears subsided.

The threats which are testified to by any of these officers are threats that suits would be brought against them, or something of that sort. If members will look over the notes I think they will find that no actual threats are proven to have been brought to the knowledge of the officers which should have deterred any man from making the registration.

Without further reviewing the evidence, for want of time, I deem these conclusions fair from the evidence:

First. That in more than half of the districts of the county no threats were made which came to the ears of the registrars, and no fears were entertained by them.

Second. That there is no testimony sufficient to warrant the belief that a registration of the voters of Callaway county under the law was impracticable in any district.

Third. That no legal evidence has been given showing that more than ten or a dozen men were improperly registered; for surely the opinions and surmises of men, not professing to be founded upon their personal knowledge of facts, but confessedly upon rumor and common fame, are not legal evidence; surely the registration of Callaway county cannot be rejected because H. S. Turner supposed there were not more than two hundred and eighty qualified voters in Callaway county entitled to be registered under the law. These opinions of men must necessarily differ as widely as their political views differ. The conclusions of the sworn officers who made the registration must stand until it is shown by the evidence of facts that men not entitled to vote were registered, and then the votes of the men thus shown to have been improperly registered should not be counted; but why should the districts registered by Vinson, Maupin, Ferguson, Hunt, Moore, and Snedcor be thrown out upon the ground that these men were prevented from making a legal registration by threats and intimidation, when they all testify that they heard no threats, felt no fears, and did make a legal and fair registration?

We have settled this question precisely in this Congress in the case of Birch vs. Van Horn. Mr. Birch complained that his political friends were not allowed to be registered or to vote. He produced the testimony of numerous witnesses that in their opinion some 2,500 legal voters had not been allowed to register or to vote. No counter testimony was given. The number of cases specified and made certain was small, and not sufficient to overcome the majority of Mr. Van Horn. The Committee of Elections unanimously reported that the testimony of the opinions and suppositions of men was not evidence; that the proof must be specific and show what men were thus improperly disfranchised, and the House sustained the action of the committee. The two cases are precisely analogous in principle, and if the same rule of evidence is applied in this case as in that it will certainly follow that the resolutions of the committee must be adopted. For myself, I am entirely unwilling to apply one rule of evidence in the case of a political friend, and a rule directly the reverse in the case of a political opponent.

Mr. STOVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes of my hour to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PETERS.]

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I have examined the testimony in this case on a previous occasion; and that examination led me to the conclusion, as a matter of law and fact, that Mr. Anderson is the gentleman entitled to the seat. Holding this opinion, I desire in a very few words to give to the House my reasons for entertaining it.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that while the majority of the Committee of Elections, composed of eminent lawyers, have announced the principle that the requirement of the "iron-clad oath," which is a part of the constitutional law of Missouri, is to be respected, they have rather swerved from applying this principle to the testimony in the case. It is a question of fact, whether Callaway county was so far disloyal that its vote should be in part or in whole rejected in making the count. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Cook,] who has just taken his seat, says that there must be distinct proof against the individuals who are to be disfranchised. That rule may have an application if the committee or the House decide to reject only a portion of that vote; but I affirm, upon the testimony in the case, that there is so much disloyalty and so much fraud disclosed by the evidence in print in this case, that the whole vote of Callaway county ought to be rejected. There can be no sifting of the votes cast. The fraud practiced in that election, as disclosed in the evidence, was so alarming and widespread that Callaway county, so far as that election is concerned, should be stricken from this record.

In the first place, let me say that at that election no man had a right to vote "who had ever by act or word manifested his adherence to the cause of the enemies of the Government, or his desire for their triumph over the arms of the United States, or his sympathy with those engaged in exciting or carrying on rebellion against the United States." Now, whatever may have been the fact in Missouri, a State marked by the red track of war, I can say to the House that even in the State of Maine, a portion of which I have the honor to represent, if that rule had been applied in any election during the war not one tenth of the Democratic voters of that State would have been permitted to exercise the elective franchise. And I believe the question with us here to-day is whether the House will stand by this law of Missouri, or whether, admitting that it is constitutional, we shall swerve from the duty which is imposed upon us.

The majority of the committee say that there is a prima facie case for the contestant. Supposing there is, any gentleman who will fairly and carefully examine the testimony must, I think, see that this prima facie case is thoroughly overturned. The committee say, further, that the registrars do not admit that they practiced wrong or committed errors. Why, sir, it would hardly be in human nature for them to do so. But even from those registrars themselves there is evidence, of an indirect character, showing that the registration was improperly made. Every one of the registrars, I believe, has testified that in his opinion there were not two hundred loyal citizens in Callaway county voting the Democratic ticket; at any rate, a portion of those officers have so testified. And further than this, if I have read the testimony aright, the contestant himself is proved to have said and written that there were not two hundred loyal men in Callaway county. I cannot find anywhere in the whole record that he has denied that statement under oath, or that there is anything tending to contradict it; and if this statement of the party himself is true the vote of Callaway county should be entirely thrown out, and Mr. Anderson is entitled to the seat.

This position is sustained by a great deal of cogent testimony. In the first place, it appears by the evidence that men advised the voters to take the oath and register—although they could not do so legally—on the ground that the registration act was unconstitutional. I find from the testimony that only twenty men went from this county to the war. I find that no Union meetings were allowed to be held there; no Union sentiments were permitted to be spoken. I find that the militia could not be enrolled in that county, except by the aid of a guard of enrolling officers. I find that at this election men who had fought and bled in the rebel army were allowed to register and to vote. I find that one registrar resigned because he could not perform successfully his duties. I find that at one place twenty-five men who were not sworn at all voted. All these are indicia.

I have not time to go further. I take the contestant at his own word, and I find the record full of evidence to substantiate that word or that letter which he wrote saying that there were not two hundred loyal men in Callaway county. If there were not then that county, in which from 1,400 to 1,600 votes were cast, has filled the ballot-boxes with disloyal votes; and the election this year, which has been very carefully guarded, shows that fact.

These are the reasons which have led me to the conclusion, the earnest conviction, that Mr. Anderson is entitled to his seat. Thanking the gentleman for his courtesy, I will take no more of his time.

Mr. STOVER. Mr. Speaker, I rise conscious of the peculiar and embarrassing circumstances attending me while participating in this discussion. Had I consulted my own feelings and desires I should have remained in my seat a quiet and observant listener; but a sense of justice to my constituents, to that noble State which, in part, I have the honor to represent, and to the great cause of loyalty everywhere, as well as to the vindication of salutary and indispensable laws enacted for the preservation of the liberty and vitality of a State, these call upon me not to let pass unnoticed the attacks of the honorable gentlemen who differ with me upon this question, or to sit in silence so long as loyalty may need a champion; and it is this that causes me to overcome that delicacy which one must naturally feel where the parties to a contest are from his own State and where one is a political friend.

For the contestant, Mr. Switzler, I cherish none but the kindest feelings. Though differing in political sentiments, I freely accord to him the traits of a good citizen and an honorable man; and it makes the pain more poignant that against a contestant so esteemed justice demands that I should protest, with all the power that is in me, against his occupying the seat to which, in my opinion, the sitting member is legally elected.

What, then, sir, are the facts in this case? Acting upon the plain constitutional proposition that "each State shall have the power to prescribe the qualifications of its own voters," in April, 1865, the people of Missouri changed their constitution, to the third and sixth section of the second article of which I desire to call the attention of this House:

"SEC. 3. At any election held by the people under this constitution, or in pursuance of any law in this State, or under any ordinance or by law of any municipal corporation, no person shall be deemed a qualified voter who has ever been in armed hostility to the United States, or to the lawful authorities thereof, or to the government of this State, or has ever given aid, comfort, countenance, or support to persons engaged in any such hostility; or has ever in any manner adhered to the enemies, foreign or domestic, of the United States, either by contributing to them, or by unlawfully sending within their lines money, goods, letters, or information; or has ever disloyally held communication with such enemies, or has ever advised or aided any person to enter the service of such enemies; or has ever by act or word manifested his adherence to the cause of such enemies, or his desire for their triumph over the arms of the United States, or his sympathy with those engaged in exciting or carrying on rebellion against the United States; or has ever, except under overpowering compulsion, submitted to the authority or been in the service of the so-called 'confederate States of America,' or has ever left this State and gone within the lines of the armies of the so-called 'confederate States of America,' with the purpose of adhering to said States or armies, or has ever been a member of, or connected with any order, society, or organization inimical to the Government of the United States, or to the government of this State; or has ever been engaged in guerrilla warfare against loyal inhabitants of the United States, or in that description of marauding commonly known as 'bushwhacking,' or has ever knowingly and willingly harbored, aided, or countenanced any person so engaged; or has ever come into or has left this State for the purpose of avoiding enrollment for or draft into the military service of the United States, or has ever with a view to avoid enrollment in the militia of this State or to escape performance of duty therein, or for any other purpose, enrolled himself, or authorized himself to be enrolled, by or before any officer as disloyal or as a southern sympathizer, or in any other terms indicating his disaffection to the Government of the United States in its contest with rebellion, or his sympathy with those engaged in such rebellion, or having ever voted at any election by the people in this State, or in any other of the United States, or in any of their Territories, or held office in this State, or in any other of the United States, or in any of their Territories, or under the United States, shall, thereafter have sought or received under claim of allegiance the protection of any foreign Government, through any consul or other officer thereof, in order to secure exemption from military duty in the militia of this State or in the Army of the United States; nor shall any such person be capable of holding in this State any office of honor, trust, or profit under its authority, or of being an officer, councilman, director, trustee, or other manager of any corporation, public or private, now existing or hereafter established by its authority, or of acting as a professor or teacher in any educational institution or in any common or other school, or of holding any real estate or other property in trust for the use of any church, religious society, or congregation. But the foregoing provision in relation to acts done against the United States shall not apply to any person not a citizen thereof, who shall have committed such acts while in the service of some foreign country at war with the United States, and who has since such acts been naturalized, or may hereafter be naturalized under the laws of the United States, and the oath of loyalty hereinafter prescribed, when taken by any such person, shall be considered as taken in such sense."

"SEC. 6. The oath to be taken as aforesaid shall be known as the oath of loyalty, and shall be in the following terms: I, A. B., do solemnly swear that I am well acquainted with the terms of the third section of the second article of the constitution of the State of Missouri, adopted in the year 1865, and have carefully considered the same; that I have never, directly or indirectly, done any of the acts in said section specified; that I have always been truly and loyally on the side of the United States against all enemies thereof, foreign and domestic; that I will ever bear true faith and allegiance to the United States, and will support the Constitution and laws thereof as the supreme law of the land, any law or ordinance of any State to the contrary notwithstanding; that I will, to the best of my ability, protect and defend the Union of the United States, and not allow the same to be broken up and dissolved, or the Government thereof to be destroyed or overthrown under any circumstances, if in my power to prevent it; that I will support the constitution of the State of Missouri, and that I make this oath without any mental reservation or evasion, and hold it to be binding on me."

In accordance with the provisions of this Constitution the Legislature on the following winter passed an act to provide for the registration of voters, approved December 16, 1865, (see sections eight and nine,) and afterward a supplemental act, approved March 12, 1866. (See section one.)

The validity of these constitutional provisions and laws, in my opinion, are beyond a doubt. Suffrage is not an inherent, or natural, but a politic right. It is a privilege granted by the superior power of a State to such of its citizens as may be deemed will judiciously exercise it. In times of peace and great material prosperity, and when no danger threatens the State, this immunity may be extended; but when hoary-headed treason rears its horrid front; when traitors, with fraternal blood yet dripping from their hands, would ruthlessly grasp the reins of government and hurl it with themselves into political ruin, then it is not only the prerogative but the duty of the State to make such salutary restraining laws as may insure its safety and prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, during the recent rebellion

Missouri occupied no neutral or doubtful position. In the very incipency of the contest desperate efforts were made to force this State from the Union. By the action of her disloyal Legislature a convention was called for the avowed object of passing an ordinance of secession. The rebel element was loud and violent in the expression of its treasonable doctrines, and for a time it was worth a man's life to combat them with argument or give utterance to loyal sentiment.

But the convention refusing to place our noble Commonwealth by the side of her "erring, wayward sisters," an effort was made to force her out of the Union by a grand coup d'état, which was only frustrated by the vigilance and the heroic daring of her loyal sons. To accomplish these nefarious designs her treasury was plundered, her school-fund, donated to her by the munificence of the General Government, and amounting to $2,000,000, was stolen; some worthy citizens were killed, and many others carried off into a hopeless captivity. Her broad prairies now became the theater of contending forces. But worse than all, a system of partisan warfare was inaugurated; neighbor seemed to be arrayed against neighbor and brother against brother. There was no security for life or property; the husbandman was shot down at his plow, and his horses seized upon by his murderers. Where formerly cheerful industry greeted the morning sun with merry songs and wails and lamentations of widows and orphans were heard, and smoking embers and lifeless corpses pointed to where the spoiler had been. Lands were laid waste, homes were desolated, and a long line of solitary chimneys, as if standing sentinel over the ashes of former cheerful homesteads, marked the track of the destroyer.

When at length the Union party had secured firm hold on the reins of government the instinct of self-preservation as a Commonwealth, as well as their duty to the General Government, prompted them to enact such laws as would secure the State to loyal principles, and that her sacred temples might be dedicated to freedom forever. Judging all her citizens by their conduct in the great hour of need, they granted the privilege of suffrage to those worthy of using it, while it was withheld from those who had worshiped at the altar of treason, and hated liberty.

These are the reasons for the present laws regulating suffrage in the State of Missouri. To some they may appear stringent, but gentlemen must remember that they had their baptism in blood, and many of our citizens first read them by the lurid glare of their burning homes. If an apology were needed I would point in triumph to a great State redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled from the bonds of slavery, consecrated forever to the Federal compact, an annual addition of one hundred thousand to her population, her waste places cultivated, and cities and towns springing up as if by magic. I would further point to the development of our almost inexhaustible mineral resources, the vast increase of our agricultural and manufacturing productions, our extensive inland commerce, and our liberal educational system, which is second to none of even our older States.

In the case before us I apprehend that the entire question is settled by the admission or the rejection of the vote of Callaway county. If that be so, it is necessary merely to ascertain whether there was such a violation of the registration laws of Missouri as prevents the number of legal votes from being ascertained. If that cannot be done, the entire vote should be rejected. No one questions the right of this House to go behind all legal forms and look into the ballot-box and purify it; or if this from any cause be impossible, if political pollution creates doubt and uncertainty, it may cast aside the vote as unworthy its attention. Whatever may be the laws of a State prescribing the qualifications of its electors, unless they are openly repugnant to the Constitution of the United States those laws, and not the preferences of this House, must be the rule to determine contested cases. This is no new doctrine, but has been recognized by every Congress since the formation of our Government; and I find this principle most fully elucidated in the celebrated Kentucky case, Samuel E. Smith vs. John Young Brown. In that very able report, presented by the eminent gentleman from Massachusetts, the present chairman of the Committee of Elections, we find the following legal propositions:

"As Congress, much less the House of Representatives, never conceded, never having the power to concede to a voter his right to the ballot, neither can it take it away, modify, or limit it."

"This House can only be the judge of the election returns and qualifications of its members; that is, can judge whether each member has been elected according to the laws of his State and possesses the qualifications fixed by the Constitution. Here its power begins and ends. It cannot touch a voter or prescribe how he shall vote, nor can it impose a penalty on him, much less disfranchise him or say what shall be the effect or the power of his ballot if it be cast in a particular way. The laws of the State determine this."

Again, on the same page I find the following strong language:

"The statute-books of the States are full of provisions touching elections, extending as well to the effect and power of each ballot as to the manner of depositing it, all of which are a rule for this House. Congress has not seen fit to enact any law concerning it, if it had the power."

The House, by a flattering majority, sustained that report as well as the action of the committee at the same session in the case of Birch vs. VAN HORN, which report was presented by the distinguished gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] who also presented the majority report in this case last session.

The doctrine I have laid down was not only recognized by the committee in that case, but seemed to have been the main rule governing its action. By the express terms of the constitution of Missouri we see that "no one shall be deemed a qualified voter who has ever, directly or indirectly, done any of the acts specified in the third section of the second article of the constitution," and the disqualifying causes are some eighty-two in number. I care not whether a man may have taken and subscribed the oath of loyalty; he even may have conformed with all the requirements of the registry law, yet if he is guilty of any of the acts specified in that instrument he is not a qualified voter; if he is not a qualified voter he is not a legal voter; and the plain proposition follows that being an illegal voter and he votes his vote cannot be anything else than illegal. It matters not how corrupt a registering officer may be or how far he may be intimidated from the performance of his duties; his functions are all ministerial, and are no panacea for political ills; his corruption or negligence cannot remove disabilities which the highest law in the State declares to operate as disqualifications. It is not charged by the contestant that any such votes were cast for the sitting member, while Mr. Anderson charges that in Callaway county a very large number were cast for the contestant.

In turning to the evidence as to the registration of Callaway county, I find that Isaac D. Snedecor was the registrar of Fulton township. Bear in mind that no one can be a qualified voter unless he take and subscribe the prescribed oath, unless he cannot write, which cases are also provided for. This portion of the law under no circumstance can be viewed as directory, but as mandatory. It is not sufficient for a man to say he can take, but he must take and subscribe the oath. A moment's reflection will clearly show the importance of this provision. It was intended to be a safeguard against perjury. Many will hesitate to subscribe their names to a known lie, thereby affixing the seals of their perjury upon their own foreheads, who would stop at no crime were it but an empty form of words.

With this idea in view, let us turn to the testimony of Snedecor, (Mis. Doc. No. 39, page 47,) and although his testimony occupies but seven lines, his character and efficiency as a registering officer may be plainly gathered from

it. He is the contestant's witness, and in answer to the question, "Please state in what manner, as registrar of Fulton township, you administered the oath to applicants for registration, and whether any person was registered by you who did not take the oath," he says:

"There was no person registered who did not take the oath. There were about twenty-five, not exceeding twenty-five, of the first who registered that I explained to them the oath, and asked them if they took the oath, and upon being answered that they did, I then had them to subscribe their names. All the rest of them I had to hold up their right hands while I read the oath to them, after which they subscribed to it."

Under the sanctity of an oath he says that no one was registered who did not take the oath, and yet in the same breath he says there were about twenty-five to whom he explained the oath and then they subscribed their names. There was none of the solemnity incident to such occasions; no raising of the right hand toward high Heaven, no "so help me God" to witness the sincerity of their declaration; but it was a farce, a mockery, a prostitution of the powers of a sworn official. The rest of them held up their right hands; these could not be spared the awful ordeal. Favored twenty-five! How fortunate that the pains of perjury were spared you by the learned exposition of Snedecor! How unfortunate for the present and future generations that we have not preserved on our records that grand Snedecorian "explanation" which could take the place of the solemnities of an oath!

Snedecor says they all subscribed the oath, and he registered none whom he knew to be disqualified. I do not know what construction he may have put upon the term "disqualified," but I do know that (Mis. Doc. No. 39, p. 59) in Fulton township he registered 451 whom he certifies to be qualified voters, nearly all of all whom voted, opposite whose names I find the following remarks in his certified list:

"James Blackamore, been in the rebel army; James A. Blackamore, rebel sympathizer, notoriously disloyal; Benton Blount, left the country, went to Illinois to avoid the draft, enrolled disloyal; Levi Blount, the same; Samuel Blount, enrolled disloyal under oath, commanded a squad of men, bushwhacked Colonel McNeil; Samuel Carrington, know him to be disloyal; M. V. Davis, crazy, noisy rebel; at the outbreak of the war, walked through the streets with his gun in hand shouting for Jeff. Davis, threatening to shoot all who differed in opinion with him; Jesse Garner, in rebel army, wounded at Wilson's creek, and the officer of registration knows it well."

I further find that in this notoriously disloyal township but thirteen names were put on the rejected list, only one of whom was rejected because he enrolled disloyal; the others were rejected because they refused to take certain portions of the oath of loyalty. If in this registration we have the fortunate twenty-five the Snedecorian antithesis is complete; for here we also find the unfortunate thirteen. No "explanations" of Snedecor could prevail; nothing could save them from the rejected list. Unfortunate thirteen! Fortunate twenty-five! Fortunate Fulton township! For so patriotic and loyal was it now that within its broad confines but one could be found who had enrolled disloyal—and most unfortunate one! He alone remained of all his many associates, the rebels of Fulton.

But although Snedecor's evidence is alone sufficient to condemn the registration, we have the evidence of another party who was witness to a portion of it. On page 20, Miscellaneous Document No. 39, W. H. Thomas, in answer to the question how Snedecor conducted the registration, says:

"I thought his whole movements were contrary to the law, in this that he subscribed the names of applicants instead of their subscribing their own names, as the law directs; and that he merely asked them if they could take the oath, instead of administering it."

It seems that Snedecor did not content himself with qualifying men by mere explanations; not only his heart and his head were brought into requisition, but his hand and his pen also render tribute. Accommodating Snedecor! In some instances he did not deem it necessary to explain. The simple question, "Can you take the oath?" answered affirmatively is sufficient to warrant him to write down the name. But perhaps it was well Snedicator wrote the names, else those hands, stained by loyal blood not yet dry, might have soiled the pure sheets of his poll-book.

Thomas further swears that he furnished the registrar a list of the persons who had enrolled themselves disloyal, and that Snedicator registered about 200 such; and his answer to the next question places this whole matter beyond the shadow of a doubt, (on page 21:)

"Question. Did he enroll persons as qualified voters who were disqualified from other causes?"

"Answer. I think he did, a great many. I know of many persons who had advocated the southern cause, who had given aid and countenance to the rebellion, who were not enrolled as disloyal, whom he registered as qualified voters."

I call special attention to this part of the testimony, because in the majority report it is stated that this is "the only evidence introduced for the purpose of showing a disregard of the provisions of the law by any of the district registers." It is not the "only testimony," as I will show to this House. But the majority report further states "on the other side, Snedicator, the registrar of Fulton, testifies that he did not register any person whom he knew to be disqualified under the law," and the committee seem to place great confidence in Snedicator's testimony, while on the other hand the testimony of Thomas seems to be discredited. I will now positively demonstrate that Snedicator illegally registered a rebel; that he could not help knowing at the time that he was disqualified; in fact the applicant told him so when applying to be registered. I refer now to the testimony of Jesse Garner, on page 9 of Miscellaneous Documents, No. 39:

"Question. By whom were you registered?"

"Answer. By Mr. Snedicator."

"Question. Were you wounded in the battle of Wilson's creek?"

"Answer. Yes, sir, I was."

"Question. Did Mr. Snedicator, the registrar, see you after you returned?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I expect he did."

"Question. Did he make any inquiry of you when you registered?"

"Answer. I told him I had been called out by Jackson, and that I fought at Wilson's creek."

"Question. Did you make any application to any court to relieve you of any disqualification?"

"Answer. I did not, sir."

And right here I ask the gentleman who joined in the statement that "there is some ground to doubt the truthfulness of Thomas" whether there is any doubt as to the willful misrepresentations of Snedicator, and why do they condemn Thomas and can find no word of censure for Snedicator?

So much for Fulton township; and the same seems to be true of the others. William B. Miller, Miscellaneous Document No. 39, page 11, testifies that he knew of persons registering in Nine-Mile Prairie who were disqualified. One of them, Franklin Bruce, had his arm taken off at Moore's Mill fight. Besides this, (page 12,) the names of Scholl, Hutz, and James Bayley are given as having been illegally registered. Here are four open, notorious rebels, and, as if this was not sufficient, the mark of the rebellion was put on one by the loss of his arm, testified to by one man alone. Who can tell how many more there were? And yet the registrar, on page 1, Miscellaneous Document, No. 12, testifies that he faithfully discharged his duty.

Marcus Bird, on page 16, Miscellaneous Document No. 39, testifies that he was one of the enrolling officers under the conscript act; that the disloyal sentiment was overwhelming, and that the number of loyal voters under the registry law would be about ten to the township. Yet in that township 77 were registered as qualified, and but 9 were rejected.

We now come to St. Hubert township, in which 142 were registered as qualified voters, and nowhere in the evidence can I find a single one rejected. Truly, here we might expect to find the loyal paradise of Callaway county, a place where all are qualified, were it not for the testimony of one Albert J. Herring, who on page 16, Miscellaneous Document No. 39, testifies that in the fall of 1864 he joined the rebel army; he was registered by George A. Moore; the oath was read to him, and he was registered; the registrar wrote his name. On his cross-examination he says the reason he did not write his own name was because he could not write. But he could at least have made his mark in accordance with a provision in the law; but there is not a syllable of testimony to that effect. The testimony is, that he neither took the oath or subscribed his name.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to occupy the time of the House by more minutely entering into the particulars of this case on this point. The certified registration list is before us, with the remarks opposite their names.

Mr. UPSON. Will the gentleman state to the House when that indorsement was made, and by whom, on the registration list?

Mr. STOVER. With pleasure. I will answer the last question first. It was made by Mr. Thomas, and I do not know, neither can I find any evidence, when it was made; but I do know that it is there. Does any one contradict its truth? Over 2,000 votes were registered in 1866, while it is in evidence before the committee that in 1868 only 664 were registered. Callaway is one of the best agricultural counties in the State of Missouri, and its location and general features make it peculiarly attractive to immigrants. The influx of immigration for the last three years into the State of Missouri, coming from the East and the North and the South by thousands, and young men attaining their majority, have been rapidly increasing our voting population, and yet Callaway, with all her natural attractions, shows a decrease of nearly one thousand. To what does all this point? Why it teaches that, in 1866, 1,600 qualified voters were not there; that the contestant himself and the other witnesses were right when they estimated the number of loyal voters at 200. For my part, I am inclined to put the figures lower than that. Was not the secretary of State right when he considered the vote there not only so tainted but so entirely covered with fraud that he rejected the whole vote?

On page 8 of the majority report it is stated that the—"Committee come to the conclusion that there was no just and reasonable ground to fear personal violence or injury in consequence of appearing to make and support objections to registration."

In my opinion the committee here transcend their powers. The question is not were there grounds for fear, but did that fear exist? It is not, was there cause for intimidation? but it is, were the people (and I mean the loyal people) so intimidated that a fair election was not held? To sit on an easy chair in a finely furnished committee-room, where peace and quiet and order reign, with the Capitol police to guard the door, thousands of troops to guard the city, surrounded by works of art and genius, while in the distance forts and battlements tower toward the skies, is a position of comparative security; and it takes strong words, ay, almost belligerent acts, to create fear or intimidation. But on the sparsely-populated western prairies, where the wild wolf is your nearest neighbor, where a man's wearing apparel is not complete unless he has a brace of revolvers strapped to his back, and where war is not a pleasing tradition to be told at the evening fireside, but where the empty chairs in the social circle, the absent loved ones, the habiliments of mourning in which those present are clad, betoken that war is a stern, terrible, direful reality; the threat "a free election or a free fight," means something. This may be idle talk to gentlemen from the northern and eastern States, but I am satisfied that those from the border States fully appreciate it.

What intimidation, then, do we find in Callaway county? In Cedar township John Yount says (Misc. Doc. No. 39, p. 17) "they threatened law-suits; they said around they would have a free election or a free fight." Some were afraid to act as witnesses, and they threatened to hang him because he was a friend of the Government. He was afraid to risk acting as a witness. In Miscellaneous Document No. 12, page 8, we find his certificate:

"I hereby certify that I was appointed by Thomas Ansell as registrar of Cedar township, in Callaway county, Missouri; that I entered upon the discharge of my duties according to law, and rejected all persons whom I knew, from my own personal knowledge, to be disqualified. Many persons who were registered by me as qualified voters were reported to me by various witnesses as being guilty of many acts of disloyalty; but said witnesses informed me that if they were to come before me and testify to the facts they would be compelled to leave their homes, and rather than do so, even under compulsory process, they would get out of the way. Knowing this I thought it useless to attempt to forcibly bring them before me, knowing also that such a proceeding would endanger their lives. Many good Union men informed me that on account of the threats and intimidations against them they thought it unsafe to go to the place of registering and voting, and did not do so. From what I know and have seen, since the passage of the registry law I am fully convinced that there could not be a legal registration made in Callaway county under the circumstances as they existed at the time of the present registration."

Given under my hand this December 8, 1866.

JOHN YOUNT.

When the contestant showed him his former certificate and asked him which was true he said:

"I thought the first one was true when I made it, but from what I know now, and so far as I have any proofs, I am satisfied the first one is true yet with the exception of ten or fifteen names."

That is, he now knew the first one was false as regards ten or fifteen names, but nowhere does he say that his second certificate is not true, and the statement that various witnesses informed him that if they were to come before him and testify to the facts they would be compelled to leave their homes, and rather than do so they would get out of the way, and that he knew this would endanger their lives, stands uncontradicted and shows the state of feeling in that township.

Abram Snethen, page 18, Miscellaneous Document No. 39, in answer to the question "would it have been safe for a man to have objected to a man's registering," says:

"I thought not."

"Question. Do you know of any intimidation in your township against the execution of the registry law?"

"Answer. It was a common thing to make threats then."

"Question. Did such threats prevent men acting as witnesses before the registrar against disqualified persons?"

"Answer. I think they did."

"Question. State the character of those threats."

"Answer. If they could not vote they would prevent others from doing so."

This gentleman testifies to the state of feeling existing in Coto Sans des Sein township. Jonathan McKinney testifies to Aux Vasse township. He says:

"I could not speak my sentiments in every crowd, I was told if I did not keep quiet I would be hung."

And a little further on he says:

"There were but two or three Union men in my neighborhood."

James Turley, registrar of Bourbon township, says (page 10, Misc. Doc. No. 39) no objections were made to those offering to register, but he was told by some that objections would have been made if it would have been considered safe to do so. Here are the loyal citizens of an entire township laboring under such a restraint that although they see known rebels perjure and register themselves, yet the fear of violence bound their tongues and made them quiet spectators of this wrong. And yet the majority report says that "we do not believe there was ground for fear." But this same Turley, when he becomes the contestant's witness, (Misc. Doc. No. 12, p. 5,) says, "I am certain that the few loyal men of my district were afraid to make objections," "and I fully believe it would have been dangerous for them to have done so." These gentlemen in their cozy committee-room can see no cause for intimidation, but James Turley, who lived, not in this committee-room, but in Callaway county, surrounded by swarms of rebels, and who judged the temper and tone of those around him by his intimate knowledge of their character, says no objections were made because it would have been dangerous. But on this point the majority use strong language. On page 8 of the report I find:

"The district registers above named and a considerable number of other witnesses testify that there was no danger of personal violence to be apprehended by any person who saw fit to appear and make objections."

Who are the district registers above named? Their names are found at the foot of page 7, (majority report,) and I ask this House to examine their testimony and see if they testify to any such thing. Turn to Miscellaneous Document No. 12, and on page 1 we find the deposition of John Vinson. He was asked by the contestant whether he had any knowledge of any system of intimidation and threatening, and his answer was, "I have not." Have not what? I have no knowledge of any such system. He testifies as to his knowledge of a system of intimidation and threatening. He does not state whether there were individual threats or intimidations, only that he does not know them to have been so combined as to form a system. But could not such a system have prevailed without Vinson knowing it? Are we to suppose that because Vinson does not know a certain thing to be so that it is not so, or that no one else knows it to be so? Has all knowledge, then, concentrated in one man, and that man John Vinson, of Callaway county, Missouri? Does the committee think that he knows everything and what he does not know is not worth knowing? But the majority say that he testifies there was no danger. He does not mention the word danger, nor can anything be found in his entire evidence that conveys that meaning.

Next on the list comes A. B. Maupin, whose deposition is on page 2, same document. He says he was not threatened with violence, and he does not know that objectors to applicants for registration would have been in danger of violence and insults. He does not say there was no danger, but he does not know that there was. His opinion was asked, but he testifies as to his knowledge. There is a vast difference between the existence of a thing and the knowledge of its existence. By the same system of reasoning, that there was no danger because Vinson and Maupin did not know it, we argue away the existence of this continent before the year 1492, and thus relieve antiquarians of immense labors in their researches to ascertain the primeval formation of the globe by the geological indications of the western hemisphere.

Thomas J. Ferguson, another of the registrars referred to by the majority, on page 8 testifies that he was not threatened, but was not asked whether any of the citizens were threatened, or whether it would have been safe for any one to make objections. The contestant evidently knew better than to ask such a question, for Abram Sneathen (p. 18, Mis. Doc. 39) and W. H. Thomas had testified on this subject, and when the contestant touched upon this point he "roared gently as a sucking dove."

The next in order are L. B. Hunt, whose testimony is on page 6; George A. Moore, page 9; and J. D. Snedcor, page 14, neither of whom were interrogated upon this point and neither of whom testified on it; and this ends the parade of district registers referred to. But these registrars testify they did not register falsely. Oh, no! I ask this House whether in a court of justice they ever heard that when perjury was charged upon a man he was asked "How is it?—is it true that you swore to a lie?" Of course he would answer, "Oh, no; I did not swear to a lie; it is a false charge!" But this is what has been done. The persons accused of perjury are brought to purge themselves from the charge. No one else is called upon to do it.

I do not charge the majority with willful misrepresentation; undoubtedly these deviations from the facts of the case occurred from oversight in the preparation of the report; but I do ask, does either courtesy or duty demand that we adhere to a majority report in which the errors are so glaring?

But, Mr. Speaker, this is not the only error.

On page 9 of the majority report this statement occurs:

"Some attempt was made to affect the case by proof that a convention of returned rebel soldiers was held at Fulton at the same time that the registration was being made at this place. But this seemed effectually disposed of when it appeared that this convention of rebel soldiers passed resolutions that they would not attempt to register or vote or have to do with the election."

I have carefully examined both books, and I say to this House that I can find no such evidence recorded. If I am wrong I ask to be corrected. And these are not the only instances; there are others, but I do not wish to occupy too much of the time of the House.

These, then, Mr. Speaker, are my reasons for favoring the minority report, namely, illegal votes, threats, and intimidation prevented a fair election in Callaway county. So strongly does that election savor of corruption that the entire vote should be thrown out. Rejecting the vote of Callaway county, we find a majority of the legal votes cast for George W. Anderson. And I appeal to members to lay aside that delicacy which often prompts us to favor the report of a majority simply because it is the report of the committee, and to give this subject that attention which its importance requires. I know some may regard the laws of Missouri as harsh and severe, while others consider them liberal enough considering the causes that brought them forth. It matters not in what light we view them, our duty is plain. They are the laws of a State, and the supreme law regulating this case. Though we may not sanction this law, yet as long as it remains on our statute-books we are governed by its provisions.

Far toward the setting sun, beyond the Mississippi, is a State large enough and in mineral resources rich enough to make a separate nationality—a State old in years but young in vigor. For over forty years held down by the incubus of slavery, she has sprung into a new life. Each State pays tribute to her rapidly increasing population, and if we have but the sympathy of those who should be our friends Missouri is sealed forever to the Union. Within her vast borders two classes of men are anxiously watching the result of this contest. On the one side are those who labored to destroy this Government, and who sought their rights in the last ditch. On the other are thousands of brave men who in their country's peril bared their bosoms to the storm and faced death that the nation might live. A decision for the contestant will mantle the cheek with shame of these, while the others exultingly will cry, "We have found the last ditch; it is in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States."

During the recent struggle between the President and Congress the loyal people of Missouri stood by Congress. Will Congress now stand by them? Think not, I entreat you, believe not, that the spirit of rebellion is dead. The rebellion itself is crushed, but its spirit yet lives. True, like the moldering ember, its heat may be but faint, but shall any act of this House fan it anew into flames? In the name of the loyal people of Missouri, in the name of her widows and orphans, by the sacred memory of the fallen heroes whose bones repose beneath her sod, I appeal to you, O legislators! let not your action this day blast our fair hopes and destroy our promise of the future. Gentlemen may vote as they please; no act of mine shall cause the soldiers of our Republic to mourn. I will put no premium upon treason nor barter the rights of the loyal.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Speaker, I shall not occupy the time of the House but a very few minutes in the discussion of this subject. It occurs to me that a simple statement of the law and the facts connected with this case will be entirely sufficient to convince this House of the propriety of sustaining the report of the majority of the Committee of Elections. What are the circumstances of the case and the law that governs it? In the State of Missouri a Republican Legislature passed a law for the purpose of preventing men who had either directly or indirectly participated in the rebellion from taking any part in the elections of the State. A Republican Governor, in conformity with the requirements of that law, appointed a superintendent of registration for each county. That superintendent, in conformity with the law, appointed sub-registrars for each township in the county. It may be proper to state that these men thus appointed were generally men politically in sympathy with the dominant party and with the Governor who appointed them.

These registration officers proceeded under the law to register the people of each county, excluding from participation in the elections every person who had either directly or indirectly participated in the rebellion or aided those who had been engaged in it. Having completed the registration they made a return of the qualified registered voters to the secretary of State. Another list was provided by these men and furnished to the clerk of the county, whose duty it was to furnish to the judges of election a certified copy of the qualified voters in each precinct. The election law of the State required of the judges of election that they should permit no person to vote whose name did not appear on the list of qualified voters as furnished to them by the clerk of their county, who obtained it from the registering officers. This is a simple statement of the law and of the requirements of the law. The registers, in conformity with this law, went forward and executed the registration in Callaway county and in each township thereof, and forwarded certified lists of the qualified voters to the secretary of State, which were furnished to the judges of election. The judges of election then, under this requirement, went forward and held the election, permitting no person to vote whose name did not appear upon these lists of qualified voters.

We have heard gentlemen speak here to-day about intimidation, but a majority of the registering officers, and the supervisor of registration himself, upon their oaths declare that they were not intimidated in the discharge of their duties. The law of the State provides that if there is any threatening or intimidation it shall be the duty of the supervisor of registration of the county to notify the sheriff of that fact, and it is made obligatory upon the sheriff to furnish a sufficient number of men to preserve order and enable the registering officers to register the voters in conformity with law, and reject every man who has ever directly or indirectly participated in the rebellion or aided those engaged in the rebellion.

The supervisor of registration made his return to the secretary of State in conformity with law; but after the election was held and it was ascertained that Mr. Switzler had been elected, he then for the first time discovered that his registration of Callaway county had been illegal; and he then, after the result of the election was known, made this certificate declaring that the registration of Callaway county was in violation of law; and he states that that certificate was made at the suggestion of the secretary of State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the facts of that election are simply these; there was not a man who participated in the election in Callaway county, according to the evidence, who was not a registered and qualified voter. There was not a man who cast his vote for the contestant in this case who was not by the officers of the law, acting under oath and in conformity with law, registered as a qualified voter. As I have remarked, there was no question made as to the legality of the registration of Callaway county until after the result of the election was known, when the supervisor of registration for this county, in violation of law and in conjunction with the secretary of State, entered his protest against the legality of the registration in Callaway county.

Mr. UPSON. I would ask the gentleman if there were not county officers elected in that county, and also members of the Legislature at the same election, and whether their election has ever been questioned by the Legislature of the State?

Mr. McCORMICK. There were both township and county officers elected at the same election who qualified under that election, the Governor of the State himself commissioning them, and no one questioned their right. They were elected under the same registration which was declared by Mr. Thomas, the supervisor of registration for the county, to be illegal.

Mr. UPSON. And members of the Legislature?

Mr. McCORMICK. A member of the Legislature for that county was also elected.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would ask my colleague if he is not fully aware that the Legislature of the State of Missouri on two separate occasions have had the validity of this election in Callaway county under consideration, and in both instances sustained the secretary of State? Is not that the fact?

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes, that is the fact; but the officer whose duty it was to issue the certificate of election to the Representative from that county has in no case questioned his right to the certificate of election. The whole thing grows out of the simple fact that the secretary of State of Missouri has, for partisan purposes, undertaken to override the wishes and will of the majority of the qualified voters of Callaway county.

Now, we are told by gentlemen here that the contestant himself in 1862 or 1863 declared by letter that there were not two hundred loyal men in Callaway county. That letter has never been produced, and it never can be produced, because it never was written; but if he had written it, what was the condition of the county of Callaway in 1862, when the torrent of rebellion swept over more than one half of the territory of the State of Missouri? The loyal men of Callaway county were then in the field in defense of their country, and he might very well say in truth that the loyal men were not there, and that those who were disaffected to our Government, and were not sufficiently strong in their rebel proclivities to take up arms against the Government, were still there.

But we are told there is evidence here to-day that the reason why the registration of Callaway county in 1866 must have been illegal is that in 1868 not much more than half the number were registered. I admit that such is the case, but it can very easily be accounted for on another ground. It is that the very men who in 1866 attempted to override the wishes of the loyal voters of that county have undertaken to strike down and reduce the number of voters in such a way as to make their action in 1866 appear plausible. But suppose that the registration in 1866 had been no greater than it was in 1868, still the contestant would be elected by a majority of the qualified voters.

But the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. STOVER] says that because there were some men registered in Callaway county who were not entitled to be registered the whole county should be thrown out. Sir, there is no justice in that sort of argument; there is no right in it. It may be, and it probably is, the case that in every county within the broad limits of the Republic of the United States there have been more or less men voting in it—boys under age or aliens—who are not entitled to vote. And if you are to invalidate the election in one county because certain persons voted who were not entitled to vote, then, in my judgment, you would by the same rule invalidate the election of every member upon this floor. Sir, no such argument is just, equitable, or reasonable, and I am very confident this House will not sustain it.

But there is another view of this question that comes home to this House. The Constitution of the United States secures to the Congress of the United States the sole right to be the judge of the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members. That constitutional right, secured to this body by the fathers of this Republic for the highest and most important purposes, is a right underlying the proper organization of the legislative department of this Republic. It is a right secured by constitutional enactment to prevent the encroachments of the executive department upon the legislative department.

But in the State of Missouri we have an officer, the secretary of State, who has no judicial functions, who has no legislative functions, who is a mere scrivener for the Commonwealth of Missouri, who yet assumes to make and unmake Congressmen at his own good will and pleasure; who has arrogated to himself the right to thrust men upon this floor in violation of the rights of this House, and in violation of the wishes of the loyal men of the ninth congressional district of Missouri, who have rejected the sitting member by a majority of 1,160 votes.

Mr. Speaker, there is a great principle of right underlying this question, and I feel confident that this House will to-day not only sustain its own rights, but will rebuke this man who has attempted by his own authority to force men upon this floor. I believe this House will inflict a rebuke upon the secretary of the State of Missouri, as well as deal justly with those interested in this case.

I will not now consume any more of the time of this House, but will leave this subject to be discussed by others.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, on a former occasion I discussed this question at length, and whatever I may have to say upon the subject at this time will be to a considerable extent a reiteration and a repetition of the arguments which I submitted to this House on that occasion.

I will admit the intensity of my own feelings when I consider this subject. But at the same time I claim that I share the feelings of every loyal man and every loyal woman in the State of Missouri. So as this is a life or death struggle, the simple question is whether the loyal men of Missouri shall govern that State; that is the question. Disguise it as we may, look at it in whatever light we will, examine and apply the law as we may, we come back to this point at last: shall the loyal people of the State of Missouri from henceforth occupy the position that the loyal people of the State of Kentucky and the loyal people of the State of Maryland occupy, or shall those who saved the State in the hour of its trial be permitted to govern it from this time on?

We have, sir, by our laws—and this was brought about after a desperate struggle—succeeded in maintaining the ascendancy of the loyal people in our State. The House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States is to-day called upon to pass on the question, may we be permitted to do this in the future and in our own way? We knew there that when this contest should end in the field there would be another contest at the polls. We knew very well that these men returning from fighting in the rebel ranks would be able to vote us down, reënforced as they would be by a certain party in the State of Missouri that claimed to be loyal during the war. Knowing this we went to work, and by a constitution adopted by the people of that State, provided that those who had been disloyal during the rebellion should not be permitted to hold office or to vote in the elections that were to follow. We flattered ourselves that we had made that exclusion effectual. We believe to-day we have done so. We provided by a registry law, which was required by the constitution we had adopted, that certain acts should be done and that certain persons should be excluded from the elective franchise. In order to make those provisions effectual we had to intrust power somewhere, and we intrusted it to a board of registration in each county. We made further provision that the lists of that registration should be certified by the president of the board to the secretary of State.

We knew another thing: that in these intensely disloyal counties—of which this county of Callaway was one, being perhaps the most bitterly disloyal county in the State, the Union men being borne down there by a majority of more than ten to one—we knew that in such localities it would be almost impossible to execute the law in its letter and its spirit. It was openly proclaimed by the opposition, "You cannot enforce your registration laws here; we will not permit them to be enforced here under any circumstances." Prominent individuals, among them men fresh from the ranks of the rebel army, went about the country haranguing the people and urging them to rise up in their might and put down the registration law in these counties, on the ground that it was revolutionary, unconstitutional, and void, (using almost the exact language that was used in the New York platform in regard to your reconstruction laws,) and should not be enforced in their midst.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCORMICK. Has not the Supreme Court of the United States declared that the test oath required by the constitution of the State of Missouri is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Supreme Court of the United States has said that preachers are not bound to take that oath. We are not trying preachers here to-day. The validity of this registration law has been passed upon in numerous instances by the courts, which have uniformly pronounced it constitutional in all its aspects and in all its bearings.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COOK] has remarked in his speech that there was no intimidation, no disturbance, no violence in the county of Callaway during the time this registration was going on. I will admit that such was the fact; that all the intimidation preceded the registration; that all the violence preceded the attempt to register the voters in that county. The confederate soldiers there met and laid down their platform. A prominent ex-member of Congress proclaimed to the people there that they should make to the registering officers the demand, "My rights or your blood!" Leading papers of the State called upon the people to "rally in their own defense to shake off the shackles that bound them." This was all done prior to the attempt to register.

The loyal men there, as I have stated, were outnumbered ten to one; and when the day of registration came every individual who presented himself and asked to be registered was permitted to be registered without question. The superintendent of registration certifies under his own hand to that fact. Three of the registering officers of the county certify to the same fact. In consequence of this state of things, there were registered in that county as voters in 1866, not sixteen hundred persons, as stated by my colleague, [Mr. STOVER,] but about twenty-one hundred. In 1868, the year just passed, we had a new registration, and the Governor of the State provided for carrying out the registration laws in that county even if the whole military force of the State were necessary to do it. The county was registered anew. I do not recollect the exact number, but about 500 votes were polled. Apply the registration of 1868 to 1866 and it elects the sitting member. A question was asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] of his colleague on the committee whether, if we reject the seven hundred odd names on the list as disqualified under the law the contestant would not still be elected; and the response was that such is the fact. That is true. But those remarks are only placed opposite the names of those who were known to be disloyal, those of whom we had record evidence, and no attempt was made to inquire into the loyalty of the balance. But more than one third of all were notoriously disloyal, had placed themselves on the record as disloyal, and were excluded by the constitution and laws of Missouri.

Mr. Speaker, there is a point that was raised by the question of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPSON] that, it seems to me, should settle this matter with the House. At this same election and under the same registration there was elected a member of the Legislature of the State of Missouri. He claimed his seat by virtue of this registration and election. The lower branch of the Legislature considered the case and by a large vote declared that the secretary of State had the authority under the constitution and laws of the State to reject the vote of Callaway or any other county for disloyalty, and refused a seat to the person claiming it. The question came up at a subsequent period before the same Legislature and they adjudicated it again. Arguments were made upon it, the case was investigated in all its bearings, and the Legislature again declared that the authority rested in the secretary of State to reject the vote.

The whole question in this case turns upon the right of the secretary of State to reject that county if it appeared to him that the law had not been carried out there. The gentleman who makes this report takes the ground that there is no such authority in the secretary of State. The rejection of the vote in Callaway county in the case of the person claiming to be elected to the Legislature, of which I have spoken, was the very vote that we are passing upon here to-day, and we are called upon, in connection with this, to say whether the Legislature of Missouri, after full investigation, was right in rejecting the member claiming to be elected.

Mr. WARD. I would inquire if the returns of this county were rejected by the secretary of State?

Mr. BENJAMIN. They were rejected by the secretary of State in this case precisely as they were in the case of the member of the Legislature, and upon the same testimony. The secretary of State gave his certificate to the sitting member, certifying that after the rejection of Callaway county the sitting member had a majority of the votes given in the district. It requires a vote of over five hundred to be cast in that county in order to elect the contestant. The same vote that was cast in the county at this election, as I said before, if it had been cast for him then would not have elected him, but would have given the seat to the sitting member.

Now, as to the right of the secretary of State to reject the votes. The Legislature of the State passed a registry law. Registration was about to commence under it. The opposition found means, as I said before, to override the law in the disloyal counties. The Legislature seeing the state of things went to work and passed a supplemental law which required the superintendent of registration to certify the result of their labors to the secretary of State. That law was enacted in order that the power might be in the hands of the secretary of State to pass upon the question whether there was a registration in accordance with law.

Mr. COOK. Will the gentleman give the date of that law?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It was approved March 12, 1866, and will be found on page 910 of the Statutes of the State. That law requires the superintendent to report to the secretary of State the result of the registration, and to append a certificate to the returns, making the certificate evidence of the facts therein stated. Upon that certificate is stated the fact that there was no legal registration in that county; that such a state of things existed as precluded the possibility of carrying out the law.

A MEMBER. How about the other registration officers?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman wants to know what about the other registration officers. I believe there were some eight or nine of those officers. Three of them certify to these facts; the rest of them make no certificate whatever in connection with the registration beyond what they make to the superintendent. All the registering officers who certify at all in connection with these returns certify that they were illegal, and that there was no registration at all in consequence of the peculiar state of things which existed there.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are matters of importance that I felt called upon to present to the consideration of the House. First, it is utterly impossible for us to carry out our registry laws unless we concede this authority to the secretary of State; and in the next place, it has been adjudicated in Missouri and found against the contestant. This, it seems to me, should be sufficient for the action of the House. There are other points which I might present; but there are other gentlemen who wish to speak on this subject, and I will first yield to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WHITTEMORE.]

Mr. PAINE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman who has this case in charge whether we are to have a vote on it to-night?

Mr. KERR. In the absence of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. COOK,] who has charge of this report, I will answer the question. Before the gentleman from Illinois retired from the room he said to me that it was his intention to call for the previous question as soon as the hour of the gentleman now holding the floor had expired and I had submitted a few remarks, and to have a vote this evening.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. Mr. Speaker, so elaborately and fully have the facts and evidence been presented in this case by the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STOVER] that I shall in the short time allotted me confine my remarks to the general influences encountered during the late elections in the South. While the eloquence of the hopeful and brilliant minds that shape the expectations of the masses is being exhausted in arguments upon "what has been accomplished by the election of General Grant," and these Halls resound with the prudent, yet earnest, admonitions of veteran legislators, who speak for the people, as the oracles of their demands, and stand as sentinels at the gates of public safety, cautioning useless and extravagant outlays; while claimants of every character are pressing their importunate measures of relief, and the combined army of petitioners is moving toward the Capitol to secure aid in behalf of their "benevolent and universally-desired" projects, which they tell us are to develop the boundless resources of the gigantic Republic and add to the wealth of its people, the extent of its revenues, and consequently liquidate the national debt more easily and speedily; while our desks are covered and the lobbies are filled with appeals to our sympathies and judgments, that we may be enlisted among the advocates of bills and resolutions that shall dig canals, build bridges, construct railroads, increase and decrease the tariff, grant subsidies, and every other special favor that human ingenuity and necessity can devise, there are matters, Mr. Speaker, that demand the consideration of every one, without reference to party distinctions, who claim to have been exercised by or who now anxiously look for the coming event which has been promised—the era of peace.

There are claims which must be heard; the plea of "the burdens that oppress us" cannot and must not close the ears of Congress to the condition which the loyal men of our country, especially in the States so recently reclaimed from the results of secession and rebellion, have been and are now experiencing. It is one thing to pass reconstruction laws; to declare the governmental policies as to how the late rebel States shall be restored to their "practical relations in the Union;" by what means they shall come back to the fellowship of States and lift their voice in the councils of the nation; but it is another thing to carry out these laws, these policies, and make the legislation of Congress, its enactments, practical and enduring. It is unnecessary for me to repeat the many propositions or conditions which, from the close of the war of the rebellion, were tendered to the southern States and rejected by their Legislatures and condemned by the paroled yet belligerent subjects of the nation's clemency; for already is the fact acknowledged by the final declarations of both Houses of Congress, the conformity to which alone has enabled the Representatives of the largest number of such States to present their credentials for and obtain their seats in the present Congress of the United States.

It has been no flowery path through which they have come; they have not been brought in the arms of such as have, according to the hackneyed phrase, "accepted the logic of events;" they have not filled the vacant chairs from which arrogant traitors hastened to their work of ruin, by the express wish of confederates converted, nor have they come to impose upon the nation the assurance that the reign of peace is triumphant among their constituencies.

So much has been said on this subject that the recital of what it has cost thus far to bring order out of confusion is received with a measure of doubt and caution by those who are willing to admit that much has been accomplished—more, perhaps, than might have been expected. It has become, however, too much the case that the honest reconstructionist of the North, who, if he differs with his neighbor in matters ever so radical in nature or opposite in character, and does so without fear of molestation or peril, thinks that the same condition of things exists throughout the whole land, or rather does not know that they do not exist. And when the faithful advocate of allegiance to the organic law of the land, the uncompromising friend of the Union, the defender of its honor, the loyal, true, and devoted patriot in the South, who has braved the contests which have been so fiercely waged, so severely won to restore the unity and perpetuity of the States, tells the perils he has encountered, reads the horrors of the inquisition that has been established among those who were to decide as to who they would have to "rule over them;" whether they would bring back "the wayward sisters" to the paternal household or leave them without in the wilderness of discontent and disorder, the wastes of confusion and alarm, it has been too often presumed that the mind of the narrator has become by virtue of his surroundings too easily impressed with imaginary fears, wrongs, and terrors, or that he is seeking to make for himself a notoriety, to establish himself a hero as yet unchronicled or unrecognized.

It is not too much for me to say that any one, however small the position he may have occupied, or humble he may have been in the efforts which have been put forth to reconstruct either of the "so-called confederate States," has a history to relate which would astonish the incredulous and astound the ready to believe. I know whereof I speak, that a price has been set upon the head of every prominent man who has dared to become the leader of the new order of things among the old adherents of the past régimes of the South; that a mark has been set against his name on the list of the doomed, and he was to be dragged to the slaughter in case the plans of the conspirators, who are not yet idle or sleeping, prevailed; and that mark has not yet been removed.

I am aware, indeed I know, that extermination of all who dared to espouse the cause of the Union was the purpose, the sworn intent, of the secret organized powers that held "their carnivals over the hopes that the lost cause might yet be regained." Intimidations of the most open and flagrant character have been practiced; men who desired to do their duty, to act in accordance with what they believed to be incumbent upon them, have been assured, if they dared to exercise the privileges that had been legislated them in any manner other than that which would satisfy such as were still plotting against reconstruction, they would do so at the peril of their lives and the loss of their opportunities to live.

Threatening has been the order in high and low places, and did any manifest the courage to encounter the probabilities before them the whole dialect of abuse and threats has been exhausted to prevent their performance of a resolution so hazardous. The reign of terror, of fearful insecurity, has been encountered, and only through the taking of their lives in their hands with a full determination to win "liberty or death" have the loyal men of the South made their way thus far in the settlement of the great problem intrusted to their solution.

Fraud unexampled, bribery unparalleled, violence unmerciful, and every species of corruption known, except where total depravity prevails, has been the actuating endeavor of the unrepentant and unreconciled traitor who still "lives and moves and has his being" in the counsels of those who pretend "they are ready to submit to the manifest sentiments of destiny," only that they may the more speedily clutch at the throat of our national existence.

During the last election, when the decision was to be made whether we would have peace or war; whether reconstruction should be a success or a failure; when the enunciations of men at the North and men at the South were so unmistakable that "the wayfaring man though a fool" could not mistake their interpretations; when the old leaders, whose bugle calls had aroused the spirits of sedition in the past, looked their comrades in the eye and bade them gather for "the last grand struggle," and reprobate patriots struck hands and united purposes to turn back the wheels of progress in the cause of the rehabilitation of the South; and reechoed the heresy of rebels; when the acts of this national Legislature, passed by the representatives of loyal States, to preserve the whole Union from the hands of the treason-workers and covenant-breakers, were declared "unconstitutional, illegal, and void," and plots already had been perfected and proclaimed to set aside the work already done, close the doors of the Legislative Assemblies that had been opened by the key of "equal rights" given by constitutional provisions to all men, through the power transmitted by the highest tribunal of the land; when hope had been inspired in the breasts of the mourners over the rolled-up parchments of secession and the flags of rebellion, and they believed that a rally around the ballot-box would give them what they had lost through the cartridge-box, then did the loyal men of the South discover the danger that encompassed them, and the peril that was before them more imminent than ever; then did they learn the fallacy of the confessions of those who have affirmed "that they recognize the fact that the hope of the present as well as the future of the South lies in the stability of the Government of the United States." Those who were really the organizers of the opposition to congressional policies did not believe such a doctrine, nor do they believe it now. It was a strong invention of the enemy, and well calculated to deceive those who are willing to believe the wolf a lamb that hides himself in the fleece of innocence. I counsel those who hear me to beware, and cautiously to legislate in the future. True, armed rebellion does not exist, but the fires of sedition burn upon the altars which have been set up in the hearts of those who still reverence the stars and the bars. They sit in the lurking places of the villages, and in secret places, as well as open, murder the Unionists. The blood of our colleague cries out from the ground, though his voice is hushed by the violent and the cruel men of Arkansas, who would consign to sudden death every member of Congress who sympathizes with the work of loyal reconstruction had they the opportunity. Universal amnesty has bid the head and front of the confederacy return, and by their works in the past we are to judge whether they will be inactive in the future.

During the last election, not only were men not allowed the free and undisturbed exercise of the franchise, but such as dared to maintain it were compelled to pass through an ordeal that would have tried the courage of many who claim that fear is not in their vocabulary. Many, too, were forced to cast their ballots for men and measures fatal to their best interests and antagonistic to their convictions or suffer banishment from society, discharge from labor, the avenues of trade and profit, cruel injuries in property and person, if not assassination and death. Returns of this election have been made false and illegal, and persons have been elected who never could have been elected had a fair, open, and impartial election been held. And such persons have been aiders and abettors in all that pertained to a total disregard of the laws of registration, intimidation, violence, and corruption. Some of them will send their petitions here for the removal of all legal and political disabilities, attaching to them by virtue of their participation in the rebellion, on the ground of being elected to office, but will fail to describe the manner of securing such an election. Some of them will make their appearance at the next Congress with their credentials, claiming to have received the highest number of votes, but they will not be indorsed thereon "secured through bribery, corruption, violence, and murder." Some of them will endeavor to press their way through these doors to these seats with their certificates covered with the blood of loyal men who have laid down their lives to carry out the great and glorious work which has culminated in the restoration of the Union of the States. They stand not, Mr. Speaker, on the order of their coming so they secure what they ever thirst for—opportunity for evil.

Mr. WOODWARD. I rise to a point of order. I have listened attentively to this discourse, and have not heard one word in respect to the pending case. I make the point that it is not in order for the gentleman to discuss elections in South Carolina on the question now pending.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. I am speaking in general of the questions involved.

Mr. WOODWARD. I insist on my point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, [Mr. SCOTFIELD in the chair.] The Chair overrules the point of order. So far as the Chair has given attention to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina they seem to be something about elections.

Mr. WOODWARD. They are in reference to elections in South Carolina, and not this election in Missouri.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not been giving particular attention to them.

Mr. WOODWARD. That is the difference between the Chair and myself.

Mr. WARD. Gentlemen have been insisting on representation from South Carolina, and I do not see why the gentleman should not be heard.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. In the State of South Carolina, especially in the third and fourth congressional districts of that State, loyal organizations have been broken up, loyal men hunted like beasts, by night and by day their houses fired into by lawless and merciless mobs; they themselves tortured and murdered, public speakers hounded, threatened and assassinated. The chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, one of the most devoted champions of human rights and eloquent advocates of peace and good will, a State senator and several members of the General Assembly brutally and maliciously murdered; mass meetings called for loyal purposes prevented, shamefully disturbed, and dispersed; armed mobs openly banded and secret clubs solemnly sworn to prevent the free exercise of the ballot; managers of elections prevented the performance of their functions of office; the local press oracles only of rebellious sentiment and malice, counseling resistance to the law and the legally constituted authorities, arousing the basest and most direful passions, advising the hanging of such as might dare to express an opinion contrary to the will of the prime movers in the second grand conspiracy to bring ruin to the already endangered Republic; nameless indignities and outrages perpetrated upon women and men; law and order completely subverted; armed men in possession of the public rights and immunities; the ballot-box, the palladium of American liberty, prostituted and desecrated, and proscription, ostracism, and terror established, such as at least in our own country has never before been witnessed, and God grant may never be again.

This is no overdrawn picture upon the canvas of imagination; but it is what the loyal men of the State I am representing have passed through to bring South Carolina back to her proper place in the Union. It is what loyal men of every southern State have contended against, that they might secure for all time the glorious immunities of freemen, the rights of American citizens, and the title deed guaranteed to us in our Magna Charta—the inalienable "right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." My colleagues on this floor, my peers from the States that have had an experience similar to my own, and those who have never deserted the grand underlying principle of our national faith, equal political privileges, who have on their knees beneath the starry banner prayed that "not one star should be erased or one stripe effaced," know that I have "set down nought in malice," nothing false extenuated; that I have spoke right on the things which they themselves can testify. But that I may strengthen the statements so positively declared I add the communication of his Excellency R. K. Scott, the Governor of South Carolina, transmitted in his message to the General Assembly shortly after the election to which I have alluded, which bears upon the same matter—

Mr. WOODWARD. I insist that it is not in order on this question to refer to messages of the Governor of South Carolina.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair having listened to the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, is of the opinion that they ought to be confined to the pending question.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. I have only a few words more. I know they may painfully surprise some and hurt the feelings of some, but I am only declaring my personal experience, as well as the history of the country.

Mr. WOODWARD. At the instance of several gentlemen near me, and especially the gentleman from Georgia, I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. WHITTEMORE. I read from the message of Governor Scott, as follows:

"It is my painful duty to bring to your notice a condition of affairs in certain portions of the State which imperatively demands your gravest consideration. Violations of law, and outrages upon persons and property have been perpetrated by vicious and unprincipled men, with a recklessness and ferocity which, while they have brought affliction and anguish to the bosoms of bereaved families and friends, have cast a shadow upon the fair fame of the Commonwealth, mortifying and painful to all who are jealous of her reputation, and which will require of you the prompt adoption of the most efficient measures for its ample vindication.

"Hon. James Martin, a representative in the General Assembly from the county of Abbeville, was murdered on the 5th day of October last. He was on his way homeward from the court-house, and was pursued by a gang of ruffians, by whom he was assassinated in the public highway. Mr. Martin was an intelligent and patriotic citizen, singularly inoffensive in language and demeanor, and all the circumstances connected with this outrage mark it as a cold-blooded assassination.

"Hon. B. F. Randolph, a Senator from Orangeburg county, was assassinated at Hodges' Station, near Cokesbury, Abbeville county, on the 16th of October. Mr. Randolph was on his way to address a meeting of his fellow-citizens, and upon the stopping of the train while on the platform of the car, was assassinated by three ruffians, who had evidently been lying in wait for the purpose; and notwithstanding there were a number of persons present, including those connected with the train, the assassins were permitted to leisurely mount their horses and escape. Mr. Randolph was a man of enlarged views, of great force of character, and exercised an extensive influence upon public sentiment. Notwithstanding that he was studiously courteous and liberal in his intercourse with his fellow-men, the additional infamy, as in the case of Mr. Martin, was attempted by sheer fabrications and falsehood to blacken his character and defame his memory as a palliation, if not justification of his murder. Other instances of violence and outrages of the most revolting character, in portions of Edgefield, Abbeville, and Newberry counties have been reported to this department, but prominence has been given to the assassinations of Messrs. Martin and Randolph because of their official position. Large rewards have been offered for the apprehension of these murderers, some of whom are known to be refugees and outlaws from adjoining States, who availed themselves of the political excitement as a cloak for their schemes of rapine and murder; but such is the condition of society in their immediate neighborhoods that neither the promised rewards nor the strenuous efforts of civil officers have accomplished their arrest.

"They are fully armed and mounted, and boast of the extent and power of their organization. And a somewhat prominent individual, who is himself under heavy bonds to answer the charge of complicity in the murder of the lamented Randolph, has had the hardihood to publish an address to the Executive, threatening still further outrages and additional victims. As a discouraging evidence of the deterioration of journalistic worth and morals, it may be mentioned that this covert threat of assassination has been published and republished without a word of censure or dissent. The turbulent condition of affairs in the localities alluded to cannot and must not be longer tolerated. The law must be made supreme. The most arrogant must be taught to obey its behests; the humblest assured of its protection."

"The difficulties" or enormous outrages in Georgia, which have not yet ceased, the violations of all the intents and purposes of the law by men who have been uppermost in the councils of opposition to a popular government, who are by virtue of their traitorous deeds ineligible to office, yet controlling the power of the State and the destinies of the people, convince us that peace is not yet a national blessing. The very men who despise the terms and conditions which qualify them to hold place or position are still the secret organizers of terror and the approvers of its devilish results. In Tennessee, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, portions of North Carolina, wherever the voice of secession and the band of treason has been raised, there the reign of rapine and murder, the barbarisms of bloody clans have been inaugurated. Registration laws, constitutional provisions, legislative enactments have been disregarded, trampled under foot; the courts have become the refuge and the judges justifiers of prowling assassins who imbrue their hands in the blood of the lover of his country, in the wholesale slaughter of such as have been taught and baptized in the faith of our fathers and claim the protectorate of the national might.

The following is the report of Brevet Major General Reynolds, commanding the fifth military district, embracing the State of Texas:

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DISTRICT,
STATE OF TEXAS, AUSTIN, November 4, 1868.

GENERAL: I have the honor to forward herewith annual tabular statement of expeditions, scouts, and report of movements of the various regiments serving in this district for the year ending September 30, 1868.

Armed organizations, generally known as "Ku-klux Klan," exist independently, or in concert with other bands, in many parts of Texas, but are most numerous, bold, and aggressive east of the Trinity river.

The precise objects of these organizations cannot be readily explained, but seem in this State to be to disarm, rob, and, in many cases, murder Union men and negroes, and as occasion may offer, murder United States officers and soldiers; also, to intimidate every one who knows anything of the organization, but who will not join it.

The civil law east of the Trinity river is almost a dead letter. In some counties the civil officers are all, or a portion of them, members of the Klan. In other counties, where the civil officers will not join the Klan, or some other armed band, they have been compelled to leave their counties; examples are Van-Zandt, Smith, and Marion counties; the county seat of the latter is Jefferson.

In many counties where the county officers have not been driven off their influence is scarcely felt. What political end, if any, is aimed at by these bands I cannot positively say; but they attend in large bodies the political meetings (barbecues) which have been and are being held in various parts of the State under the auspices of the Democratic clubs of the different counties.

The speakers encourage the attendance; and in several counties men have been indicated by name from the speakers' stand as those selected for murder. The men thus pointed out have no course left them but to leave their homes or be murdered on the first convenient opportunity.

The murder of negroes is so common as to render it impossible to keep an accurate account of them.

Many of the members of these bands of outlaws are transient persons in the State, the absence of railroads and telegraphs, and the great length of time required to communicate between remote points, facilitating their devilish purposes. These organizations are evidently countenanced, or, at least, not discouraged, by a majority of white people in the counties where the bands are most numerous. They could not otherwise exist.

I have given this matter close attention, and am satisfied that a remedy, to be effective, must be gradually applied, and combined with the firm support of the Army, until these outlaws are punished or dispersed. They cannot be punished by the civil courts until some examples of military commissions show that men can be punished in Texas for murder and kindred crimes. Perpetrators of such crimes have not heretofore, except in very rare instances, been punished in the State at all.

Free speech and free press, as the terms are generally understood in other States, have never existed in Texas. In fact the citizens of other States cannot appreciate the state of affairs in Texas without actually experiencing it.

The official reports of lawlessness and crime, so far from being exaggerated, do not tell the whole truth. Jefferson is the center from which most of the trade, travel, and lawlessness of Eastern Texas radiates, and at this point or its vicinity there should be stationed about a regiment of troops. The recent murder at Jefferson of Hon. G. W. Smith, a delegate to the constitutional convention, has made it necessary to order more troops to that point. This movement weakens the frontier posts to such an extent as to impair their efficiency for protection against the Indians; but the bold, wholesale murdering in the interior of the State seems at present to prevent a more urgent demand for troops than Indian depredations.

The frontier posts should, however, be reinforced if possible, as it is not improbable that the Indians from the north-west, after having suffered defeat there, will make heavy incursions into Texas.

To restore measurable peace and quiet to Texas will require, for a long time, that troops be stationed at many county seats, until by their presence and aid, if necessary, the civil law can be placed in the hands of reliable officers, and executed. This will be the work of years, and will be fully accomplished only by an increase of population.

I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. J. REYNOLDS,
Brevet Major General
United States Army, commanding.

ADJUTANT GENERAL U. S. A., Washington, D. C.

I quote again from the message:

"An armed organization, styling themselves the Ku-klux Klan, uniformed and masked, by their secret meetings and midnight atrocities upon peaceable and unoffending citizens and obstructing the laws, have inaugurated a reign of terror in many neighborhoods. Imitations of the secret societies of Europe during the Middle Ages, they are without their excuse of justification. In those days their power and their vengeance were directed against the turbulent nobles and barons who defied the laws and oppressed the people. Their object was the attainment of justice, not the acquisition of political power. Their victims were not the law-abiding and the lowly, but the bold bad men who trampled on right and outraged humanity. Their symbols were the dagger and the cord, fit emblems of their terrible authority and their mode of exercising it. But even in those days of rapine and murder the responsibility of this dangerous power was deemed so questionable and hazardous as to lead to its suppression."

From Louisiana comes a voice proclaiming the reign of terror triumphant through her boundaries. Governor Warmouth, in his letter to Senator KELLOGG says:

"I assert that the late election did not elicit the honest will of the people, and that the result was attained by the most shameless resort to murder, assassination, tumult, and intimidation, not to speak of proscription, that was ever known in this country, and that to allow it to go on as the expressed will of the people would be an outrage upon republican institutions and ruinous to good government for years to come."

Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee all tell the same eventful history. Nor with the election, Mr. Speaker, have these scenes of disorder and violence ceased. Although the great questions which to the over sanguine in their review of the moral, political, constitutional, and financial phases of our national character seem to have been settled, yet loyalty is not protected; the patriot southern man is not surrounded by that security which the nation owes to her citizens everywhere. But the time is not far off when we confidently look for that promise which I believe, Mr. Speaker, none more eloquently than yourself have assured to those who prove faithful to their country, "that loyalty shall be protected wherever found." All hail the coming day!

As an evidence of the turbulence of disloyal men, who continue their work of terror and hindrance to the law, I will read still another communication from the Governor of my State to the General Assembly:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
COLUMBIA, S. C., December 14, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to the house of representatives the inclosed communication from the deputy constable of Lancaster county, in relation to acts of lawlessness and violence in that vicinity, and the supineness and indifference of the executive officers of the county to the perpetration of outrages whereby the lives and property of peaceful and law-abiding citizens are placed at the mercy of the turbulent and disaffected. I also inclose a letter from Dr. A. F. G. Mittag, the auditor of the county, on the same subject. Dr. Mittag is one of our most respectable and intelligent citizens, and his statements may be implicitly relied on. It is absolutely necessary that a stop should be put to these disgraceful outrages, and the turbulent and disaffected made to feel the force of laws which they are daily in the habit of violating, and to this end all the constitutional powers of the government should be promptly brought into requisition.

Very respectfully,
ROBERT K. SCOTT,
Governor.

The HONORABLE SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

Before the next Congress will appear men from "the unsettled portions" of my State asking admittance, who when they were nominated by the enemies of reconstruction acknowledged they could never be elected if the colored men of the districts to which they belonged "had the courage and audacity to vote, and that they would take good care that they did not vote." The result of the election shows how well they carried out their threatenings. I would, Mr. Speaker, ask for a committee of investigation to visit my State and report upon the outrages which have been committed, the corruption practiced, in order that the next House may be prepared to answer the demand of such as may come here claiming a right to a seat in the Forty-First Congress. I believe I should be justified in doing it, for the sacredness of the franchise there and elsewhere has been violated and the guardians of the public weal should learn how far those who come the accredited Representatives of loyal men are entitled to acceptance or rejection. But, Mr. Speaker, the frequent admonitions of my friend, the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], have caused me to fear the success of such request.

All I ask, Mr. Speaker, is that loyal men may feel and know that they are to be fortified on every side by the strong arm and defenses of the nation; that they are to have not only the solemn assurances of protection, but that they may see, through the future legislation which may transpire in these Halls, that treason has been made odious, that traitors have been declared criminals, and that the severest penalties of the law will be visited upon those who persecute men because of their fidelity to their country, their unswerving integrity, and love of the right.

Mr. KERR. I will yield for two or three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TIFF. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say now in reference to the statements made in the speech we have just heard that so far as my own State of Georgia is concerned they are untrue, and that in a few days I shall be prepared with testimony disproving the whole charge.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to detain the House very long with any remarks in this case; but I think that it is my duty to make a few. From the very origin of this case to this hour it has presented to the House and to the country features which are extraordinary. This case commenced before the constitutional life of this present Congress began. It has been pending before this Congress during its constitutional life, now within only a few days of its expiration, and yet this case remains undecided. I think gentlemen will consult the records of Congress in vain to find any parallel to this case in its treatment by this House.

Nearly one year ago, sir, the honorable gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] made a report in this case in favor of the contestant, which expressed the unanimous judgment of the Committee of Elections except one member. That report was clearly and strongly, on all points of law and fact, with the contestant. Action upon that report, at the instance of gentlemen who are colleagues of the sitting member in this case, for certain alleged reasons was indefinitely postponed. I fear the true reason was that the colleagues of the gentleman from the State of Missouri, expecting an adverse decision, did not want it to go to Missouri until certain cherished party purposes had been attained in that State at the last election. It was therefore found necessary on the part of some of those gentlemen upon the floor of the House to assert a year ago that the contestant was not a loyal man, and by reason of disloyalty was not entitled to his seat in this House, and upon that allegation to ask this House to extend the time in which evidence might be taken by the respective parties on this new allegation. By the over-indulgence, in my judgment, if not the unjust willingness, of this House to lend its powers to the promotion of partisan schemes, that extension was granted in order that they might establish this new allegation against the contestant.

What did they do, Mr. Speaker? They went back to the State of Missouri, folded their arms in indifference as to this particular charge of disloyalty and as to the whole case, and proceeded to engage in the then pending canvass in that State, and gave their whole time and attention to that canvass and to the attainment of the purposes intended to be secured by the delay.

Mr. BENJAMIN ROSE.

Mr. KERR. In a moment. While that course is being pursued by them contrary to the rules of legal evidence, contrary to the requirements of common sense, and, I might add, to common justice, the contestant was compelled to go to the State of Missouri to incur additional expense and additional labor and trouble in taking testimony on his own account to establish a negative, to show that he was not a disloyal man, and to remove from this record the slightest color of a pretext for his continued exclusion from a seat in this House.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana whether he is not aware of the fact that this House, by a most emphatic vote, instructed the Committee of Elections to make that inquiry; and whether he is not aware of the fact that the Committee of Elections have not summoned a witness to testify in the case, although a long list of witnesses was furnished to them?

Mr. KERR. I cannot yield for a speech.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Is not the gentleman aware of that fact?

Mr. KERR. I will answer the gentleman. I am glad that he has invited my attention to that question. I say to him that I do not know any such thing, and that no such thing is the fact in this case. I say further, Mr. Speaker, that it is a thing without a precedent in this country that a committee of elections shall be required in a contest between two claimants for a seat to go into the State from which the respective parties come. It is a most astonishing proposition that the Committee of Elections of the House of Representatives is to be made a perambulating, roving committee, a sort of committee of political scavengers, to run all over this country upon the request or nod of any member of this House, whether he be a party to the contest or not.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the gentleman to let the resolution be read.

Mr. KERR. I do not yield. I ask the gentlemen of this House, I ask the members of this committee, I ask experienced and venerable parliamentarians whether this would not be a most extraordinary proceeding? Here is a contested election in which one party is the sitting member, who claims that he is entitled to retain his possession of that seat, and in which another party is the contestant, and alleges that the seat ought to be given to him. Now, a third party, not a party to this record at all, comes before this House, and on his own motion, in behalf of nobody, asks this House to send the Committee of Elections out of its proper place in this House, out of its proper place in the capital, to traverse the State of Missouri, or to go anywhere else where he should indicate that it might find evidence upon which to sustain some allegation he has thought it proper to make. Ah! Mr. Speaker, the misfortune in this case on the part of the gentleman from Missouri, and I fear on the part of the whole Republican delegation of that State, is that they have suffered themselves to become so much personally interested in the result of this contest as to have sacrificed their disinterestedness, as to have sacrificed their freedom from bias, from prejudice, and from the control of passion and those fanatical feelings which lead to complete judicial blindness. The gentleman who has just propounded a question to me in his own remarks to-day said that he must confess to the House the intensity of his feelings in this case.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] asserts that the House directed the Committee of Elections to investigate his charge of disloyalty against the contestant. Such an order, or rather an order that seems to bear such a construction, was made by the House about a year ago. But the gentleman must know that a few days afterward, and to remove all ambiguity from the first order, the House adopted the following resolution:

"On motion of Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, Resolved, That in the matter of charges of disloyalty made by Hon. J. F. BENJAMIN against the contestant for a seat in this House from the ninth district of Missouri, and of the contestant against the sitting member, the testimony be taken in the manner prescribed in the act regulating contested elections, the notice in each case to be served respectively on the respondent and the person making the charge, and the testimony to be filed with the Clerk of the House within ninety days from the passage of this resolution."

The gentleman is welcome to all the truth there is in his assertion concerning the order of the House.

Mr. Speaker, it is pertinent here to inquire why the gentleman referred to and all his Republican colleagues and the sitting member have failed to take one line or word of testimony to sustain or even justify his charge—in my judgment, most gratuitous charge—of disloyalty against Colonel Switzler. Is it unfair, is it unjust toward anybody to conclude that the charge having accomplished the desired postponement of the decision by the House it was at once abandoned, and the humiliating admission thus made that it never rested upon any truth? If it was true it was material, in the judgment of the majority of this House, to the right decision of this case; and if true it could have been established by proof. It was not, and no attempt was made to prove it. The House was thus trifled with, and its indulgence and power were abused, and that, too, to advance personal, partisan, and selfish aims. Such conduct demands the most signal rebuke both of this House and the country. But, Mr. Speaker, it was not true, and so the Committee of Elections have twice solemnly declared to the House.

Major General H. W. Halleck, the first commandant of the department of the Missouri, and whose administration of that department embraced the important years of 1861-62, bears this unequivocal testimony to Mr. Switzler's loyalty, under date of San Francisco, California, October 5, 1868:

"In regard to your conduct in Missouri in 1861-62, while I was in command of that department, it gives me pleasure to say that you were regarded as a reliable, outspoken, and uncompromising Union man. You gave valuable information in regard to the operations of the rebels in central Missouri, and assisted greatly in the success of the Union cause."

Major General Rosecrans, who was also a commander of the department of the Missouri, says:

"WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., August 14, 1868.

"I can assure any one who will take my word for it that while in command of the department of the Missouri I had occasion to inquire into your antecedents, and to know you personally and officially, and that you were in my estimation an undoubtedly loyal man."

Brigadier General Clinton B. Fisk, of Missouri, a well known Union officer and a member of the Republican party, bears the same testimony. Here is the correspondence, on file with the Committee of Elections:

MISSOURI STATESMAN OFFICE,
COLUMBIA, MISSOURI, September 8, 1868.

DEAR SIR: You knew me well during the war, and I am sure, notwithstanding our present political differences, will do me the justice to say that I was an active, uncompromising Union man. You will much oblige me by stating in reply to this your convictions on this point.

Very truly,

W. F. SWITZLER.

St. Louis, September 17, 1868.

DEAR SIR: I never doubted your loyalty for a moment.

CLINTON B. FISK.

To the same effect, full, clear, and overwhelming, testify Generals Lewis Merrill, Joseph B. Douglass, Colonel William F. Shaffer, and some thirty or forty other Union officers, soldiers, and citizens. Few if any members of Congress, either Republican or Democratic, could produce a fuller, clearer, or more unequivocal Union record than Mr. Switzler has filed with the committee.

It is a remarkable fact in connection with this case also, Mr. Speaker, not only as to the conduct of the gentleman to whom I have last referred, but also to the conduct of the gentleman from Missouri, who is one of my colleagues on the Committee of Elections, that they have not been content in their argument here to talk about this case and the evidence and the law in this case as they appear upon the record made by the parties, but they have thought it to be their duty, it may be at the expense of delicacy on their part, to go outside of that record and to constitute themselves witnesses—yes, sir, witnesses—and to testify to numerous and important facts which are not on the record of this case at all. We are told by these gentlemen that this is not a question of law; that it is not a question to be determined by this House on the facts in this record. We are told that this is not a question to be determined by the House, sitting under the solemn obligations of our oaths, but it is a question of loyalty—a question whether loyal men shall govern the State of Missouri.

Mr. Speaker, I have been in the habit of supposing that the question which arises in all contested elections is, whether this House, sitting as a court, will be governed by the law and evidence, or whether it will be governed by passion and prejudice and appeals to party animosity and party hatred? I say, therefore, that we should divest ourselves of all these feelings and approach the consideration of this case as a question of law. We sit here, sir, as jurors. We ought not to come to the consideration of this case, as my friend from Missouri has done, as attorneys for either of the parties. We ought not to come here as friends of either party, having a personal interest in the case. We ought rather to come here as disinterested men, acting solely upon the evidence in the case and the law that should control its application and value.

My friend from Missouri, [Mr. STOVER,] my colleague on the committee, who has addressed the House to-day, has taken it to be a part of his duty—for I take it he would not do a thing that he did not believe to be in the line of his duty—to go so far in his argument as broadly to insinuate that the majority of the committee, through their organ, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] who made the first report in this case, have attempted to manufacture evidence, have attempted to distort and confound and confuse the evidence, it may be, for the purpose of misleading the House. Now, I do not know whether my friend and colleague intended to make that imputation and to stand by it, or whether I misunderstood him. If he does make it, and it is his pleasure thus to come before the House—himself the youngest member in service on that committee, and the only member of that committee who hails from the State of Missouri, and who, therefore, can be supposed personally to participate in and enter into these feelings of local and personal animosity which seem to control some gentlemen—if he chooses to occupy that attitude before the House, then all I have to say is that he is welcome to assume it, and I, for myself, esteem it unworthy of further notice.

Mr. STOVER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. KERR. I will yield to the gentleman either for a question or for explanation.

Mr. STOVER. I desire to say that in that portion of my remarks to which the gentleman refers I meant no discourtesy to the committee; and further, that if I am the youngest member of this House and the youngest member of the committee, I claim the right equally with the oldest member to give an honest expression to my views.

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman's claim, after his explanation, is certainly very proper, and I would be the last gentleman here or anywhere else to question the clear right of the gentleman to exercise his privilege as a member both of the committee and of the House; but let us see what it is that the honorable gentleman from Missouri has been struggling to accomplish in this case. He says it was only to express his honest opinion, and of course it was, because he is an honorable man; but he devoted a large part of his speech to an attempt to show, out of the mouth of one of the witnesses who is in this record, named Snedcor, himself a Republican, that his testimony is not worthy of credit, because he had sworn in one breath that all of the persons who had been registered at his poll had taken the oath required by the laws of Missouri, and in the next breath that only twenty-five of the persons who were so registered had taken that oath. My honorable friend, of course, only intended to express an honest opinion and not to pervert the testimony of the witnesses in this case. But let us see what the witness really said:

"There was no person registered who did not take the oath."

That is clear.

"There were about twenty-five, not exceeding twenty-five, of the first who registered that I explained to them the oath, and asked them if they took the oath, and upon being answered that they did, I then had them to subscribe their names."

That is, twenty-five of the first who appeared and demanded registration. Now, what follows?

"All of the rest of them I had to hold up their right hands while I read the oath to them, after which they subscribed to it."

That is all his testimony on that point. Now, does it appear out of the lips of this witness that any of these persons so registered did not take the oath required by the laws of Missouri? Why, most manifestly it does not; most manifestly it appears that every one of them took that oath, every one of them subscribed that oath, every one of them exactly and literally complied with the laws of that State. There was, therefore, no omission of duty on the part of Snedcor; there was no departure from law; there was no false swearing in his testimony; there was no inconsistency even in anything he said. Yet my honorable friend only intended by the lengthy criticism he made upon that testimony to express an honest opinion as to its just weight and value in this case!

Mr. Speaker, this case has been very fully stated in all its bearings to the House by the two gentlemen of the committee who have submitted reports on the subject. I must assume that every gentleman on this floor has done the justice to this case, and the justice to his own conscience, to read both of these reports, and if they have not satisfied his judgment, then I trust that he has turned to and read the report of the evidence in the case upon which the reports are based. If they have done that, if they have given that sort of consideration to the case, and have suffered their judgments to be controlled alone by the evidence and by the law, then I do submit in profound confidence that between me and any other gentleman on this floor there can be very little difference of opinion as to what the judgment of this House ought to be. There is a great deal of matter in this record, as in all such cases, that has no legal value as evidence. This is sufficiently exposed in the able report of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] and I will waste no time in its reexamination. The conduct of some of the officers in connection with this case merits most earnest condemnation, and is consistent only with most corrupt partisan purposes on their part. The disqualifying laws of Missouri are in themselves a disgrace to the people of that State and to the civilization of our age. But it seems to have been the wicked determination of those officers to add intensified severity and cruelty in their execution.

The majority given for the contestant, upon a fair count of the votes, is 1,122. There was no evidence produced by the sitting member to overcome the facts which have been placed upon the record by the contestant. There has been no attempt on the part of the sitting member, as my colleague from Illinois [Mr. COOK] has most truly said, by evidence, by testimony, by legal means, by any of the agencies which the law places at his command, to show this House that that majority of 1,122 can be overcome by anything in fact or in law which should govern the report and judgment of the House. We decided, in the case of Birch vs. VAN HORN, from Missouri, with entire unanimity, without a dissenting voice, that where these outside irregularities are alleged to have existed, but are not placed upon the record in the form of legal testimony or legal evidence, they cannot be considered by the House as in the record at all; that it is no part of the duty of the House to travel outside of the record and take general statements, newspaper articles, rumors, vague suspicions, mere expressions of opinion on the part of earnest partisans, as any evidence at all. We decided that it is the duty of the parties to the contest, whose interest is also presumed to be so great as to lead them to do so, to present to the House, to the court, to the jury, all the facts upon which they desire that the case shall be decided. In that case Judge Birch, who was my political friend, who was the Democratic candidate in that district, failed to perform his duty in that particular. And I, therefore, as one of the members of the Committee of Elections, divesting myself of all prejudices, of all partisan feelings and predilections, determined and decided in my own judgment that he was clearly not entitled to unseat Mr. VAN HORN. Why? Not at all because, in my judgment, he had not in fact received a majority of the legal votes cast in that district; but because he had failed, by the record he had made here, to place that fact properly upon the record, and to bring it, in the mode prescribed by law, to the observation first of the Committee of Elections, and afterwards of the House itself. We decided, therefore, that he was not entitled to the seat.

Here is a case which upon all grounds is absolutely analogous to that one; it is almost precisely the same kind of a case. In the case under consideration it is alleged that large numbers of persons voted in Callaway county who were not authorized to vote, either by reason of their disloyalty or from the lack of some other qualification required by law. But there is no such proof. Why not? All such facts can be proven, if true. There is no testimony in this record that can satisfy any just and fair-minded judge that enough of those who voted in the county of Callaway for the contestant in this case were disqualified to affect in any material degree the result in this case or to change the right of the parties. Yet it was the sitting member's imperative duty to make the proof; he did not do it. He preferred to rely upon appeals to passion and partisanship. He preferred to find safety in the strength of his party in this House.

I have no hesitation in saying—and in this I agree with my friend from Missouri [Mr. STOVER]—that to the State of Missouri alone belongs the clear constitutional right to prescribe and fix the qualifications for suffrage within its limits. But that in no degree affects the rule of law which requires the party who undertakes to maintain an alleged state of facts to put upon the record in a legal form the testimony or evidence which is necessary to sustain his allegations.

It is alleged, and that, too, by my friend from Missouri, who is not upon the Committee of Elections, [Mr. BENJAMIN]—and it is a fact also that is outside of the record in this case—that in 1868 there was a registration made in this same county of Callaway, and that under that registration there was a very large reduction in the aggregate list of voters in the county, as shown by the registration of 1866. Now, sir, that is no doubt true, although it is not in this record; but for the purpose of this argument I will concede that it is so. But that concession in no way changes my conclusion in the case, nor do I think it can in any way change the conclusion of any gentleman; because if it be all true, still it does not follow that the contestant would not upon that registration have been elected. The very contrary follows, whether you consider the registration of 1868 in point of numbers or that of 1866, taking the proportion of either registration to which the vote of 1866 would entitle the contestant; in either event it fails to change the legal result in this case. But, Mr. Speaker, if a fact like this is to be dragged into this case, it then becomes the imperative duty of the House to inquire, and to give the contestant an opportunity to show, by what agencies such a result was produced in the registration of Callaway county in 1868. I have no doubt it is a fact, and susceptible of legal proof, that that result is due in great part to the interest of certain gentlemen in this contest and the determination thus to manufacture "make-weights" to affect its decision; and I have no doubt that the registration is in itself a monument of fraud, injustice, cruel disfranchisements, and outrage against the citizens and legal electors of that county. I am most credibly assured this is the case. It is therefore most irregular, as well as cruelly unjust to the contestant, that the registration in 1868 should be appealed to at all. I submit, therefore, that after the long delay which has attended the prosecution of this case, it is alike due to the dignity and judicial fairness of this House and to the parties to this contest that the question shall now be decided, and decided upon its clear and manifest merits, wholly divorced from all feelings of prejudice or passion.

It has been said by the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. PETERS] that he has concluded that the judgment of the House in this case ought to be in favor of the sitting member for two reasons: first, that the contestant did himself in fact confess that in the year 1864 there were not two hundred qualified and loyal voters in Callaway county. Now, I would like to inquire of that gentleman—for, of course, he also meant no perversion of the evidence, no unfair statement of the facts upon the record—I would like to ask him from what testimony he deduces any such fact as that? Sir, the fact is not proven; it is not in this record; it is denied by the contestant. He says he never wrote any such letter; that he never expressed any such opinion. No such letter, no such opinion can be found anywhere in the records of the Provost Marshal General's office during that year or any other year.

The gentleman from Maine ought to have known that in March, 1867, in relation to this very case, this House by a resolution called upon the then Secretary of War to furnish to this House a copy of that letter, or a copy of any such letter that might be upon the records of the Provost Marshal's Bureau or of the War Department written by the contestant. No such letter has ever been found; no such evidence has ever been furnished; no such record has ever been shown. Its existence is denied by the contestant. Its existence is asserted by only one human being, and that man is a witness in this record by the name of Davenport, who swears only that he thinks such a letter was once written by the contestant. Yet upon this kind of evidence the gentleman from Maine makes the assertion which he has made, and bases upon it his judgment in this case. I think, Mr. Speaker—I say it with all proper respect for the gentleman—his assertion is as little sustained by anything either in this record or out of this record as the other statement which he has given as his second reason for his judgment in this case, that the members of the Democratic party in Maine were during the war to a large extent disloyal, and, if justice had been done, would never have been allowed to vote. And neither of these assertions is worthy of any respect whatever.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PETERS?]

Mr. KERR. For a question.

Mr. PETERS. Or, I presume, for an explanation. I understand the gentleman to appeal to me to state upon what facts I based the assertion that the contestant had himself said that there were not two hundred loyal men in the county of Callaway.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield at present.

Mr. PETERS. I will furnish the gentleman the testimony, which is uncontradicted.

Mr. KERR. I do not yield for the purpose of having that testimony read, unless the gentleman will say that he has some testimony upon which to base that statement besides the testimony of the witness Davenport, to which I have already referred.

Mr. PETERS. I will say that I have no other testimony then that, but—

Mr. KERR. Then I do not yield further.

Mr. PETERS. But allow me to say that I find it uncontradicted by the contestant himself.

Mr. KERR. He has always denied it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but a moment longer, because I do think that at this late day and hour there is no room for any member longer to doubt what his duty is in this case, and if he wants to perform that duty there need be no further delay in its discharge.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I surrender the floor to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Cook,] who has charge of this question.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, unless the sitting member or the contestant desires to speak on this case I will call the previous question.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would like to have the floor long enough to allow the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. HEATON,] a member of the Committee of Elections, to make a statement with reference to the case.

Mr. COOK. Then I will not move the previous question at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then recognize the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. HEATON.]

Mr. HEATON. Mr. Speaker, from the fact that I happen to occupy a position on the Committee of Elections it seems to be proper that I should make a brief explanation before casting the vote which I intend to cast on the final decision of this question after having heard the arguments on both sides. I have had but little opportunity to hear the discussions which have been had before the Committee of Elections on this important subject. I was present for a short time during the pendency of this question, and have examined the report, and have come to a conclusion upon it. Sir, notwithstanding this report has been drawn by the distinguished gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] and notwithstanding I concede to him eminent legal ability, still I am of the opinion that the legal points in this report are erroneous in a very material point of view. The gentleman lays down in that report that the secretary of State of Missouri, occupying the position he did, was a simple ministerial and executive officer, and could not determine the important question whether he should cast out fraudulent votes from the returns made to him; that, in other words, he had no discretionary power whatever. I maintain, sir, according to the very language of the report of the distinguished gentleman from Vermont himself, in applying to this officer the term of "canvassing officer," that the position which he has assumed is untenable. Why, sir, the very term "canvass" implies a particular discretion. The secretary of State of Missouri was the canvassing officer, and that term "canvassing" means to examine, to search, to sift out. These returns having been made to him, it was his solemn duty, under his oath and under the constitutional laws of Missouri, to look into this subject to see whether fraud had been committed, especially when the question had been brought before him in the most solemn manner that fraud had been committed.

Now, sir, that he was justified in casting out the vote from Callaway county I have no doubt. I believe it is the duty of this House, under constitutional provision, to determine the eligibility of members-elect, and in doing that, to go behind the returns to discover who really is entitled to the seat. One fact has been developed since the committee met of which I was not cognizant at the time, but which has influenced my mind in the vote which I propose to give. The fact is this: in 1866 it is shown that there was a registration in Callaway county of 2,034 votes, and that only two years afterward, that is, in 1868, there was another registration, showing only 664 votes—making a difference of 1,370 votes. That fact is satisfactory evidence to me, together with other proof of fraud which has been produced, that the secretary of State of Missouri exercised his rightful authority in casting out the vote of Callaway county; and I ask this House, before voting on this important subject, to remember that fact. For myself, I have come to the conclusion to cast my vote in favor of the sitting member retaining his seat.

Mr. Cook obtained the floor.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the gentleman to permit me to read the resolution adopted at the last session of Congress.

Mr. UPSON. I object, unless the order of the House made subsequent to that is also read.

Mr. COOK. Let them both be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"I move that the case be recommitted to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to the committee to examine into the charges made against the contestant by the gentleman from Missouri who has just concluded his remarks, and to report thereon to the House, with leave to send for persons and papers; and in order to test the sense of the House I call for the previous question."

Mr. UPSON. I now ask the Clerk to read the action of the House subsequent to that.

The Clerk read as follows:

"On motion of Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections,

Resolved, That in the matter of charges of disloyalty made by Hon. J. F. BENJAMIN against the contestant for a seat in this House from the ninth district of Missouri, and of the contestant against the sitting member, the testimony be taken in the manner prescribed in the act regulating contested elections, the notice in each case to be served respectively on the respondent and the person making the charge, and the testimony to be filed with the Clerk of the House within ninety days from the passage of this resolution."

Mr. COOK demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. COOK. I rise to close the debate, and yield to the gentleman from Vermont thirty minutes.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, I happened to be a member of the Committee of Elections at the time this case was heard before them, and it so happens that I was the organ of the committee in making the report of the majority; and although I have ceased to be a member of that committee, still as this report has been to some extent assailed I think it proper I should say a word in support of the conclusions of the majority of the committee. I know, Mr. Speaker, how very thankless a task it is for a man to undertake to say a word upon a question of this sort against the right of a gentleman to a seat who belongs to the majority of the House politically. I am aware that to a very great extent the question with many a man is simply this: "Which man belongs to my party?" Now, the sitting member is a gentleman in full political fellowship with the party to which I belong. He is a gentleman that I personally very highly esteem, and there is no man on this floor who would vote for him more cheerfully than I would if I believed he was elected. There is a single reason why I cannot vote that he shall retain his seat in this House, and that is, that I verily believe, upon a careful examination of all the evidence introduced before the committee, that he never was legally elected.

Now, to all that class of gentlemen who only wish to know which of the men belongs to their party I have nothing to say. If they can satisfy their consciences by merely ascertaining which of the two men who claims the seat is their political friend, very well. I have no argument to address to that class of gentlemen, even if they belong to my party. As a member of the Committee of Elections, and as a member of this House, in any vote I shall give upon an election case I intend to give that vote just as I would give my vote if I was trying a case between two parties in reference to a mere private right. I know of no law, of no principle of law or of politics or of morals, that will justify any man in giving his vote upon any different grounds. If any gentleman here knows of any principle that will justify him in voting otherwise let him vote so, and let him answer to his own conscience, his constituents, and his God.

The great question that was raised upon the trial of this case before the committee, and the one that is presented to this House, is one that has been undertaken to be obscured and covered up. It is not a question of how many legal voters there were in the county of Callaway, or how many were registered, or how many men voted who were not entitled by the law of Missouri to vote. That is not the question at all; but it is, whether there was a lawful registration of voters in the county of Callaway. The secretary of State of Missouri took it upon himself to throw out the vote of that county entirely, upon the ground that there was no lawful registration of the voters. That is the question to be determined here. It is not at all a question whether there were illegal votes cast in that election or whether there were not.

Now, what is the claim on behalf of the sitting member? It is claimed that in that county there was such a public and general opposition, such a feeling of hostility by the great majority of the people against these provisions of the law of Missouri in relation to the registration, that the registrars dare not carry out the law, and that the loyal inhabitants of the county dared not go before the registrars and make objections to persons who asked to be registered; that they were deterred by fear of personal violence. Upon that ground the secretary of State took it upon him to throw aside the vote of the county of Callaway, declaring that there had been no legal registration there.

Now, I say, in the first place, that the secretary of State of Missouri had no more right to undertake to determine that question than I had. By the laws of the State of Missouri the secretary of State is a mere canvassing, a mere returning officer. The supervisors of registration in the various counties are to certify to the registration as made by the registrars of the different precincts to the secretary of State, and it is made the duty of the secretary of State to count up the votes and give the certificate of election to the man who has the majority. The secretary of State is clothed by the laws of the State with no more authority to go behind the registration and undertake to hear evidence and determine whether there has been a lawful representation or not than any other official in the State. And I venture to say, although my successor on the committee [Mr. HEATON] says it is not law—and I congratulate the Committee of Elections on having obtained superior legal wisdom by the change—that all the authorities in all the books entirely preclude any officer of this sort from undertaking to determine any question of that kind. The authorities are multitudinous on the subject. There is no such law as the gentleman from North Carolina laid down. The statute of Missouri clothes the secretary of State with no such power. He is merely to add up the votes that are returned to him by the supervisors of registration in the various counties, and determine by mathematics which candidate has the majority.

Mr. GRAVELY. I would ask the gentleman if the registration law of Missouri does not require that a list of the names of all the men who are entitled to vote in the State of Missouri shall be certified by the supervisors of registration and filed in the office of the secretary of State? And I would ask, in addition to that, if the election laws of Missouri do not require that the clerks shall send up to the secretary of State the vote of each county, and that he shall take this registered list of voters and compare the names with the certificate of return and award the certificate of election to the man who receives a majority of the votes?

Mr. POLAND. Certainly; and what does all that prove, Mr. Speaker? Why, it proves nothing, either one way or the other, different from what I said. It is made the duty of these officers to return the names of all the men who are registered as qualified voters or who are registered as not qualified, and those returns are to go up under the certificate of the supervisor of registration to the secretary of State, and he, if he knows enough of arithmetic, is to add the votes together and determine which candidate has a majority. There is nothing in the statute of Missouri different from the statutes of other States in relation to the duties of secretary of State in this respect.

I ask you and I ask every gentleman on this floor if you have ever heard before that the secretary of State in any State is to determine the validity of the election? In my own State the secretary of State is the man who is to canvass the votes and give the certificate of election; but it would be a very novel doctrine in Vermont, and I think it would be in North Carolina or in any other State of this Union, that the secretary of State can go behind the certificate of returns and determine who were legal voters and who were not, and whether there was a legal registration in particular counties or whether there was not. He is to determine upon the face of the certificates. Gentlemen talk about the certificate that Mr. Thomas, the superintendent of registration, appended to this return and some certificates that he procured to be appended by one or two of the registrars, as they term them, of the precincts, going aside from the proper certificate that the law authorized and undertaking to state some facts, and gentlemen say that they are to be regarded as conclusive.

Now, suppose that the superintendent of registration had inserted in his certificate that my honorable friend who has just now questioned me had been guilty of horse stealing, would that be legal evidence of it? Just as much so as these facts that he undertakes to certify outside of anything that the law makes it his duty to certify. I say, then, in the first place, that the secretary of State had no right whatever to act upon any of this species of evidence; and more than that, these certificates of the superintendent of registration and of the deputy registers of the precincts, when they went aside to do anything else except to certify to the correctness of their lists, were, as lawyers say, coram non judice. It was all entirely outside of any duty which the law devolves upon them, and whatever they may say about it is no more evidence than anything said by any mere outsider or interloper. So with all the evidence of that kind; it is to go for nothing in this case.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Is not there evidence before the committee to prove that in a short time after this election the population of Callaway county increased very much, while two years afterward the registration decreased more than one half?

Mr. POLAND. The gentleman knows just about as much about that as I do. I never heard anything of the kind until to-day.

Mr. DICKEY. Does not the evidence before the committee show that to be the fact?

Mr. POLAND. I have not now the honor to be a member of the Committee of Elections. I do not know what may be the proof before the committee on that point. The registration of 1868 took place since this case was tried before the committee and since this report was made by them. I am informed by a member of the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR,] that no such evidence ever has been produced before the committee. Whether it has or not I do not know, because I am not a member of the committee. But, be the fact as it may, I regard it as entirely outside of the issue involved in this case.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. I would also inquire of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] if witnesses have not testified that at the time of this election there were not two hundred persons in Callaway county who were loyal men and entitled to vote?

Mr. POLAND. There was no legal evidence upon that point.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. Was there any testimony given to that effect?

Mr. POLAND. There was evidence of this sort: several gentlemen said that they were acquainted in that county, and that in their opinion the number of loyal voters would not exceed, some said, two hundred; others said two hundred and fifty; they varied between those two numbers. But this House has decided that that was not legal evidence at all upon which a committee was authorized to act. Prior to this case we had before the Committee of Elections another case from Missouri, Birch vs. VAN HORN. In that case it also happened that the contestant was a Democrat. That election took place under the same State law that applies to this case. It also happened, in that case, that I was the organ of the committee to make their report to this House.

The evidence in the case disclosed the fact that in that district there were three thousand men who were refused registration whose names were put upon the "unqualified" list, if that is the term. They offered their votes for Judge Birch, and their votes were rejected. Mr. Birch, the contestant, produced abundant witnesses who testified that they were generally acquainted with the men who were thus refused registration, and that in their judgment a great majority of them, nearly all of them, were loyal men, legally entitled to be registered, and ought to have been allowed to vote. Now, if we had regarded that kind of evidence we must have found that a very much larger number of votes had been wrongfully excluded than would have been necessary to elect Mr. Birch. But the committee decided that that was not legal evidence; that we must know whether Mr. A, Mr. B, Mr. C, &c., was or was not a legal voter; that we could not allow a man to make a general estimate of the voters of a county; to say how many loyal men and how many disloyal men were in the county, but that it was a species of evidence that could not be regarded by the committee. And every honorable man in this House, Republican or Democrat—the vote was unanimous—voted that the committee was right. That was good enough law at that time to be applied to a Democrat. But now gentlemen turn upon the Committee of Elections and ask us to eat our own words, and to adopt an entirely different rule when it is to be applied to a Republican. The Committee of Elections are not prepared to do any such thing. If my political friends upon this floor are prepared to lay down one rule to decide the case of a Democrat and another rule to decide the case of a Republican, very well; they are not responsible to me; they must answer to their own consciences.

Now, that is the only species of evidence that we have before us in relation to the number of loyal men or disloyal men there were in the county of Callaway. But that is not a question at all affecting the registration in that county. It is said that there was such a spirit of enmity and hostility to the registration law that it could not be enforced; that there was a pall, a cloud spread over that entire county; that the registration law could not be carried out because of the fear in the hearts of all loyal men that their persons and their lives would not be safe if they should come forward and undertake to enforce the law. Now, Mr.

Speaker, what is the evidence upon this point? The decision of the secretary of State has nothing to do with the question one way or the other. He has no more right to decide such a question than I have. But, sir, although the secretary of State had no right whatever to decide such a question, the Committee of Elections had the right to decide it, and this House has the right to decide it, upon the evidence. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say to gentlemen on this floor that the evidence shows overwhelmingly that this pretense of fear and intimidation has nothing to justify it. The evidence, when carefully considered, establishes beyond question that there was no such ground of fear and no such fear, in fact.

Now, in the first place, let us see in whose hands this registration was. It will not be claimed, I take it, that the gentleman then serving as Governor of Missouri was not a loyal man. It will not be claimed that Mr. Thomas, whom he appointed superintendent of this registration, was not a loyal man; and no one has said that any one of the persons whom Mr. Thomas appointed as deputy registrars in the various precincts of the county of Callaway was not a loyal man. The evidence shows that the great majority of them were the political friends of the sitting member; and there is not a particle of evidence but that every one of them was his political friend, as in the nature of things each of them would be very likely to be. They being appointed by Mr. Thomas, I do not think there is very much ground to presume, in the absence of evidence, that any one of them was not the political friend of Mr. Thomas and the political friend of the sitting member. All those deputy registrars except one or two say that everything connected with the registration was perfectly orderly and peaceable and quiet; that there were no threats of any violence, and that there was no violence, in fact; that they themselves feared nothing in the performance of their duty, and knew of no ground for fear on the part of anybody.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman—I may be mistaken in my recollection of the evidence—whether one of those registrars does not himself testify that a man who had lost an arm in the rebel service presented himself for registration and was registered, although the registrar knew at the time that the man had been in the rebel service?

Mr. POLAND. There is the testimony of a witness who says that he had lost a leg or an arm in the rebel service and was registered in one of the precincts; and this man says the registrar knew he had been in the rebel service, or rather he says he supposes the registrar knew it. The registrar does not say any such thing. Without referring to this man, Garner, I believe that is his name, the registrar swears, in general terms, that he registered no man whom he knew to be disloyal or to have been guilty of disloyal acts. So that at the very most there is on the one side upon this point the evidence of this one-armed or one-legged rebel soldier, and upon the other side the evidence of the registrar directly the other way.

I have hardly time, Mr. Speaker, to go into an examination of the testimony with reference to this allegation of intimidation and violence; but I desire to call the attention of members to the testimony of Mr. James E. Turley, who was one of these deputy registrars. He is the great witness upon whom this case hangs in relation to the fear which is alleged to have pervaded the hearts of all loyal men in that county and prevented them from doing their duty. His testimony is so laughable, so ridiculous, and shows so clearly that this allegation of fear and intimidation is a mere pretense, that I will take the liberty to read a part of his evidence. He was the registrar for Bourbon township, and he was one of the men who made the certificate upon which the secretary of State acted in throwing out the vote of Callaway county:

"Question. In signing the certificate to your registration for Bourbon township, did you believe that the law was faithfully carried out?

Answer. I did then, sir; and if I had to do it again would do just as I did then; but I heard, after I signed the certificate, things which if I had known when I registered I would not have signed the certificate.

Question. Was there not a system of intimidation in the county at the time?

Answer. There was against me, sir. I was intimidated by fear of being interrupted.

Let me read a little further from the testimony of this man Turley:

Question. What did the people say that scared you?

Answer. When you (the contestant) spoke in the court-house you asked if the supervisor was present, and when told that he was not you then asked if any registrars were present, and he told them that we were in a very delicate situation, and to be careful.

Question. What other persons said anything to scare you?

Answer. James K. Sheely made another very frightful remark to me.

Question. When and where did Sheely make the remark, and what was it?

Answer. It was after I was appointed, in front of his office in Fulton. He said if this registration law was carried out according to radical rule there would be five hundred lawsuits in Callaway county.

Question. Didn't you carry out the registration according to the Radical rule?

Answer. I don't think I did; as I had to skin between two parties, as it was rather a zigzag course, liable to a suit from either party.

Question. Were there any suits brought against you?

Answer. Not that I know of.

Question. What other persons scared you by remarks?

Answer. Jeff. Jones made remarks in a speech here that scared me.

Question. What did Jones say?

Answer. Jones advised the people, soldiers and all, to open polls of their own and hold an election in spite of the registration.

Question. Was not Jones's advice not to resist the registration law?

Answer. I did not so understand it; but he advised them not to register at all, but to hold polls of their own at the election.

Question. What other persons made frightful remarks to scare you?

Answer. Well, sir, I'll take Mr. Hookaday as the next man, as he struck more terror to my heart than anybody else. Mr. Hookaday got up the day Mr. Jones spoke and read a document, one clause of which was that "we will put down the Radical party so that they will never destroy any other nation as they have done this."

Question. Was not that document a resolution ratifying the action of the Philadelphia convention?

Answer. I do not know.

Question. What other persons frightened you?

Answer. It was M. Y. Duncan, of Audrian county.

Question. What did he say?

Answer. He said pretty much what you said; only he went further, and said that if any man came forward and took the oath of loyalty, and the registrar refused to register him, he was liable to prosecution.

Question. Are these all that scared you?

Answer. These are all the important ones; there was some neighborhood chat of minor importance."

This is the language of Mr. Turley, one of the gentlemen who was frightened out of his wits and could not make a proper registration. The other man whose testimony Mr. Thomas acted on and who testified that there was such a state of affairs was John Young. He says expressly that all the threats he ever heard about it were that men said if they took the oath and were not registered they would bring suits. I never heard that the threat to sue a man was unlawful. I never heard that it was unlawful for a man to say that he would appeal to the legal tribunals of the country for redress. Every one of these registrars swears that the certificate of Thomas is unequivocally false from top to bottom, and the evidence of these registrars, under oath, in addition to their official certificate, is supported by the testimony of a very considerable number of other witnesses.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's thirty minutes have expired.

Mr. COOK. I will yield the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. POLAND. I would have been glad to have occupied a few minutes' more time, but I see the House is impatient and I will yield the floor.

Mr. COOK. I want to read a clause of the law of Missouri relating to the right of the secretary of State, and I shall then call for a vote:

"The supervisors of registration for the several counties and for each senatorial district in the State and the county of St. Louis shall be required to make and forward to the secretary of State a certified copy of registration therefor, which shall contain the names of all registered voters; which certified copy shall be evidence of the facts therein stated and may be used as such in any contested election case or other local proceeding."

He is authorized to certify to the facts and nothing else.

The question first recurred on the following resolution:

Resolved, That George W. Anderson is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Fortieth Congress from the ninth congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. COOK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 89, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Boyer, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Cook, Dockery, Eldridge, Ferry, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, Knott, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Marshall, McCormick, Miller, Moorhead, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Poland, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Smith, Stewart, Taber, Tift, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aiken, Van Trump, Elihu B. Washburne, James F. Wilson, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Boies, Bowen, Brownell, Broomall, Buckley, Rodrick R. Butler, Callis, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Corley, Cornell, Covode, Delano, Dowese, Dicke, Driggs, Eggleston, James T. Elliott, Ferriss, Fields, French, Gove, Gravely, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hopkins, Hunter, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Kitchon, Koontz, Lash, William Lawrence, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Moore, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Pile, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Shanks, Starkweather, Stevens, Stokes, Stover, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, John Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—89.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Blackburn, Boutwell, Boyden, Brooks, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Churchill, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Edwards, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, Farnsworth, Fox, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goss, Haight, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Halburd, Ingersoll, Kellogg, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Marvin, McCullough, Morrill, Morrissey, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Pettis, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Polsley, Pomeroy, Price, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shellabarger, Stigraeves, Spalding, Stone, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, William B. Washburn, John T. Wilson, and Wood—78.

So the resolution was disagreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. SCOTFIELD said: I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] If he was here he would vote "no;" I would vote "ay."

Mr. KERR. I desire to say for the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] that he is paired with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY.] The former gentleman would have voted "ay," and the latter "no." I am also requested to say for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GLOSSBRENNER] that he is absent on account of death in his family, and if here he would vote "ay."

Mr. O'NEILL. I am paired with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCULLOUGH.] I would vote "no," and he would vote "ay."

The result having been announced as above, Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was disagreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the second resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That William F. Switzer is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the eighth congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The House having disagreed to the first resolution, I move that this resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF NATIONAL LOAN.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, presented a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the expenditures under the appropriation for expenses of the national loan; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the contracts and purchases of the ordnance department for the year 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Ordnance, and ordered to be printed.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of contracts made by the quartermaster's department during the last six months of the year 1868; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting his annual report of the condition of the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

MINERAL RESOURCES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the report of Rossiter W. Raymond on the mineral resources of the States and Territories west of the Rocky mountains; which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and ordered to be printed.

GENERAL BANKING LAW.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1753) to amend the general banking law; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. PRICE entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred.

INDIAN DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House concurrent resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of Kansas, asking the transfer of the management of the Indians from the Interior to the War Department; which was laid on the table.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House resolutions of the house of representatives of the Territory of New Mexico, asking for an appropriation by the Congress of the United States for two translators; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONFINEMENT OF PRISON CONVICTS.

Mr. PRUYN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1754) to designate a place of confinement for persons convicted of offenses against the laws of the United States and sentenced to imprisonment in certain States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MULLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, (at five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts: The memorial of Josiah Quincy and others, harbor commissioners of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, praying for appropriations to preserve and protect the harbors of Boston and Provincetown, in Massachusetts.

By Mr. JULIAN: A petition of 42 citizens of New York, praying that in any proposed change or amendment of the Constitution of the United States to extend or regulate suffrage there shall be no distinction made between men and women.

Also, a petition of 30 citizens of New York, praying the same.

Also, a petition of 163 citizens of Nebraska, praying the same.

By Mr. MOORE: The petition of S. S. Thorp, of the city of New York, owner in eighty vessels, praying protection by Congress from illegal exactions by State and municipal corporations.

Also, a petition of owners and masters of vessels of Townsend Inlet, New Jersey, praying the intervention of Congress to protect all engaged in navigation from illegal exactions by State and municipal corporations.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The memorial of Jacob C. Youngman, late second lieutenant in company G, one hundred and forty-third regiment Indiana volunteers, praying for compensation for expenses in recruiting.

By Mr. PETERS: The petition of Hermon Bartlett, and others, of Bangor, Maine, asking a change in the naturalization laws.

By Mr. PRUYN: A remonstrance of the Albany Aniline and Chemical Works, and its officers, against any reduction of duties on aniline dyes.

Also, the petition of James F. Patterson of Staunton, Virginia, to be relieved from political disabilities.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: The remonstrance of George W. Mead, president of the New York, Housatonic and Northern Railroad Company, against any further increase of duty on imported iron and steel.

By Mr. STEWART: A petition of criers and tipstaves of the United States circuit and district courts of southern and eastern districts of New York, for increase of pay.

By Mr. THOMAS: A petition of a number of citizens of the fifth congressional district of Maryland, praying for the repeal of sections seventy-eight and ninety-four of an act entitled "An act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco," approved July 20, 1868.

By Mr. VAN AERNAM: The petition of Charles Ten Eyck, praying Congress to pass an act for repayment of commutation money.

Also, the petition of John Garnet, on the same subject.

Also, the petition of R. L. Patterson of Culpeper, Virginia, for payment of property taken and used by the United States Army.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 22, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. Gray, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As no one seems to be listening to the Journal, and we have very little time for morning business, I move to dispense with the further reading.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 21, 1868, the report of the Superintendent of United States Weights and Measures in relation to furnishing one set of the standard weights and measures of the metric system for the use of the States respectively; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of Hon. Thomas E. Bayard, elected by the Legislature of the State of Delaware a Senator from that State for the term of six years, commencing March 4, 1869; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of Hon. James A. Bayard, elected by the Legislature of the State of Delaware to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of George R. Riddle, late a Senator from that State; which were read; and the oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. BAYARD.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER. I present two different petitions from merchants of Boston, in which they petition that a reciprocity treaty may be made with the dominion of Canada and the British provinces in North America. In presenting these petitions I need hardly remark that a treaty cannot be made with the Dominion of Canada or with the British provinces, but it must be made with Great Britain. I move the reference of these two petitions to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY presented a petition signed by C. E. Doddridge, R. D. Gardner, Joseph L. Anderson, William H. Davis, Stephen Kirby, James M. Crockett, Napoleon B. French, P. F. Woolwine, John W. Hancy, John S. Draper, John R. Dunlap, all of Pulaski county, Virginia, and Robert C. Trigg, of Christiansburg, Virginia, praying to be relieved from political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented the petition of William Henderson, praying compensation for mules and horses furnished to the Government of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of John Otey Taylor, of Lynchburg, Campbell county, Virginia, for the removal of political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of James W. Davis, praying the removal of the political disabilities imposed on him by Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KELLOGG presented the memorial of G. T. Beauregard, president of the New Orleans, Jackson, and Great Northern Railroad Company, remonstrating against any further increase of duty on imported iron and steel; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMEROY. I am charged with a petition from settlers upon some public lands in the State of Kansas, in which they represent that under a treaty made with the Great and Little Osage Indians, signed on the 29th September, 1855, and ratified January, 1867, they were settlers upon this land, and they ask that the rights of homestead settlers may be extended to them; and further, in the event that that cannot be done, they ask that they may have the right to buy their lands at $1 25 per acre, with a reasonable time to make payment. I am glad to present this petition, and coincide with the objects of it; and I ask that it may have special attention from the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to that committee.

Mr. POMEROY presented petitions from citizens of New York, New Hampshire, and Florida, praying that in any change or amendment of the Constitution Congress may propose to extend or regulate suffrage there shall be no distinction made between men and women; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARLAN. I present the memorial of William Dixon, N. K. Browne, and James R. O'Beirne, a committee of the Provident Aid Society of the District of Columbia, representing the existence of great destitution among the poor of the District, and praying that Congress will make an appropriation to aid in their relief. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a very brief petition which I desire to have printed; and if there is no objection I wish to have it read, as that will take less time than it will to state it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the paper will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The undersigned beg leave to represent to your honorable body that under the existing tariff a high duty is imposed on many foreign drugs and medicines in daily and common use by the American people—articles which do not come in competition with any of our domestic products, inasmuch as they are not the growth or production of our own country; that in some instances this duty amounts to more than one hundred and fifty per cent, thus imposing a heavy burden upon the sick as well as an onerous tax on country medical practitioners, who are often obliged to furnish the sick poor with medicines for which they are unable to pay. Moreover, none of these articles can be regarded as luxuries or in any other aspect than necessary agents in the ordinary treatment of disease, a condition which renders its subjects helpless and wholly unable to sustain the ordinary expenses of living. Besides, it is to be noticed that owing to the prices of these medicines they are very extensively and generally adulterated, so that it is very difficult to obtain them in a pure and genuine state, while the cost, as above stated, places them beyond the reach of the poorer classes."

Mr. CONKLING. I do not ask to have the enumeration of medicines read; but I have ventured to have so much of this petition read in the hope of attracting the attention of the Senate to what I believe to be a subject demanding attention. The petition is signed by a large number of medical professors and physicians throughout the country. They do not ask that opium be put on the free list, but simply that a list of cheap and indispensable crude drugs, which are not and cannot be produced in this country, shall be. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I have another petition, not so palpably healing, perhaps, in its nature. It is the petition of Mrs. M. E. G. Gage and four hundred other women, of the county of Onondaga, New York, asking woman suffrage. I have not been selected, Mr. President, as the medium to bear this communication to the Senate because I champion the legislation which it proposes. I think it has been sent to me rather because the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] has been undeservedly, and I think invidiously, decorated and favored of late by his countrywomen. He has received so many of these petitions that he seems to think that he receives them as a matter of right, and presents them here, I notice, with a formal dispatch and coldness which was not altogether to have been expected from him.

Now, sir, avoiding the indifferent manner in which some of these presentations have been met, I beg to submit one remark, and that is this: that those who deem intelligence a test of the right to vote ought to look with respect upon this movement. The agitation has received some advantages no doubt from arguments coming from men; but it has been mainly sustained by the pens and by the tongues of women, who have shown a faculty and steadiness of discussion which certainly put them beyond danger wherever intelligence is to be taken as the criterion. I only hope, sir, that they will be able to revive and sustain the flagging energies of their co-laborers and advocates among men, one of whom I cannot claim to be. I move that the petition be referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POMEROY. I will only say a word in reply to the Senator from New York. I trust if any persons want their petitions presented with a flourish of trumpets they will send them to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will indulge me, I beg to say that that is the most cogent remark I ever knew him to make in connection with this subject. [Laughter.]

WESTERN MILITARY CLAIMS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House joint resolution No. 404, have directed me to report it back with an amendment, and I ask the Senate to consider it at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is it?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It provides simply for printing some evidence that is in the War Department, which it is desirable to use in the Court of Claims on the part of the attorneys of the Government. I suppose there will be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 404) providing for the disposition of certain papers relating to military claims accruing in the department of the West. It provides that all the papers and evidence returned to the War Department by the Davis, Holt, and Campbell commission (touching claims against the department of the West accruing immediately before the 14th of October, 1861,) shall be surrendered and turned over to the Attorney General, whose duty it is to be to cause the evidence to be examined; and such part thereof as has any bearing on cases pending in the Court of Claims is to be printed, and received in the Court of Claims as if it were evidence taken under commission from that court, subject, however, to reexamination or cross-examination of the witnesses by either party.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the joint resolution with an amendment, which was to strike out all of the resolution after the words "to be," in the ninth line, in the following words: "examined; and such part thereof as has any bearing on cases pending in the Court of Claims shall be printed and received in said Court of Claims as if it were evidence taken under commission from said court, subject, however, to reexamination or cross-examination of the witnesses by either party," and to insert the word "printed;" so that the resolution will read:

That all the papers and evidence returned to the War Department by the Davis, Holt, and Campbell commission (touching claims against the department of the West accruing immediately before the 14th of October, 1861) shall be surrendered and turned over to the Attorney General, whose duty it shall be to cause the evidence to be printed.

Mr. DRAKE. I would inquire of the chairman of the committee for what reason the last portion of that resolution should be stricken out? I do not see any use in the world in having all that great mass of evidence printed if after it is printed there can be no use made of it in the Court of Claims. I should like to have that explained by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Missouri, I presume, is acquainted with the Davis, Holt, and Campbell commission. He knows what it was. This testimony was taken ex parte by that commission. They were not a commission organized by law, but were selected by the War Department for the purpose of examining claims in the department of the West. There are cases pending in the Court of Claims to which this testimony relates. The attorneys of the Government, in defending the Government against those claims, wish to have access to these papers, so as to put them upon the line of testimony, if there is anything in it that they ought to procure to properly defend the Government. It was thought by the committee that it was not proper that this testimony taken ex parte should be received in court as evidence without the other party being present to examine it, and particularly as it was taken before a board that was not authorized by law to take testimony. But it is very desirable that the Attorney General's office should have access to these papers. The proposition is only to print those portions of the papers relating to the cases that are pending in court.

Mr. DRAKE. I am inclined to think that there may be a mistake of fact on the part of the Judiciary Committee in regard to this testimony. If I am wrong in attributing a mistake to them the honorable chairman will make it known to me immediately. I do not think that that testimony was in every instance ex parte.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Probably not in every instance, but much of it was.

Mr. DRAKE. If there were witnesses examined with regard to the claims of any individual against the Government and he had the opportunity of cross-examining those witnesses, then by all the rules of law the testimony taken and recorded there is evidence in all cases between the same parties at any period of time afterwards.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What! Unless the witness is dead?

Mr. DRAKE. Unless the witness is dead or inaccessible. I suppose it may be subject to that qualification.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That difficulty can be corrected afterwards, if it turns out so.

Mr. DRAKE. The only reason why I make any remarks at all about this matter is that that commission who were sent there to examine those cases were a commission of very able and upright men, and they acted according to their conscientious conviction of duty to the Government. I do not wish now that the opportunity shall be given to overthrow their deliberate judgment upon the facts before them without these facts appearing to the tribunal before which it is sought to overthrow their action. It may be that the amendment proposed by the committee is all right; but I do not think that probably it is. I think, perhaps there is some mistake, and that the original resolution as it came from the House of Representatives should be allowed to pass. It does not seem to me that there is any hardship to the individual suing in the Court of Claims that that testimony should go there to be used in that court against his claim.

For these reasons, I object to the amendment proposed by the committee, and I think that perhaps it was not offered with as much advice as is desirable under the circumstances.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the resolution to be read the third time. The resolution was read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill (S. No. 823) to grant lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Mississippi river to Yanceton, on the Missouri river, and to amend an act entitled "An act for a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State," approved May 12, 1864; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 715) to legalize certain land locations, reported it with amendments.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 765) to define the limits of the collection district of the Teché, in the State of Louisiana, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 776) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific railroad, in California, to Portland, Oregon," approved July 25, 1866, reported it with an amendment.

JOHN H. OSLER.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1451) for the relief of John H. Osler, of Guernsey county, Ohio, have directed me to report it back with an amendment, and recommend its passage. It is a bill which allows a lieutenant about two months' pay, I think, which he has not been able to get because of the loss of his proper vouchers. The amendment of the committee cuts out everything except that, and it has to go back to the House; and if there is no objection I should like to have the Senate consider it at the present time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the payment to John H. Osler, late first lieutenant twenty-sixth regiment Ohio volunteer infantry, the pay of a first lieutenant of infantry from the 9th of December, 1864, to the 27th of March, 1865, together with three months' pay, and also the pay of a first lieutenant of infantry, from the 31st of July to the 4th of October, 1865.

The Committee on Claims reported an amendment to strike out the words "the pay of a first lieutenant of infantry from the 9th of December, 1864, to the 27th of March, 1865, together with three months' pay, and also;" so that the bill will read:

That there be paid to John H. Osler, late first lieutenant twenty-sixth regiment Ohio volunteer infantry, the pay of a first lieutenant of infantry from the 31st of July to the 4th of October, 1865.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

FUNDING BILL.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to present several amendments that I propose to offer to the bill (S. No. 793) in relation to the public debt and the currency, reported by the Finance Committee. In the main features of the bill I agree, but I desire to move some few amendments that I think will tend to perfect the bill and make it more efficient. I move that the amendments be printed, and at some future time I shall advocate their adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made.

RAILROAD SUBSIDIES.

Mr. DRAKE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad to report to the Senate the following resolution, and to ask the present action of the Senate upon it. I will simply remark that the resolution is presented by the unanimous direction of the committee:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient that any subsidy in Government bonds should be authorized by Congress to any railroad enterprise not entitled thereto under existing laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I guess it had better go over. If it had not the last branch, which seems to make an exception of one railroad, should not object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, it goes over under the rule.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 824) relative to the refining of gold and silver bullion at the Mint of the United States and branches; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 825) to establish a bridge across the East river, between the cities of Brooklyn and New York, in the State of New York, a post road; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 291) to drop from the rolls of the Army officers absent without leave; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOWARD asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 202) more effectually to insure the faithful completion of the Union Pacific railroad and its branches according to law; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1751) in relation to the appointment of midshipmen from the lately reconstructed States; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 253) to change the name of Four-and-a-half street, in the city of Washington, to Lincoln avenue.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend an act entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections," approved February 19, 1851.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1751) in relation to the appointment of midshipmen from the lately reconstructed States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 253) to change the name of Four-and-a-half street, in the city of Washington, to Lincoln avenue, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

STATE PASSENGER TAXES.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. With the consent of the Senate, I will take this occasion to submit the few remarks in which I was interrupted yesterday, in reply to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill (S. No. 798) to punish the collection of illegal taxes on passengers will be considered as before the Senate, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I took the floor yesterday to submit a few remarks in answer to the argument of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] and perhaps was led to do so because of his declaration that the State which I in part represent was making its living by levying taxes on the public travel of the country; but having been interrupted by the course of business I should now let the matter pass had I not assumed to answer that argument, and were it not that the brevity of the period in which I shall have any opportunity of correcting misapprehensions of fact and of law in reference to taxation in New Jersey seems to render it my duty now to say something on the subject. I shall be commendably brief.

I do not speak in behalf of the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company. I certainly am under no obligations to them, and they are under none to me. The fact is, this bill is in the interest of that company. While I believe they are reasonably ready to pay their debts, I imagine that they will not be particularly offended should Congress pass a law declaring that it shall be a crime for them to pay their taxes to the State, while the law leaves them fully invested with all their chartered rights and privileges. This bill is directed against the State of New Jersey, not against the railroads of that State.

And, as the invocation of prejudice, intentional or otherwise, is often the readiest way of preparing the mind of a deliberative assembly for the infliction of injustice, I must be permitted at least to controvert the declarations made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in his recent speech, and which has since been read by hundreds of thousands in this country. He says, in speaking of this subject:

"It is secession intensified, for if a State seceded it lost the benefit of the protection of the General Government; but a State that can grapple and control for her own interests merely all communication over her territory could enjoy all the benefits of union and yet inflict on her sister States all the injuries of separate governments. The case of New Jersey is a marked and, fortunately for the country, an isolated example of this policy. Her territory lies between the two great cities of the continent. It is generally level, presenting no difficulties for constructing railroads. She receives vast local benefits from her proximity to those cities. One of those cities controls the commerce of the continent, the other is the chief manufacturing city of the continent. The road between them should be open, free, easy, and cheap. Every mode of transit should compete for the exchange of commodities and productions. Yet New Jersey undertakes to declare that but one corporation shall transport all these commodities and productions, and that this corporation shall collect for her a tax on all this commerce."

Why, Mr. President, one would suppose that the State of New Jersey stood at the gate of the great metropolitan sea-port of this country, and in a churlish, inhospitable spirit would not permit the free people of this land, who have a right to go anywhere, hardly to pass her borders at all; and if she did permit the gate to turn on its rusty hinges, stood like some bullying brigand to rifle the pockets of every wayworn traveler that might pass. I think I can show she is very far from meriting any such imputation. Secession mitigated or intensified, infidelity to the truest and best interests of this nation, whatever may be her shortcomings, is the last charge that can truly be made against New Jersey. Her more remote as well as her more recent history disproves it. When in the waning fortunes of the Revolution the country looked to her they did not look in vain. There is scarcely an ancient spire in her borders the shadow of which does not rest upon the graves of those who have British bullets encased with them; and if the ancestry of my respected friend from Indiana, who were Jerseymen, were possessed of the same patriotic impulses which the nation rejoices to accord to him, some of them may now fill such honored graves. In the more recent struggle she was equally true; for first of all the States, on the call of the President, New Jersey placed her full complement of men in Pennsylvania avenue for the defense of Washington. She maintained her historic character on every battle-field of this Union. Secession or infidelity does not live in the breasts of the people I represent. And as to the charge that she is grappling for her own interests and taxing all the commerce that passes through the State, let me call the attention of the Senate to a few facts.

The railroad enterprise of the country had its birth in New Jersey. There is no courage now required to undertake the building of railroads. The errors by which millions on millions of capital have been lost have all been discovered. New Jersey tried the experiment, and the whole land, without sharing in the losses incident to the trial, profits by our experience. The Camden and Amboy railroad, extending from Camden to South Amboy on the Raritan bay, and from thence by steamer to New York, was completed in 1832; the railroad from Philadelphia to New Brunswick, by way of Trenton, was completed in 1838; and no other railroad from New York existed until ten years later. The Harlem, the New Haven, the Hudson River, were constructed in 1848; the Erie in 1850. And with the exception of the Philadelphia and Wilmington road, no railroad excepting this was constructed from Philadelphia until 1844. New Jersey has expended, as the census of 1860 shows, more money in constructing railroads than any State between Washington and Canada, with the exception of the two great States of New York and Pennsylvania and the State of Massachusetts. Every county in the State has a railroad; and the fruits of her enterprise are discovered in the statistics of the land, which show that the average value of an acre of land in New Jersey is considerably greater than that in any other portion of this country.

I would remind my friend from Indiana that while his State in population is the fifth in the nation, and New Jersey the sixteenth, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, Indiana paid into the national Treasury $5,200,633, and New Jersey paid $9,781,492, an excess of nearly four million dollars over Indiana; and in the year ending June 30, 1867, while Indiana paid into the Treasury $4,101,182, New Jersey paid $7,838,504. We do not live, sir, entirely by taxing public travel.

Now a word as to the facilities of transit across the State. Is it true that there is but one railway by which you can cross our territory? No. There are seven railroads radiating in every direction from the city of New York across New Jersey. There is the Northern railroad, from Jersey City to Piermont; the Erie railroad, from Jersey City to the boundary line, and thence on to Lake Erie; the Morris and Essex railroad, running from Jersey City to Pennsylvania, doing a large business in the transportation of passengers and produce to and from the West; the Central railroad, extending from Jersey City to Pennsylvania—a road perhaps more expensively and perfectly constructed than any in the Union; the Camden and Amboy, from Camden to South Amboy, on Raritan bay, connecting with New York by steamers—the road that we usually travel, through New Brunswick, Trenton, and to Philadelphia; and there is also the railroad from Port Monmouth, extending to Cape May, and a road which, since the monopoly has expired, will be able to make connection with Philadelphia. Here are seven railroads shooting in different directions across the State of New Jersey. There, too, is the Delaware and Raritan canal, than which there is not a nobler or more expensive work in this country, extending from the Delaware to the Raritan. In the administration of President Monroe his Secretary of War recommended this as a military measure in order to avoid the danger of the outside passage in time of war. The Government did not adopt it as a public improvement, and the capital of New Jersey constructed it. It is a canal seventy-five feet wide and seven feet deep, admirably constructed, and on which ply steamers and other vessels doing an immense commerce between Philadelphia and New York. There is another public work that occurs to me. De Witt Clinton happened to be spending some time in the mountains of New Jersey and discovered a beautiful and extensive lake on the top of the mountains, affording a large supply of water, and the idea occurred to him that by the use of that water a canal might be constructed between New York and Pennsylvania over the hills that intervene. The enterprise of the State was invoked, and a canal one hundred and three miles long, overcoming by means of inclined planes an elevation of nearly one thousand feet, was constructed. New Jersey, sir, is not exactly a Chinese wall, good for nothing else but to be kicked at by those who have nothing better to do.

Now, a word or two on the law. He affirms, and truly, that no State has the right to impose a tax on passengers. That position will not be disputed; and if it be denied, his lucid argument and the authorities adduced demonstrate its truth. But that is not the point where the argument comes in. The question is, whether this statute, avowedly directed against the policy of New Jersey, is called for; whether that State does tax passengers? Had he here addressed himself there would have been more to answer. The general proposition is most succinctly stated by that just and learned judge who during the war, by one or two of his decisions, rendered a service to the nation as important as a great victory. Justice Grier says:

"A tax imposed by a State for entering its territories or harbors is inconsistent with the rights which belong to citizens of other States as members of the Union, and with the objects which that Union was intended to attain. Such a power in the States could produce nothing but discord and mutual irritation; and they clearly do not possess it."

The true question, however, is whether the tax complained of is a tax on passengers? I assert that it is not. Every State may in some manner tax its railroads. Taxation is not in itself an infringement of the Constitution. It is only the peculiar mode in which it is effected, as by taxing passengers, that is objectionable. There are various methods by which States tax railroads. In some instances the tax is levied on the stock in the hands of the company. Again, it is levied on the cost of the road, so that both the stock and bonds of the company are reached. Another mode of taxation is to tax the railway, the machine-shops, the depots, and water-tanks in every county. That is the manner of taxation in Indiana. Still another plan of taxation, and that which is clearly the most just, is to tax the company according to its ability to pay, or in other words to tax its business. This is not a tax on passengers, but on the company in respect to its passengers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A tax on income in reality.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, substantially a tax on income. By either of these modes of taxation the tax is paid by those who use the road. The consumer, in this as in all other cases, pays the tax. How else can it be paid? We cannot find the tribute money in the fish's mouth. It must be earned, and those who use the road must pay it, and one mode of taxation is no more a tax on passengers than the other.

The State of New Jersey while railroads were in their infancy, not knowing what capital would be required, the profits being very uncertain, instead of imposing a tax (as experience has enabled them subsequently to do) upon the stock, imposed a tax on the company in respect to their business. The State provided that the treasurer should once in three months make a return to the State of the number of passengers and of tons of freight which had been transported. The tax was then apportioned to the business, being ten cents for each passenger, fifteen cents for each ton of bulky freight, and ten cents for each ton of merchandise. This was found too heavy a tax, and was so altered as only to apply to passengers crossing the State, such as those coming from Philadelphia or Trenton. The amount of fare imposed upon way passengers being greater than that on through passengers they really contribute more than their proportion of the expense of taxation. As to the railroad from New Brunswick to New York, their tax was laid at eight cents a passenger. This was afterwards changed to eight per cent. on the gross receipts from through passengers. The way-passenger business having proven equal to the through business the tax on the through passengers business is about four per cent., say fourteen cents for each passenger from New York to Philadelphia. From looking at the statutes of New Jersey it seems that as to the railroad from South Amboy to Camden, in 1832 the State commuted this mode of taxing in respect to the number of passengers as $30,000 a year; but the plan as originally adopted remains in force as to the Trenton route.

The Senator from Indiana insists that we add the tax to the fare. There he is in error. It is more impracticable to add the tax to the fare in this case than where the tax is levied on the stock of the company. The charter limits the maximum of fare, which is not usual. The rate of fare between New York and Philadelphia for the first-class rapidly-moving cars is three dollars, while there are comfortable trains at $2 25 and $1 50. The fare cannot be made more. Why, sir, the railroad company is bound to pay New Jersey the tax if they should carry their passengers for nothing; and yet this bill makes it a crime, even under such circumstances, for the company to pay the State that which they have agreed to pay.

Observe, too, the law provides that this tax is in lieu of all other taxation. No city, county, township, or other State tax can be imposed. The tax is less than is usual in other States. It is a fact that when our railroads are making arrangements with the railroads of Pennsylvania for through passengers, it is claimed that the New Jersey roads shall take less than their proper proportion of the fare, because the tax expenses of our roads are less. I think I may safely say that the tax does not exceed one and a half per cent. on its capital. I observe by the recent message of our Governor that the tax received from the two railroads from New York to Philadelphia and from the canal last year was $267,000. In the State of Indiana the tax is two and a half per cent. on the capital, one per cent. more than in New Jersey, and I would ask him if the passengers who pass through that State do not pay that tax; and if they do pay it, whether it is not a tax upon public travel? Is the tax unconstitutional when one and a half per cent. in New Jersey and constitutional when two and a half in Indiana? Is it unconstitutional for a State to exempt a railroad company from all county, city, and township taxes, and to impose a tax on business even if the public travel be made cheaper by reason of such arrangement? Is there anything in this plan of taxation that is unlawful? I trust that the Congress of the United States is not in the habit of deliberately violating the Constitution; and yet the mode of taxation in New Jersey is exactly that which Congress has adopted for imposing taxes. I read from the revenue law in reference to railroads now in force:

"That every" * * * "corporation owning or possessing or having the care or management of any railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, &c., except, &c., shall be subject to and pay a tax of two and one half per cent. of the gross receipts from passengers and mails of such railroad."

This action of Congress will at least make the crime New Jersey is guilty of respectable.

We have been referred to the "passenger case" found in Howard. That was a tax of $1 50 imposed by the State of New York on every person who landed in New York from a foreign port. It was clearly a tax on passengers. It could not be anything else. There was nothing else to tax. New York had no right to tax the free highway of the ocean; but is that true of those who travel upon our railroads? Are not those who use the road bound to contribute toward the expense item of taxation? There is no similarity whatever between the case upon which the honorable Senator relies and that to which he seeks to apply it. The former was a pure capitation tax.

The case of Crandall vs. The State of Nevada is equally inapplicable. That was not a tax upon any company and did not pretend to be. It was a general law that every person who left the State of Nevada by railroad, coach, stage, or other vehicle should pay a dollar to the State. It does not assume to be a tax on anybody excepting on the passengers, and the very law calls it "a capitation tax." It is not in lieu of other taxation, and the tax was added to the fare, was to be collected by officers and paid over to the sheriff. The act is in these words:

"There shall be levied and collected a capitation tax of one dollar on every person leaving the State by any railroad, stage-coach, or other vehicle engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers for hire."

The act itself sustains me in all I have said.

The next position of law that my friend comes to is the fourteenth amendment; and I am glad that he has called attention to it, for I believe that there is to be found a mine of gold not yet explored. And, turning away from the case in hand for a minute, let me say that the second section of the amendment executes itself, the penalty for withholding the ballot being the loss of representation. But the first section does not execute itself, and it is competent for Congress by legislation to enforce it. The amendment declares that no citizen of the United States shall be abridged of his privileges or immunities; and in passing let me say that if it is an abridgment of the rights of citizenship to withhold from him full representation, and hold that he shall be represented in Congress or elsewhere only by a privileged class, if it is an abridgment of rights to hold that he shall be forever ineligible to office on account of his complexion, then there is power under that amendment for Congress by enactment to enforce it. I make these remarks outside of the case in passing, because this amendment is now a subject of interest on account of the Georgia difficulties.

As to the case in hand the amendment is applicable and pertinent, if it is one of the immunities of an American citizen to travel on railroads which pay no taxes. But it has nothing to do with the case if that is not one of the immunities of an American citizen. If the railroad must pay the tax the citizen must contribute to the expense item of taxation. It would be quite as rational to hold that it was the right of the citizen to travel without paying fare as to travel free of incidental taxation.

But, Mr. President, the argument of my friend is felo de se. He insists that Congress must pass a statute making it a crime for an agent to pay New Jersey the tax agreed to be paid, because it is a tax on passengers, and sustains the argument by showing that the judiciary have set aside as null statutes which impose such a tax. Well then, I pray, what the necessity of a statute? It is a subject that belongs to the judiciary instead of to the legislative department, and when presented to the judiciary they can calmly discriminate between that class of cases which are clearly a taxation on passengers and that class which by a careful examination are as clearly only a taxation on business.

Mr. MORTON. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes, and I prefer replying to the Senator from New Jersey now rather than waiting for some future time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let it be understood that the regular order is laid over informally. ["Certainly."]

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the position taken by the Senator from New Jersey in reference to my argument is, that this is not a tax upon passengers, but that it is a tax upon business, and that the State of New Jersey has a right to tax the business of the railroads within its limits in lieu of all other taxes. The New Jersey law provides that the railroad company to which I referred shall pay to the State ten cents for each passenger carried across the State, and fifteen cents for every ton of freight. Now, Mr. President, it comes right back to this question, is a tax levied on a railroad company in this way in the nature of a tax upon the passenger? I insist, with all respect to my honorable friend from New Jersey, that that question is settled directly. It is true that the State of New Jersey does not say that this is a tax upon the passenger, but it says that the company shall pay so much for each passenger carried. What was the statute of New York upon which the decision was made that I quoted yesterday? It provided for collecting "from the master of every vessel from a foreign port for himself and each cabin passenger $1 50; for each steerage passenger, mate, sailor, or mariner, one dollar." And second, "from the master of each coasting vessel for each person on board, twenty-five cents; but no coasting vessel from the States of New Jersey, Connecticut, and Rhode Island shall pay for more than one voyage in each month."

The statute of New York did not say it was a tax upon the passenger, but it said that the captain of the ship should pay so much for each passenger carried; and the statute of New Jersey says that the railroad company shall pay so much for each passenger carried. In the one case it is the captain, and in the other case it is the railroad company that has to pay. Can we make any distinction in principle? It is utterly impossible; and yet the Supreme Court said most directly and repeatedly that the tax put in this form was a tax upon passengers. Sir, it is not an open question. Let me read a brief extract from the opinion of Judge McLean in the passenger cases. Speaking of this law of New York, he said:

"It imposes a tax or duty on the passengers, officers, and sailors, holding the master responsible for the amount at the immediate termination of the voyage, and necessarily before the passengers have set their feet on land. The tax on each passenger, in the discretion of the Legislature, might have been five dollars or ten dollars."

Now, suppose this tax had been ten dollars for each passenger carried, just as the Supreme Court puts the case here, instead of being ten cents, what then? The Senator says it is a mere tax on business, and the Legislature of New Jersey has a right to impose it. But in a precisely similar case the Supreme Court of the United States says it is a tax on passengers, although the captain of the vessel is bound to pay it; and here, although the railroad company is bound to pay it, it is nevertheless a tax upon the passengers for the same reason. Again, said the Supreme Court in that case:

"A tax or duty upon tonnage, merchandise, or passengers is a regulation of commerce, and cannot be laid by a State except under the sanction of Congress and for the purposes specified in the Constitution."

Mr. Justice Catron, in his opinion, goes on to state that one of the reasons that brought about the American Union was the levy of a tax upon passengers and freight by other States, and he uses this language, to which I call the particular attention of the Senate:

"If it be the true meaning of the Constitution that a State can evade them by declaring that the master may be taxed in regard to passengers on the mere assertion that he shall have a remedy over against the passengers, citizen and aliens, and that the State may assess the amount of tax at discretion, then the old evil will be revived, as the States may tax at every town and village where a vessel of any kind lands."

Now, sir, it is a mere verbal difference. The Legislature of New York did not call the tax in that case a tax upon passengers; it did not call it a tax at all; but it was so much that the master of the ship was bound to pay on account of his passengers; and yet it was obvious that it would be collected off the passengers, and therefore it was called a tax upon passengers.

In the case of Crandall vs. The State of Nevada, the same argument was made that has been made by the Senator from New Jersey. What said the counsel for the State in that case:

"It is strictly a tax on his business, graduated by the amount of such business, as are license taxes, which often are made to vary pro rata with the amount of business done by the person taking the license."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would call the attention of my friend to one difference. The argument is true in the case of New Jersey; it was not true there.

Mr. MORTON. That depends upon argument rather than upon assertion. Now, I assert that there is no difference in principle between the statute of New Jersey and the statute of Nevada. What is the statute of Nevada? It is—"That there shall be levied and collected a capitation tax of one dollar upon every person leaving the State by any railroad, stage-coach, or other vehicle engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers for hire, and that the proprietors, owners, and incorporations so engaged shall pay said tax of one dollar for each and every person so conveyed or transported from the State."

What are the operative words of that statute? That the stage company or the railroad company shall pay so much to the State for every passenger carried, just precisely as in New Jersey the railroad company shall pay so much for every passenger carried. But the New Jersey statute does not call it a capitation tax, and the Nevada statute does call it a capitation tax. The operative words in the Nevada statute are that the company shall pay the tax, not the passenger; yet the court said it is nevertheless a tax upon the passenger. Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion, said:

"It is claimed by counsel for the State that the tax thus levied is not a tax upon the passenger, but upon the business of the carrier who transports him. If the act were much more skillfully drawn to sustain this hypothesis than it is we should be very reluctant to admit that any form of words which had the effect to compel every person traveling through the country by the common and usual modes of public conveyance to pay a specific sum to the State was not a tax upon the right thus exercised."

And accordingly it is here held in express terms that it is a tax upon the passenger, although the passenger was not required to pay it at all; but the stage company or the railroad company was required to pay it, just as in the case of New Jersey. Where is the difference?

The Senator from New Jersey says that any State has a right to levy a tax on the business of a corporation, instead of taxing its property. I deny it. That is the very point that is here decided. There are some kinds of business which the State of New Jersey has no right to tax, even to the amount of one farthing. It may be said to be in lieu of all other taxes; it may be a good arrangement for the company; it may be a bad arrangement for the State; but it is the character of the business that is taxed and not the amount of it that settles the question.

Now, let us suppose, for the sake of the argument, that it would have been much better for New Jersey to tax the property of this railroad company in the ordinary way, just the way all other property is taxed. Suppose, for the sake of the argument, that it is a good thing for the company to be compelled to pay only so much upon passengers and so much upon freight, does that change the principle? It is the character of the tax, and not the amount of it. Chief Justice Marshall said, in the case of McCulloch vs. Maryland, it is not the amount of the tax that Maryland levies on the notes of the banks of the United States, but it is the fact that she levies a tax at all. And he went on to say that if she had a right to levy a tax of ten cents she had a right to levy a tax of $100 or $1,000. And so in the case of the State of New Jersey: if New Jersey has a right to require a railroad company to pay ten cents for one passenger she has a right to require the company to pay one dollar or $100, and it amounts to a destruction of travel. No, sir; it is not the amount of the tax, nor is it the fact that it is in lieu of all other taxes. That makes no difference. It is the kind of business that is taxed; and what is that business? It is the carrying of passengers across the State—a business secured and guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

Now, sir, let me make an illustration or two. Let me suppose that the State of New Jersey should levy a tax of one fourth of one per cent. on all sales made by importers of foreign goods in the original package, and should say that that should be in lieu of all other taxes on those persons. There is a tax upon business in lieu of all other taxes. Has the State of New Jersey a right to do that? No, sir; those importers have a right to sell their goods in the original package by virtue of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the State of New Jersey has no right to levy a tax upon their sales even to the amount of one fourth per cent. or of one hundredth part of one per cent. It might be a very good arrangement for the importers to be taxed in this way; their taxes might be much smaller than if they were imposed upon their property in the ordinary way; it might be a very bad arrangement for New Jersey to do it; but, sir, it is the character of the business that is taxed that makes the difference. New Jersey has no right to tax that business. Let me take another illustration. Suppose New Jersey should levy a tax of one half per cent. upon the incomes of all persons derived from interest on United States stocks, and should provide that for the amount of money received they should pay a tax to the State of one half per cent., and that this should be in lieu of all other taxes on them. There is a tax upon business; but has the State of New Jersey a right to do it? It may be a very bad thing for the persons thus taxed; but New Jersey cannot impose that tax because the receipts from United States stocks are in virtue of a contract with the United States, and the State cannot interfere with it. If a State can lay a tax of one half per cent. it can make it one per cent. or it can make it ten per cent. That comes right back to the old principle; it is the kind of business you are taxing; it is not the amount of the tax which regulates the question. You cannot tax the importer on his sales in the original packages; you cannot tax the income from the United States bonds; you cannot tax travel across the States of this Union in any form. It is not the amount, but the character of the business.

Mr. CATTELL. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. CATTELL. I ask whether the railroads in the State of Indiana pay any tax to the State?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CATTELL. If the railroads in Indiana pay a tax to the State where do they get the ability to pay it except from the profits of their roads; and what difference is there whether the tax is laid on the number of passengers crossing the road or upon the gross receipts or the value of the property?

Mr. MORTON. The railroads of Indiana pay tax just as other kinds of property pay taxes. They pay no special tax. The State of Indiana has no right to levy a tax upon travelers and release the companies from the ordinary taxes that other corporations and that private persons pay. But, sir, all these things are wholly foreign to the question. It is the kind of business that the Legislature of New Jersey proposes to tax which makes the tax objectionable. The Supreme Court of the United States has said, on various occasions, that no State has the power, directly or indirectly, to tax travelers and travel.

Mr. BAYARD and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair feels bound to arrest the debate for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to the unfinished business of yesterday, which is now regularly before the body.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION REGENTS.

Mr. WILSON. Before that is taken up I desire to introduce a resolution which ought to be acted upon at once. It is to provide for the reappointment of Professor Agassiz as regent of the Smithsonian Institution, his term having expired.

By unanimous consent, leave was given to introduce the joint resolution (S. R. No. 200) reappointing Louis Agassiz a regent of the Smithsonian Institution; and it was read three times, and passed.

CHARTERING OF RAILROAD COMPANIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 554) to promote commerce among the States, and to cheapen the transportation of the mails and military and naval stores, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. DOOLITTLE, to insert after the word "empowered," in line two of section eight, the words "with the consent of the Legislature of the State or States through which said railway may be located."

Mr. DOOLITTLE addressed the Senate. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CAMERON obtained the floor.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to allow me to make a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to renew the amendment which was offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. WILEY] to this bill, and withdrawn by him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That cannot be done until the amendment before the Senate is disposed of.

Mr. POMEROY. It will only be an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear this report from the conference committee.

EVIDENCE IN CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1558) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in the case of contested elections,' approved February 19, 1851," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out all of said Senate amendments and all after the word "that" in line one of the original bill down to and including the word "district" in line two, and insert in lieu thereof as follows: "Any register in bankruptcy or notary public resident in a congressional district;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

ROSCOE CONKLING,
FREDERICK T. FRELINGHUYSEN,
GEORGE VICKERS.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

H. L. DAWES,
SAMUEL MCKEE,
JOHN W. CHANLER.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the bill read as it will stand if that report is agreed to. I am perfectly unable to understand what it means in the way in which it has been stated.

Mr. CONKLING. I can state it in one moment, if the Senator will allow me. The bill, as it will stand if the report is concurred in, will authorize either a register in bankruptcy or a notary public to act as the officer before whom testimony may be taken in any congressional district in which there is a contest. That is the whole of it, I believe, in appropriate language.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to make any serious opposition to a little matter of this kind; but I have the impression that the Judiciary Committee, to whom this bill was referred in the first instance, were of opinion that a register in bankruptcy, which was the original House proposition, ought not to be one of the persons authorized to take this testimony, and we reported it with an amendment which provided some other officer; I believe, as we reported it, a United States commissioner. Then, on the motion of my friend from New York, that was amended by general consent by substituting a notary public, I think. Now the conference committee propose to reinstate in the bill the register in bankruptcy. The objection that was suggested to that (although it will have no force in my State that I know of) was that registers in bankruptcy, as they now exist, practically have been nominated and their appointment controlled by the members of Congress from the various congressional districts, and hence it was supposed that a member having a contested election might have in the register who was to take the testimony a person who might be under some prejudice or partiality in his favor, and who would not stand, therefore, entirely neutral and unprejudiced between the parties. That was the objection that was suggested by my friend from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] who is not now in his seat, to the bill as it originally stood. I do not know that the objection is a very serious one; but I thought it right to call the attention of the Senate to it, inasmuch as the result of the conference appears to be the opposite of that to which the committee came who reported the bill in the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. The progress of this bill must be gratifying, I think, to all beholders interested in diligent and circumspect legislation. The bill originated in the House of Representatives. It related exclusively to a very simple matter pertaining to the privileges of the House, there being a number of contested-election cases in which it had been found impossible seasonably to obtain an officer authorized to take testimony. Without dissent of views in the House, as I understand, it was proposed to authorize registers in bankruptcy to act in necessary cases; and they were selected for the obvious reasons, first, that there was one in every congressional district, so that there would be no provocation or excuse for long travel and constructive mileage; second, that every register in bankruptcy was a lawyer, and would understand how to act as a master in taking testimony. The bill came here and was the subject of very diligent and careful scrutiny, and it was thought that various officers had better be substituted, and at length, as the Senator says, notaries public were put in on my suggestion. I thought it was not a wise selection, but it harmonized the views of the committee, and it was done. The bill went back to the House, and the chairman of the committee of Elections there, who is a gentleman of pretty large and extended experience on this subject, thought the amendment was unwise, deemed registers in bankruptcy the best persons for this purpose, and the House non-concurred in our action. When a conference came to be held, they seemed to consider notaries public rather surplusage than otherwise, and were willing they should be retained to do it, and that is the reason it was agreed to.

Now, I have but one single word to say about the merits of it. It is a bill in which I feel very little interest. It is of considerable interest to a number of persons whose time prescribed by statute within which they must take testimony has almost run, and who have been unable to find any officer before whom testimony can be taken. Registers in bankruptcy were appointed by the district courts of the United States upon the nomination of the Chief Justice of the United States, and the Chief Justice was, as all will remember, quite fastidious in his mode of satisfying himself of the fitness of these officers. They were compelled to come with certificates under the seal of courts of record, setting forth their qualifications in a variety of respects enumerated in a circular which was sent out by the Chief Justice. And now really I am unable to stretch my credulity so far as to believe that a serious risk is to be run in allowing the House of Representatives to direct that testimony may be taken before registers in bankruptcy if they choose. It may possibly be that some register in bankruptcy is at once so dishonest and so much beholden to the Representative of his district, whose election is contested, that he will write down untrue testimony given, or refuse to write down that which is given; but it strikes me that is so very remote a possibility that I think we shall discharge our share of duty toward this bill if we allow it now to pass after its long pilgrimage through the two Houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I wish to repeat what I said a few moments ago, that this is a matter which does not interest, so far as I know, anybody in the State of Vermont; but I did think it right that the Senate should be informed of the singular metamorphosis through which this bill has gone since it was reported to this body, with the opinion of a majority of the Judiciary Committee that it was not a wise piece of legislation to add to the large number of persons who are authorized to take this testimony registers in bankruptcy, of all other men. And the reason upon which the committee proceeded was the one that I have named, that we know that the Chief Justice, in the exercise of that care and conservatism which characterize him, had relied mainly upon the member of Congress from each district for the selection of an appropriate person to fill that office; and hence the committee thought that to enlarge the area of persons who were to take this testimony by the addition of that particular class of persons might, as a principle, lead to just criticism in the selection by the member of that particular officer to perform the duty.

As my friend says, this may be all fanciful. The presumption is that every register in bankruptcy is honest, certainly. The presumption is, also, that every member of Congress is honest, I take it. Why not permit him to take the testimony himself, and the contestant himself, or his brother, or his son, or his clerk, or somebody who stands in a position of particular friendship and partiality toward him? It is the same wise principle which forbids that which should pervade all the operations of Government that partake of the nature of jurisprudence and of judicial proceedings; and that is, that every agency in the administration of justice and in the elimination of truth from a witness should be conducted through a channel which is absolutely above not only actual partiality and prejudice, but above the suspicion of it. That is the proposition, because, sir, permit me to say that a suspicion in a community that justice is being administered by partial and unfair hands, that testimony which is to affect the right of the people to representation in a contested case is being taken through a channel which is colored in the least degree by partiality or prejudice or friendship, is one of the most dangerous steps in the administration of a free Government that can be taken.

That was the view of a majority of the Judiciary Committee, without intending to imply in the least degree that in the particular half a dozen cases that may be pending where this bill would operate there was any dishonesty in the register in bankruptcy; but when we pass general laws we pass them for the general good of the whole body-politic; we pass them to stand on the statute-book as long as there shall be occasion for that species of administration; and passing them in such a spirit we must pass them upon principles that will bear investigation, and under guards that will preclude not only the possibility of improper conduct, but any reasonable suspicion of it.

Now, it is said that this subject relates to the privileges of the House of Representatives. So be it, sir. If they are constitutional privileges of the House of Representatives, which they are entitled to be the judge of themselves, then it does not need any law about it. The House of Representatives can select its own agents, and if a majority of the body desire to select a register in bankruptcy let them do it; it would be far from me to complain. But if this is one of those measures of regulation which the Constitution requires the law to make over the proceedings of Government, then we must look at it as a law, and the fact that it concerns the House of Representatives is no argument in favor of one class of persons rather than another being selected.

I will say too, sir, that I think we hear quite too often as reasons for the action of this body that the opinion of the House of Representatives, or particular members of it, is so and so. It used to be thought in old times, before we entered upon modern parliamentary practice, that such methods of argument and such allusions were entirely out of order and unparliamentary; but I do not know but that it is late to retrace our steps in that respect. While, as I said before, this is a matter which concerns the body of people whom I have the honor to represent in a very small degree, indeed, I think it right to call the attention of Senators to the fact that this bill has now got back to the same position in which it stood when the Judiciary Committee reported against it and proposed a substitute for it, which is now set aside and this restored. I have no more to say.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President—

Mr. CAMERON. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to suggest that I had the floor and gave way to the Senator from New York, at his request, on the condition that there was to be no discussion. I see now that this matter will occupy the whole day, and I desire to make my motion for an executive session.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I shall bethrough in a minute, and then the Senator can take the floor.

Mr. President, as a member of the Judiciary Committee I held the same views as those expressed by the Senator from Vermont on this bill, while at the same time I did not consider it a very serious question, as the duties to be performed by this commissioner are purely ministerial, not judicial in any sense; but as the House of Representatives, after hearing our objection, still adhered to their former view, and as it was a matter entirely relating to them, I thought it becoming on the part of the Senate, being one of the committee of conference, that we should not adhere to our views.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in; there being on a division—ayes 26, noes 13.

Mr. CAMERON. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we can finish the bill to-day. We have got to do it some time or other, and may as well do it now.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not think so at all. I cannot give way again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he had better let the bill be printed as it now stands with the amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. They make no change in it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There have been several amendments made.

Mr. SHERMAN. Merely striking out; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GRIMES. I believe a motion to adjourn takes precedence of that, and I make that motion, that the Senate now adjourn until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, January 22, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BRYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MORNING HOUR.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the business in order is the calling of committees for reports of a private nature, the Committee for the District of Columbia being entitled to another morning hour.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. POLAND, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, submitted a report in relation to the bill (H. R. No. 1701) to amend the seventh section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1867. Also, a report in relation to the bill (H. R. No. 1702) in amendment of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867; and the same were ordered to be printed, and recommended to the committee.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. GRISWOLD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1755) to diminish the fluctuations in gold and provide for a return to specie payment; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

OLIVER BASCOM.

Mr. GRISWOLD also, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the claim of Oliver Bascom, assignee of Edward Lusher, for services in taking care of a dredge for the United States at Whitehall, in the State of New York, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CHANLER moved to reconsider the votes of reference, &c.; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ASSAY OFFICE AT HELENA.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1756) to establish an assay office at Helena, in the Territory of Montana; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask to have the bill printed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not think it ought to be printed.

Mr. KELLEY. It comes from the committee with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, and is introduced in connection with another bill I now present for the reduction of the mint at Denver to an assay office—a matter of economy.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What does the gentleman propose?

Mr. KELLEY. To have it printed and referred to the committee. The mint at Denver has cost $235,611 34, and the receipts have been $9,512 89. It is proposed to reduce it to an assay office, and to establish another at Helena.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. How much has the other coined?

Mr. KELLEY. It is not for a mint; it is for an assay office, and it is a matter of economy. The motion to print was agreed to.

UNITED STATES MINT AT DENVER.

Mr. KELLEY also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1757) to convert the branch mint of the United States at Denver, Colorado, into an assay office; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

REFINING OF GOLD AND SILVER.

Mr. KELLEY also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1758) relative to the refining of gold and silver bullion at the Mint of the United States and branches; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the votes by which the bills, were severally referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARTER OF GEORGETOWN.

Mr. KOONTZ, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 418) to amend the charter of the corporation of Georgetown, District of Columbia.

The bill was read. The first section provides that in addition to the rights heretofore granted to the corporation of Georgetown, District of Columbia, to regulate the anchorage and mooring of vessels arriving at the port thereof, said corporation shall be authorized to levy and collect, according to regulations to be established by said corporation, from each and every vessel arriving in the port and harbor a fee not to exceed the sum of $4 50, which fee shall be graduated according to the tonnage of said vessels, and also a ballast fee not to exceed $1 25 from each and every vessel discharging ballast in said port.

The second section proposes to ratify and confirm all acts done and performed by said corporation of Georgetown under an ordinance passed by the corporation entitled "An ordinance for the appointment of harbor masters, and for other purposes," approved September 10, 1864, and all acts done and performed by harbor masters or assistant harbor masters under said ordinance.

Mr. KOONTZ. In explanation of this bill I would state that prior to 1867 harbor masters' dues were collected under an ordinance of the municipal authorities of the city of Georgetown, but at some time during that year there were certain decisions of the courts of the District of Columbia and of the Supreme Court of the United States by which provisions similar to those contained in the ordinance were held to be unconstitutional. The ordinance under which such fees had been collected was to this effect:

"Be it enacted, &c., That section second of the act entitled 'An act for the appointment of a harbor master, and for other purposes,' be so amended that the harbor fees to be collected by the harbor master shall be as follows: on all vessels of fifty tons and under, fifty cents; vessels of fifty tons to one hundred tons, one dollar; two hundred tons, $1 50; from two hundred tons to three hundred tons, $2 50; from three hundred tons to five hundred tons, four dollars; and over five hundred tons, five dollars."

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. In the confusion prevailing in the Hall it has been impossible to hear the bill; but I now make the point of order that this bill is not a private bill and ought not to be introduced here to-day. It is a general bill granting to the city of Georgetown the right to impose a tonnage tax. It is a bill that ought to be considered very carefully, and I, think, by the Committee on Commerce. I submit the point of order that it is not a private bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the point of order is made too late. The bill was read by the Clerk at the Clerk's desk, and if the gentleman from Massachusetts was not attending to what the Clerk read it is not the fault of the Clerk.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I am not finding fault; but the misfortune is, that living in the Alaska region, it is utterly impossible for me to hear what is said. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That complaint is not generally made against the Clerk, whose voice is usually audible throughout the Hall.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. If my point of order is too late I wish to give notice that whenever I can obtain the floor for the purpose I will move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] that by May's Parliamentary Practice, which lays down the distinction between private and public bills in the British Parliament, this would be a private bill. The precedents are found on pages 612 and 613 of that work, as follows:

"Though a bill relating to a city is generally held to be a private bill, bills concerning the metropolis have been dealt with as public bills; the large area, the number of parishes, the vast population, and the variety of interests concerned constituting them measures of public policy rather than of local interest. Thus the metropolis police bills in 1828 and 1839, the metropolis local management bill in 1855, the main drainage of the metropolis bill in 1858, and others similar bills were brought in, and passed through all their stages, as public bills."

"Bills concerning the city of London only have generally been private bills, having been solicited by the corporation itself, which desired special legislation affecting its own property, interests, and jurisdiction. Thus even the bill for establishing a police force within the city was brought in upon petition, and passed as a private bill."

As Congress is the exclusive legislature for this metropolitan District of Columbia, it would appear from the above precedents established in the nation whence we draw our parliamentary law that this bill, confined as it is in its operations to the city of Georgetown, is a private bill, while taxation bills operating throughout the whole District should be held as public bills if objection was made to their being considered on private bill day.

Mr. KOONTZ. This bill has been fully considered by the Committee for the District of Columbia, and I believe the members of that committee, with one exception, are unanimously in favor of the passage of the bill. As I was about stating when interrupted, the owner of the schooner Nautilus refused to pay the small harbor fee of fifty cents which was levied on his vessel. An action was brought for the amount so levied and the case was taken before the supreme court for the District of Columbia, and the court decided that the levying of such dues was unconstitutional. The provision under which these fees were collected was precisely the same as those under which the authorities of Georgetown previously collected them. In the case of the Southern Steamship Company of New Orleans against the masters and wardens of the port of New Orleans, the Supreme Court of the United States declared that it was unconstitutional to collect fees of a similar character that were imposed by authority of the Legislature of Louisiana.

It is held in both these cases that inasmuch as Congress alone possesses this power under that clause of the Constitution which provides that "no State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage," &c., no State or city authority, without a previous grant of power by Congress, has a right to impose any such duty. The committee have deemed it advisable, in view of the importance of this officer, that this power should be given to the corporate authorities of Georgetown. The duties of the harbor master are to remove from time to timeships and vessels in order to make room for others or to admit the river craft to pass in and out of the docks, and to compel the masters and captains of ships and vessels to accommodate each other, so that ships and vessels arriving from sea shall for a reasonable time be entitled to berths next to the wharves until they have unloaded their cargoes. There are a variety of duties imposed upon him, regulating the whole matter of the lading and unloading of vessels and their entry and departure from port.

An officer of this kind is absolutely necessary at every port. I have examined the authorities, and, so far as I can find, there is not a port in the United States in which such an officer is not found. Yet under the decisions of the supreme court of the District of Columbia and the Supreme Court of the United States I do not hesitate to say that in every case where fees are imposed and collected, either by legislative or municipal authority, it is done in violation of the Constitution of the United States. It is not denied, however, that Congress has the right to confer the power to collect such fees upon the municipal authorities of any city. Therefore it becomes merely a question of expediency whether this power shall be granted; and when it is also understood that there is an absolute necessity for an officer of this kind in every port, I think that gentlemen will agree with the Committee for the District of Columbia that this bill should be passed. And now, sir, with this explanation, unless some gentleman desires to be heard upon this subject, I will call the previous question.

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KOONTZ. For what length of time?

Mr. BALDWIN. I do not want much time; not more than five or ten minutes.

Mr. KOONTZ. I will yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. BALDWIN. I think this bill ought not to pass until it is more clearly and fully understood by the House. It is a bill to allow the corporation of Georgetown to levy tonnage duties for revenue on vessels visiting that port. It does not provide merely to allow harbor masters to receive pay for services rendered to vessels visiting that port, but to allow the corporation of Georgetown to collect money by means of this tax, which is to go into the city treasury. This bill certainly proposes a novelty in our legislation, and a novelty that is every way objectionable. If any authority of this kind shall be granted, which I cannot suppose possible, it should be by a general law. At all events, I shall urge here, as I urged in the committee reporting this bill, that before it is further considered the bill should be referred to the Committee on Commerce; and I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOONTZ] to yield and allow such a motion to be made.

Mr. KOONTZ. I cannot yield for such a motion.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KOONTZ. No, sir.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to address an inquiry to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. A member cannot be taken from the floor by another member rising to put an inquiry to the Chair.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman, when explaining this bill, was not heard in this part of the Hall, and I would like to ask him for some information.

Mr. KOONTZ. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the gentleman whether this bill proposes to introduce an exceptional system in the collection of revenue, or whether it is in accordance with the established custom of the Government in regard to the collection of revenue at ports throughout the Union?

Mr. KOONTZ. I will say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] that in all the other ports of the United States these fees are collected either under municipal authority or by legislative enactment; and, as I have already stated, according to the decisions of the courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States and the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the collection of these fees under such authority is unconstitutional. This bill, so far as it confers this power upon the city of Georgetown, is perhaps exceptional.

Mr. CHANLER. That is what I wanted to get at. Now, I will ask the gentleman whether he has any objection to introducing a similar measure with regard to the corporation of the city of New York?

Mr. KOONTZ. I have no objection whatever to such an enactment, though I have no authority from the committee to present such a measure.

Now, I will say in reply to my colleague on the committee [Mr. BALDWIN] that if he had examined this bill he would have found that it contains no provision by which revenue is to be raised by the collection of these fees. The first section of the bill provides—

"The corporation of Georgetown are authorized to levy and collect, according to rules and regulations to be established by said corporation, from each and every vessel arriving in its port, a harbor fee not to exceed the sum of $1 50, which sum shall be graduated according to the tonnage of said vessels."

The bill contains no provision by which revenue is to be raised from these fees. They are simply designed to compensate the harbor masters for services rendered in assigning vessels their proper places at the docks, removing them, attending to loading and unloading them, and performing the other duties I have already enumerated. The authority proposed to be given by the bill is precisely similar in character with that formerly exercised under the ordinance authorizing the collection of these fees. As the collection of such fees under municipal authority has been declared unconstitutional, the bill proposes to authorize their collection by act of Congress, the only power competent to give such authority.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will allow me a few minutes before he yields the floor.

Mr. KOONTZ. I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will begin by saying that this bill, if it be passed, will stand alone upon the statute-book, being wholly exceptional in its character, without precedent, so far as I am advised, in any legislation heretofore adopted by Congress. The Committee on Commerce have now upon their files a multitude of petitions praying that some legislation should be had prohibiting the imposition in different ports of various taxes under local laws. It appears that the tax which has heretofore been in some way or other collected at Georgetown has been ruled by the courts to be contrary to the provisions of the Constitution; and now the corporation of that city having made application to Congress, the Committee for the District of Columbia have reported a bill, which has not been printed, and which has not been examined by any gentleman who has not had the chance to read it in manuscript, proposing that Congress shall confer upon the corporation of Georgetown the right to impose on every vessel coming into that port a tax not exceeding $4 50 for one purpose, and a ballast fee not exceeding $1 25 for another purposes. Now, Mr. Speaker, it may be well enough for Congress to take into account the interests of all the ports of the United States before undertaking to say that any one port shall have the privilege to impose tonnage taxes upon the commerce of the United States. I submit that this is a question that ought to receive the most careful consideration of the committee charged by this House with the duty of examining questions of this kind, and that it is not right that bills professing to affect only specific ports, but which may affect the interests of the whole commerce of the country, should be reported from committees not having charge of the general subject. I cannot, in the few minutes which are allowed me, undertake to state to the House the various objections to this proposed legislation. All I can do now is to say that it is wholly exceptional in its character, and that it has not received the examination of the committee whose duty it is, as it seems to me, to look into questions of this kind. I shall, if I have the opportunity, move the reference of this bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to corroborate the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts. My constituents are now petitioning Congress upon this very subject—to be relieved from this sort of extortion. I hope, therefore, that the House will send this bill to the Committee on Commerce, so that if there is to be a bill passed on the subject it shall be made general, and not as this is, exceptional in its character.

Mr. KOONTZ. The reason this bill is exceptional is this: the corporate authorities of Georgetown have deferred to the decisions of the courts; in other cities they have refused to do so. The fees are now being collected in New York, Philadelphia, and other ports in violation of the Constitution of the United States. The committee were not asked to consider the question of giving the power to other cities. This bill provides that power be conferred upon the authorities of Georgetown to have an officer under the law to do what is now done in other ports without law. I demand the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. If the previous question is voted down, will it be in order for the gentleman from Massachusetts to make a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

The House refused to second the previous question—ayes 22, nays 92.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ROSS. I move to lay it on the table.

The question being taken on the motion to lay the bill on the table, there were—ayes 79, nays 46.

Mr. KOONTZ. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BREVET RANK IN THE ARMY.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, presented a letter of the Secretary of War, in regard to brevet rank in the Army; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FOUR-AND-A-HALF STREET.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 253) to change the name of Four-and-a-half street, in the city of Washington, to Lincoln avenue.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MASONIC MUTUAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1779) to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was reported.

Mr. WOOD. I do not think this bill requires any explanation. It explains itself. It is simply a bill granting an application by the members of the order of Masons in this District to have an active incorporation to enable them jointly, all the lodges being represented, to distribute their alms to their brethren and their widows and orphans.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMILIN, one of its clerks, announced that that body had passed the following bill and joint resolutions; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1451) for the relief of John H. Osler, of Guernsey county, Ohio; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 404) providing for the disposition of certain papers relating to military claims accruing in the department of the West; both with an amendment.

LOANS UPON UNITED STATES NOTES.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now yield for three minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNES].

Mr. BARNES. I ask unanimous consent of the House to present a bill to prevent loaning money upon United States notes for the consideration of the House at this time. I will state that the bill has been considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and considered of vital and immediate importance, and is unanimously recommended to the attention of the House at the present time.

Mr. WOOD. I object.

POLICE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WELKER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with sundry amendments, chiefly verbal, the bill (H. R. No. 1627) to establish a police court for the District of Columbia.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, reads as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be established in the District of Columbia a court, to be called police court of the District of Columbia, which shall have jurisdiction of all offenses committed in the District of Columbia not deemed capital or infamous crimes; that is to say, of all offenses which are declared to be misdemeanors and made punishable as such and not punishable capitally or by imprisonment in the penitentiary, and of all offenses against any of the ordinances of the city of Washington, or of the city of Georgetown, or the levy court of the county of Washington. It shall consist of one judge, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the term of six years; and who shall, before entering on the duties of his office, take the oath prescribed to be taken by judges of the courts of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the salary of said judge shall be $3,000. The said court shall have power to appoint a clerk, at a salary of $2,000; said clerk shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations, and shall give bond with surety as prescribed by law for clerks of district courts of the United States, and who shall hold his office for six years, unless sooner removed by said court for good cause.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That prosecutions in said court shall be by information, without indictment by grand jury or trial by petit jury. But a party deeming himself aggrieved by the judgment of said court may appeal to the criminal court held by a justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia; and in such case said appeal shall be tried on the information filed in the court below, certified to said criminal court by a jury attending at said criminal court, although the case had originated in the last-mentioned court.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That said police court shall hold a term thereof in each month of the year; said terms shall begin on the first Monday of each month. Said court shall have the power to issue process for the arrest of persons against whom information may be filed at any time, and to compel the attendance of witnesses. Such process may be directed to the marshal of the District of Columbia, who shall execute the same in like manner as in other cases. Such process shall be under the seal of said court, and shall bear teste in the name of the judge thereof, and signed by the clerk.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said court shall have power to punish contempts and to issue all process necessary for the exercise of its jurisdiction, and shall have a seal. It shall not have jurisdiction to naturalize foreigners.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That said court shall have power to appoint one bailiff, who shall receive for his services $3 50 for each day's attendance upon said court, as provided for in section four-teen, certified by the judge of the court.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That there shall be no fee charged for any service by the clerk. The marshal and witnesses shall receive the same fees as are allowed for similar service and attendance in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and be paid in the same manner.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That in all appeals from said court the party applying for the appeal shall enter into a recognizance with sufficient surety, to be approved by the said court, for his appearance at the criminal court then in session, or at the next term thereof, if said criminal court be not then in session, there to prosecute said appeal and to abide the judgment of said criminal court. Said recognizance, with said approval indorsed thereon, and the information, shall be immediately transmitted to the clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. Upon such recognizance being entered into all further proceedings shall be stayed in the said police court, and the judgment of said criminal court shall be final in the case.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the bailiff of said court may act as a deputy for the marshal of said District of Columbia for the service of process issued by said court.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That said police court shall be provided with a suitable place for the holding of its sessions, at the expense of the District of Columbia. Said court shall have power to do all acts which may be necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction hereby conferred.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That upon the failure of any party appealing from the judgment of said police court to the criminal court to enter into recognizance, as provided for in section eight, he shall be committed to jail to await his trial upon his appeal, and said trial may be held in said criminal court as though said recognizance had been entered into. In such case it shall be the duty of the court below to send up the information filed in the cause, and a copy of the record of all the proceedings, to the criminal court.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the judge of said police court shall have power to take the acknowledgment of deeds for lands in the District of Columbia, to administer oaths to public officers, and to certify to the sufficiency of sureties in official bonds and guarantors of contracts with the various Departments and Bureaus of the Government; for which service, in either case, a fee of one dollar may be charged.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That said court shall have power to make such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary and proper for conducting business therein. Contempts may be punished by fine and imprisonment, or both; but the fine shall not exceed twenty dollars, nor the imprisonment be longer than twenty-four hours.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the salaries of said judge and clerk of the police court, and the compensation of the said bailiff, shall be paid quarterly by the authorities of the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington in such proportions as may be fixed by the mayors of Washington and Georgetown and the levy court of said county, having reference to the value of the taxable property therein, respectively.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That all fines and penalties assessed and collected by said court shall be paid over by the clerk thereof to the proper authorities of the cities of Washington and Georgetown and said county of Washington in the same proportion as said mayors and levy court shall apportion the salaries aforesaid.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the United States attorney of said District, or his assistant to attend to the trial of all cases in said police court and conduct the trial thereof, and attend to all business in said court in relation thereto, on behalf of the Government; and for his services rendered in said court the said United States attorney shall receive as compensation the same fees allowed him by law for similar services in the criminal court of said District, to be paid by the authorities of the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington, to be apportioned as aforesaid on the certificate of the judge aforesaid that such services were rendered; and said attorney shall not be required to include said fees in his semi-annual emolument return to the Secretary of the Interior, and they shall be in addition to the fees paid him by the Government for other services.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That all justices of the peace in said district having jurisdiction of the crimes and offenses of which jurisdiction is given herein to said police court shall recognize such accused persons for appearance in said court instead of the criminal court of said District, and certify the proceedings to said court in the same manner as now provided by law in the case of recognizance of accused persons to said criminal court of said District.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me to offer an amendment?

Mr. WELKER. I will hear it read.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This seems to be a bill to establish a new court here and create a great deal of additional expense, and if it can be done at the expense of the District I do not know that I shall have any objection. I desire the gentleman to allow me to offer the following as an additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the levy court of the District of Columbia to levy a tax to pay all the expenses of the court, which shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and held as a special fund to pay such expenses, and no expenses of said court shall be a charge upon the Treasury.

Mr. WELKER. I have no objection to providing that the levy court may levy the tax, because the bill provides that this court shall be at the expense of the District.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What want to provide is that the establishment of this court shall not entail, as it would under the bill as reported, an additional and very heavy expense to the Government.

Mr. WELKER. I have tried to prevent its being any expense to the Government.

Mr. HOPKINS. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois this modification of his amendment:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That no expense incurred by the organization of this court shall be paid by the Government of the United States.

Mr. WELKER. I have no objection to that amendment being offered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I will accept it as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. WELKER. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. This bill as proposed to be amended, it seems to me, is objectionable in one or two particulars. I am not sufficiently informed in regard to all the facts; but one of the objections which occur to me is that it proposes to allow the district attorney to charge certain fees which are not specifically described in the bill or the proposed amendment. Now, we have on various occasions passed bills containing provisions of that sort, and afterward ascertained that allowances had been made which never would have been made if this House had understood exactly what was being done. Then another objection I have to the bill is, that it allows justices of the peace now holding commissions to take cognizance first of the very offenses of which this police court are to have jurisdiction, and that the parties charged are to be held over to answer in the police court. I do not see why the police court should not have original and exclusive jurisdiction of all those cases. I understand that one of the grievances, if it be not something worse, in this District is that these justices of the peace arraign persons who, perhaps, ought not to be arraigned, and in one way or another receive very large fees either from the treasury of the District or from the United States.

Mr. WELKER. I will first answer the last objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] We have undertaken in this bill to provide that these justices of the peace shall have some criminal jurisdiction. It is not proposed to give justices of the peace any additional criminal jurisdiction whatever.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The point I make is, that this police court should have the same place in the judicial proceedings of this District that police courts usually have in cities of the size of this one; that is, original and exclusive jurisdiction.

Mr. WELKER. This bill does give that court general jurisdiction. But in the District of Columbia these magistrates, or justices of the peace, examine charges against individuals and bind them over for trial in the criminal court of the District. In place of the criminal court it is proposed by this bill to establish a police court for the trial of certain offenses.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The great grievance complained of in this District, and which I understand is to be perpetuated if the proposed amendment to this bill shall become law, is that justices of the peace will have original jurisdiction, as well as this police court, of various offenses under the general name of misdemeanors. Now, I think, if we are to set up a police court here, that court should not only have original but exclusive jurisdiction, and that justices of the peace should be disrobed of their power to arraign any one. And the fees that are complained of, and which are now taken by these justices of the peace; constitute one of the difficulties which we ought to get rid of when we establish a police court for this District. Without that I certainly would not vote to establish a police court here.

Mr. WELKER. It is not proposed by this bill to change at all the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in relation to this class of crimes. If there is any complaint to be made against them for the exercise of that jurisdiction I am entirely willing that the section directing them to bind over to this court shall be stricken out of the bill. The bill itself gives the police court original jurisdiction in all that class of crimes in this District. But I supposed that these justices of the peace, now having criminal jurisdiction, could go on under the present law investigating offenses charged and bind over to the police court that class of criminals which they now bind over to the criminal court of the District.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and this bill will go over to the morning hour of the next private bill day.

Mr. WELKER. I ask that the bill, with the pending amendments, may be printed for the use of the House.

No objection was made; and the bill and pending amendments were ordered to be printed.

LEAGUE ISLAND BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a communication from Commodore Glisson, commanding League Island navy-yard, asking authority to repair the bridge connecting the island with the main land, and asking an appropriation of $10,000 for that purpose; and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. MILLER asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Captain James Thompson, of Juniata county, Pennsylvania.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask that the bill (H. R. No. 1625) concerning the boundaries of the States of Nevada, Minnesota, and Nebraska, and the Territories of Colorado, Montana, and Wyoming, which has been made a special order for next Thursday, be ordered to be printed, with the amendments.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill and amendments will be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection.

EVIDENCE IN CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. DAWES, from the committee of conference upon the bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend an act entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in case of contested elections," approved February 19, 1851, presented the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to bill (H. R. No. 1558) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in case of contested elections,'" approved February 19, 1851, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: strike out all of said Senate amendments, and all after the word "that" in line one of the original bill down to and including the word "district" in line two, and insert in lieu thereof as follows: "any register in bankruptcy or notary public resident in a congressional district;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

H. L. DAWES,
SAMUEL McKEE,
JOHN CHANLER,

Managers on the part of the House.

ROSCOE CONKLING,

F. T. FREELINGHUYSEN,

GEORGE VICKERS,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] will, according to notice already given, call up the constitutional amendment in regard to suffrage for debate during the day.

DENVER PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The House, according to order, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 570) for a grant of land, granting the right of way over the public lands to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. VAN TRUMP resumed and concluded the remarks begun by him on last Wednesday.

The entire speech is as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I shall crave the attention of the House for a time while I proceed to give some of the reasons why I cannot concur with the majority of my colleagues on the Pacific Railroad Committee in asking for the passage of the bill now before the House. The question is of vast importance to the material interests of the people; and I am much mistaken in the popular sentiment if it does not demand a prompt and definite settlement of the proposition one way or the other. I do not consider the votes already taken as at all conclusive of the question yet to be presented on some of the many bills not reported, and of the one now before the House. The vote on the Niagara canal bill and on the resolutions of the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] may be indicative of what is called the temper of the House; but they are not conclusive.

"We have scotched the snake, not killed it."

Sir, it is a fact disputed by no one that the action of the present Congress in relation to the almost untold numbers of bills now pending in committee asking the aid of the Government in the construction of railroads and ship-canal and other kindred works denominated public improvements, will affect the public interests, if not the public feeling and opinion, with consequences which will reach into the far-off future, and exert an influence, for good or for evil, upon the coming generations. I regret exceedingly, sir, that I have been hurried into this debate without that examination and preparation, especially upon its legal and constitutional propositions, which its importance demands, and without which a full knowledge and understanding of all its multifarious bearings upon the great interests of the people in the present embarrassed affairs of the Government cannot be fully obtained. I shall reserve the right, if I can get the opportunity hereafter, to present my views upon the constitutional questions involved in this grand scheme of Government subsidies to private corporations. Nor shall I now confine myself to the bill under consideration.

I wish to say, right here, in relation to this Senate bill, No. 570, proposing to grant a subsidy, in the bonds of the Government, of $800,000 to the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, that I am most decidedly opposed to voting any more subsidies, either in the people's lands or the people's money, to these private corporations, for the reason that, outside of the question of constitutional power, they are intended to inure more to the selfishness of private ends than the public good. I not only have very grave and serious doubts of our constitutional power to do so, but my convictions as to the wrong and impolicy of the thing, in the present disturbed condition of the country, are clear and unhesitating. Sir, with this great and mighty public debt resting upon and tormenting the people to an extent and with a crushing weight never before imposed upon an equal amount of population and property in all man's history, we are now asked, or will be asked, to increase the vast volume of this public obligation in a sum of more than one hundred million dollars in the way of grants of lands and bonds to railroads and ship-canal, owned and controlled by a few private and unscrupulous individuals whose attention is more devoted to cheating the Government in their construction than to care for and protect the people's rights by a fair and honest compliance with the terms of the law which gives them these enormous subsidies.

Sir, in my humble opinion it is high time we should pause in this mad course of extravagance and special legislation. In times like these, if in no other, all our legislation should look to the common weal and the public safety instead of private aggrandizement and the creation of these most intolerable special and personal privileges. These jobs and speculations may triumph now, but a day of the most signal retribution will surely come. The people may be careless and indifferent now, or seem to be so; but there will come a time when they will look into these things with a most thorough and searching scrutiny. The frenzy of party politics, the passions and prejudices growing out of the war and belonging to the great question of reestablishing the Government, may yet for a time so occupy and absorb the public mind as to ignore all other questions; but a time will surely come when we, as the Representatives of the people, will be held to the strictest accountability for our present action upon these gigantic schemes of public plunder. Sir, do I state the question too strong? Do I denominate this system by too harsh a term? It is no time now to deal in honeyed phrase, any more than it is to deal in unmerited vituperation. The plain, straightforward language of truth is what the times demand; and he who does not dare to use it so as to clothe truth with all its significance and power fails in his duty to the people, when their rights and their interests are at stake. I shall present some facts before I take my seat which will show that the importance and fearfulness of this subject cannot be exaggerated.

Mr. Speaker, the best way to comprehend and anticipate the future is not to neglect or forget the practical teachings of the past. It is the instinct of wisdom to profit by example. History is the great light-house of the nations; and woe unto that people who do not heed the rocks and shoals disclosed by its warning light shed across the troubled waters of a nation's life! Everything in the past warns us of the future. There is not so much difference in men, either as individuals or when massed into classes, in the impulses and passions which dictate and lead to their actions, as there is in the circumstances and temptations by which they are surrounded and controlled. Time and circumstances do not so much make as they develop human character. Applying this philosophy to the subject in hand, we can form some idea how these new schemes of railways and subsidies will be managed in the future, by looking into the management of those which have already been consummated. I think I shall show either the most reckless extravagance or else the most gigantic fraud that has ever occurred even in railroad extravagance and corruption.

Take the Union Pacific railroad as an instance. In 1862, in the midst of the war, during its darkest and most gloomy prospects, and upon the miserable plea of a "war necessity," this gigantic monopoly and swindle upon the people was incorporated with a capital of $100,000,000. This war cry is still kept up to force a compliance with the leech-like demand for more bonds and lands. I beg leave here to say that in my opinion my friend, the honorable gentleman from Minnesota on my left, [Mr. WINDOM,] marred his very able and elaborate speech the other day, in advocacy of the Northern Pacific railroad, by using this worn-out appeal of a "war necessity" in relation to our troubles with the western Indians. It was not worthy of the high level of his general argument.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] who immediately preceded me in the discussion of the bill now before the House, also sounded this war-whoop against the "poor Indian." All this shows that the art of war is not at a stand-still. Why should not improvements be made in the science of war as well as in anything else that pertains to man in his onward march to perfection? Sir, it would be a most amusing sight to see a noble squadron of this iron-sinewed steam cavalry making a charge through the narrow cañons and over the lofty precipices of the Rocky mountains upon a few flying and scattered sachems, mounted on their shaggy and half-starved ponies! The poet's idea of the "leaps of the living thunder" among the Alpine crags would be almost realized. But, sir, in all seriousness, there is a much better remedy for our Indian difficulties than the screams of the steam-whistle or the prancings of the iron horse. Let this Government deal fairly and justly with these Indian tribes; let it put an end to the chicanery and dishonesty of its Indian agents; let it bestow but a fraction of the consideration and money upon the red man which it does upon the black, and we will hear no more of Indian troubles or Indian wars.

Mr. Speaker, there was a day in the history of this Government when the great and almost imperial corporate powers of this Union Pacific Railroad Company, outside and independent of its enormous land and money subsidies, would have excited the alarm and indignation of the people; but the popular mind seems to have become paralyzed, and nothing now, whether of power or expenditure, either shocks or attracts the public attention. But, sir, I must postpone to another time the consideration of its tendency to political and commercial dominion: I only wish to call attention now to the monstrous mismanagement if not corruption of its affairs, and the insatiable voracity with which it has swallowed up the lands and the bonds of the Government. We have none of us forgotten the slashing and unmerciful description by the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] of the manner and the means by which this act of incorporation was carried in 1862. That was a picture of legislative action, a photograph of parliamentary tactics, not soon to be forgotten.

But that is not all. The passage of the supplementary act of 1864 must have been quite as extraordinary, for by that act the first mortgage lien of the Government upon the entire road and all its equipments, solemnly enacted to secure $20,000,000 of its bonds, was absolutely struck out of existence by the insertion of five short lines in the amendatory law in order to give place to an equal amount of the private bonds of the company, perhaps largely owned by its own stockholders! That was a sweep of the pen, "my masters," which would have been magnificent had it not been so profoundly unjust and iniquitous. Then look, too, at the gigantic scale of these subsidies! There is nothing in all history that can compare with it. Lands enough to form and sustain an empire have been squandered upon these railroad corporations.

Sir, what a most radical change has taken place in the legislative if not the popular mind in the theory of disposing of the public domain from what it was in the days of Webster and Wright, of Clay and Cass, and of Ewing and Benton, as the great leaders of the two opposing parties in the halls of legislation and upon the hustings! Then it was a very grave and vexed question whether Congress had any power at all over the subject upon the question raised between the two parties, and whether it was, outside of the mooted constitutional question, the true policy of the country, that even the proceeds of the sales of the public lands should be distributed among the people of the several States. As a political question, it never was permanently settled, for the verdict of the ballot-box vibrated both for and against it. Now, however, Congress wrests this great heritage of the people from the hands of both States and people by millions upon millions of acres, and absolutely gives it away without compensation to a few favored individuals for the purpose of building up immense private interests under the guise of insuring the public prosperity. But my object at present, Mr. Speaker, is not to speak at large of these land grants. That subject was completely exhausted on yesterday by the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

In speaking of these bond subsidies and the wrong use which has been made of them I shall only consider those of the Union Pacific road proper, excluding those granted to the Central Pacific, although that road is an extensive portion of the same trunk line, for the reason that I shall only notice the delinquencies of the first-mentioned line, as officially reported by the Secretary of the Interior in his late annual communication to the President; and I do this to warn the country of the inevitable tendency of this system of subsidies which we are asked to sustain and extend by the passage of the bill now before the House. I shall not notice now the immense land subsidies to this corporation, although the extraordinary covenant is entered into on the part of the Government to extinguish by purchase with the money of the people for the benefit of this company the Indian title to all lands held and owned by them along the route of the road.

The act of incorporation establishes three different scales for the issuing of the bonds of the Government. For three hundred miles on the mountain slopes bonds were to be issued at the rate of $48,000 per mile; an uncertain portion of the route lying between the Rocky and Sierra Nevada mountains was to receive $36,000 per mile; and the residue of the line was to be compensated at the rate of $16,000 per mile. This latter section includes the great plain of the Platte lying west of Omaha, the eastern initial point of the road, on five hundred and thirty-five miles of which there is not a single rock excavation, the whole extent of that portion of the line presenting nearly practicable natural grades. There is but one tunnel on this whole portion of the Union Pacific railway, and that is only two hundred and thirty feet long. There are only four other tunnels in the mountain ranges, and the entire amount of tunneling on the whole road is only eighteen hundred and thirty-four feet. I mention these facts to show either great fraud or great extravagance in its construction.

As an index to the fact whether it is the one or the other, it may be regarded as a pregnant circumstance that the great contractors who have engaged to do the greater portion if not the whole of the work are composed of an inner "ring" of the principal stockholders of the company itself! A very nice and convenient modus operandi of fraud, and in itself presumptive of wrong, unless the gentlemen who sustain this double character of contractors and stockholders approximate a degree of human perfection not common in these modern days. The charter provides that before any bonds of the Government shall be issued or any patents issue for the lands thus granted the company should have at least forty miles of their road constructed and equipped "equal in all respects to a fully-completed first-class railroad," and so on, consecutively, for each additional forty miles thereafter. In order that these conditions precedent should be fully and faithfully performed, and as the evidence of their actual performance the act of incorporation also provides that it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to appoint three commissioners to examine and report as to whether the company, in each consecutive instance of forty miles of constructed road, have fully complied with these provisions of their charter.

Now, sir, I wish to call the attention of the House and of the country to the very recent report of one of these commissions appointed by the President. On the 25th of September last General G. K. Warren, of the United States Army, Jacob Blickensderfer, jr., of Ohio, and James Barnes, of the State of Massachusetts, were appointed such commission. It is hardly worth while to stop to criticize the appointment of a commissioner from the State of Massachusetts, where the ruling stockholders and contractors of this company reside, or that Mr. Blickensderfer is one of the original incorporators named in the act of incorporation, and one of the constructing engineers of the road itself. I have known Mr. Blickensderfer for a quarter of a century, and can indorse his honesty and integrity of character. I only mention these things to show how this Pacific company arranges all its operations. I have no doubt that these commissioners have made a reasonably fair and honest report of the character and condition of the road, and to that I shall now proceed to pay some attention. They report as their opinion—

"That the location of the road, as a whole and in its different parts, is upon the most direct, central, and practicable route, but that the line is not in all respects well adapted to the ground, as there are points where the full capabilities of the country have not been developed, and others where, in its details, the location is radically wrong. This has been occasioned by a desire to diminish the cost of the work by the introduction of more and sharper curves than the circumstances require, although the saving in cost was but small in comparison to the permanent injury of the road. The line as built should not be permanently adopted. The higher embankments are not brought up to the proper standard, and in some instances the width of the top is less than the length of the ties. The cuts have not all been excavated to the depth desired. On the curves the rails have not been bent to conform to them. The track has, without exception, been laid on the bare roadway, without the latter having been previously prepared to receive it. Six hundred and sixty trestle and pile bridges, after providing for those over the principal streams, must be replaced by box girders, arches, or stone abutments, with girders or trusses of short span."

The commissioners enter into a very minute and detailed estimate of the cost of supplying these palpable deficiencies in the construction of the road, of which the following is a condensed synopsis: it will cost $200,000 in changing locations to improve line and diminish curvature; $200,000 for completing embankments to full width; $245,000 for reducing grades; $910,000 for ballasting and readjusting track; $144,000 for abutments and pier foundations; $457,200 for masonry in abutments and piers; $380,250 for Howe truss bridges; $565,100 for supplying openings of trestle work; $100,000 for renewing Dale creek bridge; $100,000 for additional water ways; $310,000 for sixty new passenger locomotives; $150,000 for repair of locomotives; $234,000 for forty-four new passenger cars; $114,000 for thirty baggage, express, and mail cars; $450,000 for five hundred box freight cars; $200,000 for fifty additional locomotive stalls; $350,000 for completing shops at Cheyenne; $80,000 for additional water stations; $75,000 for additional station buildings; $50,000 for additional snow fences; and $30,000 for additional fencing against stock; making the enormous aggregate of $6,489,550 to supply the deficiencies in only a part of the road, and on the cheapest and easiest portions of the entire route.

From this exhibit of facts, drawn from the report of a commission composed of gentlemen certainly not adverse to this corporation, it is manifest to my mind that many millions of bonds have been issued to this road not authorized by the strict stipulations of its charter. But this is not all, sir. The annual report of the Secretary of the Interior, laid upon our tables only a few days ago, contains a statement of the most startling and alarming character. Sir, if I am not much mistaken it is a disclosure of the acts and doings of these railroad cormorants which will astonish the people; one which will arouse them from their lethargy, and draw down upon the heads of these unconscionable speculators their deepest condemnation. I honor the Secretary for his well-timed and manly independence in making the statement, for he must have known that nothing could have been more damaging to the interests as well as the character of these railroad managers. On page 14 of his printed report the honorable Secretary makes the following statement:

"As the actual cost of this road is a matter of public interest I deem it proper to present, in a condensed form, the estimates submitted, on the 14th instant, by Jesse L. Williams, esq. He states that the cost of the road, as shown on the books of the railroad company, is, of course, equivalent to the contract price per mile. The actual cost to the contractors forming an association, which embraces most of the larger stockholders of the company, is shown only by their private books, to which the Government directors have no access. The calculations were, therefore, made from the most accurate available data, and the estimated cost of the first seven hundred and ten miles of the road was taken as the basis for computing that of the whole line. Should the road, as is expected by the company, form a junction with that of the California company, near the northern extreme of Great Salt Lake, a little west of Monument Point, its length would be about eleven hundred and ten miles. The cost of locating, constructing, and completely equipping it and the telegraph line is $38,821,821, an average per mile of $3,977.32.

The Government subsidy in bonds for that distance at par amounts to $29,504,000, an average per mile of $2,950. The company's first mortgage bonds are estimated at ninety-two per cent., and would yield $27,143,680. The fund realized by the company from these two sources amounts to $56,647,680, being an average per mile of $51,034, exceeding by $16,056.68 the actual cost of constructing and fully equipping the road, and yielding a profit of more than $17,750,000."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I put the question directly to this House whether this is not a most extraordinary statement of the management of the affairs of this road, in which the money of the people is so deeply involved? It is to be borne in mind that this is no personal or partisan allegation, no idle newspaper charge, no imputation resting upon mere common rumor; but that it is a sober, serious statement, upon reliable data, in a public official State document, by one of the great Departments of the Government, and which remains to-day unchallenged and uncontradicted by any of the "high contracting parties" alleged to be connected with the transaction. There are one or two features of this statement calculated to challenge an attention at once intense and painful. The very worst feature of all is the fact that "most of the largest stockholders of the company" should have combined with each other to "form an association," thus creating an adverse interest, as "contractors," to the interests of the corporation, for the purpose of building a road in which the Government had invested the sum of nearly thirty million dollars as guarantor of that same corporation; a situation so delicate and so full of temptation to prey upon and fraudulently deal with such an immense outside capital that no honest man or men would desire to occupy.

I should like to see a list of those contracting stockholders. I think it would open the people's eyes. Sir, it is a specimen of the "confidence game" in which we might well affirm that its turpitude is almost lost in its magnitude. If we could look in upon all its secret springs and hidden movements what an interesting and spectacular drama might it not present! But it is to us and to the people a terra incognita. Railroad embankments, excavations, bridges, and underground masonry are capital inventions to hide away ill-gotten treasure with no danger of its discovery or exposure unless through the instrumentality of honest and disinterested science in a full and accurate measurement of the entire work from one end of the line to the other. One of the Government directors, Mr. Williams, in a letter of November 14, 1868, says that the actual cost of the road to the contracting company is shown only by their private books, of which the Government directors have no knowledge. He knows what the cost of the road is to the corporation, and consequently to the Government, by the terms of the contract; but all else growing out of this credit mobilier arrangement "shadows and darkness" rest upon it.

But, sir, I shall give these stockholding contractors, these happy recipients of the proceeds of Government bonds by millions, credit for a mistake which the Secretary of the Interior has evidently made in the elements of his statement, that a profit in the sum of $17,750,000 was or will be made in the full construction of the road. He has unquestionably failed to deduct two items from that amount, to wit: the amount it will require to compensate for the deficiencies of construction for the first eight hundred and ninety miles as stated by the commissioners, in the sum of $6,489,550, and the same ratio of deficiency in the residue of the unfinished line, terminating at the head of the Great Salt Lake, near Monument Point, in the further sum of $1,620,000, making the total sum to be deducted $8,109,550. This sum deducted from $17,750,000 leaves the sum of $9,640,450. This is the true result of the data as furnished by the commissioners, taken in connection with the facts furnished by Mr. Williams. And in its reduced proportions is it not wonderful enough? A "profit" of $9,640,450! Who realized it? Was it the stockholders generally, said not to number over forty individuals, or was it the stockholding contractors in particular?

Sir, is it not strange that none of these stockholders or contractors have either admitted or denied this most remarkable statement made in an official document issued by one of the great Departments of the Government? And yet, as to this immense sum thus found in the hands of these disinterested patriots, it is to be borne in mind that not one dollar of it comes from the millions of acres of lands granted by the Government to this all-grasping monopoly. That great subsidy yet remains intact and untouched, and will hereafter add millions of dollars more to this "profit" fund, when they shall be sold by the company to the people, the original and rightful owners. Sir, it is indeed time that the people should ponder well and seriously upon these most extraordinary transactions.

The people will have some idea of the vast resources placed in the hands of a few favored individuals when they are informed that over fifty-one million dollars of the bonds of the Government have already been issued to a single line of road and its tributaries and connecting branches. The Union Pacific railroad is connected with, and therefore will control, the following other roads, to wit: Central Pacific, of California; Union Pacific, eastern division; Sioux City and Pacific; Western Pacific; Atchison and Pike's Peak; and Central Branch, Union Pacific. The last annual report of the Secretary of the Interior shows the following amounts of Government bonds issued to these several lines, which, with the $7,000,000 issued last month and since that report was made, make the aggregate sum over fifty-one million dollars, as before stated:

Union Pacific, 800 miles.....	$20,238,000
Central Pacific, of California, 390 miles.....	14,761,000
Union Pacific, eastern division, 394 miles.....	6,303,000
Sioux City and Pacific, 69½ miles.....	1,112,000
Western Pacific, 20 miles.....	320,000
Atchison and Pike's Peak, { 100 }	640,000
Central Branch, Union Pacific, { miles, }	960,000
1,798 miles.....	$44,337,000

Mr. Speaker, the sensitive and delicate modesty of these corporations should elicit our highest admiration. They are perfect models of retiring diffidence. They are seekers after the public good under difficulties which nothing less than the bravest spirit of the highest philanthropy could overcome. While they are extorting from the Government, as well as from private individuals, the most exorbitant rates of charge for freights, and even for the transportation of troops to form a protecting guard against provoked depredations of the Indians on their own property, they do not hesitate to come here with an array of lobby solicitors to demand of Congress the grant of still further millions of acres of lands and bonds in untold amount to aid them in building up the very monopoly which enables them to impose such imperious terms. Their rates of passenger fare and freight exceed those of the Atlantic and Mississippi valley roads more than two hundred and fifty per cent.

By a statement in a pamphlet publication of the eastern division of the Union Pacific railroad, issued a few months ago by themselves, it appears that the amount received by that road from the Government, for freight and transportation of troops for the year ending December 31, 1867, was the sum of $511,908.24. A letter from General D. H. Rucker, acting quartermaster general of the United States Army, to William H. Palmer, esq., treasurer of the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, dated Washington, June 6, 1868, shows that the rate of charge on this business was ten and ninety-nine hundredths cents per ton per mile. This is also the rate of charge on the Union Pacific railroad proper, and, as I suppose, on all its several branches. The rate for passenger fare is ten cents per mile, one hundred per cent. higher than the rate under the old mail-coach system.

Now, Mr. Speaker, by referring to the official railroad reports of the several Atlantic States, made by the requirements of State legislation, it will be found that the average rate of charge for the same kind of freight over lines of much shorter transit than those of the Pacific is a large fraction less than three cents per ton per mile. It is thus that the Government, by a process of the most unwise legislation in the grant of corporate power, as well as of its lands and credit, has been made a party in the erection of a great and overshadowing monopoly, which will not only regulate to suit its own selfish purposes the overland trade between the two oceans, but will dictate and control the politics of all the States and Territories lying along its line. Is this fact or is it fiction? Why, what a scene did we have presented here on this floor only the other day! The chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. DAWES] solemnly proposing to have a Delegate from the Territory of Wyoming sworn in, who was originally from my own State, and who is or has been connected with the Pacific company, elected or selected by a mass meeting largely made up of the employes of the road, and whose only credentials consisted of a certificate of three of the members of the meeting, and the meeting itself held before Wyoming was organized as a Territory! This is only a "specimen brick" of what we may expect in the future. They intend to rule not only the business but the politics of the people, and will exert their influence not only at the ballot-box, but in the legislative halls of the country.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to ask the gentleman upon what ground he makes the statement that this Delegate from Wyoming was selected by a mass meeting?

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I derive my information from a gentleman coming from that region. I do not assert the fact on my own authority.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections are desirous of getting all the information they can upon this question; and if the gentleman has any information to the effect he has stated he will oblige the committee by communicating it to them.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I will, if the chairman of the committee desires it, refer him to the gentleman who communicated the matter to me, who will doubtless give the committee the benefit of the information. Most of the facts which I have stated in my place to-day were stated by gentlemen on the floor when the gentleman made his report.

Mr. DAWES. We shall be much obliged for any such information.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Sir, while I would be the last one to decry the importance and benefits of railway communication in developing the great and yet dormant resources of our country, I am not unmindful of the fact that even our choicest blessings may be turned into tormenting curses if misused or distorted from their natural and legitimate purposes. This great existing railroad system for power and influence may be said to constitute already the third estate in this Government. With forty thousand miles of running railway communication, fully equipped and based upon a capital of $1,700,000,000, we can at once appreciate the tremendous power for good or for evil which lies concentrated in that mighty investment. It is the business of legislation to see that the rights and interests of the people shall be amply protected against the monopolizing tendencies of such a vast system of associated capital and corporate power. I know, sir, that in this storm and pressure period, this age of fast men and lax principles, when prudence is denounced as imbecility and honesty is "whistled down the wind" as something almost disreputable, these apprehensions of the future, these warnings of placing too much power in the hands of a few, will be contemned and disregarded as being too slow and conservative for this age of radical revolutionary ideas. But time will test their wisdom, and the people, in regard to this question, as in all others when surrendered to the whirlwind instead of moderation and reason, will learn when too late the hard lesson of experience.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus noticed some of the prominent and startling facts in the management of the Union Pacific Railway Company rather than discuss the particular merits or demerits of the claim presented in the bill now before us, for the reason that I oppose the system rather than the particular bill, and because this debate opens the whole question of Government subsidies. And yet even this bill is a manifestation of the "crooked ways" in which legislative wrongs are sometimes perpetrated. As the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] said the other day, its very title is a cheat and deception. The suppression veri is betrayed in every word and syllable. It is declared to be "a bill for a grant of land granting the right of way over the public lands to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and for other purposes." Now, sir, what are these other purposes, and how are they expressed in the body of the bill? The leading purpose of the bill, to those who understand it, is the grant of a money subsidy, not to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, so ostentatiously paraded in the title of the bill for a land grant and for the right of way over the public lands, but to the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, in the sum of $16,000 per mile for an unknown and undetermined distance, but supposed to be about fifty-four miles.

We are presented with no survey to fix the distance, and consequently the extent of the grant. No one not acquainted with the previous and complicated legislation in relation to the eastern branches of the Union Pacific railway would dream of a money subsidy in the bonds of the Government lying concealed in the following ingeniously ambiguous language of the bill, to wit:

"And upon the connection of the Union Pacific railroad and telegraph, eastern division, with said railroad and telegraph at Denver City, said company shall be entitled to the same rights and privileges as if the whole line had been completed by said eastern division company."

And yet, sir, this is the meal-tub in which lies snugly hid away from unpracticed eyes the nice little subsidy in Government bonds to swell the public debt of the country, amounting to nearly the sum of one million dollars, for the benefit of the eastern division of the Union Pacific Railway Company! We also have this surprising fact for our consideration, that although this road is but very imperfectly built for a distance of four hundred and five miles, and besides its land grant has already received in the bonds of the Government the sum of $6,463,000, it has discontinued its work and is awaiting the passage of this bill for a recommencement of its operations. Sir, I look upon this bill as a test question in the Fortieth Congress. The embryo life of many a railroad, ship-canal, and mining-tunnel hangs quivering in the scales. If the voice of an awakening people could be heard on this floor I have no doubt what their decision would be.

Mr. Speaker, as the people, in legal effect, have so tremendous an investment in these roads, it is all-important for them to know how their interests have been managed in their construction and equipment. I have already shown with what reckless prodigality, if not bad faith, the trunk line of the Union Pacific road has been constructed from Omaha to its present western terminus. I propose now, very briefly, to exhibit the deficiencies of construction in the eastern division, which, as a corporation, is independent of the main trunk line. A commission, composed of General Warren and Mr. Blickensderfer, made an examination and report of this road, which was communicated to this House by the Secretary of the Interior only a few days ago. The commissioners allege in their report that—

"The whole line bears evidence of the unsettled purposes which have operated in determining it. In the details of the location there is too much curvature; the grade is generally laid too near the ground and follows too closely the undulations of the natural surface. Cheapness of first construction seems to have been the ruling idea. The grades are too high. The track has been laid on the bare road-bed, without having the latter previously prepared by a covering of ballast to receive it. The fastenings are the old style, now almost universally discarded, and the rails are not bent to conform to the curvature. The commissioners exhibit the following estimate of cost to make the road equal to the requirements of the law: $260,000 for increasing width of cuts and embankments; $240,000 for correcting changes in location; $227,000 for reducing grades; $32,000 to supply deficiency in cross-ties; $15,000 for abutment and pier foundations; $54,000 for masonry in abutments and piers; $20,000 for replacing stone culverts of defective construction; $33,500 for replacing wood culverts; $251,500 for replacing trestle-bridges; $523,500 for ballasting and lifting track; $50,000 for snow-fences; $50,000 for cattle-fences; $700,000 for fifty additional locomotives; $90,000 for fifteen passenger cars; $23,000 for ten baggage, express, and mail cars; $360,000 for four hundred box freight cars; $500,000 for engine-houses, turn-tables, machine-shops, &c.; $75,000 for additional water-stations; and $70,000 for additional station-buildings—making in the aggregate the sum of $3,662,500."

Thus, sir, it will be seen that this road is also deficient in its construction and equipment to an amount almost equal to one third of the entire sum which should have completed and fully equipped it as a first-class railroad. And yet every dollar of the full quota of Government bonds have been issued and delivered in violation of the express provisions of a law passed almost in furore by a Congress but too ready and anxious to serve the interests of a banded clique of capitalists and speculators, who have from the beginning looked more to the construction of the road than to the road itself and its business afterward, as the means of private profit to themselves. Does any one doubt that these stockholding contractors in the Union Pacific railroad feel more interest in their contract than they do in their stock, and that the temptation to sacrifice their unpaid stock to the profits of their contract is the real key to this most remarkable arrangement? The stock as an investment, and the ultimate success of the road is a naked experiment; the profits of the contract made under such circumstances can be placed beyond all contingency. In such an alternative self-interest never hesitates. It will sacrifice the lesser to the greater interest, and as between two modes of speculation, or even speculation, it will grasp the certain at the expense of the uncertain.

Now, in view of this state of facts, Mr. Speaker, I here make the prediction that the end of all this will be that ultimately and after there is a transfer of the original stock these roads will be sold in the same manner that a large proportion of our American roads have already been sold, and the first-mortgage lienholders will become the owners, thus cutting off the lien of the Government for the security of its bonds, leaving the people to foot the bill. That, sir, is the probable feast which the American people will be invited to sit down to hereafter. I am not alone in this opinion. I think one of the Government directors in the Union Pacific Company is impressed with the same apprehension. In the report on the Union Pacific railroad sent to this House on the 18th of last month there is a very curious letter from J. L. Williams, esq., to Oliver Ames, esq., president of the Union Pacific Company. In this letter he alludes to a "paper" inclosed as explanatory of his suggestion of what he calls a "reserved fund;" but, singular enough, no copy of the paper is given in the report, nor is there any reply of Ames, although the letter is dated July 1, 1868. Williams goes on to say that those representing the Government might well hesitate to sanction the delivery of the entire subsidy for the whole extent of the road while the work is in so incomplete a state. He concludes his letter with the following significant paragraph:

"I should add that if the control of the work would certainly remain in the hands of the very respectable and wealthy gentlemen now holding the stock, no such precaution might be necessary, for they would put in fresh money as needed to make an efficient road. But in the ever-changing control of such works this is not probable."

Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the fact may be, for I have not the means of knowing, but I do know that the opinion prevails pretty extensively among the people that not a dollar of the large stock originally subscribed to the Union Pacific railroad has been applied to its construction. I see my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. AMES,] now sitting before me, smiles at this declaration. I do not state the fact as of my own knowledge; I state it as a common belief. But, however this may be, sir, one fact is certain, that by the amendatory act of 1864 the miserable pittance of five per cent. semi-annually may be assessed upon the stockholders; so that in any event sixty per cent. of its entire stock yet remains undue, and of course not paid in. The inference to be drawn from all this is at once suggestive and alarming.

Sir, I feel so deep an interest in the defeat of this bill, not so much for its own sake as from the fact that it is the test as well as the representative of a most vicious system of legislative extravagance, that I have a very great repugnance to make any political allusions whatever. But I may say, what will not and cannot be controverted, that this whole scheme of Government grants and subsidies to private corporations is a Republican measure, inaugurated and carried on by a Republican Congress. Whatever of merit or demerit it may possess belongs exclusively to the party now in power. The Democratic party can claim no part in its honors, nor can they be called upon to share in any of its responsibilities. Such has been its history in the past; what the future may produce we must wait for the future to develop. I am rejoiced, however, to observe some indications that General Grant is disposed to put a check upon this extravagant legislation, or at least that he will lend his influence in that direction. I know, sir, the hint has been thrown out that he does not so much object to the system as he does to particular lines. As I am not one of his supporters, it matters not to me what his motives are, whether dictated by principle, or policy, or partisanship. If he opposes all future appropriations to new roads from the Atlantic to the Pacific, upon the ground of their becoming rivals to the Union Pacific railway, while I may not admire the motive I am bound to accept the result, because it accords practically with my own views, although mine may be drawn from quite a different stand-point. The leading Republican journal of Ohio infers, from my opposition to these schemes of public plunder, that I shall become a supporter of the administration of General Grant. As the editors of that journal are avowedly in favor of one or more competing lines of Government-aided railroads across the Rocky mountains, the sarcasm of its prediction is as likely to be intended for General Grant as for myself, or it may be for both.

But these gentlemen may rest perfectly easy on that score, as I can assure them there is no very great danger of any such political conjunction. The General would have to cut himself loose from the party which has raised him into power upon scores of other great and vital questions, involving not only the rights and liberties of the white citizen, but the reestablishment and supremacy of the Constitution over all the States, alike in Georgia as in Massachusetts, before I would be willing to acknowledge myself as one of his supporters in general politics. Whenever he is right upon any given question of policy he will receive no factious opposition at my hands; and I shall never stop to inquire whether I will gain or lose by supporting his administration when my judgment shall be convinced that it is my plain and direct duty to do so, either as a private citizen or as a Representative of the people.

Sir, I fully appreciate the argument of a rival road to divide the trade and perhaps reduce the cost of transportation both of passengers and such light freights as could successfully compete with the water transit through the Gulf of Mexico, between the Atlantic and Pacific States. At the proper time and with the use of the proper means that will be all well enough. Whenever a second road could be made profitable, or whenever it shall be made plain and clear that a second line is an absolute necessity, there is no reason, or there ought to be none, why the private capital of the country could not and would not build such a road. Because Congress has already improvidently added some fifty or sixty million dollars to the public debt by the issuing of bonds to existing roads is certainly no good or conclusive reason why they should more than double that amount to new roads, the present necessity for which is neither apparent or probable. The system itself, under any circumstances, is radically wrong; and you might just as reasonably desire that the plague should compete with the cholera in afflicting and decimating mankind as that the wrongs of this system of government aid to private corporations should be doubled in order that its instruments or creatures should be pitted in competition with each other.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Kansas has made an arrangement with the Arkansas delegation that he shall occupy the floor till quarter before three o'clock, when the death of Hon. JAMES HINDS, late member from Arkansas, will be announced.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, in what I have to say it will be my purpose to discuss the bill now before the House. I shall not attempt to follow the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VAN TRUMP] through the general declamation in which he has indulged against our Pacific railroad system. With some of the views he has so ably presented I entirely agree, while from much he has said I dissent most emphatically. Much less, sir, shall I attempt to imitate the remarkable speech of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], made at the onset of this debate. Sir, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has seen many years of service in this House. He has been honored by its Presiding Officer with the chairmanship of one of its most important committees. But, sir, no length of service, no parliamentary position here can possibly justify his unbridled license of statement and misconception of facts so far as this bill is concerned. I am at a loss whether to condole with him most on the array of accusations with which some one has supplied him or the ridiculous errors into which they have led him. I admire the ambition which seems to inspire him to be the "watch-dog of the Treasury," and my desire to see such a spirit raised to its highest usefulness leaves me to regret that it should hurl its thunders blindly against every expenditure, whether it be a measure of dishonest or unnecessary appropriation or an expenditure necessary for the highest interests of the nation. It is one thing, sir, to legislate for the public good and to protect and foster the public welfare, while it is quite another thing to indulge in unwarrantable philippics and needless declamation.

Supported by facts and sustained by wise considerations of public policy, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has often rendered on this floor great service to the country in resisting schemes of reckless extravagance and fraud. But, sir, in the discussion of this bill the gentleman has grown furious at a phantom, has presented fictions for facts, and has evidently been made the victim of misplaced confidence by some over-zealous and ignorant opponent of the pending bill.

What are the facts? It is the exact provisions of this bill to which I desire to call the attention of the House. In the first place, this bill does not grant a single acre of land beyond what is granted by existing laws. Let me read from the amendatory act of July 3, 1866, as follows, which authorizes the construction of the road up the valley of the Smoky Hill river:

"That the Union Pacific Railway Company, eastern division, is hereby authorized to designate the general route of their said road, and to file a map thereof, as now required by law, at any time before the 1st day of December, 1866; and upon the filing of said map, showing the general route of said road, the lands along the entire line thereof, so far as the same may be designated, shall be reserved from sale by order of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That said company shall be entitled to only the same amount of the bonds of the United States to aid in the construction of their line of railroad and telegraph as they would have been entitled to if they had connected their said line with the Union Pacific railroad on the one hundredth degree of longitude as now required by law: And provided further, That said company shall connect their line of railroad and telegraph with the Union Pacific railroad, but not at a point more than fifty miles westwardly from the meridian of Denver, in Colorado."

Now, sir, under this law the land has been already withdrawn from market for the use of the eastern division company when they build the road, extending all the way from the present terminus of the road to Denver, and from thence to the connection with the Omaha line. Cheyenne is on the Omaha line of the Pacific railroad, one hundred and six miles north of Denver; Cheyenne Wells is on the line of the eastern division road, fifty-six miles west of the present terminus of its track, and about one hundred and fifty miles southeast of Denver. This bill extends the subsidy of $16,000 per mile, and no more, to the Eastern Division Company from the present terminus of the track to Cheyenne Wells; and the amendment of the committee limits the same to fifty-four miles in all, amounting in the aggregate to $864,000 in bonds. The attempt of the gentleman from Illinois to torture this bill into any other meaning is not complimentary, at least, to the intelligence of this House. But what else does this bill contain? It authorizes the eastern division company to transfer that part of its lands beyond Denver to the Denver Pacific Company, in consideration of said company building that part of the road and giving the eastern division company perfect running connections as provided in the original Pacific railroad law. Thus it will be seen that the two hundred and fifty miles of road west of Cheyenne Wells is to be built without any further aid in bonds, and with the lands already granted.

The privilege of mortgaging that part of the road that gets nothing but the lands already granted is given to the two companies, respectively, by the bill—a privilege I suppose they have already. Now, sir, this is all there is in this bill. It is fair and honest in all its provisions, and is in no way liable to the fictitious construction put upon it by the gentleman from Illinois. Can it be possible, Mr. Speaker, that a single member of this House will vote against this bill because the gentleman has sought by violence of denunciation to give a construction to its provisions entirely foreign to its language and its objects? I say again that it does not grant a single acre of land, and I challenge the gentleman from Illinois to make good his statement to the contrary.

And now, what are the reasons why this bill should pass? They are many, and in my judgment such as ought to govern the candid judgment of this House.

From time immemorial it has been the policy of this nation to make judicious expenditures on behalf of trade and commerce. Millions upon millions have been lavished upon rivers, harbors, and coast works, to insure and protect the mercantile and commercial interests of the people. The spirit that condemns this use of public moneys is alien to the necessities of the country, and hostile to its growth, prosperity, and wealth. The enterprise which weds the eastern and western shores of this continent by a grand thoroughfare which is destined, in the event of its success, to avenue the accumulated wealth of ages, and lay its vast treasures at the feet of our people, is one not less deserving our encouragement and aid than those measures which call for the nation's treasure to protect the commerce of the seas.

The attempt of the gentleman from Illinois to prejudice the fate of this bill by alluding to the origin of the charter upon which the Union Pacific Railway Company have been building their line, and stigmatizing the gentlemen who are connected with it as a "border-ruffian company," seems to me unworthy the cause in the interest whereof he professes to resist the passage of this measure. It cannot be a matter of great import that the Legislature which originally chartered the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Company was composed of those whom he characterizes as "border ruffians." Few of the original corporators are now living; none, I believe, are interested, directly or indirectly, in the present company—a body of enterprising and practical gentlemen, whose names are too well known to ask or need defense from me.

The gentleman cannot be ignorant that the charter of the Kansas territorial Legislature, to which he thus refers, covers not more than one hundred and forty miles of the four hundred and more already completed and in running order; and it cannot be a matter of serious concern to the nation that the present company, which has pushed with unexampled and remarkable energy this great railway nearly five hundred miles from the Missouri river toward the cordilleras of the Sierra Madre, are the assignees of men who may have merited the severe language applied to them by the honorable gentleman. It is but charity to believe that the inflamed and hostile language of the gentleman reflected the feeling of some irritated litigant with the company, who seeks to color with his grievances the deliberations of this body.

It is not to be forgotten that the aid of the Government has left this company upon the most barren and sterile point between the mountains and the Missouri, in the heart of the "American desert," where it, however, is rendering most signal services to the nation by the transportation of troops, munitions, and supplies to advanced posts upon our western frontier. Valuable, however, as are its uses to-day, were the road extended, as they hope by the passage of this bill to be enabled to extend it, almost incalculable benefits would inure both to the Government and to the people.

The gentleman from Illinois denounces the aid proposed to be extended by this bill as reckless and extravagant on the part of the Government. I oppose this statement with the declaration that it would be worse than recklessness and extravagance not to pass it, and I will attempt to prove this assertion to the satisfaction of the House. On the 25th of May, 1863, the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a letter from the Secretary of War, inclosing a letter of Lieutenant General Sherman, dated March 4, 1863, recommending Government aid to extend the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, as a military necessity and a measure of public economy, submitted a report unanimously concurred in by the committee, a portion of which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"That they have carefully considered the statements therein made, and have found them confirmed by the following facts, drawn from official record. The cost to the Government for transportation on the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, in 1867, was..... $511,968 24
If the military supplies had been wagoned and the mails carried by stage and the troops marched, (taking the average rates at which the Government made its transportation contracts for that year, as shown by certificates of the departments of the Quartermaster General and Postmaster General,) the cost would have been..... 1,358,291 06

Saving to the Government in 1867..... $846,322 82

"At this rate of saving all the United States bonds issued in aid of this road, principal and interest, would be extinguished in less than four years.

"These are the results of the use by the Government of the finished portion of the road in Kansas in the last year.

"In regard to the extension of the road beyond the point in Kansas at which its subsidy ends, the committee find that there are three regiments of troops in New Mexico, (two of infantry and one of cavalry,) nearly all of the supplies for which are wagoned from the end of the Kansas Pacific railway at a cost of $1 23 per hundred pounds per hundred miles. At the present freight rates of the railway, as shown by their printed schedule, the saving in transportation on these supplies to Albuquerque, on the Rio Grande, a central distributing point in New Mexico, would be per annum $851,880. We have ascertained that the additional saving to the Government in the transportation to Albuquerque of the mails, troops, and Indian supplies would be $231,922. Total annual saving, $1,083,802.

"But there is another consideration of economy in the public expenditure as the result of constructing the road. Lieutenant General Sherman has testified that one half of the military force in New Mexico could be dispensed with if the road was constructed, owing to the greater mobility of the remainder and the growth of self-protecting settlements on the line of the road. As his estimate of the cost of maintaining the two regiments of infantry and one of cavalry was about four million dollars a year, the committee find that an additional saving to the Government of $2,000,000 annually would thus be effected by the road. This saving, added to the saving in the transportation of the diminished military force that would be left in New Mexico and of the supplies to maintain them, including the carriage of the mails and Indian goods and supplies would, in less than six years, reimburse the entire loan necessary to extend the road from its present terminus to the Rio Grande."

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. There can be no mistake, Mr. Speaker, about these significant facts presented by the Committee on Military Affairs. They come to us authenticated by a committee of this House, and, overwhelmingly refuting the statements made by the opponents of this bill, show to the House and to the country that we will be unmindful of true economy if we deliberately refuse to encourage an enterprise which in reality is daily saving vast sums to the Government. If this bill is not passed, more money will be taken from the Treasury next year, and every year thereafter, by $94,000 than heretofore, and I challenge a contradiction of the fact. Last year the Government transportation on route No. 2, beyond the present end of the track to New Mexico, as stated by General Easton, of the quartermaster general's department, was over 20,000,000 pounds or 10,000 tons. The above 10,000 tons carried over the 54 miles for which this bill grants aid would cost, at the railroad tariff, 10½ cents per ton per mile, which would amount to $58,800. The United States mails carried over the same distance at contract rates by railroad, $150 per mile per annum, amounts to $8,100.

The United States troops carried last year numbered 6,225 over an average of 173 miles of road, equivalent to 2,692 taken to the end of track, which is 400 miles. The cost of transportation of these troops on the 54 miles to be constructed would amount to $12,123. Total amount of Government transportation on the 54 miles, $78,523, of which the Government would pay the railroad company under the present law but one half, or $39,262.

Now, if these supplies should continue to be transported by wagons over the 54 miles, the mails carried by stage, and the troops marched, I estimate the cost as follows: Government freights, 10,000 tons, at 28½ cents per ton per mile, $158,360; United States mails, at $243 per mile per annum, $13,122. The saving by transportation of 2,692 troops by railroad is estimated at one third the cost of marching the said troops: so that this saving would be one half of $12,123, or $6,062. From this statement the following facts are shown: the total cost under the present system would be $184,667. If the railroad were constructed the actual outlay of the Government would be $39,262. The yearly retrenchment on existing Government business over this 54 miles would be $145,405. Total aid in Government bonds, $864,000. Interest at six per cent., $51,840. Yearly saving to the Government over the interest, $93,565; which would wipe out the entire principal of the Government loan in less than eight years, leaving for the twenty-two years thereafter, until the bonds mature, $93,565 yearly to the Government of the United States. This sum placed at interest by the Government would yield over five million dollars by the time the bonds will become due. It is with such facts as these with which I oppose the inaccurate statements of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the gentleman has referred to me, I would like him to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What I desired was to show the House the enormous rates of freight which this company is exacting from the Government of the United States, and how much absolutely the Government has to pay, which I undertake to say is more than it would cost to haul the freight by teams.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, that does not meet the question. This is not a question of fares of freight for the people. On the question of reduction of rates I agree with the gentleman. I have given the exact rates of freight which the Government is charged for the transportation of troops and mails; and I say that these rates, from the official record, show a vast reduction upon what is paid by the quartermaster's department by contract at the present time for Government wagon transportation. I repeat that a comparison of the prices paid under the two modes of transportation shows that the sum of $145,405 would be saved in one year by the Government upon existing business if the remaining fifty-four miles of this road were constructed and in running order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the road had not been built there would have been no necessity for these expenditures. The construction of the road has stirred up these Indian wars and necessitated these vast expenses.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I will have something to say about that by and by. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois, as little as he admits upon this floor, will concede the fact that the business of this Government in future years over this great line of communication will increase and not diminish; and while the statement I make to-day is based upon the business of the last year, and shows the fact that $145,405 was actually saved by the Government, I do not hesitate to say that the business of the Government for the present year, when eight thousand troops are operating upon the plains against hostile Indians, will be once, twice, and even three times as great as heretofore.

Mr. Speaker, I have learned for the first time, from the gentleman from Illinois to-day, that the construction of these roads is regarded by anybody as the sole cause of Indian hostilities and increasing the cost of Army transportation upon our frontiers. I deny that assumption, and will remind the House of the fact that the expressed opinions of every one of our military commanders—Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Hancock, and others—are contradictory to that of the gentleman. But these estimates are made on the single item of transportation, and the figures are taken from official sources. If we calculate the time required to transport the troops; if we take note of the increased efficiency of the Army; if we remember the fact that the mere existence of the railroad goes far to prevent the recurrence of Indian hostilities; and if members of this House would analyze the vast expenditures of the Interior and War Departments on our western plains, they would most readily see that the figures I have presented do not actually exhibit the real saving to the public Treasury by the construction of this road.

I think it is safe to say that there are at this moment not less than eight thousand troops in the vicinity and on the line of this road operating against the hostile Indian tribes and protecting the vast commerce of the plains and the rich mineral regions beyond, all of whom draw their supplies by this line of communication. If our Pacific railroad system were so far completed as is contemplated by this bill one half of these troops at least would be relieved from duty, and an expense of not less than $5,000,000 saved to the Government in a single year. Moresagacious than the gentleman from Illinois, and more mindful of the public welfare and the public Treasury, because foreseeing the military as well as the commercial necessities of the Government, General Grant, while treating on this subject in his report as Secretary of War, said:

"During the last summer and summer before I caused inspection to be made of the various routes of travel and supply through the territory between the Missouri river and the Pacific coast. The cost of maintaining troops in that section was so enormous that I desired, if possible, to reduce it. This I have been enabled to do to some extent from the information obtained from these inspections, but for the present the military establishments between the lines designated must be maintained, at a great cost per man. The completion of the railroads to the Pacific will materially reduce this cost, as well as the number of men to be kept there. The completion of these roads will also go far toward a permanent settlement of our Indian difficulties."

General Sherman has declared:

"The completion of this road during the present year to Fort Lyon would be a most important event to the military interests of that frontier, and the completion of the other branch (Denver branch) to coal and wood would also be most important to all the interests along the valley of the Smoky Hill, chiefly so to us who have to guard that line and provide for the wants of the necessary garrisons. It seems to me that we can, with great propriety, recommend to Congress at its present session to extend their subsidy to this company at the present rate for two hundred and fifty miles more, the aggregate amount being $4,000,000 in bonds. This road is a military necessity."

General Sheridan has declared:

"I know that pecuniarily it would be to the advantage of the Government to help this road; certainly as far as Fort Wallace, and also to Fort Lyon. But, in addition, it is a most substantially ends our Indian troubles by the moral effect which it exercises over the Indians, and the facility which it gives to the military in controlling them. No one, unless he has personally visited this country, can well appreciate the great assistance which this railroad gives to economy, security, and effectiveness in the administration of military affairs in this department."

General Schofield, Secretary of War, wrote to Senator DRAKE, of the Pacific Railroad Committee, in July last:

"In reply to your communication of July 2, respecting the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, in which you desire to know the wishes of the War Department as to the proposed extension of Government aid to that road as far as Cheyenne Wells, I have no hesitation in recommending the proposed extension."

"By reference to a letter from General Sherman to General Grant, dated March 4, 1868, now before Congress, it will be seen that a much greater aid is recommended than that now proposed, and that the road is spoken of as a military necessity."

"No man could be better able to judge of this matter than General Sherman, and I have no hesitation in indorsing his opinion."

"I believe near Cheyenne Wells is the most easterly point where a temporary depot for the supplies destined for Fort Lyon and the posts beyond can be made so as to conveniently subserve the military interests."

"Abundant water and forage at that point make it more suitable than any other point farther east for such depot, while the distance (about forty miles) from Fort Wallace to Cheyenne Wells will be saved in wagon transportation of supplies."

"The proposed extension appears to be a measure of economy to the Government."

General Hancock wrote to the Secretary of War, under date of June 4, 1868:

"I have the honor to state that from my knowledge of the facts concerning this road, which is probably as intimate and extensive, and, as regards actual experience, in some respects more minute as to details than that of those who have spoken favorably of the enterprise, I feel at liberty to offer the weight of my testimony in a few words, believing that the interests of the Government may be benefited thereby. I commended the department of this Missouri last year, during an Indian war, and from my personal experience, obtained while I was on the plains, with respect to the transportation of troops and supplies by the railroad in question, as well as its great importance in connection with the settlement of that country, I feel that I can speak in strong language as to the necessity of this road being extended as rapidly as possible."

"I consider any assistance given by the Government to this enterprise as most wisely and advantageously applied."

But there is another reason far more cogent than the figures presented in the report of the Military Committee and the opinions of Generals Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Schofield, and Hancock why this bill should become a law.

The vast mining interests of Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona are languishing to-day for want of cheap, speedy, and easy transportation. In the Territory of Colorado alone the product of gold can be increased by the introduction of capital, machinery, and labor to $100,000,000 annually, thus going far to solve the problem of returning to specie payments. And not only will the production of bullion in Colorado be stimulated, but the vast mining resources of the surrounding Territories will be awakened into life and activity, and the great commercial avenues and centers of the whole country correspondingly enriched and benefited. Thus, while eastern enterprise and capital will smite the stubborn sides of the "mountains of gold," the Pacific railroad will bear back to the great money centers of the East the vital elements of wealth, prosperity, and power.

I hesitate not to say here, sir, as a member of this House, that when our Pacific railroad system is completed in all its parts and the volcanic and mineral regions of New Mexico and Arizona are opened up by the great line of railway which shall soon find its way across the valley of the Rio Grande and stretch onward toward Mexico, the Gulf of California, and to San Francisco, and when that other great national line from Lake Superior to Puget sound penetrates the gold regions of the North, that the annual product of the precious metals and of other mineral values in the United States will more than equal similar products in all other parts of the world. No temporary fit of false economy; no refusal to meet the present exigencies of the public welfare; no cowardly attempt to shift the responsibilities of to-day on those who are to come after us; no political demagoguery or special pleading can arrest the irresistible progress of our civilization, or stay but for a moment the onward destiny of the Republic in the development of its material resources. And, Mr. Speaker, let me also say that I am one of those who believe that we owe something of encouragement and support to the sturdy pioneers of our civilization who brave the dangers of our frontier and sacrifice so much in extending the area of our wealth and developing the elements of our material, educational, religious, and political progress. These men have fought our battles in all our wars, and are fighting a continual battle for the benefit of the generations who are to come after them. It would be base ingratitude, worse than cowardice, and a policy not less fatal than foolish and short-sighted, to declare now that we will stay the further development of the new sections of the country, and withhold from their people a just encouragement to those avenues of communication essential alike to individual and national prosperity. We cannot afford to do it! If we refuse as legislators to keep pace with the just demands of the people in any section of this country we shall be and ought to be rebuked by those who exercise the sovereign power of the Republic. Political parties are omnipotent only as they represent with fidelity the popular will. As with parties so it is with men. Not even the gentleman from Illinois, grown gray in the public service and entitled to grateful recognition from the people—from which I would be the last to detract—can stay the march of empire or successfully resist the demands which a progressive and enlightened people have the right to make upon him.

Mr. Speaker, on the 8th of June, 1867, I had the honor to meet a large company of distinguished gentlemen from all parts of the country at the then terminus of the Union Pacific railway eastern division, near Fort Harker, Kansas. Not half a dozen miles away countless herds of buffalo covered the broad prairies and hostile bands of Indians hovered in the vicinity. I remember now that several distinguished gentlemen upon this floor were present upon that occasion. A meeting was organized, and with the broad and beautiful panorama of nature spread out before us we enjoyed the pleasure of listening to several addresses. The distinguished gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORT], in the course of able and eloquent remarks relating to this great enterprise, said:

"Where we stand to-day the Indian and the buffalo but a few days ago held undisputed sway, while the not distant morrow will witness their departure to wilder scenes and more inaccessible recesses."

"Our good 'Uncle Sam' has come here and he brings with him science and civilization, and he intends to plant permanently a part of his great family; for he is now founding empires, and his mission will not be fulfilled on this continent until every foot of its soil will acknowledge his dominion and his power. [Applause.]

Less than twenty years ago the project of a railroad uniting the Atlantic with the Pacific was regarded by our most practical business men as chimerical, while to-day we look with amazement, even in this fast age when scarcely anything amazes us, upon the rapidity with which this great work approaches completion. The Pacific railroad has become a political necessity, and our Government, even if such a thought were harbored, cannot now recede from lending such material aid as will, under wise and judicious management, accomplish its completion at the earliest practical period."

"In view of these facts, so hastily glanced at and so imperfectly brought to view, I submit to you, Mr. Perry, as President of the eastern division of the Pacific railroad, whether you are not about reaching that point in your route when a southern detour becomes necessary? Should you not at once reach out the iron arm of your road and grasp the rich valleys of the Rio Grande and its tributaries?"

"Should you not furnish an artery for the vast commerce of northern Mexico, an outlet for her mineral wealth, which equals in richness the best veins of Nevada and Montana? And not only an outlet for Mexico and Mexican products, but as a necessary consequence a market, rich and profitable, for the products of American skill, energy, and industry. [Applause.]"

The gentleman from Indiana on the other side of the House [Mr. NIBLACK] said:

"When I first entered the Congress of the United States, now near ten years since, Kansas was the theme of almost every tongue, and practically absorbed all other questions. I was frequently called upon to vote on different phases of her political affairs, and finally had the honor of voting to make her one of the States of this Union. [Cheers.] I am one of a very few members of the present Congress who can claim this honor; most of those who participated in her admission have either retired from public life or been swept down by the swift course of mighty events which have since intervened. I confess, therefore, that it was with some emotion that I entered the borders of this State the other day for the first time in my life, and looked out upon her broad plains and fertile prairies. As much as I have heard said and seen written concerning these I was not quite prepared to see such beautiful scenery and so grand a country. Had I the power of painting scenery as only a master hand can paint it I feel that I still could not make a picture so beautiful as that I have seen. The grandeur would, at least, be wanting."

"I shall return, as I doubt not others will who live east of the Mississippi, with impressions as to the scenery and country now around us which will never be effaced. I shall return, too, under the impression that the eastern division of the great Union Pacific railroad is in the possession of the right men, and that each man is in his right place. [Cheers.] I will ever bear with me the kindest recollections of the courtesies and hospitalities which have been so profusely extended to us. What I have seen of the country west of the Mississippi has more than ever impressed me with the practicability of reaching the Pacific ocean by railroad and with the grandeur of the enterprise. From its geographical location, if for no other reason, the eastern division of this great work must ever be a favorite route with those among whom I live. Come what will, then I do not want to see it fail. [Cheers.] Whatever, therefore, I can in conscience and honor, do to forward it, I will. I hope, feel ever ready to do. [Cheers.] Of course I do not desire to see this road pressed forward in any way that shall be injurious to other routes. I wish to see the Government extend a fostering hand to the extent of its ability and power to all kindred enterprises. There is room for many routes to the Pacific, and there is little danger, I imagine, that too many will be constructed."

The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS] also added his testimony to the importance of this work, as follows:

"Mr. Chairman, I possess no language in which to express my surprise and delight with the scenes through which we have flown in our progress from the sea and by which we are surrounded to-day. Such scenes can never fail to impress most vividly the feelings and imaginations of those who visit for the first time the fertile fields, the teeming cities, and the boundless prairies of the great West. In my own little but gallant State we are accustomed to boast of natural wonders which attract and repay the distant traveler; and yet for myself I must say that I do not believe that I should be penetrated by greater astonishment than has been awakened in my mind by this grand proscenium of the continent over which our progress has led us, if on my return I should find the face of the 'Old Man of the Mountain' wreathed in smiles or behold Mount Washington nodding his imperial head in stately courtesy to these expansive prairies."

"I owe the pleasure of this trip to the call of personal friendship and the curiosity of travel. But I feel, sir, that it has not been without its practical lesson or its real benefits. And here, sir, in the very center of the continent, on the historic soil of Kansas—with what a price has she purchased her liberty!—I am free to say that I recognize the utility, yes, sir, the future necessity, of uniting the shores of the Atlantic with those of the great peaceful sea, and binding together the industrial East with the Golden Gates of California by those iron bands which in the future are to bear the burden of a mighty commerce in its transit across the continent. Against all obstacles this great enterprise, this magnificent scheme, must go forward to its completion. I shall be glad to lend my personal and official aid to this great work. I hope it is not now to be interrupted by war. I trust the rising cloud of Indian hostilities will prove a cloud only. Be that as it may, this work must go forward. While the peaceful Indian can rest in security side by side with our own race, the warlike savage, the wild, untamed, and untamable Indian, must retire before the advancing tread of cultivation. New England found that out two hundred years ago. Let the rest profit by our history, let the country mark our example, and promptly and speedily the barbarities of the Indian and the sensuality of the Mormon shall give way to the progress of civilization, commerce, and Christianity."

Following the gentleman from New Hampshire came the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAFLIN.] I quote from his eloquent address:

"I feel a personal pride in the success which has crowned the efforts of the great Pacific railway. Coming as I do from the State containing within its borders the largest number of people in any of the glorious States of this great Union—a State represented by a wealth and a commerce of which we may be justly proud; a State which has felt from its very infancy the force and effect of the prosperity of the section of country beyond it, at the West, and a State, too, which has somewhat distinguished itself by its works of internal improvement—I may say that, coming from that State, I feel that all the States beyond us at the West and all the improvements which have developed in them are part and parcel of our system."

"When we remember that it is almost within the lifetime of some of those who are before us that the mighty Empire State, now numbering within its borders four million people, had a population little exceeding the present population of the territory which now constitutes the State of Kansas—which twelve years ago was an unknown wilderness—we are astonished at the progress which our country has made. And when we bear in mind that in a few more years this State of Kansas, containing within its borders more than double the number of square miles of the State of New York, and possessing far more of the elements of agricultural wealth, will also count its millions of inhabitants, the imagination is lost in wonder at the teeming millions of prosperous people who will occupy our great Republic of America, through the heart of which we have passed on this journey."

"Indeed, there are persons with us, young it may be, who will scarcely arrive at the age of the majority of us, who will see occupying this immense territory of the United States a population nearly equal to one half of the whole population of the globe. And is it not a matter of pride, should it not be a matter of congratulation, that those who are the pioneers, those who are to lead onward the tide of immigration and of population which is bearing westward, are men of such enterprise, men of such public spirit, and, as we can all testify, men of such eminent private virtue and ability as those gentlemen who are leading on the enterprise of constructing this railroad through to the Pacific?"

I will conclude this testimony by quoting a brief extract from the address of the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. NICHOLSON:]

"I have been amazed at the stupendous obstacles which nature has interposed in the pathway of human enterprise, but no less amazed at the success which has crowned your efforts in surmounting those obstacles. The most formidable of the difficulties you have had to encounter appears to me to have been immensity of distance, and this is vanishing at your touch. You stagger not at apparent impossibilities; and now this great work, spanning a continent, the progress of which we have been brought hither to witness, presents every assurance of speedy accomplishment."

So it seems, Mr. Speaker, that members of this House, standing in the very center of the continent and on this great line of road, united with our military commanders in concurrent testimony in favor of the work to be accomplished by this bill. I only regret, sir, that the gentleman from Illinois had not wandered thus far away from the shades of Galena, and, abandoning for a time his peculiar problems of economy, looked with unprejudiced eyes upon the necessities of the whole country and comprehended, like the honorable gentlemen from whose remarks I have quoted, the present and prospective wants of not only the commerce of the plains but the commerce of a continent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the particular attention of the House to the location of the line of this road west of the meridian of Fort Riley. By the act approved July 1, 1862, it was provided as follows:

"The route in Kansas west of the meridian of Fort Riley to the aforesaid point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude, to be subject to the approval of the President of the United States, and to be determined by him on actual survey."

But on the 3d of July, 1866, Congress passed the act allowing this road to follow the valley of the Smoky Hill, providing that the company constructing the same should be entitled to only the same amount of bonds as they would have been entitled to if they had connected their road with the Omaha line on the one hundredth degree of longitude, as required by the original act. The grant of land, as I have said before, was made to a point not to exceed fifty miles westwardly from Denver. Now, as a matter of fact, the route west of Fort Riley under the original law was never located by the President of the United States, nor was the point of intersection ever fixed by the President on the one hundredth meridian. It has been often said upon this floor, and was stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in his speech in favor of this bill, that this route was to run by the valley of the Republican river. This is a mistake.

Mr. KELLEY. I stated distinctly that they took the Republican route because the Smoky Hill valley was then involved in an Indian war; and as they had, according to the terms of the law, to file a map by a certain day, they took the route of the Republican fork, although they might, and but for the war would, have taken the preferable route of the Smoky Hill.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. This additional statement of the gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. PRICE. By the original act granting a subsidy to the Union Pacific railroad and its branches they were compelled to make the connection at or near the one hundredth meridian, between the Republican and Platte rivers, in the Territory of Nebraska, and therefore this junction could not be on the Smoky Hill route.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I do not so understand the law. Any of the roads running west from the Missouri river were authorized to connect at a more westerly point under certain conditions. The eastern division road might have been located on the Republican river in accordance with the law, or it might have been located on any other route if found more practicable. It might have followed any one of the many streams which flow into the valley of the Kansas from the northwest; or it might have followed the divides on the prairies in equal harmony with the provisions of the law. Thus, sir, it will be seen by way of illustration that if it had been located in the Republican valley the distance might have been, say, three hundred and fifty or three hundred and seventy-five miles; while had it been located on any one of the other practicable routes, the distance might have been reduced to three hundred miles. But it is impossible to tell on which of the routes the President would have located the road. If it had followed the meandering of the Republican valley the distance applied to the present line of the road would have extended beyond Cheyenne Wells, and would have rendered this bill unnecessary. This fact alone amply vindicates not only the wise policy of Congress in amending the original act, but it refutes the charges made against the company, so far as keeping faith with the Government is concerned.

In this state of uncertainty as to the point where the subsidy ends it is assuredly the duty of Congress to fix the same by law, as is now proposed. In fact, sir, the company have no other remedy than to submit the case to the judgment of Congress. They have done so with a frankness of explanation and statement and with that regard to the public interest which ought to protect them from the misrepresentation by which it is attempted to envelop the consideration of the bill now before the House.

Let me in conclusion say, sir, that while the road already has passed through Kansas and has acquired a purely national character, that the citizens of that State are neither insensible to its magnitude or unfriendly to its projectors. The amusing effort of the gentleman from Illinois to resurrect the venerable ghost of the border ruffian, untimely dragged back to earth, will not do more than provoke the mirth of the people I have the honor to represent. It has no more to do with the merits of this measure than has the ghost of Don Quixote. Let me say to that gentleman that I yield to no man in reverence to that historic young State. In that early struggle Kansas gave a name and character to the party into whose charge has been intrusted the keeping of the Republic. Her people have struggled against heavy odds to build up a State which shall be a pillar to the nation. I believe the honorable gentleman is not insensible to the importance of the results which have been there achieved. I will go with him, as a member of this House, in resisting all schemes of monopoly and speculation. I will go with him in protecting the public lands from the grasp of the monopolist, who seeks, in enriching himself, to nullify the homestead and preemption laws of the United States and outrage the most sacred interests of the great mass of the people.

I believe that in all our future grants of land to railroad corporations, and for all works of internal improvement, it should be opened to actual settlement only at stated prices, and under such regulations as will render it easy for all classes of people to acquire a speedy title. I will go with the gentleman from Illinois for a reduction of fares and freights, as I did in the last Congress, on all the Pacific roads to which the Government has extended its aid. Roads constructed by the aid of the people of this country ought to be open to them at the lowest possible rates. But these are not questions involved in this bill. The real question is, shall the fostering aid of this great Government be denied to an enterprise so truly national in all its essential features, and which, as I have shown, will, instead of being a permanent outlay on the part of the Government, speedily return to the public Treasury far more than what is now solicited and secure incalculable advantages to the development of our national resources. In my judgment, sir, if this House consults the true principles of economy it cannot possibly refuse to pass this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I only propose at this time to modify my substitute so that it will read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, is hereby authorized to continue the construction of said road from the point of its present completion fifty-four miles in the direction of or to the Cheyenne Wells. Said company shall have authority to issue coupon bonds to the extent of $16,000 per mile of road to be built, said bonds to run forty years and to bear interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually on the 1st days of February and August of each year in lawful money, the interest and principal to be payable at the Treasury of the United States or at the office of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States, at the city of New York, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the President of the United States shall appoint three competent persons as commissioners to examine said railroad; and as sections of twenty miles of said railroad are built in a good and substantial manner said commissioners shall so report in writing to the President, who being satisfied with such report shall approve the same and cause it to be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury, whereupon the United States shall guaranty the payment of the interest of the bonds authorized to be issued as aforesaid to the extent of $16,000 per mile of road built; and it is hereby made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to indorse and register such bonds for the United States, guarantying the payment of the interest thereof in such form as he may deem proper; and the indorsement of such bonds by the Secretary of the Treasury on behalf of the United States shall ipso facto constitute a first mortgage on said railroad, its rolling-stock and furniture, the interest on said bonds; and it is hereby made the duty of said railroad company to have or deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, at least ten days before any semi-annual installment of interest falls due, a sufficient amount of money to pay such installment of interest and upon failure to do so, the President may cause the Secretary of the Treasury, upon sixty days' notice to said company, to take possession of said railroad, stock, and fixtures for and on behalf of the United States. And for the purpose of making provision for the payments of the interest of said bonds the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to retain—

First. All sums of money due said company on account of transporting troops, munitions of war, and military and Indian supplies.

Second. All moneys arising for the transportation of the mails by said company.

Third. All moneys arising from the transmission of telegraphic messages by said company for the United States.

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause semi-annual statements of the interest account to be made with said company; and any surplus money remaining after the payment of any semi-annual installment of interest shall be paid to said company. And for the purpose of making provisions for the payment of the principal of said bonds so indorsed by the United States the lands of said company heretofore granted by the United States for the construction of said road, or so much as lie along or on either side of said road, as herein mentioned to be hereafter built, (except so much as may be necessary to the operating of said road, which shall be set apart for said purpose by the three commissioners aforesaid,) shall be, as fast as every twenty miles of said road are completed, put into market to actual settlers at $2.50 per acre, under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. And all moneys arising from the sale of said lands shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon cause such money to be invested in said bonds, the same to be canceled and delivered to said company.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted. That so much of this act as provides for the putting into market to actual settlers at $2.50 per acre, and requiring the money arising therefrom to be placed in the Treasury of the United States, to be invested in the bonds of the said company, shall equally apply to said road from Cheyenne Wells to Denver, and to the Denver Pacific Railroad and Telegraph Company, from Denver to Cheyenne, on the Union Pacific railroad.

The substitute, as amended, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN held the floor; when the Speaker stated that, in accordance with the understanding, the Arkansas delegation would now have the floor to announce the death of one of their colleagues.

DEATH OF HON. JAMES HINDS.

Mr. ELLIOTT, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, since the first session of the present Congress death has invaded our midst, and among those who have been called from the scene of their usefulness and labor in this world must be recorded the name of the lamented Hon. JAMES HINDS, of Arkansas. As his successor, it devolves upon me to make the painful announcement of his demise to this House; and greatly do I regret, in offering this tribute to his memory, that my very limited acquaintance with him, and my humble abilities, will hardly enable me to do justice to his character. My acquaintance with him commenced during the exciting canvass for the adoption of the present constitution of the State of Arkansas, and the zeal and enthusiasm which he displayed in the cause which he had espoused won for him the praise and admiration of all who took an interest in that eventful struggle. At that time our State was the scene of intense political excitement, and it required great firmness and the most daring courage for any one to advocate the adoption of that constitution or to attempt to defend it against the attacks of its enemies. But JAMES HINDS failed nor faltered not, and the dangers of the hour were unheeded in the discharge of what he considered his duty to his country. Devoting all his energies, enlisting all his sympathies, contributing all his might, he had at last the proud satisfaction of seeing the State of his adoption redeemed from political anarchy and again restored among the sovereign States of our Union, in which proud position may she ever remain.

Mr. HINDS was born December 5, 1833, of highly respectable parents, residing five miles north of the village of Salem, New York, within the borders of the town of Hebron. He was the youngest of a family of five sons and a daughter, all of whom survive him. One of his brothers having become established in the legal profession in the far West induced him, while he was yet a minor, to remove thither also. He there engaged in the study of law, and attended the courses of instruction given in the law schools at St. Louis and Cincinnati, at which latter place he graduated in 1856. He thereupon settled in the practice of his profession in the town of St. Peter's, Minnesota. Here he was appointed district attorney, thirteen counties being embraced in his district. While the war of the rebellion was in progress he enlisted in an expedition which was sent by the Government against the hostile tribes of Indians on our western frontiers. Emigration having become suspended by the war, and St. Peter's having greatly declined from its previous prosperity, he cast about him for a more inviting place in which to establish himself. Accordingly, on the downfall of the rebellion he moved to Arkansas, and settled at Little Rock in June, 1865. He hence became so well known and highly esteemed that he was chosen a member of the convention which framed the constitution under which Arkansas was readmitted to the Union, and at the election of State officers he was chosen one of the three Representatives of the State in the national Congress. Immediately thereupon he repaired to Washington and took his seat. On the adjournment of Congress, not having seen his aged mother for eleven years, and his father having died within this period, he visited the home of his boyhood and remained there but a short time. Leaving his wife and two children with his relatives, he hastened back to his adopted State to attend the convention which had been called to make the congressional nomination for his district. Finding that other candidates were anxious to obtain this nomination, he declined having his name presented to the convention. He thus had no direct personal interest in the election, but he evidently regarded the contest as one of momentous importance and claiming his best services. Accordingly, he entered upon a canvass of the State, addressing meetings in the several counties. These meetings were largely attended, and the utmost courtesy was extended by him to the Democratic party, his political opponents, at those meetings. In obedience to this call of duty he took his place in the vanguard among the sons of liberty, and fell by the hand of Democratic Ku-Klux assassination while nobly sustaining and defending those principles which concede equal rights and privileges to all men, regardless of race or color. Thus, Mr. Speaker, has another martyr been added to that glorious band of heroes who have struggled and died in the honest conviction of the righteousness and justness of the principles they advocated.

This is a painful and solemn charge to have recorded against the State which I have been a citizen of for the last twenty-two years, and gladly would I suppress the facts if it were charity and justice to do so; but such acts of violence have become so common that they deserve our loudest condemnation, and no State pride or partiality should cause us to hesitate a moment in denouncing them in the strongest terms or cease to regard them as other than crimes of the most heinous nature.

Mr. Speaker, persons in all ages who have been the victims of violence or assassination in advocating just and great principles have been regarded as martyrs, and their untimely fate has always added strength and power to the cause they have advocated. Indeed, so much is this the case that it has passed into proverb that "the blood of the martyr is the seed of the church;" and JAMES HINDS, in laying down his life in the defense of that cause which he so enthusiastically loved and espoused, has entitled himself to be regarded as one of those great men who have sacrificed life to principle, and his name must rank high among those heroes whose life and death form the book of martyrs in their country's cause.

There are many among you who can recall to mind their social intercourse with Mr. HINDS, his affable disposition and pleasant address, combined with the noble attributes of a warm heart, that left an impression upon your minds which will cling around you long after the scenes that now surround us have passed away.

Mr. HINDS's devotion to his country amounted almost to idolatry. Beyond her prosperity he saw nor anticipated not. In her laws and Constitution he saw the wisdom of many great minds whose examples he might safely follow and in whose footsteps he could with honor tread. With the precepts of such brilliant examples before him he shaped his course, as the mariner who shapes his course from the charts and compass of those who have preceded him. Peace to his ashes. Let his slumbers be undisturbed. With him the din of political strife is over. His memory belongs to his country, and his labors will never be forgotten by those for whom he served and fought so earnestly.

Mr. Speaker, I now offer the following resolutions in memory of my deceased friend.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has received with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. JAMES HINDS, a member from the State of Arkansas.

Resolved, That this House tenders to the family of the deceased the expression of its sympathy in this afflictive event; and as a testimony of respect for his memory the members and officers of this House will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the family of the deceased, and also to the Senate.

Resolved, That as a further testimonial of respect for the deceased the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ARNELL. I rise to second the resolutions that have been offered. Upon occasions like the present nothing more beautiful and appropriate, full of instruction and of thought, can be told than the ancient myth of man's origin. The old mythology, with all its defects, had a true and clear conception of life. I will repeat the myth. Care, with downcast eyes, was crossing a river, and observing the marly clay, began to form man out of it. Jupiter happening to pass that way, she entreated him to animate it. He did so; but a contest immediately arose concerning the ownership. The Spirit of Earth clamored for her right, as she had afforded the body. Time was taken as arbitrator. He decided the ownership in favor of Jupiter, but possession while living for Care, and that the new-formed creature should be called man, (homo), because made of earth, (humus.) A touching and pathetic declaration of our common brotherhood, our bondage to care and heirship of immortality. Yet to appreciate this in some realizing sense we must be stirred, admonished, perhaps startled, by the departing footsteps of some friend or brother pressing ahead of us into that "great darkness" of which sense knows nothing, and faith next to nothing, save that we are passing from one mystery to another—from God to God!

Mr. Speaker, the memorial services of to-day have for me more than ordinary significance. The pathway of this third session of Congress has literally been over the graves of its members. The first was that of the "great commoner," but his demise we felt to be according to the order of nature; the fall of ripe fruit in the slow-dropping, mellow autumn. After him came his colleague, (Mr. Finney,) released from endurance of long disease by the Great Physician's healing. Next was Mann, of Louisiana—an orange and magnolia covered grave. To-day we stand by another bier. Mr. HINDS, of Arkansas, was comparatively a stranger to most of us, yet who does not remember his peculiarly sad and reflective face? Little, however, did we deem that the shadow of the death angel was so near to it. When we separated from this Hall last summer for our distant homes those of us who live within the "dead line" of the rebellion well understood the work before us. Freedom of speech was to be practically asserted upon the most sensitive of political questions where never before it had been tolerated even; and it was asserted. Yet lift the pall from the face of our comrade and let those "dumb mouths" (his wounds) speak its price. Men of the great North, who sit undisturbed by quiet firesides, little do you understand that unconquered battle, yours as much as ours, that rages still about our southern doors!

But we have come to look upon the face of our dead comrade. Here is death, not overtaking the weary old man, as he did our great Thaddeus Stevens, and summoning him, with the smile of one of Corregio's angels, to a couch of rest, but death in the midst of life, death in youth, death by violence. This is the first time assassination has entered this body. Until the great horror of Mr. Lincoln's death, assassination in this country, for political reasons was thought impossible. The dominion of the "Old Man of the Mountain," the father of assassins, was put to an end by the Moguls at the close of the twelfth century, and we believed no brood of his could exist in a free republic. History, however, repeats its darkness as well as its grandness. JAMES HINDS, of Arkansas, lost his life in the brave discharge of duty and in the assertion of free speech. We are his debtors for all time to come. Let us gather into our minds the circumstances of that death, that we may realize the intrinsic nobleness of his self-sacrifice. It was the 22d of October. The golden light of a mellow autumn flooded field and wood. A Representative of the people, belated by the refusal of a steamboat captain to give him passage because he was "a Radical," riding peaceably with a single friend to a public appointment, there to uphold, not his claims for office, but the claims of freedom, and to vindicate by argument the Republic, is overtaken by a fiendish and pursuing assassin, whose lips were burdened with "peace resolutions" but an hour before as a mask to his fell purpose, and who knew him and hated him only as the Representative of the victorious nation, at noonday this Representative, without personal provocation on his part, without a moment's hostile warning even on the part of his foe, is brutally shot down by this cowardly assassin and dies by the roadside.

I think that autumn day must have cried out in agony. It is said that we only recognize our noblest when death has overtaken them. I think that this is true. Here was one that passed among us unknown for a hero, yet has proved himself capable of the highest self-abnegation. Yes, we are blind and know it not. Let us stand around this hero's grave with uncovered heads. Yet the chief mourners are not all here. Involuntarily my mind wanders away to that far-off home darkened by this fearful tragedy. There a wife gathers her orphan children and hushes their sobs for a never-returning father. Words cannot lift the overwhelming weight of her sorrow, and I would not trespass upon the sanctity of her grief. Yet let us realize for our ourselves in her sorrow the costly price of freedom—realize for ourselves that this murderous spirit to day treads the Republic and numbers its victims. Through this grave a cry comes up to us to-day from the South for better protection. American homes rest for happiness upon American liberty. Here was one who sacrificed his life in obedience to duty that yours and mine, Mr. Speaker, might be more secure. We shall have but little manhood left us, either as a nation or as individuals, when we grow indifferent and unmoved by the struggles and sacrifices of the true and the noble. It was in the degenerate and not heroic days of Greece that the announcement was made to those sitting in the theater at Athens that a great battle had occurred and the best blood of Greece had unavailingly been poured out, and the audience only drew their cloaks about their eyes, heaved a sigh, and the next moment had forgotten it in the play of the Grecian master.

JAMES HINDS, we are told by his colleagues, was a soldier; then soldierly did his life-work end. Reconstruction is a part of the great battle begun in 1861, and not yet ended. He enlisted in both and did honorable service in both; and it will be well remembered of thee, O patriot soldier! Remember that undaunted, with true warrior heroism, thou didst enter and die in thy country's battle. Thy service merits thee a double crown, and sweet, perpetual remembrance! And in the long hereafter it will often be tearfully told how a soldier of the Union perished by an assassin's hand in the brakes of Arkansas—perished because he was freedom's servant and freedom's Representative.

Mr. ROOTS. Mr. Speaker, the sad subject occupying the attention of this honorable body is one that bears upon my mind with peculiar force. I was personally acquainted with JAMES HINDS during a busy portion of his eventful life, and it was in the district that I have the honor to represent in which he met his terrible death by political assassination.

His life, though short, was long enough for many hundreds to have become so endeared as to have wished it longer. His life, though short, was long enough to afford a wonderfully instructive lesson of encouragement to all those in this crowded world struggling against the barriers of poverty. Its history is an account of the child of poverty, developed into the honored man by its own exertions. Its history recounts what mighty results may be accomplished on no other capital than a clear intellect under the impetus of an indomitable will. Generally, when one falls so young the exclamation is, "Oh! what might have been." In this instance imagination might feast itself on such a theme ad libitum; but that is not necessary. It is grand enough to say, "See what was!"

Only twenty years ago JAMES HINDS was a fatherless, penniless lad. But so determined was he to acquire knowledge that he attended school when he only did so by hiring a room, doing his own housekeeping, and working enough beside outside of school hours to earn the means of paying for his school expenses and daily living. Such earnest perseverance created success even under the most lowering clouds of adversity.

Traveling by such rugged steps he did not come upon the stage of manhood a mere hot-house production of opulence, but an earnest, laborious youth, gradually developed into a self-made, self-reliant man. Experience taught him to never wait for the coming of success or friends, but first make success, and then friends would come. His nature and training alike rendered it equally impossible for him to play sycophant to the rich or oppressor to the poor. His warm sympathy with the oppressed and downtrodden touched a responsive chord in men's hearts that returned him in a remarkable degree the affection of the masses. The humblest and most friendless loved him without fear of being repulsed, and learned to regard him as their especial champion.

When the great struggle came between human oppression and the nation's life, he was at once found positively on the side of his country, and he went forth to do battle upon the side of loyalty, of freedom, and justice to humanity.

It is now, though, nearly four years since the happy moment arrived when we considered the struggle ended. We all proudly felt that henceforth free speech and free men were to be as universal south of Mason and Dixon's line as they long had been north. It was at that happy period that Mr. HINDS was allured by the genial clime and inviting features of the Southwest to make his home in Arkansas, and engaged in the practice of his profession with an assiduity that received merited success.

Alas! it was not long until the fact was developed that the fierce fires built on human oppression to destroy and keep destroyed the relations of the State to the nation were not extinguished, but only smoldering; compressed and changed, but not abated. When this fact was developed, and the question arose as to whether or not Arkansas should make an effort to regain her lost sisterhood in the great family of States, notwithstanding the odium and dangers with which those who had severed the State from her proper relations cast about such a course, JAMES HINDS became an earnest advocate of her return to the loyal household. Elected to the constitutional convention by one of the largest majorities in the State, he soon became recognized as one of the prominent leaders, and to him the humble, toiling citizen of that State owes a debt of gratitude he can never repay; for in the construction of the fundamental law of the State he was most active in the introduction and riveting of those points which are barriers of protection for the many weak against the few strong, and for the securing to the humblest all the rights of citizenship granted to the proudest.

After the adjournment of the convention and the submittal of its work to the people he was elected by a remarkably large vote to a seat in this body, and even in the brief period of his presence here he exhibited a lively interest in the welfare of the State and indefatigable efforts to promote her good without failing to strive for the greatest weal of the whole nation.

Immediately upon the closing of the summer session he went to his home and entered vigorously into the canvass for freedom, peace, and prosperity against caste, oppression, revolution, and murder. I know, sirs, many of you may think that the party which Mr. HINDS opposed was equally anxious for peace with the party whose principles he espoused. That might have been the case in other places, but in Arkansas at least their acts showed that the Republican party advocated peace with a desire that the beloved white-winged spirit of peace might settle and abide in the land. But when the Democracy did for a moment advocate peace their desire seemed to be for pieces of Radical skulls. To advocate real peace was not entering upon a holiday pleasure excursion, but was to brave death and tread on the very verge of eternity. All this JAMES HINDS knew, yet faltered not. A few days before his death he wrote to a friend:

"We must win the election, stand a fight, or leave the State, and it is sad to think that many of our number, perhaps myself included, must be murdered before seeing the ides of November, to know whether we win, fight, or leave."

On the day of his murder he was in a county which he considered less dangerous than some through which he had traversed, and he so expressed himself, but added:

"With men all over the country bound by terrible oaths to take Radical lives, we do not know where there is any safety. Oh! it is terrible. But it may be that it is all for the best, for they say the blood of the martyr is the seed of the church, and it may be that the loyal blood now drenching this land will arouse those criminally timid men who had the power and withheld the grant of arms to our State authorities, and arouse the patriotic masses to realize it is the nation's duty to protect the nation's citizens."

Oh! little did he think at that moment that ere the sunlight of that beautiful October day should give way to the cold dew of night his own soul would be driven from his body by the cold damp of death. He was traveling with Hon. Joseph Brooks, another tried and valiant soldier in the great cause of freedom and equal rights. They were to speak that day about six miles from the village of Indian Bay. They had been refused passage on a steambot because they were Radicals, and so were belated. Some hundreds of eager, expectant Republicans were awaiting their arrival. To this meeting the officers of the Democratic club had gone as advocates of the adoption of "joint peace resolutions." The Republicans said that several Radicals had then recently been killed in the county, and no Democrats; and therefore they thought if the Democracy had suddenly acquired a desire for peace no resolutions were necessary; but although some of them thought it merely a cloak for Democratic villany, they were willing to bind themselves in resolutions to do what they intended doing anyhow, and they therefore unanimously adopted the resolutions. One of the principal signers and most apparently earnest advocates was George W. Clark, secretary of the Democratic club. But as soon as he had signed them he returned to his home, arriving there before Messrs. Brooks and HINDS had reached that far, and himself gave the fated ones direction as to the road. When they had ridden on he got his gun, saddled his horse, and rode after them. The intended victims were riding along with their greatest solicitude at the moment, being anxious thoughts to reach the waiting crowd.

The horses being differently gaited, Mr. Brooks was at the moment some fifty yards ahead. The man with grayish suit on rode up near, but a very little in the rear of Mr. HINDS, smiling as Judas may have smiled when he kissed his Lord and Master, he engaged in pleasant conversation. For a second the three thus rode on, the victims wholly unsuspecting, and the smiling murderer, with cold-blooded calculation, waiting for a better opportunity to make sure of both. An illustration of the meaning of Democratic peace resolutions is about to be made. The same hand which a few hours before signed peace resolutions now grasps the assassin's weapon; within a very few feet of Mr. HINDS's back, the gun is suddenly raised. Click, click, hear the triggers! Oh, the terrible instant! bang, bang, goes the gun. Mr. Brooks's horse, stung with buck-shot, bounds ahead with a wounded rider, while the second horse madly leaps forward riderless, and JAMES HINDS lies on the ground motionless, dying. Another order of the Ku-Klux-Klan has been executed; smiling with a fiend's smile upon his features stands the Democratic assassin: the soul of another martyr is sent unshriven before the arbitrator of eternity; dying, shot in the back, lies the Radical Congressman. Would to God the curtain of oblivion might drop over the scene forever!

JAMES HINDS's spirit has passed from earth, but his life, deeds, and death will not soon pass from memory, so well he lived, so hard he toiled, so young was he gathered into the unseen fold, that when we think of him we cannot avoid to lament that:

"The hand of the reaper
Takes the ears that are hoary,
But the voice of the weeper
Wails manhood in glory."

He had so many noble qualities and won so many strong friends we can very easily drop the veil of charity over his faults, whatever they may have been. Had he been faultless he could not have been human. It is said a deathbed is a detector of human hearts. If so, it is pleasing to know that in his expiring moments, lying with no more friendly touch than the breast of mother earth, his few words were not concerning his own death tortures, but were expressions of solicitude for his wife and two sweet daughters whom he loved so dearly. Could you, sirs, have seen the hundreds of compressed lips and wet eyes which spoke in an eloquence and intensity of grief words could not be framed to utter when his remains passed through the city of Little Rock. You would have exclaimed, "Behold, how they loved him," and certainly he who has thus won the love of man must have a strong claim on the mercy of God.

But ceremonies in honor of the dead can only be beneficial in so far as they affect the actions of the living. Could the spirit of JAMES HINDS speak to us to-day it would not be with an effort to induce fulsome eulogies upon those who are beyond mortal aid, but from the portals of the dead he would say protect the living.

The nation has the power to obey such a request, and when the people arose in their might and majesty on the 3d day of November, it was to declare in unmistakable terms their heartfelt approbation of the promise of him whom they felt had the power to execute the promise that freedom and protection should be guaranteed as well on the warm gulf coast as on the cold lake shores. That was the keynote to the entire canvass. The mighty leader of the loyal hosts was a popular man, remarkably, deservedly popular for his glorious services to his country. But he was most popular from the full confidence that the people had in him that he had the will and the power to speak into peace and tranquillity the angry waves of prejudice and passion that were raging in the South, crimsoned with human gore. It was the embodiment of that will and power for which the nation in such overwhelming numbers spoke its preference, and the present is an auspicious moment to inaugurate obedience to the people's behests. Many good men who have always wanted peace, but could not tear themselves loose from political thralldom in the heat of political excitement, now express their earnest, anxious longing for protection of life and the restoration of peace to the country. The very leaders of the political assassinations themselves seem now to be partially revolting from the horrible atrocities of the execution of their own schemes and orders, which feeling, added to the wholesome belief they have that the authorities will be sustained, lives will be protected, and peace will be maintained, is making even them for the time converts to the great loyal heart's desire for restoration of peace and protection.

It is not indemnification for the past that is asked, it is only security for the future. The murdered cannot be brought to life, but murderers can be made to spare the living. Honeyed words alone cannot accomplish this, but men must be made to feel that protection will prove more profitable than assassination; kind words may do the work if it is positively known that the nation supports the State authorities, so that there is a reserve of sterner power which can be brought to the support of kindness on any instant of emergency. Let party lines be obliterated in this desire for the maintenance of peace and protection. Let partisans now be absorbed in patriots, so that all men, Republicans and Democrats alike, will feel an inspiration of such God-given patriotism as found utterance from the steps of this building when nearly four years ago he who spake as one with less in him of earth than heaven, said: "With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, let us strive to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace." His words fell with magic effect, because while he extended the olive-branch with the left, in his right hand he wielded the great American Army, the most potential power on the face of the earth. The olive-branch should still be extended, but it will only be to loose the hand that offers it unless it is demonstrated that the strong arm of power will be used whenever necessary to overwhelm the crushing tyranny of lawlessness and oppression.

Agonized the great Omnipotent who snatched time from eternity and spoke system from chaos, said "Let there be light," and the sacred chronicler informs us "there was light." To-day the mighty people who have saved the nation's life in the sanguinary struggle and declared freedom in the kingdom of slavery, have said "let us have peace." Shall not the historian who records the doings of this year be allowed to say "there was peace?"

Oh, shall it not be so! The spirit of JAMES HINDS unites with hundreds (you know not how many) of other spirits of treacherously murdered men in beseechingly asking the question. Their suffering widows and orphans, without even the little comforting crumb of a Government pension, are weeping asking the question. The hundreds of thousands of maimed and crippled loyal men who fought and suffered beside comrades who, fighting, fell to establish peace and protection, are earnestly asking the question. Thirty-eight million inhabitants in these United States, whose prosperity can only be commensurate with the maintenance of peace and protection, all join in prayerfully asking the question. The countless lovers of freedom throughout the whole world with one accord are looking to this nation and anxiously asking the question. And, sirs, remember the Representatives of the people and the Government must be responsible for the answer.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, before the outbreak of the late civil war the deceased member from Arkansas was a citizen of the State of Minnesota, which I have the honor in part to represent here. His memory is cherished there by many relatives and friends. I feel constrained, therefore, however reluctant to trespass on the time of the House, to add a few words to those already spoken by his colleagues.

It was my good fortune during the last session of this Congress to become comparatively well acquainted with Mr. HINDS. I learned to highly esteem his solid worth; the gentleness of his character and the modesty of his nature. He seemed just stepping forth upon a bright and useful career, possessed of all those qualities of mind and heart which could bestadorn it.

Death is in any form a terrible interruption of the hopes and plans of life—a rude sundering of all the ties of affection. It enters like a fierce intruder amid the warm and glowing scenes of our existence, and at one blow strikes everything to the earth. But when its terrible aspect comes suddenly upon us, lighted with the glare of murder, and looks out upon us through the awful eyes of the assassin, a thousand additional terrors are added to the blow. Such was the death of him whose loss we lament to-day.

He died a conspicuous victim amid that long array of martyrs, that army of the slain, whose blood has held together this nation, and upon whose ashes we are to build the temple of our future greatness. As they pass by us in countless multitude their uplifted hands and imploring eyes plead to us to stand faithful to those great principles of liberty and human progress for which they perished.

The future age will scarce believe that the dissemination of wise and liberal principles, the diffusion of the purest light of civilization over the darkened and benighted portions of our country could have met with such fierce resistance, and that men perished in their blood for being simply the missionaries of this gospel of equal rights, equal justice, and equal liberty. It is the worst characteristic of error that it hurls itself with fiercest cruelty against those who would lift up its victims, while it licks, beast-like, the feet of those whose efforts are directed to increase their sufferings. The Republican party has had no mission save to benefit mankind by alleviating the miseries of its most unhappy race; to tear down all walls of caste, and to throw open the gates of opportunity to all men. Yet, with this noble, Christian motive as its actuating principle, the waves of its advance have met everywhere a flood of blood, and men have seemed to prefer desolation rather than liberty.

It is, however, pleasant to reflect that all these things are ephemeral; that wrong and wrath and hate pass away; that even murder cannot stay the forward movement of humanity; and that amid frothing waves and roaring breakers the great tide steadily rises, overwhelming and covering all the weak devices of man to stay its upward progress.

In that day when peace shall dwell amid the fair fields of Arkansas, when education shall be universal, when benevolence shall take the place of old half-forgotten bitterness and hate, and when the equal rights of men before the law shall be an accepted, unquestioned axiom, even as their right to air and light and life, then shall Arkansas honor herself by erecting enduring monuments to her martyred dead, and amid them all no more deserving name shall be recorded upon the marble than that of our late esteemed companion and associate on this floor, JAMES HINDS.

Mr. BOLES. Mr. Speaker, the ruthless destroyer, death, has snatched from our number another victim. My late colleague, Hon. JAMES HINDS, fell as no other member of this House before him. Death did not approach him with stealthy steps, in the form of wasting disease. He fell, not as the military hero, on the field of glory amid the multitude who throng the gates of sudden death, and who continue to live in song and story. Neither were there any loving hands of wife or children to wipe the death damp from his brow or to smooth the pillow on which he died. No loved ones' tears fell upon his bed of death; but while stooping to lift the heel of oppression from the poor and lowly he was stricken to the earth. He fell by the hand of the assassin, the first martyr of our number to the God-given doctrine bequeathed to us by our fathers, that "all men are born free and equal;" and

"His virtues
Will plead like angels, trumpet-tongued, against
The deep damnation of his taking off."

He was born in Hebron, in the State of New York, in the year 1833; was educated at the State normal school at Albany, after which he graduated at the Cincinnati law school; from thence he went to St. Peter's, Minnesota, and entered upon the practice of the law. While in Minnesota he served three years as district attorney, and for a short time filled the position of United States district attorney for the State.

During the late war he was a firm, unflinching supporter of the administration of President Lincoln, although at that time he was a member of the Democratic party. He was among the first to offer his service to the Government when the hand of treason was stretched forth against the life of the nation; but the examining surgeon refused to accept him, deciding that he was physically incapable of marching. Nevertheless, when General Sibley made his campaign against the hostile Indians of the West Mr. HINDS succeeded in enlisting in the cavalry, doing good service during the whole campaign.

In the year 1865 Mr. HINDS located himself at Little Rock, Arkansas, and resumed the practice of the law, taking but little part in political matters until after the passage of the reconstruction acts. Seeing in these acts of Congress an opportunity to work effectively to secure the rights of all men in the State of his adoption, he fearlessly and ably advocated the reconstruction measures. He took great pains to lecture and teach the lately enfranchised colored men the nature and extent of their newly-acquired rights as citizens of the United States; and in doing so he did not forget to impress them with a sense of the duties and responsibilities which were incumbent upon them in their changed condition. His early and able advocacy of the immutable principle of justice caused the loyal men of Pulaski county to select him as a delegate to the State constitutional convention in November, 1867, and was one of the ablest and most industrious members of that body, reflecting credit upon himself and the body of which he was a member.

In March, 1868, he was elected to the Fortieth Congress after an arduous and dangerous canvass in behalf of the ratification of the constitution which he had assisted to frame. He was admitted to a seat in this body on the 24th day of June, 1868. His term of service in this Hall was brief, and his manners were so retired and unassuming that comparatively few of this body formed his acquaintance or knew his worth. Reference to the Journal of the House will show that he jealously watched the interests of his adopted State, and was ever ready to promote them. During the few weeks he occupied his seat here he introduced a bill for the sale of the Hot Springs of Arkansas, which passed the House, his object being to promote the interest of the school fund of the State. He also introduced a resolution proposing to open the Court of Claims to loyal claimants from Arkansas, which passed the House; and a resolution extending to the State of Arkansas the benefits of an act of Congress aiding in the establishment of agricultural colleges; and a bill to place colored soldiers enlisted as "slaves" on an equal footing with white soldiers in regard to bounty. These bills and resolutions having been introduced and two of them passed in one month show that Mr. HINDS was an active and industrious member of this body; and had his life been spared he would have become a prominent and useful man.

The Legislature, in redistricting the State, separated the county in which he resided from the district he represented, which prevented him from being renominated. Yet he never ceased his advocacy of the cause he had so long battled for until the heart within him ceased to beat, his busy brain was stilled by the chilling breath of death, and his noble soul had gone to the God who gave it.

Hon. JAMES HINDS is dead. How strange it sounds! He that was so full of life, health, and the vigor of youth but a few days since is dead. Alas, it is true! To say that he died on the 22d day of October, 1868, without going more into the details of his awful death, would be falling far short of duty. I would gladly draw the curtain of forgetfulness over the tragic scene if it stood alone in the late fearful canvass in which he lost his life; but such is not the case. His assassination was but one of a number which seemed to have been planned and executed with such diabolical precision and cruelty as to convince all unprejudiced minds that the fell spirit of treason still burns in the hearts of many of the late rebels in our State, and they only await a favorable opportunity to fall with all their envenomed fury on the heads of the loyal men. Again, justice to the memory of the deceased requires that the slanderous reports made by those who consented to his death should be silenced by the records of the country.

Weeks, months, and years of bloody scenes almost without parallel have been endured by the loyal men of Arkansas without apparent hope of redress from the law. They have seen fathers, husbands, brothers, and sons weltering and dying in their blood upon their own floors and around their own hearth-stones. The ears of the authorities there have been pierced by the shrieks of anguish and the appeals for redress coming up from the scores and hundreds of widows and orphans deprived of their protection by the assassin's hand. At times I wonder that the patience and endurance of the loyal people has not long since worn out, and they, driven to desperation, should swear such oaths of vengeance over the graves of their loved and honored ones as would blanch the cheeks and cause the hearts of men to stand still who were unacquainted with their woes and wrongs. Little is known outside of the late rebel States of the terrible cost of being loyal. If you argue the question at issue your arguments are met by the halberd, bludgeon, revolver, or shotgun. If you dare sympathize with the maltreated, or take them into your house, the torch of the incendiary is ready to apply to your home. Social ostracism and business proscription is your reward from those who are the power behind the outbreaking ruffians. This has been for some time the condition of affairs in many portions of Arkansas. Such facts impel me to give the account of the murder of Mr. HINDS more in detail than I otherwise would feel my duty.

On the 22d day of October, 1868, Mr. HINDS and Hon. Joseph Brooks, of Helena, Arkansas, a leading Republican of the State, (and from whom I received the particulars of the assassination,) stopped at the house of one Clark, in Monroe county, on their way to fill an appointment made for them in that county, to inquire the way to the place. Clark gave them the desired information, when they rode off in the direction indicated, thinking that they were safe under the protection of the flag of our country, for which they had periled their lives on the field of battle. They had ridden but a short distance when they were joined by Clark, who had mounted his horse and overtaken them, armed with a shot-gun. Mr. Brooks, whose horse was much the faster walker, was a few yards in advance of Mr. HINDS. Hearing some one talking to Mr. HINDS he looked back and saw Clark armed as described riding alongside of him. His suspicions were not aroused, because carrying arms has become so common there. They had ridden thus but a few moments when Mr. Brooks felt the sharp sting of gunshot wounds and heard the report of a gun. He turned just in time to see Mr. HINDS fall from his horse mortally wounded.

As soon as the report of the assassination became known at Little Rock, dispatches were sent all over the country, stating that Messrs. Brooks and HINDS were extremely radical, and therefore offensive to many of the Republican party, who, fearing their influence in the party, had plotted their death. Their object in this was well known in Little Rock. Messrs. HINDS and Brooks were among the most influential canvassers in the State, and they were feared by the disloyal. The rebels felt it necessary to create an opinion in the country that they had not done the deed, not regretting it was done on account of the assassinated, but because of the effect of such an outrage on men so well and favorably known in the country.

The only denial of the willful slander thus sent abroad necessary to refute it is the finding of the coroner's jury which sat on the case, it being composed of white men of both parties. The unanimous verdict of that jury was that Mr. HINDS was killed by Clark. This Clark was the secretary of a Democratic club of Monroe county, and only knew the victims by reputation. And there can be found no palliating circumstances connected with the assassination. The assassin was not prompted to the committal of this dark deed by feelings of revenge, for he had nothing to revenge; he did not do the deed under the influence of a sudden outburst of passion, for the time dethroning his reason. No, sir; it was a cool, premeditated, willful murder for political purposes.

About an hour after the assassination some men who had been at the place where the meeting was to have been held coming up found Mr. HINDS's horse loose in the road, and soon came to the spot where he had fallen and was still lying, the thirsty soil eagerly drinking in the life blood of its adopted son, as if anxious to hide the traces of a crime so fearful, and blushing that a deed so damnable should have been perpetrated on its bosom. Mr. HINDS had just strength enough to observe that strangers were near him, and implored them not to shoot him again as he could live but a few moments longer in his present condition. They succeeded in proving to him that he was in the hands of his friends. They procured a wagon and took him some two miles to a house. Their labor of love was all in vain. While he was being conveyed from the wagon into the house his brave spirit winged its flight to the spirit land. The men who discovered Mr. HINDS found beside him the paper lining of his hat which he had torn out, and in those fearful moments while dying alone he had written on it, "I have a wife and two children at East Norwich, New York, to whom I wish my remains sent." What mind shall be found so active as to trace the lightning thoughts of the man during that awful hour dying alone!

"Found dying! dying alone,
There was nobody near, nobody near,
When the martyr dying on his pillow of stone
Was found; no wife, no children dear.
Not a friendly voice to soothe or cheer,
Not a watching eye or a pitying tear."

The poet may beautifully describe the fact of found dying alone; but what tongue of eloquence shall be found able to tell of the thoughts, the hopes, the fears, the anguish of mind endured for an hour while dying alone! How often the hearts of the widow and his fatherless children will yearn to know what he would have said during that eventful hour, contested for by life and death, time and eternity, in that lonely, silent wild, disturbed only by the clattering hoofs of the horse of the assassin while carrying him to a place of refuge among his accessories. And then the assassin yet remains securely shielded from the penalties of the outraged law.

His death was a severe blow to the loyal people of Arkansas, and cast a gloom of sorrow over the State which dampened the joys of his constituents even in the midst of their triumph over that class of people who by their counsels had brought about the condition of society of which the spirit of assassination was the legitimate offspring. He was a man of unimpeachable integrity, a devoted husband and kind father. He was a man of firm and fixed principles, and the first in his part of the State to brave the indignation of the late ruling class there by openly and zealously advocating the cause of the weak and the oppressed colored man. The poor never plead with him in vain, and the humble ever found in him an able advocate and a warm friend. From the time he became a citizen of Arkansas he was an enthusiastic and brave advocate of equal rights. He lived a friend to freedom and sealed his devotion to his principles with his blood, and behind him left a noble record worthy of emulation. His deeds will follow him; and notwithstanding he is dead he still lives holding an enviable position in the hearts of his countrymen. He needs neither towering marble shaft nor high sounding epitaph to commemorate his virtues. The name of JAMES HINDS is and has been a household word among the humble, and will be cherished by the rising generations.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. Speaker, in rising to pay my humble tribute of respect to the memory of our departed associate I am painfully conscious that my feeble words cannot reach the ear of the silent sleeper whose death we mourn. Speech can add no luster to the crown he wears. Panegyric is in vain; and in view of the ever-approaching summons of the dread messenger who called him hence none are so ignoble as to give way to invective or dwell upon the infirmities of mortality. He has gone beyond the reach of our praises or our censures. He has joined the champions and martyrs of human freedom, civil and religious, and fallen thus, is numbered with all the hosts of them who counted not their lives dear unto them for the sacred cause of country and humanity. By the offerings we bring let us rather seek to refine and ennoble our own souls and fit ourselves the better for the work laid on us to do.

During the few short weeks I have held a seat in this House, once and again have we made our pilgrimage to the cities of the dead, to the sepulchers of our fallen comrades. But of all the ways in which death smites down its victims none is more appalling, none more heartrending, than the manner in which our late associate met his fate. Others have been taken hence at the close of a long and brilliant career, crowned with honor; and with manly forms bowed beneath the weight of years they have come to their grave in full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season. But he whom we mourn was stricken down in the prime of life, standing upon the threshold of an opening and promising career; yes, life, with its cherished purposes, its exalted aims, its high ambitions, its stimulus to noble action and its sweet rewards was in the broad outlying future. All the realization of all, was within the possibility of a lofty, heroic nature. Others, in the "mellow autumn" of life, have been permitted to pluck ripened fruits from their spring-time planting, but he was snatched away in the midst of the summer culture. Like the prudent husbandman he planted trees, the fruit of which he will pluck never in this world. It is true he caught glimpses of the reward of his self-sacrificing and patriotic labors as men catch glimpses of the shining sun through the rifts of the storm-cloud. He lived to see our endangered liberties rescued and our broken Union restored. He lived to see a race emancipated and elevated to American citizenship. He lived to see his adopted State take her place again in the sisterhood of States with a new and higher life beating in her heart, with new and purer blood coursing through her arteries; her soil too free, her air too pure for the feet or the lungs of slaves. And in the last glimmer of expiring life he caught, as by prophetic vision, the dawning of the era of peace and prosperity to the Republic upon which we are so soon to enter.

Others have passed from their high station to the grave as sometimes falls aged oak of the forest when not a breeze sighs in the pinetop nor a leaf trembles upon the aspen. They have been taken in times of public tranquillity, from peaceful and quiet homes, where there was "no lack of gentle nursing," surrounded by affectionate kindred and devoted friends, whose pious hands closed their eyes in death. But alas! how different with him to whose memory we pay the tenderness of our regards. He was stricken down in the brightness of noonday splendor by the hand of a cowardly assassin, so hardened in crime that he waited not for the cover of darkness to gratify his thirst for the blood of a loyal man. An ancient historian of standing authority, in speaking of the death of the Roman general who led his victorious legions over Britain, accounted his chieftain who had faced death on many a battle-field happy because by his death-bed sat his affectionate wife, and over his grave shed the tears of her affectionate remembrance. These tender, sacred rites of the Roman general were denied a member of the American Congress, and the departed passed unwept to his last resting place.

But we turn from this sad picture to the contemplation of his virtues, to emulate which is more manly and befitting than to indulge in the lamentations of grief.

Mr. HINDS has gone; he has passed his trial and got his verdict; but his heroic self-sacrifice in the priceless cause of liberty and justice, of right and truth—the very light and life of men—is not lost. Men die; but forces and principles are eternal and operative evermore. The liberty he demanded for himself he conceded to all men, and aided them to achieve it. In the mighty struggle he even dared to die; and who shall say he did not die in a noble cause?

"The fittest place for man to die
Is where he dies for man."

Let us trust and hope that one who bore his part so worthily was himself consecrated by the noble cause he espoused.

That was a beautiful custom, Mr. Speaker, in the Middle Ages, which led the lover in the stillness of the midnight hour to seek the grave of his affianced, and seating himself by her side, with bated breath and uncovered head, listened to her words of warning and her commands of duty. Methink if we were to pause to-day and place our ears by the side of the grave of the nation's dead, of all the thousands who have been immolated upon their country's altars; if the spirit of the noble dead who have fallen during and since the war in the cause of equal rights and civil liberty for all men, from our martyred President to this moment, could speak, the profound lesson of this bereavement would be as clear as the noonday sun. What, then, is the lesson of this national bereavement, this long-continued baptism of blood? It is, I believe, this, and to this, it seems, the index-finger of God's providence points, it is to make speech as free, as respected in Arkansas—yes, on the very spot where our lamented associate fell—as beneath the shadow of this national Capitol; it is to make the protecting shield of American citizenship as powerful to the humblest citizen, of whatever race or color, in Texas as in New England; it is to secure to the weakest citizen of the Carolinas the same political and civil rights enjoyed by the most favored citizen of Massachusetts. In short, it is to make peace, liberty, and personal security, blessings all over our common country, as universal as the air we breathe. Doing this, we shall pay our highest tribute and our tenderest regards to the memory of the noble dead; we shall act worthy of a noble ancestry and a glorious history; we shall honor and pay tribute to the grandeur of American nationality at home and abroad.

Mr. MULLINS. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to pay my tribute of respect to the passing bier of the dead as it is borne by my door. It is one of the most solemn occasions that man can possibly be called upon to behold. The great Creator has declared that "by sin death entered into the world, so that death has passed upon all men." Hence the decree of Him who brought the world out of chaos, that "man is of but few days and full of trouble." In consequence of sin man must die; his days are numbered, and they fly swift as a weaver's shuttle. His life is but a span. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, human life is the gift of God, and should not be taken by a fellow mortal, except it be necessary, in consequence of the violation of the laws of society, that a man should forfeit his life so that peace and good order may be preserved.

Sir, I cannot sit silently here while this requiem of death is being sounded on our border and this solemn procession is marching by me. I turn to those who are paying their last respect to their colleague who has fallen a martyr to the cause of liberty and of the perpetuity of a Government that has spread its benign influence over the civilized world, and I join with them on this occasion of more than ordinary solemnity in paying my tribute to departed worth. It is but a few days since we were called upon to perform this duty to the memory of others who passed from among us. They have given up their life while in the service of their country. God, in his own good time, has removed them. But we are now called upon to pay the last sad tribute of respect over the pale and palsied frame of one who has been murdered in his country's cause and by that country's enemies.

Looking back to the earlier history of the United States, what do we witness? In the State of South Carolina there transpired a scene that makes my heart grow cold when I think of it. While the first defenders of our country were there arrayed against a foreign foe that was invading our soil the patriot Hayne was murdered by a British court-martial. What a picture do we behold! His wife and family, clad in the habiliments of mourning, implore that the life of the husband and the father may be spared. But no; falling into the hands of the enemies of our Government he must die, and die upon the gibbet. In the same way those who to-day are following the paths marked in blood by our fathers must suffer and die, falling victims to the enemies of the Government, who array themselves against all who would perpetuate liberty for themselves and their posterity. Thus it was with Mr. HINDS. Perilous everything to perpetuate liberty and to deliver those who had been in bondage, who had been overridden by rebellion, he is shot down without a moment's warning, and his immortal spirit takes its flight to—

"The undiscovered country, from whose bourn
No traveler returns."

For him all the affairs of time are now ended. It only remains for those of his survivors who sympathized with the cause to which he devoted his life to testify their condolence with his relatives and personal friends. We can do no more than show that our hearts beat with sympathy and mourn with those who are bowed down in the affliction of bereavement.

Sir, we have had in my own State instances of the same fiendish spirit that wreaked its vengeance upon Mr. HINDS. One of the senators in our State Legislature, going to visit his family for a few days, was attacked by this same band, the enemies of republican government, and was murdered within a few miles of his home. There was another member of our Legislature whose son was the victim of a similar cold-blooded murder. This was in 1866 or 1867. And, sir, since this session of Congress has begun the news has come to us in the public prints that Captain Dowdy, another member of our State Legislature, while on a visit to the western part of the State, was murdered by a band of assassins such as those who took the life of Mr. HINDS.

Why, in the ordering of Divine Providence, these atrocities are permitted God alone knows. My mind can come to no other conclusion than that the great Ruler of the universe is permitting these men to go on in their wickedness that their cup of iniquity may be filled, till at last they fall beneath the wrath of His avenging sword, and this at no distant day.

But Mr. HINDS has gone from among us. His voice will never again be heard in these Halls or in the popular assemblies of his countrymen. He sleeps among the silent dead, awaiting the great trump that shall break the slumber of the tomb. Born in the State of New York, his body, as I learn from those more intimately acquainted with him, reposes in Hampton cemetery. There all that is mortal of our late fellow-member must lie enveloped in the darkness of the grave till Gabriel shall sound the last catastrophe of nature; when the heavens shall grow dark and the foundations of earth be rent asunder. Then his body shall become immortal, and, rising above the smoke and desolation of a crumbling world, shall be joined with his undying spirit in the realms above, to dwell forever with those who fought side by side with him in the great battle for human liberty and the well-being of mankind.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and accordingly (at twenty minutes past four o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CULLOM: A petition, signed by citizens of Springfield, Illinois, asking that the law in relation to stamps on cigars be changed.

By Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts: The petition of John M. Lynn, late of company I, thirty-second regiment Massachusetts volunteers, for a pension.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: The petition of 52 merchants of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying that financial aid be granted to the Northern Pacific railroad.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of Robert M. Heterick, of Rappahannock county, Virginia, for removal of disabilities.

By Mr. LYNCH: Resolutions of Board of Trade of Portland, in favor of the Niagara ship-canal.

By Mr. ROBINSON: The petition of Bridget Hearn, for a pension.

By Mr. SELYE: The petition of Stephen Boyce, of Penfield, Monroe county, New York, asking reimbursement of $500 in Treasury notes held by him and destroyed by fire while in his possession.

By Mr. WILSON, of Ohio: Additional testimony in the case of Adam Carrell.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 23, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN. I present a preamble and resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in which they set forth that the three times appointed by Congress for the unconditional discharge of voluntary bankrupts, namely, one year from the approval of the act; one year from June 1, 1867; and, finally, January 1, 1869, have all elapsed, and the law is now in the shape intended by Congress to be final in that regard. They therefore declare that in the opinion of the Chamber the true interests of commerce require that the law in its present form should be allowed to be fully tested by experience; and that no new extension of the time for an unconditional discharge should be enacted by Congress. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CATTELL presented the petition of Polly Hunt, administratrix, and George W. Hunt, administrator, of the estate of Walter Hunt, deceased, praying to be allowed a rehearing before the present Commissioner of Patents of their application for an extension of patents for improvements for manufacturing paper collars; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of John B. Goode, praying a removal of the political disabilities imposed on him; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Thomas K. Weisinger, praying the removal of the political disabilities imposed on him; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SPENCER presented the memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, asking a grant of land to aid in the construction of the Eufaula, Opelika, Oxford, and Guntersville railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, in favor of aid for improving the harbor of Mobile; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, in favor of aid for the improvement of the navigation of the Black Warrior river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Jones M. Withers, praying the removal of the political disabilities imposed on him; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of A. D. Simmons, praying the removal of political disabilities imposed on him; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING presented three petitions of citizens of Washington county, Missouri, praying that the land known as the Spanish claim of Moses Austin may be disposed of to actual settlers under the homestead laws; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also presented a petition of the trustees of the town of Potosi, Missouri, praying the confirmation of the title to the land on which that town is situated; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of citizens of Massachusetts, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of captains and owners of vessels engaged in the coal trade, and plying between Providence and Pawtuxet, Rhode Island, and Virginia and the District of Columbia, praying the intervention of Congress to protect them from taxes imposed on them by States, cities, and sea-port towns; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McCREERY presented the petition of John W. Lee, praying compensation for supplies furnished to the quartermaster's department; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NYE, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 810) to regulate elections in Washington and Idaho Territories, reported it without amendment.

Mr. RICE. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 182) declaring null and void acts of confiscation or forfeiture passed by the late rebel authority, to report it back with the statement that in their opinion, by the laws as they now stand, such acts of confiscation and forfeiture are null and void; and the committee therefore report adversely on the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1370) to fix the time for holding the terms of the United States district courts in Virginia, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 310) to extend the provisions of the act of July 4, 1864, limiting the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims to the loyal citizens of the State of Arkansas, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, reported a bill (S. No. 827) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means of their vindication," approved April 9, 1866; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 692) to amend an act entitled "An act concerning notaries public in the District of Columbia," to ask its indefinite postponement.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope that bill relating to notaries public in this District will not be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not be acted upon if there is any objection to action.

Mr. POMEROY. I object to the indefinite postponement of that bill.

CANNON FOR A MONUMENT.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report a joint resolution (S. R. No. 203) donating cannon for a monument to the memory of the late President Lincoln. I suppose there will be no objection to the joint resolution, and I ask to have it put on its passage.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver to the Lincoln Monument Association, of Springfield, Illinois, such quantity of condemned ordnance as may be necessary for the castings of a monument to the memory of the late President.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 826) supplementary to an act to incorporate a Newsboy's Home; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 828) to define the jurisdiction of the orphan's court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 829) to incorporate the Calvary Baptist church and congregation in the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

SUFFRAGE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 8, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I do not propose to press it to a vote to-day, but I wish the Senate to commence the consideration of it, so that we can get through with it at an early day.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 18, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to proceeding at a very early day to the consideration of that resolution; but I have an amendment which I intended to submit to it, and I desired to submit it with some remarks upon it. If the resolution is going to be pressed to-day I shall not be prepared to do so.

Mr. STEWART. I presume there will be no definite action had to-day upon it. There are amendments to be offered by several Senators. I merely desire to bring the subject before the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. To take up such a subject in the morning hour merely for remarks is hardly customary.

Mr. STEWART. I want to fix a day for its consideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have upon the table a great many bills that will take very little time, and which ought to pass; some of them of public importance. I have charge of several such, and if I could get the attention of the Senate for half an hour or an hour they could be passed, and ought to be passed to promote the public interests. I think there would be no objection to them if we could get the consideration of the Senate to them; and the only opportunity to consider them is in the morning hour. Bills of a controverted character have been under discussion which have taken up all the time of the Senate. Now it is proposed by the Senator from Nevada to call up a proposition to amend the Constitution in the morning hour. We shall just use up the morning hour, and it will prevent the passage of a good many bills that there would be no objection to if we could get attention to them. The constitutional amendment doubtless will be more or less discussed, and we cannot get through with it in the morning hour. Let it come up at one o'clock some day and have the attention of the Senate, and let us then hold on to it until we get action; but it seems to me we shall accomplish nothing if we take up in the morning hour an important matter of that kind, which unquestionably cannot pass between now and one o'clock. I think we had better go on with the ordinary business; and that is the reason why I have voted against taking it up at this time. It is poor economy of time.

Mr. STEWART. The session is drawing to a close, and if there is to be action on this subject at this session it is very important that it should be at an early day. Since the resolution was reported I have been trying to get the floor every day to urge it forward; but it is utterly impossible to get it up after the morning hour. I want to call it to the attention of the Senate particularly. I believe that there is a general concurrence that it should be passed at this session. I do not think that it will involve long discussion; at all events, I do not propose to make any protracted remarks, if any, on it. I do not care to make any. It is an amendment that is well understood. The principles upon which it is based have been discussed at great length at each session for several years, and it is necessary to get action very soon. I understand that on Monday next the chairman of the Committee on Finance will occupy the time of the Senate with business from that committee, and I do not know for how many days. When that financial question is opened it may last a long time; I cannot tell. There is other business pressing, and I felt called upon this morning to call this subject to the attention of the Senate, and as it is very important I will move to make it the special order for Thursday next. I now desire to call it up for the purpose of making that motion. If we can get to it on Thursday next it will be making progress. Of course I cannot interfere with the business of Monday next unless the chairman of the Committee on Finance will give way on that day. I now ask that the resolution be taken up, with the view of making it the special order for Thursday.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not see why this proposition may not be voted upon in the morning hour, without fixing a future day and without deferring other business. It relates to a very important subject, upon which there has been, and there might still be, indefinite debate; but debate upon it would naturally be conducted for the purpose of influencing those here who are to listen to the debate. As no canvass proceeds in the country now, the temptation would seem to be slight to debate for the purpose of effect beyond the limits of this Chamber; and it seems to me that every Senator must have formed definitely his opinion in reference to the real question involved in this amendment. If so, I see no reason why we should not vote upon it promptly and speedily; and unless it shall turn out by experiment or by a declaration of Senators that they intend to indulge in protracted debate, it seems to me the vote had better be taken at once; and I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that unless an avowal shall be made by some Senator that he wishes to occupy time in discussing a question which I think has been subjected, I may say, to the utmost rigor of discussion already in Congress and in the country, he had better hold on to his motion and see whether it cannot be disposed of now.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the question of taking it up.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 83, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cameron, Catto, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Pool, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Spencer, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Hendricks, McCreery, Norton, and Vickers—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conness, Cragin, Ferry, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Tipton, Van Winkle, Warner, Welch, Whyte, Willey, and Yates—24.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The joint resolution, as originally introduced by Mr. HENDERSON, reads as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XV.

No State shall deny or abridge the right of its citizens to vote and hold office on account of race, color, or previous condition.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to strike out the words of the projected article, and to insert:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The Congress, by appropriate legislation, may enforce the provisions of this article.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to move an amendment to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I understood that when we voted to take up this resolution it was to fix a day for its consideration. I voted to take it up with that understanding. The Senator from Nevada said he wished to fix a day for its consideration. We cannot get through with it in the morning hour, of course.

Mr. STEWART. I did not know that it was so understood. I intended to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from New York, but if any Senator voted to take up the resolution with that view and desires to have it postponed, of course I will make such a motion. I move that this joint resolution be postponed until Thursday next and made the special order for that day at one o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. On the question of postponement and making a special order for Thursday I desire to call the attention of the Senator who has this resolution in charge to the pending question now before the House of Representatives. It is understood that they are this very day acting on a similar proposition, and under their rules, with the previous question, it is supposed that within one or two days they will arrive at a result. Now, the question which I have to submit to my friend is whether it would not be better for us to act on the proposition that shall come to us from the House of Representatives? That, of course, will be advanced one stage further to the result which we are all trying to reach.

Mr. STEWART. If that proposition should be passed in the other House to-day, our committee will have time to look at it and have it before the Senate on Thursday, if this resolution be postponed until that day; and we can then act upon the House resolution, making this an amendment to it, or making such other amendments as the committee may suggest or the Senate may decide upon. In making this motion I desire to have it understood that the subject-matter, in whatever form it may be here—a resolution from the House, if they shall pass one, or, if not, this resolution—is to be considered on Thursday next.

Mr. DIXON. Before the vote is taken on the motion to postpone, perhaps this is a proper time to give notice of an amendment which I propose to offer when the subject shall be before the Senate, so that the Senate may have time to consider it. Article five of the Constitution, which relates to the proposition of amendments by Congress, provides that—

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which in either case shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

Now, sir, this proposal of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides for its ratification by the Legislatures of the States, instead of by conventions; and that has been the usual mode, and I am not sure but that it has been the uniform mode of proposing amendments to the Constitution when they have been proposed by Congress. At any rate it has been the mode in recent times. Now, sir, there are reasons, and it seems to me very strong reasons, existing at this time why this proposition, if submitted, should be submitted to conventions and ratified by conventions of the States, instead of by the Legislatures. I propose, therefore, when the matter shall come before the Senate for its consideration, to move to strike out the word "Legislatures" and insert "conventions," so as to provide that the proposed amendment shall not be valid until ratified by conventions of three fourths of the States.

The reasons for this I will not give now at any length; but I will barely state that it seems to me so important a proposition as this should be ratified by bodies selected for that very purpose. In my own State it is peculiarly important, because in the first place the Legislature in that as in other States is not chosen for that purpose; and then again, as is well known, the Legislature of the State of Connecticut does not represent the people in consequence of the peculiar mode of our representation. It may be said that the same remark may apply to a convention; but I take it if Congress order the ratification to be made, if at all, by a convention, it would be in the power of Congress to say that the convention should be chosen in such a manner that it should represent the people; that it should be chosen in some mode, distributing its members in some way, so that the convention would represent the people of the State.

If it is proposed by the sovereign power of Congress to the people of the whole country to change the suffrage laws of the State of Connecticut, it does seem to me that Connecticut, as a component part of the whole country, should have the power of expressing its opinion on that subject aside from all other questions, and that the question should be presented to the people of the State of Connecticut for their consideration; and the only mode of doing it is, as it seems to me, to submit it to a convention of the people chosen for that purpose. Then the voice of the people will be expressed. But it will be very difficult to secure an expression of the voice of the people by the Legislature, especially if that Legislature were chosen before the subject was submitted to them. In this case, I agree, in the State of Connecticut the Legislature would be chosen subsequently; but there are many existing Legislatures in various States of the Union to which bodies it is proposed to submit a proposition of this kind, where the people to this day have never for a single moment considered it. Take for example the Legislatures now in existence, the Legislature of Massachusetts, the Legislature of Illinois, the Legislature of Maine, the Legislatures of perhaps a majority of the States of the Union, already chosen; they are to consider a question of this kind which the people have never had an opportunity to canvass or to express in any manner their opinion upon. That is a reason why at least the body to ratify should be a body chosen subsequently to this period. That would be accomplished by the amendment I propose to offer.

I will not now go into this subject at any length. My object in giving the notice is that the Senate may have time to think of it, and that Senators may consider whether in a matter of such vast importance as this, a matter which goes to the very root of our republican institutions, changing the mode of suffrage in the States, and not only changing the mode of suffrage but changing the principle of suffrage; that is, taking it from the people of the States and giving it to Congress, the voice of the people should not be distinctly and unmistakably pronounced.

Now, sir, it is not only a question as to what the precise mode of this change, as in this instance, but it is a question as to whether the right of regulating the suffrage in a State shall be left with the people of the State, as has been done from the foundation of the Government to this time. I will not now enlarge upon the question; but when the joint resolution comes before the Senate for consideration, I may take the opportunity of expressing my views more at length.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to ask my colleague a question with his permission, whether he proposes that Congress shall not only direct that the amendment shall be submitted to conventions, but also direct in what manner the State of Connecticut shall elect its convention, and how the convention shall be composed? If I understand my colleague correctly, he prefers to depart from the usual custom in cases of constitutional amendments, which have been, ordinarily, as he says, submitted to the Legislatures of the States. But in the case of the State of Connecticut, one reason for his proposed change is, as he says, that our Legislature does not represent the people. Does he therefore propose that Congress shall legislate as to the mode in which the State of Connecticut shall choose its convention?

Mr. DIXON. Why, Mr. President, I threw out that idea, so far as I did hint at it at all, with a view of answering what I supposed might be an objection to submitting the question to conventions, and that was that the convention would be precisely like the Legislature so far as the representation is concerned. I thought that my colleague and others might say, what do you gain by submitting it to a convention, because a convention to be chosen now by the State of Connecticut would be probably founded on the representation in the Legislature, so that the convention would be the same thing, and therefore there would be no advantage in that except that the convention would be chosen afterward, and in our State there would be no advantage in that respect because the Legislature is chosen afterward. I therefore hinted at that objection, and meant barely to say that if that was an objection it might be provided for by Congress.

Mr. FERRY. Does my colleague mean to have Congress provide that Connecticut shall choose a convention in a particular way?

Mr. DIXON. I am coming to that. I suppose there would be full power in Congress to legislate in regard to the mode of choosing conventions. The Constitution provides that Congress may submit amendments to conventions of the States, and if my colleague will look at the Constitution he will see that the subject is left, I might say, almost in an obscure state as to the mode in which an amendment to the Constitution is to be presented to conventions. The language is, that it may be submitted to the Legislatures or conventions. The question would at once arise, how shall that convention be chosen? I take it, there would be power in Congress, under the clause which gives Congress power to pass all laws necessary to carry the Constitution into effect, to provide for the mode of choosing that convention. I think that is a constitutional power.

Mr. FERRY. The question I ask is, would my colleague have the power exercised?

Mr. DIXON. That is a question of policy which would require consideration. If it were necessary to accomplish the great purpose of enabling the people to pass upon this subject in the proper manner I would not object to it. If it is a constitutional power existing, it would certainly be no encroachment. Whether that would be proper or necessary, I will say to my colleague, I do not know; that would be a question for after consideration; but I can tell him that it would be far better for Congress to pass a law on the subject providing for a proper mode—that is, if Congress has the power, if the power exists—than to submit this question to a body which cannot express the opinions of the people. It is certainly important that the people should have the opportunity to express their sentiments on this question. In the State of Connecticut, our unfortunate, I may say rotten-borough system of representation, gives the city of New Haven, with fifty thousand inhabitants and nearly ten thousand voters, the same representation in the Legislature which the smallest town in the State has with only one hundred and fifty voters. That is the mode of representation in the State of Connecticut to-day. The city of Hartford and the city of New Haven, with nearly twenty thousand voters between them, and paying more than one fifth of the whole State taxes of the State, if I am not mistaken, have only four representatives in the Legislature. This sometimes works a grievance. It may, I agree, sometimes work for the advantage of the people of the State, and perhaps of the whole country. It sometimes sends a Senator to this body who misrepresents the people of the State. It may in particular instances, as in the very case which now exists, work perhaps for the advantage of the people of the State in the election of my most worthy and estimable successor. But, sir, there is a prejudice, perhaps not unreasonable, in the minds of the people of this country in favor of the Legislature responding to the sentiments of the people of the State, and although in the choice of a Senator it may not be of as much importance, because that is, although for a term of somewhat long duration, after all rather temporary, still in a change of the fundamental law of the country with regard to suffrage it is important.

I will say one word more with regard to the question proposed by my colleague. If it is necessary to answer it further, I will say to him frankly that I do not know what would be the proper mode of choosing the convention. It occurred to me, as I looked at the Constitution, that it was somewhat difficult to say how it should be done, but I think it could be provided for, and I have no doubt his ingenuity would enable him to devise a mode by which conventions could be chosen in the States which should represent the sentiments of the people of those States; and that is all I desire in this connection.

Mr. FERRY. I wish it to be understood that the drift of my colleague's argument is, that in submitting this amendment to the Constitution to the people of Connecticut he would have our system of representation changed, not by the act of the people of that State, but by act of Congress. Such is the drift of his argument.

Mr. DIXON. One word further, with the consent of the Senate, on that question. I do not know that there is any other method of changing the mode of representation. Perhaps it might be submitted to the Legislature. I do not know but that Congress would have power to authorize the Legislature to point out the mode in which the convention should be chosen; but at any rate, if Congress is to do it, it should be remembered that it is to do it by existing power and authority. If the power exists in Congress, then there is nothing very shocking to my mind in the exercise of the power.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not desire to interrupt this discussion, but simply wish to say that it is far from my desire to put any obstacle or stumbling-block in the way of the passage of the resolution. I am for the enfranchisement of every human being in this country who is an American citizen. But if we are going to change the fundamental law I do not propose to allow the States to make any inequalities among their citizens unless they have committed crime. The equality of the citizen is the doctrine which, so far as I am concerned, I shall insist upon putting into the Constitution of the United States as a part of the fundamental law.

Mr. GRIMES. Without regard to sex or color?

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir; without regard to sex or color. If the resolution is to be postponed, as I suppose it is to be, I shall prepare an amendment looking in that direction.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to inquire of the Chair if the question before the Senate is not on the postponement of this subject to next Thursday, and making it a special assignment for that day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the further consideration of the joint resolution until Thursday next, and making it the special order for one o'clock on that day.

Mr. POMEROY. There can be no object in making it a special order. The unfinished business takes precedence of a special order, and nothing can be gained by making this resolution a special order.

Mr. STEWART. I hope it will be made a special order.

Mr. WILSON, (to Mr. STEWART.) Do not contend for that. It will not make any difference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It takes two thirds to make it a special order.

Mr. STEWART. I have no doubt there will be two thirds willing to make it a special order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Special orders are very embarrassing to the transaction of business at this period of the session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I may as well give notice now that I feel bound, by what I stated the other day, to call up the currency bill reported from the Committee on Finance on Monday next, and I trust the Senate will then be prepared to take up and consider that subject, and kindred subjects that may be presented by members of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you mean the currency bill regulating the national banks, or respecting the public debt?

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill I reported on Monday last; and I now give notice that in three days, which I think will be sufficient, I hope to secure action of the Senate upon that bill. I shall therefore vote for the proposition of my honorable friend from Nevada, hoping that in three days we may dispose of the other subject.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask leave to submit an amendment as an additional section to the proposed article of amendment to the Constitution which has been called up, which I desire to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made if there be no objection. The question now is on postponing the further consideration of the joint resolution until Thursday next, and making it the special order for that day at one o'clock. That motion requires the concurrence of two thirds of the Senate, and the yeas and nays will have to be called if there is any opposition to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object to special orders at this period of the session. They always prove exceedingly embarrassing to the transaction of business, and it was for that reason that the Senate changed the rule so as to require a two-thirds vote to make a special order. I hope it will not be done in this instance. I have no doubt the Senator from Nevada can call up this resolution on Thursday next without making it a special order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The railroad bill was made a special order the other day, I think.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; there has been no special order this session, I believe.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not object to the resolution being postponed until next Thursday, and I have no doubt the Senator can call it up then. I shall probably vote for taking it up.

Mr. STEWART. I do not know whether I can get it up or not. That is the trouble.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There will be no difficulty about it, judging by the vote this morning.

Mr. POMEROY. There is no advantage in making it a special order.

Mr. STEWART. There are two advantages that will be secured by making it a special order.

Mr. GRIMES. What are they?

Mr. STEWART. In the first place, we shall secure the attention of the Senate to the subject at that time, and it will take a vote of the Senate to put it out of the way; but if it is not made a special order I have no doubt that it will be antagonized by a dozen measures on that occasion, and one of them may obtain precedence of it, because somebody will be very likely to get the floor before I can. Then, again, if it is made a special order it will be a decision by the Senate that they intend to consider it at that time. This is a very important subject. By postponing it until Thursday its consideration is put off until we hear from the House of Representatives. They will probably take action to-day, and sufficient time will be allowed for action by our committee, if it should be deemed necessary, and we can dispose of the matter next week. I hope we shall have a vote on the question whether the joint resolution shall be made a special order or not. I want to take the sense of the Senate on that point.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I shall not vote to make any subject a special order at this period of the session, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion. It is a matter of indifference to me how the Senate decide it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays will have to be called, as there is opposition to the motion.

Mr. POMEROY. Is the motion susceptible of division?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 37, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Howe, McDonald, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Warner, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Hendricks, McCreery, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Vickers, and Whyte—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Buckalew, Fowler, Harris, Henderson, Kellogg, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Pomroy, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Welch, and Yates—13.

So (two thirds voting affirmatively) the joint resolution was made the special order for Thursday next at one o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPIERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House passed a bill (H. R. No. 1758) to incorporate "The Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia;" in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend an act entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections," approved February 19, 1851; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. There is a joint resolution on the table, which has been returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment, which I desire to have taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is bound by the rules to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that, the morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator who has charge of that subject to allow a joint resolution, returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment, to be taken up.

Mr. CAMERON. I rise for the purpose of moving that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. There is a great deal of business of that character to be done, and some important questions to be decided, and I think this is the proper time to begin their consideration. I therefore move an executive session.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion. ["No!" "No!"] I withdraw the call.

Mr. WHYTE and others called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. I think we ought to decide whether we are to do any executive business or not at this session.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Fowler, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, McCreery, Morton, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Pool, Rice, Ross, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, and Whyte—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howard, Morgan, Morrill, of Maine, Morrill, of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Robertson, Sawyer, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Warner, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Henderson, Kellogg, McDonald, Ramsey, Sausbury, Spencer, Sprague, Thayer, Tipton, Welch, and Yates—13.

So the motion was not agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not well enough to serve on the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 941) to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy and Marine corps. I therefore ask to be excused from service on that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following resolution calling for information:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to inform the Senate whether any railroad first mortgage bonds, having a prior lien to that of the United States, have been issued with the condition that the interest shall be payable in coin, in violation of the law requiring all such bonds to be of even tenor and date, time of maturity, rate and character of interest, with the bonds authorized to be issued to said railroad companies respectively.

A single word in explanation of this resolution. I am informed that such bonds have been issued, and I am inclined to the opinion that if they have been they are illegal. At all events it will be seen that the United States has a very clear interest in knowing whether these railroads have increased their prior lien upon these roads, or not. I suppose there will be no objection to the passage of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CONNESS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made it goes over under the rule, and the unfinished business is before the Senate.

VIRGINIA AND TEXAS.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator from Ohio to allow a joint resolution now on the table, which has come back from the House of Representatives with an amendment, to be taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to any morning business being done informally.

Mr. WILSON. I move, then, to take up that resolution, which has been lying on the table for several days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask that the order of the day be passed over informally?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; that is all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be done by unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. BUCKALEW. What is the bill?

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. R. No. 173) respecting the provisional governments of Virginia and Texas, returned from the House of Representatives with an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will it lead to debate?

Mr. WILSON. If it does I will not press it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the joint resolution is before the Senate, the question being on the amendment made to it by the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to persons who, by reason of the removal of their disabilities, as provided in the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, shall have qualified for any office in pursuance of the act entitled "An act prescribing an oath of office for persons from whom legal disabilities shall have been removed," approved July 11, 1868: And provided further, That this joint resolution shall not take effect until thirty days from and after its passage.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the original resolution read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the persons now holding civil offices in the provisional governments of Virginia and Texas who cannot take and subscribe the oath prescribed by the act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, shall, on the passage of this resolution, be removed therefrom; and it shall be the duty of the district commander to fill the vacancies so created by the appointment of persons who can take said oath.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment, with an amendment applying the provisions of the resolution to the State of Mississippi, so as to put all three of those States on the same footing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the House of Representatives by adding to it the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the provisions of this resolution shall be, and are hereby, extended to and made applicable to the State of Mississippi.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the House of Representatives, as amended, was concurred in.

HOLLY, WAYNE, AND MONROE RAILWAY.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to take up the bill relating to the Holly, Wayne, and Monroe railroad, in the State of Michigan. It is a House bill, and there is a necessity for its being passed at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to postpone the order of the day and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. POMEROY. I thought I had the floor on the regular order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think this bill will give rise to no debate. It is merely to allow a railroad company to stamp their certificates of stock, which has been inadvertently omitted.

Mr. HOWARD. That is all. There is a necessity for its immediate passage.

Mr. POMEROY. If it can be proceeded with by unanimous consent, I have no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I presume there will be no objection to it.

Mr. POMEROY. I yield to the Senator from Michigan to call up that bill.

Mr. HOWARD. Then I submit the motion. The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance a few days ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order can be passed over informally for the purpose of considering this bill, if there be no objection.

Mr. POMEROY. If it leads to no debate I presume there will be no objection to that being done.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 687) to enable the Holly, Wayne, and Monroe Railway Company, in the State of Michigan, to have the subscription to its capital stock stamped, and the stamps already affixed and to be affixed to be duly canceled.

The Committee on Finance proposed several amendments to the bill. The first was after the word "directors" in line three to insert "of the Holly, Wayne, and Monroe Railway Company in the State of Michigan."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "stamps" in line ten to insert "required by law, affix the proper stamps."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was before the word "cancel" in line thirteen to insert "also," and after the word "thereof" in line fourteen to insert "as aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was before the word "valid," in line seventeen, to insert "good and."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill, as amended, reads as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the president of the board of directors of the Holly, Wayne, and Monroe Railway Company, in the State of Michigan, or any directors of said company, may appear before the collector of the revenue of the first congressional district of the State of Michigan at any time prior to the 1st day of May, 1869, with the subscriptions to the capital stock of said company, and the said collector shall, upon the payment of the proper stamps required by law, affix the proper stamps to said subscriptions to said capital stock, and note upon the margin thereof the time of his so doing; and he shall also cancel and note upon the margin thereof as aforesaid all such stamps as have already been affixed and not duly canceled; and the said subscriptions to the capital stock of said company shall thereupon be held good and valid to all intents and purposes, and may be used in all courts and places in the same manner and with like effects as if they had been originally duly stamped.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is the proper time for acting on the preamble. The Committee on Finance propose to amend the bill by striking out the preamble, which will be read.

The preamble was read, as follows:

Whereas the subscriptions to the capital stock of the Holly and Monroe Railway Company, in the State of Michigan, were not duly stamped and the stamps thereon were not duly canceled.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A bill to enable the Holly, Wayne, and Monroe Railway Company, in the State of Michigan, to have the subscription to its capital stock duly stamped."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1758) to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CHARTERING OF RAILROAD COMPANIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 554) to promote commerce among the States, and to cheapen the transportation of the mails and military and naval stores, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. DOOLITTLE, to insert after the word "empowered," in line two of section eight, the words "with the consent of the Legislature of the State or States through which said railway may be located."

Mr. POMEROY. I saw in this bill of the Senator from Ohio, called the railroad bill, when it was first introduced, something that was attractive to me, and I was willing to proceed with its consideration, because the Senator explained it as providing several roads to Washington, and I thought it was time that there were more public avenues reaching to this city, the capital of the nation; but the bill now has dwindled down to one line. The Senate, on the motion of the committee reporting it, have amended this bill so as to strike out everything from it except a provision for a competing line of road to one we already have between here and New York. I believe there is no public necessity for that. I do not know of any controlling necessity for it. We are now tolerably well accommodated between here and New York; at any rate, better than between here and any other point; and to occupy the time of the Senate day after day simply to invent some scheme against the Baltimore and Ohio or the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, seems to me to be a waste of time. I do not believe there is enough in that to justify us in exercising any doubtful constitutional power.

If the bill had in it the original provision opening new thoroughfares, especially those to the great grain fields of the West, I should have supported it; but as we are informed by the chairman of the same committee who have occupied the attention of the Senate for several days with this bill that he intends on Monday to occupy the Senate with other measures, and as there cannot now be anything in this bill of great and controlling importance, I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill and all prior and pending orders, and proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 256. That is a bill relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific railroad, which we have already considered at considerable length. There will be no opportunity of acting on that bill unless it be acted on to-day, and I feel it a duty I owe to my constituents, to those in my State who have carried forward that enterprise thus far, that we shall have the vote of the Senate on the measure. If there was anything in this bill that was of public or great importance I would not antagonize it; but I believe there is now nothing in it of national importance, and we can never reach a vote on it; and the Senator from Ohio notifies us that on Monday he wishes to proceed with something else. There can, then, be no importance in attending to this to-day; and therefore I make the motion which I have indicated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have nothing to do, as a matter of course, with the excuses which the honorable Senator from Kansas gives for opposing this bill. He says he would have voted for it in its original condition. He voted against taking it up.

Now, Mr. President, every Senator here knows that the two branches, as they are called, were stricken out at the suggestion of many Senators opposed to including three different bills in one. I preferred to put them all together and to vote for the entire bill as it originally stood; but Senators around me know very well that several objected to this form of legislation, but were willing to vote for one of these propositions if left by itself; and at the request of Senators the select committee concluded to take these roads separately, each in a bill by itself. Now the Senator from Kansas makes this the ground of objecting to the passage of this bill. I wish to strip that objection of all pretense.

Mr. President, there are two roads that were stricken out of this bill, one that would have connected with the Chesapeake and Ohio road and furnish a railroad to Cincinnati. No man can be more in favor of that project than I am; and at any time, at this session or at any future session, there will be no difficulty in getting the necessary legislation. That railroad goes through the State of Virginia, not through the State of Maryland; and the State of Virginia, as it is now being reconstructed, is liberal and grants charters for the building of railroads wherever necessary. There is, therefore, no present necessity for calling for the action of Congress to aid in building a railroad through the State of Virginia; and it was inserted here originally because of the anomalous position of affairs in Virginia which prevents immediate legislative action. There is no doubt at all that the Legislature of Virginia will promptly pass a railroad act to enable a railroad to be built to the Chesapeake and Ohio road, and then Congress may assent to it. In regard to the other, a railroad to Pittsburg, just as sure as we authorize a road to be constructed between Washington and New York, and one is constructed, the Baltimore and Ohio railroad will build the Metropolitan road, and they will never do it before, because it is against their interest. The Metropolitan railroad will not be built unless the Baltimore and Ohio railroad company are compelled to build it.

Now, if there is any question upon which there is a united feeling in this country, from the Pacific to the Atlantic, it is that Congress should break down the restrictive laws in several of the States which check commerce between great States. If there is any question upon which there is a union of popular opinion in this country it is a demand that we shall break down the restrictive legislation which controls the avenues of trade.

I listened to the argument of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] yesterday. I could have read to him from Mr. Polk's messages, from Mr. Monroe's messages, and from various other documents, arguments such as he used; but they have been answered over and over again on this floor and elsewhere, and I could have shown him nearly five hundred precedents where this power has been exercised. The arguments that have been read here and could be read for ten or fifteen or twenty days have been answered. Sir, the country will remark that while this bill has been pending here three days no one has spoken in favor of it; all that the friends of the bill ask is a vote upon it, while for three days there has been a continual opposition to it by long speeches not meeting the distinctive point in debate.

Now, sir, I agree that unless the Senate are willing to stand by this bill to-day and pass it, after having heard three days' debate against it, it is idle to waste more time upon it. If it is the determination of Senators to defeat the bill by consuming valuable time, as a matter of course it cannot pass at this session; and if that is the purpose the sooner it is stated the better. But, in my judgment, the public voice and the public interest demand the passage of the bill or some general scheme by which new railroads may be constructed from this city. The reason why the committee selected the route between Washington and New York as the entering wedge, I may say, as the means of opening new avenues of trade, was because everybody feels and knows that there is a necessity for a competing line between this city and New York. There is not a citizen of the United States but feels the importance of it.

Now, Mr. President, look at the motion made by the Senator from Kansas. He proposes to postpone this bill, which will provide for a railroad to be constructed by private capital, without money or cost to the Government, in order to take up a bill to subsidize by the Government of the United States a railroad in a remote section of country where there are no people. That is, he will postpone the erection and construction of a railroad between the capital of our country and the city of New York, without money and without cost to the Government, by the voluntary energy of our own people, in order to take up a bill to grant a subsidy to a company to build a railroad where nobody lives but Indians. What an absurd proposition that is!

The proposition now is, when our credit is already being impaired by subsidies, to take up and pass a bill to provide for constructing a railroad from a point one hundred miles west of St. Joseph off to Fort Kearny, on the very ground where the Indians are yet roving savages, and to take from the Treasury of the United States $16,000 a mile to aid in that project. If the Senate is willing to do that let it be done; but it seems to me extraordinary. If there is pressing public business here that prevents us any longer from yielding to an unnatural and undue opposition to this bill let it be done, but let it not be done under the pretext of taking up a bill to put our hands into the Treasury and to take out $2,400,000 in order to build a railroad in a country where white men yet cannot live.

I do not desire to consume time, because having already, as briefly as I could, expressed the opinions of the committee on this bill, we concluded that we would not debate it, but let the bill stand on its own merits. There is nobody here, no powerful lobby interest, no controlling money interest to advocate the passage of the bill for a new railroad between New York and Washington. I doubt very much whether if the bill passes anybody could make any money by it, because its terms are so restrictive that none but capitalists embarking large sums of money would engage in the enterprise, and they cannot expect more than a living profit, competing with great and powerful monopolies. Therefore nobody supports this railroad bill except from the general interest and the public good of this whole country; but there is opposed to its passage the most powerful money interest in the country. The great railroad presidents have proclaimed their voice against it; the Camden and Amboy, the Baltimore and Ohio, and all the existing interests are opposed to it, while there is nothing to speak for it except the general voice and the general good of the whole country.

Now, therefore, if the Senate is compelled to defeat this bill merely by the ability of those who are opposed to it to make long speeches, let it be done gracefully; but in the name of God, of the public credit, and of public justice, let us not when we are doing it take up another bill to take from the Treasury of the United States $2,400,000 to build a railroad in a remote wilderness.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, if my honorable friend from Ohio, in his great zeal in favor of this measure, stated the issue between these two bills, and stated it correctly, I think there would be considerable force in his argument against the taking up of the bill referred to by the honorable Senator from Kansas. But, sir, the Senate must not forget that we have already legislated upon the subject of this Central Branch Pacific railroad, and the best lawyers of the country who have been consulted upon the question, as I understand, give their opinion that by the law as it now stands this Government is already obligated to pay the subsidy to the one hundredth meridian of longitude, and that the bill—

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to finish my sentence. I do not like this catechising in the middle of a sentence. When I finish the sentence I will yield. I say the Senate should not forget that the proposition contained in this bill is to ask permission of Congress to stop short of the one hundredth meridian—to stop at Fort Kearny, at a distance some forty or fifty or sixty miles this side of Fort Kearny; so that instead of a proposition to take money out of the Treasury it is to save the Treasury from a liability to which it will be subjected if the company go on and build their road to the one hundredth meridian. I will now yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Wisconsin is always so cool on the floor that I supposed he could be interrupted without any inconvenience to himself or I should not have presumed to propose a question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I only object to being broken off in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator asserts that some of the ablest lawyers in the Union have given their opinion that equity requires some further favor on the part of Congress, or something to that effect.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That the law requires it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire merely to ask him if he does not think that for the same fees, equally able lawyers could be procured to give opinions on the opposite side of the question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Well, Mr. President, in the estimation in which I hold the gentlemen in the profession to whom I have referred—and I allude especially to Mr. Curtis, of Massachusetts—I do not believe that Mr. Curtis, for any fee that could be given, would give his opinion deliberately upon a public law against the convictions of his judgment. I believe that from all I know of him, from his character and his antecedents; and I will say to my honorable friend that I believe that a majority of the members of the legal profession who have reputation and standing in the States of this Union would not suffer themselves for any money consideration to publish an opinion against their convictions. That is my opinion of the legal profession.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is not the point of my question. I do not doubt that these men gave honest opinions. The only question is whether there are not equally able and equally honest lawyers who entertain different opinions.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It may be that other lawyers equally able may differ from Judge Curtis; I do not know how that is; but I confess for myself after reading the opinion of Judge Curtis I was inclined to think that he was correct in the construction which he gave upon the statute as it stands; and if his construction be correct Congress is already bound by the laws which we have enacted to pay to this company the subsidy of $16,000 a mile and make the grant of the lands if the company goes on from its present termination and extends its line to the one hundredth meridian in pursuance of law; and I understand that what the company now ask is the permission to stop short of the one hundredth meridian, at Fort Kearny, and that it is rather a saving to the Treasury. Therefore, if this construction be true, (and it will appear when Senators turn their attention to the law as it stands,) the idea of my honorable friend from Ohio, that this proposition is a proposition to involve the Treasury or take money out of the Treasury, is a mistake.

I would not go for anything which was to take money out of the Treasury for any new subsidies or appropriations; and if he will persuade me on the discussion of the law, as it stands, that we are not legally or equitably bound by what has been already done by Congress, I would not be for incurring any new obligation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask my friend, then, if under the law this road has the right to these bonds, why does it come here? It is only because the Secretary of the Interior and the late Attorney General Stanbery, certainly as good a lawyer as Mr. Curtis, the authorities of the present administration decided that under the law it was not entitled to these bonds, and therefore there was no authority to issue them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand that that decision has been made. The company must first build twenty miles further of the road before they can legally demand the subsidy in bonds, as I understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why do not they do it and apply to the courts, then?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the company are compelled to do that, they must go on to the line of the one hundredth meridian, and not stop at Fort Kearny. It is a question of law, I admit, a question on the law as it stands, and the discussion in the Senate may convince me that we are not bound; and if we are not, I do not incline to the granting of any new subsidies in the present situation of the Treasury.

Mr. President, in relation to the project pending before the Senate I expressed my views yesterday, and I, of course, shall not take any time in saying further anything on that subject now.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio is not more earnestly in favor of the passage of the railroad bill of which he has charge than I am. I intend to vote for that bill, though I may have a word to say upon it before it is finally disposed of. But the bill alluded to by the honorable Senator from Kansas is one which was before the Senate for consideration during the last session and was fully discussed, at least very largely discussed, during several days, and I flattered myself that the Senate could come to a vote upon the bill without much more discussion; and I think that will be the case if we take it up now. I do not anticipate that much time will be spent in the further discussion of the merits of that bill.

The company concerned complain that the Government has not fully performed the contract which it made with them originally, or rather that the Government has not fulfilled the assurances held out to them in the statutes in reference to the construction of their road. They have expended a very large amount of money already in the prosecution of their enterprise, and they complain that it is a severe hardship upon them to leave them according to the common saying "out in the cold," and withdraw from them that aid which the Government originally promised that they should receive at its hands. I do not think that the bill will consume much of our time, as I said before, and I shall be ready for one to proceed immediately when that is disposed of to the consideration of the bill of the honorable Senator from Ohio. I hope the Senate will take it up and let us dispose of it one way or the other.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I should regret if the bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio should be taken up to-day. I did wish to submit some remarks to the Senate in regard to it, but I am not able to do so. My convictions are very clear that I ought not to vote for the measure; and on the question suggested by the Senator from Kansas it is hardly necessary for me to add to what I had an opportunity of saying in the Senate a year ago. I came to the examination of that bill with a decided prejudice against it, and intended to vote against it; but when I found the law to be as I think I did find it to be, of course I concluded to cast my vote according to the law. I believe it is the law, as enacted in 1862 and 1864, that this Atchison branch was entitled to a connection, and in the absence of such connection being allowed because of the failure of the other companies, the Atchison road became entitled to occupy the ground and the benefits which were promised to the defaulting road. The difficulty, as I understand, in this case was that Congress permitted the departure of the road with which this should have connected, and allowed it to take a southwestern direction, so that the connection became impossible, and the work resulted in the structure of a road in the wilderness and a stopping there. Of course that was not the purpose of Congress.

But, Mr. President, my object in rising was to say that I hope very earnestly the bill that the Senator from Ohio calls up will not now be considered. It is rather a new measure in its present shape. I wish to discuss it somewhat, if I shall recover my health sufficiently to do so. I think it is not only an infringement of the Constitution, going beyond the powers of Congress, but I think it is a dangerous precedent to set. We need not invite great enterprises into Congress; we need not invite jobs here; there is no occasion for it. The corruption of Congress is a possibility, perhaps; and it was not intended that the Congress of the United States should have jurisdiction of things like this. But, sir, if I have an opportunity I intend to express my views upon it; not at the present time.

Mr. NYE. It seems to me, sir, that there are two or three considerations about the taking up of the bill last mentioned that should prevail with the Senate. For more than a year this company have been hung up here in this body awaiting its decision upon this important bill. Its corporators are among the best, ablest, and foremost supporters of this Government, and men whose names rank with the highest in the land. They have made large outlays themselves; they have received large subsidies from the Government; they have received and expended large amounts from their first mortgage bonds, so large that their interest now is more than three hundred dollars a day, and they are not earning, in the imperfect state of their road, enough to pay the running expenses of the road itself. Now, sir, it seems to me to be due to them, it is due to this body, it is due to the principles of justice between the Government and those who deal with it that the question should be settled. I speak not now of the manner in which they shall be settled; I leave that to the candid judgment of each Senator who shall vote on this important measure; but I insist upon it that it is due to them, due to the dignity of the Government, due to its good faith, that these men should be taken down from this legislative hook on which they have hung for more than twelve months, and that they shall know what the decision of this body is to be.

Sir, I repeat I do not know what the sentiment of this body will be; but it is better to dive into trouble than wade in. It is afflicting to go inch by inch to an overwhelming gulf; you had better jump in at once. If it is to be the judgment of this body that the Government shall lose what it has put in this road, or that it shall take the last cent of the private fortunes of those gentlemen to pay the interest on the debt, and that the first mortgage bonds shall take the fragment of a road they have got completed, let it be so determined at once; but, I repeat again, it is high time that these incorporators should know what the judgment of Congress is.

Now, sir, I am as anxious as the Senator from Ohio to pass that bill of his, not only that the road should be constructed, but for the establishment of the principle announced in that bill; and I shall vote for it and support it cordially and heartily; but there are no great private interests suffering now for an immediate decision upon that bill. On the other hand, with regard to this other bill, there are interests that appeal even to the humanity of this body to determine the question at once. I hope, therefore, that the judgment of the Senate will be, and that the Senator from Ohio will concur in it, that this bill shall first be taken up, that these individuals shall know their fate. It is due as well to the Government to look for its own security, for if this road is not to be extended the investment already made by the Government in it is lost and the private fortunes of those individuals will not rescue it.

Mr. President, I hope the Senators will with great unanimity determine the rights of these individuals first; their sufferings appeal to us in tones that we are not at liberty to disregard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved by the Senator from Kansas that the bill under consideration be postponed until to-morrow for the purpose of taking up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SHERMAN asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron Cole, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Howland, McCree, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Pool, Rice, Ross, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Whyte, and Wilson—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Edmunds, Harris, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Osborn, Sherman, Stewart, Warner, and Williams—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Kellogg, Patterson of New Hampshire, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Sprague, Sumner, Tipton, Wade, Welch, Wiley, and Yates—17.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 404) providing for the disposition of certain papers relating to military claims accruing in the department of the West, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RUFUS P. SPALDING of Ohio, Mr. F. C. BEAMAN of Michigan, and Mr. W. S. HOLMAN of Indiana, managers at the same on its part.

CENTRAL BRANCH PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. POMEROY. I move now to take up Senate bill No. 256.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 256) relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, to strike out in lines twenty-four and twenty-five the words "for any greater length of road than one hundred and fifty miles" and insert the word "beyond;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That no subsidy in United States bonds shall be allowed to said Central Branch Company beyond the termination of the one hundred miles on which bonds are already authorized to be issued on said line of railroad.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. It will almost entirely destroy all the benefit of the bill should it become a law. It narrows down the amount of the subsidies very largely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does not that make it conform to the original law?

Mr. HOWARD. It is making a new law, not recognizing the old law. The amendment will allow the company simply what the original law gave them. They find it necessary to extend their line and build a greater length of line than they were required to do before by a great number of miles; I do not know how many.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state in a very few words what this case is. I desire merely to enter my protest against the bill, because I take it from the vote already cast the Senate is disposed to pass the bill. We, by the unanimous vote of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, yesterday reported a resolution that no more subsidies should be granted to Pacific railroads, or to any railroads. We have before us, laid on our table, a report stating that the present Pacific railroad has yielded a profit of about seventeen thousand dollars per mile, being the greatest yield of any enterprise probably in the history of mankind. According to the statement of Mr. WILLIAMS, the cost of the road is about thirty-four thousand dollars a mile. The first mortgage bonds are $27,000 per mile. The United States grants as subsidy the best bond in the market, an average of about twenty-seven thousand dollars a mile. Then the stockholders have twenty miles of land and all the stock of the road. This has excited so much public attention that the Senate committee felt it their duty promptly to say that they would grant no more subsidies. The House of Representatives have done the same; and now this bill proposes to give $2,400,000 of subsidy to a railroad that will be built upon the land grant as sure as the progress of civilization marches westward. No man can doubt but what under the present law, with the benefit already of $1,600,000 of subsidy from the Government, the road from St. Joseph or Atchison will be built to join the main line at Fort Kearny, or this side of it. The development of that beautiful country along the Republican fork in this course of four or five years will as surely build the road without any subsidy as that our country remains as it is, prosperous and growing, especially in that western region.

This additional subsidy is asked upon the ground that this company have a legal right to it. But for that claim no Senator here, in the face of public opinion, would vote the proposed subsidy. Now, sir, if they have a just and legal claim for that subsidy they can make it in the courts. There is not a Senator who, if their claim was established by law, would not vote for the requisite authority to issue the bonds; but the executive authorities of this Government have decided that they have no legal right to this subsidy, that under the existing law the bonds cannot be issued to them, and that they cannot be issued except by the authority of an act of Congress. If they dispute the decision of the executive authorities they can make a case in twenty-four hours presenting to the courts their right to a subsidy. If they have confidence in their claim they can build, with the subsidy already granted, twenty miles of road, apply to the proper officers for their bonds, and in case of refusal a mandamus would promptly issue to compel the executive officers to enforce the law. They have a legal remedy for a legal claim. Why shall we not let them rest upon that legal remedy? Why shall we now add to the burdens of this Government $2,400,000? I have never yet been able to satisfy my mind that there was any legal claim for this grant, while, as I said at the last session, I do see a kind of equitable demand growing out of the circumstance of the passage of the law authorizing a change of direction of the road with which this branch was to connect. But it must be remembered that when we made that change of direction from Fort Riley south, all those railroad interests were here acquiescing and assenting to it.

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me get through; I shall be through in a moment. If this central branch company believed that that legislation would impair their rights or change their legal right to bonds, or prevent them from making the connection, if that claim had been made known to the Pacific Railroad Committee or made known here in Congress in such way as to attract the attention of the Senate or of the House, provision would have been made to guard against all pretense of such a claim. I myself voted for the change of route because it was done upon their suggestion and at their request, and I was willing to give them any choice of routes they chose which would not increase the subsidy; and that was the intention and meaning of the act. When we passed that bill no Senator contemplated that by making this divergence of track we added to the burdens of the Government $2,400,000. No such claim was made here, so far as I remember, in the Senate.

Under these circumstances, I am not prepared on account of a mere appearance of an equitable claim to extend the grants already made to Pacific railroads. If they have a legal right they have a plain legal remedy, as plain as any man could have upon a note of hand; a remedy that is as open to them as the courts are open to any suitor. You are now violating the resolution to which you have come, substantially, because I have no doubt the resolution reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad is the opinion of the Senate itself, as it was of the House of Representatives—you are violating that rule by issuing $2,400,000 of bonds, when if they have legal right to those bonds they can enforce it by a plain and palpable remedy in the courts, a remedy that my honorable friend from Michigan could point out; so learned a judge as Judge Curtis could point it out to them very readily. All that would be necessary for them to make their legal claim would be to comply with the law, by which they say they have the right to the subsidy, by building twenty miles of railroad, and then making their formal application for the bonds.

Under these circumstances, I do not know that it is worth while for us to make any protest about it, because I take it from the vote already cast the bill will pass; but I desire to say that after a faithful examination of this question at the last session I came to the conclusion that the law gave them no legal right to these bonds; that the subsidy of $1,600,000 they have already received would be amply sufficient, together with the grant of lands, which I was willing to increase, to enable them to build their road to connect with the existing Pacific railroad. The Government has done all in this direction that it ought to do. Anything more than that would be a departure from the principle we have now adopted, without any claim on their part that is sustained by law.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I will not protract the debate. I will say a word, however, in reply to some of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Ohio. He does not state to the Senate that by the original charter of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the eastern division, the Kansas branch so called, was required to pass up the Republican fork, so called, in a northwestern direction. It was contemplated originally that the eastern division would form its connection about the one hundredth degree of west longitude, and would pass upon the Republican fork. The central branch had the privilege of forming a connection with that eastern division on its way up the Republican fork. It was required to form that connection with the eastern division by law. By the act of 1866 Congress allowed the eastern division to diverge off in a western and southwestern direction, so as to render it impossible, according to then existing laws, for the central branch to form that connection. The object of the central branch, of course, was to have access from the point of its commencement on the Missouri river to the Union Pacific railroad proper, and to emerge out upon that road on the line formed by the eastern division. The legislation of 1866 took away from the central branch that valuable privilege which was guaranteed to it by the charter itself. It cannot now form this junction, as it was allowed to do by the old law, and the fact that it is left in the condition it is is the ground upon which it makes this claim before Congress. It asks to have restored to it its original privilege of forming a connection of the Union Pacific railroad at or about the one hundredth degree of west longitude. That was a privilege originally given to it that was taken away from it by Congress by the act of 1866.

I will not say the company has any legal right—any right which it could assert in legal form in a court of justice. It is not necessary that I should express an opinion upon that subject; but I was well satisfied, and so were the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, that it has an equitable claim to a restoration of this same privilege of forming connection with the Union Pacific railroad. That is the basis of the claim.

Now, sir, as the honorable Senator from Ohio has referred to the resolution which was introduced into this body yesterday, I ask the Clerk to be good enough to read it, and let us see whether this case comes within its terms. I think it will turn out that it is not by any means embraced in that resolution. This is a case already pending before Congress, resting upon the equity growing out of the statutes we have passed. The object of that resolution, if I understood it properly, was that we will not make any further subsidies of Government bonds upon any new enterprises or new works to be commenced or recognized hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will read the resolution called for.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution reported yesterday from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, as follows:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient that any subsidy in Government bonds should be authorized by Congress to any railroad enterprise not entitled thereto under existing laws.

Mr. HOWARD. That is it. Clearly it does not include this case. The ground upon which this rests is the equity, that the central branch has an equitable claim upon Congress for this extended privilege for the issue of further bonds—a claim growing out of our own legislation. Certainly no such case is contemplated by the resolution.

The honorable Senator remarks that this company acquiesced in the change of the law made in 1866, by which the eastern division was allowed to diverge off west and southwest. I do not know what may be the sources of information from which he derives that knowledge, if it be knowledge; but I will say simply this: that the moment that legislation came to the knowledge of the Central Branch Company it hastened to present its remonstrance to the House of Representatives against the passage of the act of 1866, granting that privilege of diverging off, and the remonstrance was presented to the House of Representatives on the 22d of June, 1866, and I hold it now in my hand. The company did all that it was in their power to do to prevent the passage of that bill. I am not aware, however, that any such remonstrance was ever presented in the Senate; I will not say that, but it was certainly presented in the House of Representatives.

Mr. CORBETT. I offer the following amendment:

And provided further, That no more Government bonds shall be issued to said company, but that Government may guaranty the interest on said bonds for twenty years, and the interest may be paid at the Treasury of the United States, but all earnings of said road for service performed for the Government, and five per cent. of its gross earnings, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, to secure the payment of the interest on the same.

Mr. CONKLING asked for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. The only objection to that is, it is a new form of subsidy which the Government has never yet adopted, guarantying interest on other people's bonds. That form of subsidy might have been the best if the Government had adopted it; I do not know that it would not have been originally; but to adopt that new form now, of guarantying interest, would be a derangement of the whole system by which these railroads have been built. It might be the best form if we had started out in that way, but I hope it will not be introduced here as a beginning.

Mr. CORBETT. I have offered this amendment to this bill for the reason that our debt is large, and there is an objection to increasing the debt of the Government; but I think it but just and right that we should guaranty the interest upon these bonds in order that this company may be enabled to make a connection with the Union Pacific railroad. From my examination of this subject I believe that the Government is in duty bound to assist this road to some extent to make this connection; but whether it is bound to give a subsidy of $16,000 a mile, accepting a second mortgage upon the road for that amount and allowing the company to mortgage the road for $16,000 more, is a very serious question in my mind. I deem it my duty to offer this amendment to this bill, and probably a similar provision will be introduced into all bills of this sort hereafter presented to Congress, so that the Government shall not assume the payment of the principal of these bonds, but guaranty the interest upon them, and assist these roads in that way.

I think it is proper and right for the Government to develop its resources and internal commerce in this way, and thus advance the interests of our settlers by opening up new lands to cultivation, and making the Government lands through which these roads run more valuable. But I believe this company can build this road for the remaining distance with the assistance of a guarantee of the payment of the interest upon its bonds by the Government. They may have the right to issue additional bonds to the extent of $16,000 per mile of their road under the same provisions as heretofore, but I think this proposition will assist the company and also the Government out of the trouble in which we are now involved. I offer it as a compromise between the different interests of the country.

Mr. DIXON. I do not propose to speak upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon, but upon the bill itself which is pending. As I understand this case, this railroad company claim to have a right to issue a certain amount of bonds, and the Secretary of the Interior, whose duty it is to issue the bonds, declines to make the issue in consequence of his doubt whether they have a legal right to them. The company claim that they have a legal right to the subsidy in question. Now, they either have or have not that right. If they have, if their right is clear, then there is no occasion for an act of Congress. They have furnished us the opinions of distinguished lawyers which go far to convince me that they have a legal right.

I should hesitate very much before I differed from Mr. Benjamin R. Curtis upon a legal question, and I am very much inclined to think he is right, and that they have the right which they claim; but I feel somewhat with regard to this matter as Mr. Webster did with regard to reënacting the laws of God. He said he would not reënact those laws. I do not wish to reënact the laws of Congress. If this company have a legal right, then why are they here asking us to make that right more legal? I am therefore unwilling to vote for the bill, taking it for granted that they are right in supposing that they have a legal claim. But, sir, suppose they have not; if they have no right, then I certainly am unwilling to give it to them.

Mr. President, if there ever was an occasion when our pretensions of economy should be carried out in practice, this is that time. If at this time we propose to make a grant, a gift to any company whatever, let us hereafter say nothing upon the question of economy.

I am unwilling upon either view of this case to vote for this bill. If the right exists they need no assistance, they need no help; if the right does not exist they ought not to have it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, provided I cannot get a vote upon another and direct proposition which was indirectly embraced in the amendment that I offered on a former occasion, and on which I think the vote was taken when the Senate did not fairly understand it and while I happened to be called out for a single moment.

Mr. President, I think it is obvious throughout the world that the railroad business has been vastly overdone. Take the guaranties of England for her railroads in India and in Canada. The stock that she has guarantied is worth something; but when you go beyond that, railroad stock is worth little or nothing.

I have been in favor of a Pacific railroad. I want one finished and made complete, that we may see how it will operate. I have no doubt that in due time we shall need more. When that time arrives I shall be ready to vote as my judgment dictates. We are even now negotiating for a passage across the Isthmus of Darien. If we should have a ship-canal across that isthmus how much that will compete with these roads who can tell? All are aware that a water communication is vastly cheaper than any other; and if there should be a canal built across that isthmus it will unquestionably take the major part of the trade from the Pacific coast. That is inevitable.

But I desire, as I said, a direct vote on the question whether you will in any case grant further subsidies on the part of the United States to railroads. I think the policy heretofore inaugurated of giving public lands to those roads is well. It is possible that something more in some cases will be needed, but it is very apparent that we have squandered unnecessarily millions already in this direction that we ought to have saved, and which will go eventually into the pockets of a very small number of stockholders in these roads. I hope the Senator from Oregon will withdraw his amendment for a single moment to enable me to offer an amendment in order to obtain a direct vote of the Senate on the proposition whether we will grant further subsidies to this road or not. I propose to strike out all of the proviso to the bill after the word "provided" and to insert what I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon withdraw his amendment?

Mr. CORBETT. I should like to hear the proposed amendment of the Senator from Vermont read for information first.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, which was to strike out all of the proviso at the end of the bill after the word "provided" and in lieu thereof insert:

That no subsidy in United States bonds shall be allowed or authorized by anything herein contained.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to add that if there is any subject upon which the people of this country have made up their minds, in an economical point of view, it is that Congress ought to be economical in relation to this very matter.

Mr. CORBETT. I do not know that there will be any objection to the proposition of the Senator from Vermont as an independent amendment; but cases may arise where it may be necessary for the Government to assist these roads with bonds. I would rather decide upon that question as each case is presented. I understand that this amendment of mine is substantially the proposition that is now proposed with regard to all the roads that are asking Congress for subsidies. It proposes that the Government shall guaranty the interest upon certain bonds to be issued, instead of making it liable for the principal of the bonds, and I understand the proposition of the Senator from Vermont to be to cut off all those bonds.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I only desire an opportunity to reach a vote on my amendment, and the Senator will see I shall not have that opportunity unless it is allowed to be tested first. I shall certainly vote for his amendment provided mine does not carry. The Senator can have no objection to having a test vote on this question. It is merely in relation to this railroad, whether it shall have a subsidy or not. That is all that my proviso covers.

Mr. CORBETT. It may be that if that amendment were defeated it would commit us to the idea of furnishing the bonds, which I desire to avoid by the proposition that I offer.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. You will have an opportunity to offer your amendment afterward, undoubtedly.

Mr. CORBETT. I shall feel obliged to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand whether the Senator from Oregon withdraws his amendment or not.

Mr. CORBETT. I would rather not withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not withdrawn.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have but a few remarks to make upon the amendments offered by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Oregon, and also upon the real question that is presented to this body in the bill before us; and I shall court brevity in making them.

Two things are acknowledged in this debate. The first is that the principle of giving bonds as subsidies to these roads is a settled fact. Another is, that this central branch road is a part of the system, a part of the unit of the Pacific railroad, both Union and central. Its construction was entered upon with that full understanding, and with the guarantee of the Government that it should receive these bonds. Now, what has it done since to forfeit them? The southern branch has been diverged, leaving the western end of this road in a wilderness where nothing short of Omnipotence could rear a town, cut off from all connection with the great line, north and south; and there it stands as an unfinished monument to the perfidy of some one.

The honorable Senator from Vermont has taken up the modern popular cry, "down with all subsidies for railroads." I desire to say here to-day as an humble member of this body, that that cry has no effect upon me. I know how readily I shall be criticised by the journals of the day as being desirous to get my hands or somebody else's into the Treasury of the United States upon this subject of railroads. I desire to say to them and to the world that I never owned a dollar of stock in a railroad in my life, and never expect to do so.

But, Mr. President, I have lived to see two or three generations realize what was thought to be the most ideal thing in the world, to wit, the construction of internal improvements by the aid of the General Government and the States. The whole internal commerce of our nation, which in 1852 amounted to $480,000,000, has within the last year, under the operation of this system of internal improvements, amounted to $11,000,000,000, a sum four times greater than the national debt.

I have seen other fruits of this system, and he it said to the honor and liberality of this Government and its farsightedness, I have seen the prairies of Illinois, seeing them first in 1832, from one barren waste of profitless land come up under the system of public improvements to which the nation gave its help, until it to-day pays $25,000,000 into the revenue of this nation. Against the proposition to aid the great railroad which has brought about this wonderful change I heard in both branches of Congress stronger denunciations hurled than the Senator from Vermont can hurl in this body.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It did not have any subsidies.

Mr. NYE. It had what was better than subsidies—the rich land of the prairies, which is growing in value every day. I heard that project denounced. Robert Rantoul, jr., one of New England's brightest geniuses, was the author and the founder of that system. His sun set while it was yet rising; but the glory of his foresight and his work abide and magnify upon the visions of the present day.

Mr. President, I have seen a little more than this. I have seen this railroad enterprise strike across the almost trackless prairie, over which the emigrant, after one hundred and forty days of toil and battling with sands and hills, and valleys and streams, by hard work managed to make his way to the Pacific coast. I have seen as if by magic every improvement of modern times borne by this great improvement across the continent of this nation, and the barren wildernesses of the West to-day bud and blossom like the rose as the legitimate fruit of a great nation's generosity in aiding that grand work. No matter if it has made individuals rich; it has increased the productive acres of this country; and it is to those acres that you must look to pay every dollar of your indebtedness. Talk of your tariffs or of whatever sources of revenue you may, it is the teeming earth that has got to pay your indebtedness, and there is no way in which to enable it to pay but to open and develop means to get its products to market. This road has not only carried private individuals to wealth, but it has carried Christianity and American civilization to the very coasts of the Pacific ocean. That is no small triumph for the nation to win; and allow me to say to the honorable Senator from Vermont that when the spasmodic cry for economy is over, he will want to wipe out the speeches in which he declared it to be the settled policy of this Government to do no more toward developing its mighty resources.

Sir, this great system of internal improvement has done more. It has not merely brought the productions of the earth to market. The object of these improvements is to make channels where nature failed to supply them. There is in that western country a great basin twelve hundred miles in extent, with not a navigable stream within its borders, but almost every acre of it will yet be as productive as the soil that surrounds us in this Capitol. How is that great basin, so soon to teem with countless inhabitants, to get its products to market? Tell not the plowman to plow nor the reaper to gather his sheaves when there is no market for the result of his toil; it is an insult. Say rather to the husbandman, as he goes into the wilderness, "We will bring to your door the means by which you will be enabled to carry your products to market."

My friend from Vermont says he is very anxious to see a railroad to the Pacific. He can see it within two hundred and eighty miles of completion to-day. If he will go to the western end of this road he will see that the company there, against the settled judgment of the most scientific men of this nation, who have been sent upon that errand, declaring it impossible to mount the Sierra Nevada mountains with a railroad—he will there see the conquest of individual enterprise aided by the Government over their science. Ay, sir, above the eagle's nest is heard the whistle of the locomotive. Has not the nation any glory in this? Is it not a source of congratulation to every man here that he has aided in that mighty work and brought the two oceans within sound of each other's roars? No, no, my friend from Vermont says, there has been stealing on the road. Sir, there are two things they cannot steal—

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I did not say anything about that.

Mr. NYE. You said it had made a great many individuals rich. It was a slight intimation that there had been a little picking around. I do not know but that there has been; but there are two things, thank God, that they cannot steal. They cannot steal the foresight of this Government in yielding its aid to the construction of this road, nor can they steal the road that is already made. That stands as a monument to the enterprise and foresight of the American people. The rapidity of its construction has been the wonder of all Europe. It has been spoken into existence as if by magic. How? By individual enterprise and by Government aid. I count it as one of the highest glories of this country, and let no man undertake to belittle those who had the manliness to project it and the vigor to execute it.

Sir, there will be more railroads to the Pacific. This railroad across the continent is as the spider's single web to the locomotive and its path. My friend from Vermont and my friend from Ohio, I am afraid, have forgotten that we have just opened up to eight hundred thousand people a commerce which to-day is another monument to the foresight of this nation. I know how bitterly the subsidy to that line of steamers was opposed; but, sir, it pays; and while heretofore the commerce of the world has been almost confined to Europe, by the foresight and energy of this great people, at the proper moment, we have grasped the commerce for which the world has striven for centuries—the commerce of the Indies and its rich productions. Large amounts of that commerce are coming across this continent now. My friend will be able to get his tea after awhile across the plains free, as the citizens of Boston once did. They got a large pot of tea there once free. [Laughter.] The trains of this road will be loaded with silks and the rich productions of the East. My friend will live to see the day, I sincerely hope, when there will be not only one, but three or five railroads across this continent.

Mr. President, I rose chiefly to say that I did not yield to this spasmodic contraction which the newspapers of the day and some politicians are trying to carry out. I know men who were burnt in effigy for voting an appropriation for the Erie canal; but, sir, the day of their vindication has come, and New York, by virtue of that great improvement, stands peerless in the sisterhood of States. Her greatness consists in her internal improvements, and the name of Clinton will survive that of all his calumniators, and will go down to posterity as the name of the wise man who mingled the waters of our inland seas with the tide-waters of the Atlantic ocean. Let not my friend from Vermont or anybody else be cramped by this unnatural spasm. We have given lands, we have given money to railroads. What have we secured in return? Where are the trophies? Let the riches of the western mountains and the products of the western plains be my answer.

Sir, I have read carefully the provision of the law in relation to this railroad. I have heard the criticisms of the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and of my honorable and learned friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] on a former occasion upon it, and criticisms from several other sources; but were I sitting as a juror to-day upon my sworn obligation, in my honest judgment I should say this road is entitled to these bonds. It is so "nominated in the bond;" it is so written in the law; it was so understood by Congress, and this quibble to avoid it was an afterthought that was born in this unnatural spasm of contraction.

Sir, against the justice of such a construction of the law I enter my protest. These men entered into the construction of this road under the honest belief that they had a right to these bonds. Nobody can doubt that. I hold in my hand the affidavits of these men, showing that they have paid in $1,000,000, less $35,000, in cash towards this project. They have paid in their own solid money; and these are affidavits by men who could not be moved by thousands to forego the reputation for truth which they have acquired. Tell me, honorable Senators, whether these men, who have offered their millions upon the altar of the faith of this Government, are to be now turned out to batten upon what I should term legislative quibbles? If there is the color of right, if honest men have entered upon this work with an honest impression that they were entitled to this subsidy, and the Government sanctioned it for one hundred miles, as they have done, tell me not that it is the duty of the Legislature to turn their backs upon such a case.

There is another consideration of economy that I wish to suggest. We are told that this road has received $1,000,000 of Government subsidy. The security of the Government is the road. On the top of this security lies a first mortgage bond. Now, I appeal to the honorable Senators around this circle, as a matter of economy, shall the Government pocket the loss of $1,600,000 or shall they carry out the honest intention of Congress when they chartered the road? As a matter of economy it seems to me that it is wisdom as well as justice to help this road to meet the branch that it was intended to meet at the nearest practicable point.

I hold in my hand the affidavits of these men who have paid $1,000,000 of their own money, less $35,000, into this project. They have honestly put in it the subsidies they have received from the Government. Their road is in the wilderness, and they cannot go any further without aid. The question is now submitted to the Senate for their decision, and I will venture to stand between public criticism and the conscience of my friend from Vermont if he will vote for it. Sir, a man who would not do this in his own private business could not have an honorable standing in his own neighborhood, and a nation cannot afford to do, under the color of legislative proceeding, what an individual ought not to do. The same standard of judgment will be applied to the nation that is applied to me as an individual. If a contractor with me had made an honest endeavor to carry out this work and encountered these difficulties I should be ashamed to look him in the face and deny the right he had to my fulfillment of my part of the contract to help to make profitable and useful the expenditures he had already made.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, when this bill was brought before the Senate at the last session I entertained very strong prejudices against it, and perhaps if it had been brought to a vote at any time during the last session I should have voted against it; but upon further investigation of the subject it seems to me that we are not at liberty to regard it in the light of an original proposition. I should certainly, as one member of the Senate, vote against entering upon any new project which involved subsidies; but that is not the attitude in which this question is presented here to-day.

Let me make a brief statement of what I understand to be the history of this question. Several years ago Congress passed a bill granting subsidies and making provision for the construction of a railroad starting at Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, to the Pacific ocean, terminating at San Francisco, a point some four hundred miles south of the starting point, Omaha. By the same bill provision was made for the construction of a branch road, starting from Kansas City, on the Missouri river, a point nearly three hundred miles south of Omaha, intending to connect with the main branch starting from Omaha at a point not further west than the one hundredth meridian. The same bill then provided for an intermediate road, starting from Atchison, about two hundred miles south of Omaha, and about eighty-five miles north of Kansas City, which was to connect with the branch starting from Kansas City at a point not more than one hundred miles from Atchison.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will allow me I desire to correct him in one statement of fact that he has made. The original bill did not make Omaha the starting point of the Pacific railroad, but it was fixed at the one hundredth meridian. From Omaha to the one hundredth meridian it is a branch just like the branch from Sioux City and the branches to which the Senator has referred. The branches are all alike.

Mr. MORTON. I am glad to be corrected, but still the correction does not alter the effect of my statement. The construction, as I understand it, of these three roads commenced simultaneously, or very nearly so. The road that is now under discussion, starting from Atchison on the Missouri river, was to connect with the branch starting from Kansas City at a point about one hundred miles west. Therefore this road was necessarily dependent for any value whatever, or at least for its chief value, upon the construction of the road from Kansas City to intersect with the main branch of the Pacific road; for if it was not to have that connection it would not be worth while to build the road, and it could have but little value when constructed. Therefore this road was built upon the faith of constructing another road from Kansas City, intersecting the main Pacific road at a point not further west than the one hundredth meridian.

After this company had been organized and private stock had been subscribed and the Government subsidies had been issued according to the original provision of the charter, Congress permitted the southern branch, starting west from Kansas City, to diverge to the southwest, so as not to intersect with the main branch at all. This, of course, would render the intermediate road, the central branch, of no value unless it got a connection somewhere. It has been built out one hundred miles, and there stops in the Indian country.

Now, Mr. President, it cannot be said that there is not good faith involved in this question. The men who invested their money in this enterprise invested it upon the distinct understanding that the road should be built from Kansas City to the main branch of the Pacific road, starting from Omaha. And now that the Government has permitted that southern road to diverge to the southwest instead of running northwest to the Pacific road starting from Omaha, the question is, what is the duty of the Government in regard to this middle road which was commenced upon that faith?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to state one fact right here?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The diversion of the southern road was without the consent and against the protest of this road.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to know where that protest was made, and to whom?

Mr. HOWARD. It was made to the House of Representatives. I hold it in my hand.

Mr. SUMNER. It was duly presented by Hon. Alexander H. Rice, and filed on the 22d of June, 1866.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When the bill passed the House of Representatives and passed the Senate I supposed it was by the common consent of both parties. I heard nothing then of this terrible wrong which is to be inflicted on this company.

Mr. MORTON. I do not know anything about that protest beyond what the Senator has stated, which I have no reason to question. But it is not reasonable to suppose that the persons engaged in the construction of the middle road would consent that the southern road should diverge to the southwest and not make the connection with the road starting west from Omaha, because that would leave the middle road without any connection at all. Therefore, such a consent could hardly be presumed.

Now, what must this middle road do in order that the men who have put their money into it shall not lose their money, and in order that the Government shall not lose the $1,600,000 it has invested in it? The middle road must either connect with the northern road or with the southern road. They do not want to connect with the southern road. They did not start out with that understanding. They want to connect with the northern road, and as the southern road now will not connect with the northern road, the Government must enable them to connect with the northern road, or what they have invested may be said to be lost.

We cannot suppose, Mr. President, that intelligent men would invest their money in a road which was to run one hundred miles west and stop in the Indian country. We cannot suppose that the Government would put $1,500,000 into such a road. Therefore, it is inevitable that the men investing their money in the road and undertaking the construction of it, and the Government, at that time, did understand that it was to have the connection as then provided by law with the road running northwest from Kansas City to the road starting west from Omaha. That understanding has been destroyed by the action of Congress, and it comes up as a question of equity and justice, what shall this Government do in the premises? It is not a new question, whether we shall now start out by making a road and granting subsidies, but it is simply a question whether we shall complete an enterprise undertaken some four or five years ago.

The Government has got $1,600,000 in this road. I understand that by now investing $2,000,000 more and completing the road to make the connection with the road starting west from Omaha it will make it a valuable road, and that the earnings of the road will pay the interest on all the money invested. Would it not, then, be a matter of wisdom, as well as of economy, to complete the road to the northern line, and thus make a road that will pay the interest on the whole investment rather than, by stopping where we now are, lose the $1,600,000 that have been put in? That, I think, is the question. I put that as a question of prudence and economy on the part of the Government, aside from the question of justice.

There is another consideration to which my attention has been called, and which I think is entitled to some weight. In the first place, I think it was imprudent and unnecessary for the Government to start two branch roads to connect with the road starting west from Omaha within eighty-five miles of each other. It would have been sufficient to have started the one west from Atchison or the one west from Kansas City to make the intersection with the road running west from Omaha; but the Government started two branch roads. Now, sir, I insist that it is a matter of some importance that at least one of these branch roads shall be completed; and why? It will be observed by looking at the map that Atchison, where this road starts west, is on a point nearly due west from the capital of Illinois, the capital of Indiana, and the capital of Ohio, and but little south of the capital of Pennsylvania. Any person starting to go to the Pacific coast by way of the Pacific railroad in order to get upon that road must go almost directly north to begin with one hundred and sixty or one hundred and seventy miles. Any one starting from Cincinnati to go to the Pacific by the way of that road must first go north to get on that road at Omaha, or, going by the way of Chicago, he must go north nearly two hundred and fifty miles; and if he starts from Memphis or from any point further south, of course the distance he has to go north is increased. As a matter of justice and convenience to that great travel going west from the meridian of Indianapolis, Columbus, Harrisburg, and St. Louis there ought to be some way of striking the Pacific road without being compelled to go north in the first place from one hundred and sixty to three or four hundred miles. By looking at the map you can see the importance of that to all persons living on the latitude that I have described and south of that latitude.

Mr. President, I believe it will be a great many years before we shall have more than one Pacific railroad. We shall have two, and perhaps three in course of time; but it will be a very long time before we have more than one; and during that period it will be a very considerable hardship if all the persons living south of Chicago, and from there down to the gulf, are compelled to go north as far as Chicago or Omaha before they can start west to get on to the Pacific road. In this point of view this central branch road is important; and as the Government has already put $1,600,000 in it, as it was begun upon the faith that the road was to be constructed from Kansas west, intersecting the northern road at a point not further west than the one hundredth meridian, and as Congress has turned that road in another direction, it seems to me to be a matter of justice, a matter of good faith, that it shall enable this road to get up northwest to make that intersection.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I have more than once expressed my opinion on this bill, and I have no desire now to enter at length into the discussion. What I have to say shall be directly on the proposition moved by the Senator from Vermont; and that I may be perfectly understood, I desire to have the Secretary read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment under consideration is the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Senator from Oregon did not withdraw his amendment; that is now before us.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposition of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, is to strike out the following words in the proviso at the end of the bill, "that no subsidy in United States bonds shall be allowed to said Central Branch Company for any greater length of road than one hundred and fifty miles from the termination of the one hundred miles on which bonds are already authorized to be issued on said line of railroad," and in lieu thereof to insert "that no subsidy in United States bonds shall be allowed or authorized by anything herein contained."

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, there are two ways of opposing a measure: one is directly on its merits; the other is by creating a diversion. My friend from Vermont is too experienced not to be a perfect master of both systems. He knows when to meet any measure on its merits; he knows also when he can meet it only by creating a diversion. He has not attempted the first system to-day; he has attempted the second. He has brought before you a proposition, general in its character, on which he has made an argument general also in its character. He opposes any further subsidies to railroads. Very well; admit his argument; how does that bear on the question? I am not now going to enter upon his argument. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] has already engaged the attention of the Senate upon that question, and we may offer our gratitude to my friend from Vermont that he has given occasion to the outburst of eloquence to which we have listened.

But permit me to say that the argument of the Senator from Vermont and also the eloquence of my friend from Nevada are out of place at this moment on this measure. There is no question of principle with regard to subsidies; there is no question as to any policy of Congress in supplying subsidies for the prosecution of railroad enterprises. It is simply a question of good faith on the existing legislation of the country. Congress by its legislation has induced certain parties to undertake a railroad at the West. They have embarked largely in it; they have contributed out of their means; they are extensively interested. Then afterward, by subsequent legislation, Congress rendered all that they had done comparatively valueless. Congress did that against the protest of these gentlemen. So doing, I submit that Congress became liable to make good their original legislation to these parties; and that is the simple object of the present measure. It is to carry out in good faith the original legislation of Congress; nor more, nor less.

Senators in the debate have already alluded to the affidavits which have been introduced. I hold a copy of them in my hand. Let any Senator read them, and then I would ask him, can he hearken to my friend from Vermont and on any general sentiment against subsidies refuse to sustain the faith of the Government? Day by day we plead for the preservation of the national faith. God grant that it never may fail in any respect; and now again I plead for it, not on any great historic question as of faith to the national freedmen or of faith to the national creditor, but of faith to corporators who have entered upon a great public work in the trust that they would be sustained to the end by Congress. I have here in one of those affidavits positive declaration that the subscriptions were made "in good faith, and on the faith that this road was a branch of the Union Pacific railroad, and was to have a connection therewith;" "and this deponent avers and declares that such connection was all that gave the road value in the estimation of capitalists." The Senator from Indiana has shown how that connection gave value to the proposed road. I need not enlarge upon it. Nobody can look at the map, nobody can read one of these affidavits, or become in any way familiar with this case, without seeing that without such connection the road was almost worthless.

Among these affidavits is one from a name that I know will be honored in this Chamber. It is that of the present Governor of Massachusetts, William Claflin, well known now in public life, where he has earned an honorable renown, but also in a less conspicuous circle known as one of the true, just, business men of the country. Wherever he is known his word is as good as his bond. He is one of those corporators, one who has invested largely in the construction of this road. What does he say?

"That his subscription to the capital stock of said company was made on the faith of the acts of Congress known as the Pacific railroad laws, and on the faith, as therein provided, that the said central branch was to connect with the eastern branch railroad at a point above one hundred miles west from Atchison, where the maps of the two companies, then filed, showed a junction; that said central branch was located and built with reference to such connection until the route of said eastern division was changed by Congress."

This is a deposition signed by himself. I find added, also, the name of Nathaniel Thayer, an eminent banker of Boston, A. C. Mayhew, A. H. Batcheller, and John T. Manny.

I need add nothing to this statement, which is plain and explicit. These gentlemen embarked in this enterprise and put their money in it on the faith of Congress. The simple question now is whether Congress will keep its faith.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I intend to vote for this bill, and as I am opposed to granting any new subsidies to railroads I wish to state briefly why I am in favor of it. In the first place, I wish to allude to the statement made by my friend the Senator from Vermont at the last session, and by the Senator from Ohio to-day, that the friends of this road, the central branch, in 1866 asked that the eastern division might be turned from its original route and go up the Smoky Hill fork. At that time I was a member of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and it so happened, owing to sickness, that I was compelled to remain in Washington several weeks after the adjournment of Congress. During that time these gentlemen, among others Governor Claflin, of Massachusetts, came to me after the adjournment of Congress and called my attention to that legislation, and told me that it was a great wrong to the central branch and that they protested against it.

From that circumstance I was induced to look into this matter, as I did as well as I was able to do, and my investigation convinced me beyond a doubt that these gentlemen who had embarked their fortunes in this central branch road had been wronged by the action of Congress; that Congress had granted them the right to unite with the eastern division and thereby form a connection at about the one hundredth meridian upon the great trunk of the Union Pacific road, and it had also provided that in case any branch should fail to build its road the other might take up that road and carry it forward to the point of union. But Congress having voted that the eastern division might change its route, there was no such thing as a failure to build in the eye of the law. Congress had actually granted land and subsidies over the identical route now asked by this road, the route to the one hundredth meridian. All that these parties now ask is that they may have the right to go forward under that original intention of Congress and complete their enterprise. I believed then, and I believe now, that they have the right and the justice upon their side, and believing that I shall vote for this bill, not as a new subsidy, but as carrying out the original policy and design of Congress. Besides, there is no other way by which St. Louis and points on either side of it can at present make a direct connection with the Union Pacific road. Therefore, in addition to the rights of the individuals interested in this enterprise I conceive it to be a public question, a question of magnitude and importance to the country at large, and especially that portion of the country.

Believing, then, fully in the justice and equity of this claim I shall vote for this bill, although I am opposed to any further subsidies to railroads at present. If this was an original proposition, if it was a new question, I should vote against it; but the Government has already advanced $1,600,000, and it only needs this additional legislation not only to complete the road, but to make valuable what has been already advanced.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I believe I have not occupied in all that I have said on this bill over twenty minutes' time of the Senate, and I am somewhat surprised at the elaborate attention I have received this morning from the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER.] So far as the eloquent Senator from Nevada is concerned, I always listen to him with pleasure, whether he delivers an original speech, or whether he lets "the locomotive scream at the top of the eagle's nest," as we have heard him this morning, not, perhaps, for the first time. I do not think he need to have any fear of being charged at home or abroad with any unusual "contraction," any "spasmodic economy." There is, it seems to me, no danger of that. But let me say to that Senator and to the Senator from Massachusetts that the very existence of the Republican party depends upon whether we adopt the principle of economy for the next four years or not. That, whether we blink the issue or not, will be the main question. I am not a common ranter in relation to this subject of economy. I allow my course to be judged by my works, by my votes, not by mere words. It is very unusual for me to say anything on this subject, but I trust in my official action here never to lose sight of it.

But, Mr. President, when a measure of this sort comes up in the Senate, involving millions, I conceive that I have a right to make a direct proposition—not an indirect one, as the Senator from Massachusetts asserts—upon it. I come forward with a proposition asking the Senate to vote directly on the question whether we shall give a subsidy for the extension of this road or not. Is there any indirection in that? If there is, I fail to comprehend it.

The Senator from Massachusetts takes refuge under great names from home. I take no such refuge. I prefer to vote upon my own independent judgment in relation to this matter. I have no Governors or other distinguished citizens whose affidavits have been given or whose letters are to be read here; but there are thousands of taxpayers who will watch my vote, as they will the votes of other Senators.

The Senator also seeks some sort of refuge in voting for this subsidy, as an exception to his general rule of opposing further subsidies, on the ground that the public faith has been pledged. I recognize no such pledge. I have read the whole of the documents which have been presented to us on this subject, including the opinions of the attorneys, whose opinions have been brought into the case; and while I admit that they have the power of confusing the subject so that it requires a great deal of labor to understand it, I confess that so far as my mind has enabled me to comprehend the subject I have not seen a particle of evidence tending to pledge the public faith to a further subsidy of bonds. We have done already all that the law required of us. So far as I am concerned I feel perfectly free and at liberty to vote as my judgment dictates upon this bill. Sir, if it were an original question do you suppose that the Senate could be induced to vote for a further subsidy on this line? Is it needed by the Government, or is it only in the interest of private parties? I do not believe it could obtain the vote of one third of the Senate as an original question. Coming here now after the long importunities that we have had, after every Senator has been button-holed for over a year in relation to this matter, it is not surprising that it receives some support. I expect it to pass. All that I ask—and I do not think I deserve to be taken to task in the style I have been for this—is that Senators shall place themselves on the record directly on the question whether we will vote this additional subsidy to this road at this time or not. I take it there is no indirection about that; and I hope yet to be able to obtain a vote upon that question.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to have the amendment pending read.

Mr. CORBETT. Let it be read as modified. THE CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as modified, is to insert at the end of the bill the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That no more Government bonds shall be issued to said company, but that the Government shall guaranty the interest on said company's bonds for thirty years, on the completion of each section of twenty miles of said road, and the interest shall be paid at the Treasury of the United States; and to secure the payment of such interest all earnings of said road for services performed for the Government, and five per cent. of its gross earnings, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. STEWART. I send to the Chair an amendment, which I ask the Senator from Oregon to accept in place of his amendment. I think it answers the purpose a little more carefully. It is the amendment that was proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] the other day to another bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed amendment, which was to insert as additional sections the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no additional bonds shall be issued to said company; but whenever and as often as the said company shall complete and equip ten or more consecutive miles of the said road in all respects as a first-class railroad, the President of the United States, at the request and expense of the said company, shall cause the same to be inspected by three skillful commissioners appointed by him; and upon their favorable report, approved by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to the said company, for each such completed mile of road, sixteen bonds of the said company prepared by him, of the denomination of $100,000 each, payable by said company in gold coin at the Treasury of the United States thirty years from the 1st day of January or July then next ensuing, with half-yearly interest coupons attached, payable by the said company in gold coin at the said Treasury at such rate, not exceeding six per cent. per annum, as the company may elect; upon the face of which coupons shall be a statement, signed by the Treasurer of the United States, that payment of the same, according to its terms, is guaranteed by the United States. And the principal of the said bonds shall constitute a first lien upon the said road and telegraph, and upon the rolling stock and all other real and personal estate of the said company.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the moneys arising from the sale of the said lands, and from the transportation and other business to be done by the company for the United States, shall remain in the Treasury of the United States as a fund for the payment of the interest on the said bonds; and if the moneys so reserved shall be insufficient for that purpose, the company, after two years from the completion of their said road, shall pay into the said Treasury three per cent. of their remaining gross receipts, or so much thereof as may be necessary to meet the said interest as it falls due; and any surplus of the said reserve not required for any half-yearly payment of interest shall be paid to said company.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That after the expiration of ten years from the completion of the said road the said company shall pay annually into the Treasury of the United States such sums as will amount to the principal of their said bonds by the time the same will fall due; which several payments shall, as between the United States and the company, be deemed to be payment of like amounts of the said bonds.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if the said company shall fail to make any of the payments required by this act for the account of either the said interest fund or the said sinking fund, the Secretary of the Treasury shall report such failure to the President of the United States, who may, and if he deems it necessary to the security of the United States or of the bondholders he shall, appoint a receiver to take possession of the said road and operate and manage the same for the best interest of the company, and pay into the Treasury of the United States so much of the receipts therefrom as may be necessary and sufficient for the said purposes, or until the company shall make the said payments.

Mr. STEWART. Having been a member of the committee and consented to make this report, I should like to call the attention of the friends of the measure to this amendment. I believe it would be a fair settlement of the whole transaction and give just about what ought to be given. Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that the central branch at the time the law was passed was intended to go on until it should have a junction with the other road—and such I believe was the intention of the law—it was also the intention of the law very clearly that they should unite at a point not so far distant as the one hundredth meridian. The two branches—the Union Pacific, eastern division, and the central branch—were to unite long before they reached the main stem from Omaha.

The central branch or the Atchison branch has completed one hundred miles of road. If the Union Pacific, eastern division, had gone in its original direction to make the connection, before it got to the one hundredth meridian the Atchison branch would not have been by the map more than one hundred and fifty miles long. There would have been only about fifty miles more or in that neighborhood; from forty to sixty, on which subsidies would have been granted to them in any event; perhaps not more than thirty miles. It would depend somewhat on the way in which the road would be run.

This bill proposes to extend the subsidy for one hundred and fifty miles, as reported by the committee. These persons come to us and say "Inasmuch as we expected to have a connection with the eastern division, and you changed the direction of the eastern division, thereby depriving us of it, you have destroyed the value of our road, and the investments we have made are not available for any purpose, and we ask Congress to relieve us." If they relied upon the letter of the law the courts would be the proper place for them to apply for relief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Nevada give way to enable the Chair to receive a message from the House of Representatives?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly; and I give notice that I shall conclude my remarks on another day.

DEATH OF HON. JAMES HINDS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced the death of the Hon. JAMES HINDS, late a member of the House from the State of Arkansas; and communicated the proceedings of the House of Representatives thereon.

Mr. RICE. Mr. President, it becomes my painful duty to announce the death of Hon. JAMES HINDS, late a member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HINDS was born in Hebron, Washington county, State of New York, on the 5th day of December, 1833. He studied law and graduated at the Cincinnati law college in 1856, and located for the practice of his profession at St. Peter, in the State of Minnesota. Shortly after he established himself there he was elected district attorney, which office he held, faithfully discharging his duties, until 1860.

Shortly after the breaking out of the late war he entered the Federal Army as a private, and was honorably discharged after several months' service. In 1865 he removed to the city of Little Rock, in the State of Arkansas, where he resumed the practice of his profession with fair success. He was an active and prominent member of the State constitutional convention that framed the present constitution of the State. He was in that convention liberal toward the enemies of reconstruction and just toward the colored people.

His manifest ability as one of the committee on the judiciary caused the convention to select him as one of the commissioners to codify the laws of the State. He was, at the first election after the adoption of the constitution by the convention, elected to represent his district in the Fortieth Congress of the United States.

The story of his death is too barbarous, too atrocious, to detail with the ordinary feelings that one would have had it been the result of natural causes. I dislike this portion of my duty. I cannot think of the brutality that actuated the assassination, or the more deplorable fact that it was the result of party action and a part of a great scheme by which the State was to be cleared of all its prominent, active Union men, without being inclined to use language too harsh to be appropriate on this sad occasion. I will therefore simply recite the circumstances attending the murder. It was during the recent presidential canvass. Mr. HINDS, being an able and very effective speaker, entered the canvass in behalf of the Republican ticket. He and Hon. Joseph Brook, than whom there is not a better man or better speaker in the State, had a list of appointments in a number of counties in the eastern part of the State. Although the times were anything but peaceable, although assassinations in other parts of the State were of almost daily occurrence, yet these two men, without any regard for their personal safety, determined to do what they conceived to be their whole duty to the Government under which they lived. Without other protection than their natural but greatly misplaced confidence in what claimed to be a generous, law-abiding people, they started on their canvassing tour. After filling several appointments they, on the 21st day of October last, proceeded on their way to fill an appointment at Mr. Evans's, in Monroe county. In this county Mr. HINDS was an entire stranger, and Mr. Brook had but few acquaintances and no personal enemies. At Indian Bay, six miles from the place of meeting, they inquired at a store for an acquaintance of Mr. Brook, and a stranger to them volunteered to tell them that he had gone to the speaking and gave them directions to the place; and they passed on.

When out about a mile and a half from Indian Bay, from the difference in the walking gait of their horses, Mr. Brook led Mr. HINDS some fifty yards. At this point, Mr. Brook heard some one talking, and looked back and saw this same man that had given them directions riding alongside of and in a friendly conversation with Mr. HINDS. The man had a double-barreled shot-gun in his hand. Thinking nothing of the circumstance Mr. Brook rode on. In less than a minute afterward he felt a blow in his side and heard the report of a gun. Immediately looking back he heard another shot and saw Mr. HINDS fall from his horse. Thus, in open day, without the slightest warning he was murdered. Mr. Brook put his horse at full speed for assistance, but before it arrived some kind man had found Mr. HINDS and removed him to his house, where he expired about two hours after receiving the fatal shot. Mr. Brook was shot in the side and thigh, and his wounds were so serious that he has not yet recovered. The murderer returned to Indian Bay and boasted of what he had done. A coroner's jury were summoned, and after hearing the evidence, found that he came to his death by being shot, and that George W. Clark was the murderer. This George W. Clark was the secretary of the Democratic club at Indian Bay, and not two hours prior to the shooting participated in a peace meeting of the leading men of both parties, in which resolutions were passed deprecating violence and pledging themselves to the preservation of peace and order in the community. Such is the brief history of the life and death of Mr. HINDS.

In the midst of life he found death. In the prime of manhood he became a martyr. Mr. HINDS had strong traits of character. His success in life was owing to those traits.

I know that it is usually the case with most persons when they see a man in position to inquire in their own minds how he came to be selected for that place, what are his peculiar traits of character that have caused his fellow-citizens to elevate him to position. These are the usual reflections, I suppose, of most men.

In the case of the deceased the answer to these inquiries could be readily made by any one acquainted with him. He was a man of strong convictions, strong will, very persistent in the advocacy of what he thought right.

These characteristics manifested themselves in a very marked degree after he turned his attention to politics. He was one of the first in the State of Arkansas that espoused the cause of the colored people on the subject of suffrage. At the time he commenced pressing the matter upon the public mind it was very odious even to many leading men who afterward became its strong advocates. The opposition he met seemed to inspire him with increased zeal and fervor in behalf of what he regarded and what was a great principle. He embraced this doctrine long in advance of the passage of the reconstruction acts, and contended that through the enfranchisement of the colored race alone could the reconstruction of the southern States ever be effected. He concentrated all his energies upon this one question; it was the burden of all his speeches and of all his conversation upon politics. Of course, he could give it no shape until after the passage of the reconstruction acts by Congress.

Then his ideas took a practical form, and his arguments became effectual; and many who had before this joined in heaping odium on him for his incendiary doctrines, as they were termed, became themselves warm advocates of the same. It was his persistent adherence to these sentiments, through evil as well as good report, that marked him as a man who could be trusted by the people. By his course he had acquired a hold on the colored people so strong that nothing that could be said about him would shake their confidence in him. He was a strong, forcible speaker, with sufficient industry to be well posted on any subject he attempted to discuss. His convictions were his politics. As to what is termed policy he knew nothing and seemed to care nothing for it. He was unsuspicious, and hence easily deceived. With no disposition to violence toward others, he had childish confidence that none would be inflicted on him, and therefore was never prepared to resist or avoid it. This is a brief history of him whom we mourn to-day.

I can truthfully say of him that he lived a patriot and died a martyr to the cause he loved—the cause of man, the cause of his country.

Mr. President, I move the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with profound sensibility the announcement of the untimely death of Hon. JAMES HINDS, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Arkansas.

Resolved, That with a view of showing proper respect for the memory of Hon. JAMES HINDS, the members and officers of the Senate will go into mourning by the usual mode of wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to communicate a copy of these proceedings to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect for the memory of Mr. HINDS, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. President, as one of the Senators of Arkansas it is proper that I should add a word to what has already been so well said relative to the untimely death of our lamented friend. His history and services have been recounted by those who knew him far better than I knew him. My acquaintance with him began with his first settlement in Arkansas, and I have known him since as the stern and determined supporter of the principles of good government, and the relentless and uncompromising foe of treason in all its forms.

Although a Democrat at the period of Mr. Lincoln's first election, in the stirring events that followed he patriotically ranged himself on the side of the Administration, and devoted all the energies of his character and intellect to the earnest support of the Government of his country. His manly nature held no sympathy with treason, and in the stern struggle for the life of the nation his was no doubtful or uncertain utterance. The war found him a Democrat, but left him a Republican.

As during the war he espoused the side of the Government, so in the reconstruction of his adopted State his voice and influence were given in behalf of loyalty and freedom, and against those who had sought to sunder and destroy the perpetual Union of the States. In the maintenance and advocacy of those principles so dear to his heart and the country, those principles which have been enacted into statutes and become the law of the land, he was stricken down by the hand of the assassin, and his name has been added to the brilliant roll of heroes and martyrs whose lives have been sacrificed because of their devotion to the country; and history will record and remember this sacrifice as warmly and gratefully as if his life was yielded on the stricken field of battle and amid the crash of hostile legions. The valor and heroism he exhibited in maintaining and defending his principles were equal to that of the "hero of an hundred battle-fields;" and yet dead indeed must be the heart of patriotism in the State of Arkansas before his memory can be permitted to perish from our midst. He needs no eulogy from me. His life and death are written in the hearts of his people, and history will erect his monument for the admiration and sympathy of future years.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, it is with hesitation that I add a word on this melancholy occasion, and I do it only in compliance with the suggestion of others.

I did not know Mr. HINDS personally, but I have been interested in his life and touched by his tragical end. Born in New York, educated in Ohio, a settler in Minnesota, and then a citizen of Arkansas, he carried with him always the energies and principles ripened under our northern skies. He became a Representative in Congress, and, better still, a vindicator of the rights of man. Unhappily that barbarism which we call slavery is not yet dead, and it was his fate to fall under its vindictive assault. Pleading for the equal rights of all, he became a victim and martyr.

Thus suddenly arrested in life, his death is a special sorrow, not only to family and friends, but to the country which he had begun to serve so well. The void when a young man dies is measured less by what he has done than by the promises of the future. Performance itself is forgotten in the ample assurance afforded by character. Already Mr. HINDS had given himself sincerely and bravely to the good cause. By presence and speech he was urging those great principles of the Declaration of Independence, whose complete recognition will be the cap-stone of our Republic, when he fell from the stealthy shot of an assassin. It was in the midst of this work that he fell, and on this account I am glad to offer my tribute to his memory.

As the life he led was not without honor, so his death was not without consolation. It was the saying of antiquity that it is sweet to die for country. Here was death not only for country but for mankind. Nor is it to be forgotten that, dying in such a cause, his living voice is echoed from the tomb. There is a testimony in death often greater than in any life. The cause for which a man dies lives anew in his death. "If the assassination could trammel up the consequence," then might the assassin find some other satisfaction than the gratification of a barbarous nature. But this cannot be. His own soul is blasted; the cause he sought to kill is elevated; and thus it is now. The assassin is a fugitive in some unknown retreat. The cause is about to triumph.

Often it happens that death, which takes away life, confers what life alone cannot give. It makes famous. History does not forget Lovejoy, who for devotion to the cause of the slave was murdered by a fanatical mob, and it has already enshrined Abraham Lincoln in holiest keeping. Another is added to the roll; less exalted than Lincoln, less early in immolation than Lovejoy, but like these two, to be remembered always among those who passed out of life through the gate of sacrifice.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I would not dispel the impression which the eloquent truths uttered by the Senator from Massachusetts have made upon this body; but I would simply say, that while I have not had time to prepare for presentation the thoughts which have occurred to me in connection with the assassination of Mr. HINDS, there are one or two considerations which I will present.

I knew Mr. HINDS personally. Agreeing with Mr. Carlyle in his admiration for earnest and sincere men, I can say of Mr. HINDS, from personal knowledge, that he was an earnest and a sincere man, and therefore a hero worthy of our best admiration. But there is a lesson which we may draw from the story that has been detailed to us. To-day the American Senate is sitting and passing resolutions of respect for a man who died for his political opinions. We are to-day confessing the fact, in the face of this great people and of the civilized world, that there are districts in this country where an American citizen may not go and be a free-man without fear of the assassin's knife.

Mr. President, this is a melancholy confession for the Senate and Congress and people of the United States to make. This nation has shown that it has the power to subdue armed rebellion; to crush millions of armed men whose hands were raised to strike against the flag of the country; but it has not yet shown—I hope it may show—that it has also the power to reach its strong hand down to the humblest of its citizens, to take within the arms of its protecting power the lowliest of its citizens, and protect and cover them with its shield. It is this lesson which I would have the Senate learn from this tragic event: to see by what means we may give that protection which all men have a right to demand.

This is not a singular occurrence, my brother Senators. Those of us who are familiar with the condition of things at the South know that in some sections of the country every man who went forth to the exercise of the rights of an American citizen, to proclaim his political opinions and to urge the election of General Grant to the Presidency, carried his life in his hand. Two of the men who sheltered me in my campaign in Alabama last summer, two of those who gave me hospitable welcome under their roofs, within a week afterward were assassinated.

These things exist to some extent in the southern States. Now let the impression be left upon our minds by this sad event that we shall protect everywhere American citizens in the exercise of their constitutional and natural rights.

The resolutions were agreed to nem. con.; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 23, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BRYNOR. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MOORE obtained leave of absence for three days.

EXPENSES OF SUBSISTENCE BUREAU.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Commissary General of Subsistence, asking an appropriation of $9,000 for the contingent expenses of his office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REFUNDING OF TAXES.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1548) to regulate the refunding of taxes paid into the Treasury of the United States; and the same was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

REGISTERS IN BANKRUPTCY.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1467) repealing so much of the third section of the general bankrupt law, approved March 2, 1867, as directs the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States to nominate and recommend registers in bankruptcy, and to vest that appointing power in the President of the United States; and the same was referred to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States.

PAY OF UNITED STATES MARSHALS.

On motion of Mr. BLAINE, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in compliance with the House resolution of the 18th ultimo, a statement showing the amount due and necessary to pay certain United States marshals for services in connection with the eighth census, in 1860; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

MISSISSIPPI AND MEXICAN GULF CANAL.

On motion of Mr. BLAINE, also, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1520) concerning the Mississippi and Mexican Gulf and Ship-Canal Company, asking an appropriation of $300,000; and the same was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

ST. MARY'S FALLS SHIP-CANAL.

On motion of Mr. BLAINE, also, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of citizens of Philadelphia, asking for appropriations for the improvement of St. Mary's river and St. Mary's falls ship-canal; and the same was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

INVENTORS OF NEW FRUIT.

Mr. KETCHAM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1759) to encourage and protect inventors of new kinds of fruit; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

BUILDINGS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, Secretary of War, Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of the Treasury, and of the Interior be requested to furnish the House with a statement of the buildings and premises held and occupied by their Departments, respectively, in the city of Washington under lease for rent; for what purposes so held; the owners of the respective buildings; how long said buildings or premises have been so held; what time the leases severally have to run; the amount of the annual rent of said premises as so leased, respectively, and whether any such buildings can be dispensed with.

PROPERTY OF WILLIAM T. HARRIS.

Mr. KELSEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to inform this House whether any, and if any what, measures have been taken by the United States Government to recover from the Government of Brazil the property of William T. Harris, an American citizen, who died at Bahia in the year 1852, and whose property it is alleged was seized by officers of the Brazilian Government after his death, notwithstanding the protest of the United States consul; and the Secretary of State is directed to send to this House copies of all correspondence with the Government of Brazil, and papers relating to the estate of William T. Harris, deceased, that are on file in his Department.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 1558) to amend an act entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in case of contested elections," approved February 19, 1851; when the Speaker signed the same.

WESTERN MILITARY CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. SPALDING, by unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 404) providing for the disposition of certain papers relating to military claims accruing in the department of the West, returned from the Senate with an amendment, was taken up.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out all of the resolution after the words "to be," in the ninth line, in the following words: "examined; and such part thereof as has any bearing on cases pending in the Court of Claims shall be printed and received in said Court of Claims as if it were evidence taken under commission from said court, subject, however, to reexamination or cross-examination of the witnesses by either party," and to insert the word "printed;" so that the resolution will read:

That all the papers and evidence returned to the War Department by the Davis, Holt, and Campbell commission (touching claims against the department of the West accruing immediately before the 14th of October, 1861,) shall be surrendered and turned over to the Attorney General, whose duty it shall be to cause the evidence to be printed.

Mr. SPALDING moved that the amendment of the Senate be non-concurred in and a conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Mr. SPALDING, Mr. BEAMAN, and Mr. HOLMAN managers of the conference on the part of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 200) reappointing Louis Agassiz a regent of the Smithsonian Institution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 1558) to amend an act entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in case of contested elections," approved February 19, 1851.

MIAMI INDIANS OF INDIANA.

Mr. SHANKS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1760) to secure to certain members of the Miami tribe of Indians, who reside in Allen and Huntington counties, Indiana, the lands to which they are entitled; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the various votes of reference; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

B. & O. R. R. DEPOT, WASHINGTON.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire whether the depot of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad in Washington ought not to be removed from its present site, north of and near the Capitol, to some point more remote from the public grounds, and where it will less interfere with and injure city property and obstruct the course of city improvements; and that the said committee report at the earliest practicable day by bill or otherwise.

DEFALCATION, ETC., IN IDAHO.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to send to this House all information in his possession in relation to a contract made with Frank C. Kenyon to print certain statutes passed and journals kept by the Legislature of the Territory of Idaho; whether the books have been delivered in accordance with the terms of the contract; what amount was paid, when paid, and to whom; and also to send with the other information a copy of the report made by special commissioners, H. C. Street and W. R. Deftrees, filed October 18, 1863, in relation to this matter among others; and also all information in relation to the defalcation of Horace C. Gillson, former secretary of Idaho Territory, how the money delivered to him was to be disbursed, and what amount of money was lost by the Government through his defalcation.

CESSION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FLANDERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 414) ceding the buildings at Fort Steilacoom to Washington Territory for an insane asylum; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories; and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

GEORGIA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DAWES. I give notice that it is my intention, at the first moment special assignments will permit, to call up the contested-election case from Georgia.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. ARNELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1761) for the better protection of the rights of women in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The first business in order to-day I understand to be the question of suffrage brought up by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] by a motion to reconsider. I would like to inquire of the Chair what is the present condition of the business of the House, and I desire to know what course the gentleman from Massachusetts intends to pursue in regard to the business of which he has charge. I desire this information to enable me to direct my action in reference to the appropriation bills. First, I would inquire of the Chair the present condition of the business of the House?

The SPEAKER. By the unanimous order of the House the bill in regard to the Denver Pacific railway is made the special order after the morning hour each day until disposed of. Upon days when there is no morning hour—as upon Thursday last, when the Missouri contested-election case was considered—that bill does not come up. After that bill shall be disposed of the next bill which is made the special order is a bill reported by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. LYNOX,] in regard to specie payments. A motion to reconsider, however, is privileged above all other motions, except a motion to adjourn, and can be called up immediately after the reading of the Journal on any day.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The business of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] would, then, take precedence of everything else.

The SPEAKER. It will take precedence of the morning-hour and of special orders.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that after to-day the gentleman from Massachusetts will consent to a postponement of the business in his charge until some future time, so that on Monday we may get at the Denver Pacific railway bill and dispose of it as soon as possible. And I wish to give notice that immediately after that bill shall have been disposed of I shall move to go into Committee of the Whole, from day to day, until the legislative appropriation bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I do not understand that the morning hour of Tuesday next will be interfered with by the business of my colleague, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

The SPEAKER. It will be, unless, by a majority vote the House shall postpone that business until after the morning hour of that day.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I desire to state a circumstance which may to some extent modify the course I had at first intended to pursue in regard to the business which I propose to bring before the House this morning, by calling up my motion to reconsider. The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] a member of the Judiciary Committee, who expects to speak upon this question, does not understand in precisely the same way that I do a conversation which we had in reference to this matter. My desire is to arrange as far as possible so as to accommodate my course upon this bill to what he understands to have been the nature of the conversation between us; and therefore, observing his understanding of our conversation, I cannot consistently call for the vote on this measure before Friday or Saturday next. I would be glad to call for it earlier, and would do so if it were not for this circumstance.

After to-day, on Monday next, I will ask the House to hold an evening session, for debate only, if there are members who desire to discuss this proposition. I will not interfere with the morning hour of Tuesday, and will not call for a vote before Friday next. I will endeavor to carry out the arrangement I have stated, keeping, however, control of the measure, so as to get a vote in six or seven days.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I do not understand the gentleman to say that the entire time of the House will be taken on Monday with this bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Not at all; only the evening session.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I only desire that there may be a perfect understanding of what the gentleman from Massachusetts designs to do in regard to this bill. I certainly did understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts, if allowed to make his report at the time he did without objection, would at some day thereafter, to suit his own convenience, call it up and make his speech on it, and if there were any other gentlemen on his side of the House who wished to debate it they should have the opportunity. I supposed when he called it up to-day that such would be the order, that he would make his speech on the bill, and others on his side who wished to speak on it should have the floor, and that then the discussion should be postponed for one week. Whether it is Friday or Saturday next does not make any particular difference to me, so far as I am personally concerned. This understanding I gave to my friends, that that was the order in which the bill would be discussed. They so understood it. But there is one gentleman on our side who is prepared to make his speech to-day, and there will be no misunderstanding between the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself if he shall make his speech and then yield the floor to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] to submit his remarks. There are other gentlemen on this side of the House who wish to make speeches, and if the bill be postponed until next Friday or Saturday that will be understood.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot consent to that, for that is different from any understanding I could have had with the gentleman from Wisconsin. As far as the business of the House will permit, I desire that the discussion on this bill shall run on during every hour that I can control between this and next Friday. I understood that the extreme limit asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin was that he should speak one week after I made my speech.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts could not have so understood me, it seems to me. He proposed to report the bill without a written report, and to bring it up at the time he did. I tried to get him to make a written report, so that we might know something about the course intended to be pursued. He knew that I had been engaged on the sub-committee, and that my whole time had been occupied with the investigation into the charges against Judge Busted ever since it had commenced. Finally, he told me, as I understood him, that he would report the bill, and at some time afterward, convenient to himself, make his speech, and then consent to its postponement. I so understood him; and when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] objected I went to him, and he withdrew it on the understanding which I have just stated. I hope the gentleman will not insist on any other order, because it was on that understanding that the bill was allowed to be reported.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask whether any member has the control of a measure of this kind so as to say when it shall be postponed, and when acted upon? If there is any such understanding I hope the House will take into its own hands the control of a matter of such importance to the country.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I resume the floor.

Mr. McKEE. I call for the regular order.

SUFFRAGE.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1667) to secure equal privileges and immunities to citizens of the United States, and to enforce the provisions of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution, and the resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, were recommended to the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from Massachusetts now calls up that motion, and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not think it necessary for me to consume the time of the House in discussing the conversation which I had with the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr.

ELDRIDGE.] My object was not to make any arrangement by which the business of the House should be improperly controlled, but as the gentleman was a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and was engaged upon a sub-committee in the service of the House, and desired to speak upon this subject, it was, of course, natural and proper for me to seek to so arrange the conduct of this measure as to give him an opportunity to be heard. That is all I designed to do, and I beg the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] to take notice of it. For the future conduct of the bill I can only say that it is my desire that the gentleman from Wisconsin shall have an opportunity to be heard on Thursday or Friday; but if the House judges otherwise, and takes control of the measure, the House will be responsible for its own action.

This measure, or these two measures, which have been reported together by the Judiciary Committee, are the last as far as I can foresee of a series of great measures growing out of the rebellion, and necessary for the reorganization and pacification of the country, with which the Republican party to a large extent, through their Representatives and Senators in the Thirty-Eighth, Thirty-Ninth, and Fortieth Congresses, has been charged. I say that this measure, as far as I can foresee, is the last of those great measures, and for this reason: if we secure to all the people of the country, without distinction of race or color, the privilege of the elective franchise, we have then established upon the broadest possible basis of republican equality the institutions of the country, both state and national.

I am persuaded, by my experience upon those other questions and by the circumstances in which we are now placed, that it is impossible, whatever may be the desire of individual members of the House, whatever may be the wishes, or the hopes, or the prejudices of any portions of the people of the country, for us to escape this issue as a Congress and as a party. I shall speak to-day with great freedom upon the responsibility of the Republican party to the country. I know it is not customary in a legislative assembly to present measures in what is called a party aspect, and I will therefore state to the House very briefly the reasons for the course I now pursue.

Those reasons are largely based on the declaration that the Republican party stands in a relation to the country and to certain great questions and interests differently from any other party that has existed since the revolutionary era. During all previous time since the close of the revolutionary war parties have divided upon questions of administration, upon a difference of ideas as to what the public policy of the country should be. During the revolutionary war the differences between the Whig party and the Tory party were more comprehensive and fundamental. One party maintained the right of the Colonies to a separate and independent existence as a nation, and the other denied that right. We stand to-day in an analogous position. The Democratic party of this country as a party organization, from the opening of the war to the present time, has been identified with all those ideas and measures which were calculated in their nature and in their operation to prevent the restoration of the Union by and through the agency of war for the suppression of the rebellion. It is a noticeable fact, which we do not to-day sufficiently appreciate, that this nation is indebted to the Republican party for its existence. Therefore, I say that the Republican party organization is responsible, and it cannot escape being responsible, for the consummation of those measures which are necessary to the perpetuity and to the peace of a nation which the Republican party has saved from overthrow.

One of the measures reported by the committee is a bill to secure equal privileges and immunities to citizens of the United States, and to enforce the provisions of article fourteen of the amendment to the Constitution. The other is a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I am aware that there are persons who believe that all that is necessary to be done should be done by an act of Congress. There are others who are of opinion that the subject is not within the proper scope of legislative power, and that the only way to secure equality of suffrage to the people of this country, without distinction of race or color, is by an amendment to the Constitution.

As I proceed I shall state the reasons why I am not willing to rely exclusively upon a law of Congress, and also the reasons why I think it not wise to submit a constitutional amendment without the aid of legislation. For the present I only desire to say that the committee, I believe—certainly in speaking for myself I am able to say it—invite examination and criticism in regard to the phraseology as well as to the objects proposed by the bill and by the constitutional amendment, it being our purpose to make the two measures as perfect as possible without regard to the paternity of the words employed. I shall direct my remarks generally to the provisions of the bill. The first section of the bill is in these words:

That no State shall abridge or deny the right of any citizen of the United States to vote for electors of President and Vice President of the United States or for Representatives in Congress, or for members of the Legislature of the State in which he may reside, by reason of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; and any provisions in the laws or constitution of any State inconsistent with this section are hereby declared to be null and void.

The second and third sections are remedial and punitive, and are not necessary to be considered particularly in the discussion in which I am now engaged. The fourth section of this bill is framed in accordance with and by authority of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. It is in these words:

That any person disqualified by section three of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and from whom such disability shall not have been removed by act of Congress, who shall exercise the powers and duties of any office therein specified, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be imprisoned and kept at hard labor for the term of two years; and an indictment for the same may be found at any time within ten years from the commission of the offense.

The purpose of this section is clear. There are in many of the States, those that have been reconstructed, those that are still under military government, as well as in the State of Kentucky, and perhaps in some other States that were not engaged in the rebellion, men who by the fourteenth article of amendment are disqualified from holding office. While, as I shall have occasion to say, we are not in our legislation to be governed by any feeling of resentment or malice, I still think it is due to the supreme and solemn character of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution that Congress should enforce it against every man who by that provision is disqualified; and after having enforced it, we may then consider whether those men should be relieved of their disqualifications. But I hold it to have been a duty on the part of every man who professes now to be loyal to the Government of his country and who was holding office when the fourteenth amendment was adopted to resign his office, and thereby recognize the supremacy of the Constitution of the United States.

It will be seen that the first section of this bill, which contains all the essential provisions with reference to the right of suffrage, limits the operation of the law to elections for President and Vice President, Representatives in Congress, and to members of the State Legislatures. It will also be seen, by the argument which I shall submit, based upon the Constitution of the United States, that the powers of Congress are probably broader than those set forth and asserted in the section of the bill which I have just read; but inasmuch as I believe all the objects which we are now seeking can be accomplished by the legislation here proposed, and the right of every citizen, whether black or white, native-born or naturalized citizen, can be secured within a reasonable period of time, I am in favor of legisla-ing so far only as may be necessary, to secure those objects, not waving, however, or in any way, qualifying the assertion of the constitutional right in Congress to legislate upon the subject of the franchise, even in reference to the election of officers not named in this section of the bill. Those who are familiar with the debates which took place in the convention that framed the Constitution of the United States, and especially those who have read the debates that took place in the several State conventions upon the subject of ratifying the Constitution of the United States, must have been struck with the circumstance that all the friends of the Constitution asserted that there was power in the Constitution over the elective franchise to an extent which would enable the national Government to preserve its own existence independently of any action on the part of the States. If this Government be not a mere confederacy, held together by the merest thread, this must be true in the nature of the case. If the declaration in the preamble that we are a people has any meaning; if the Constitution which the people of the United States as one people established has any virtue or any force, any power to accomplish the purposes of a Government, then in this Government there must be constitutional means by which those charged with the administration can provide for its preservation and continuance.

I am now dealing with general principles, and not with the text of the Constitution, to which I shall come ere long. Upon general principles there must be power in the national Government to provide whatever is necessary for its own preservation. But if the doctrine of those who maintain that the whole question of suffrage is vested in the States be true, then the States may refuse to choose electors; they may refuse to send members to this House; they may refuse to choose Senators by their Legislatures, and thus the Government of the United States would come to an end. There would be no President; there would be no Senate; there would be no House of Representatives, and the Government would consequently cease to exist.

Sir, I know not in the darkest days of the Republic, when State rights were triumphant, I know not of any theory more destructive to national existence and public liberty more directly opposed to the nature of our Government than that which is now avowed. It is a remnant of ancient and false traditions not supported by the Constitution. I shall ask the House to consider what the Constitution does declare upon the subject of suffrage. It will be found that there is no word or phrase in the instrument which tolerates the idea that the existence of this great Government, continental in its dimensions, is at the mercy of the States through defects in our fundamental law.

I come now to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States bearing upon the question of suffrage. I read first that provision on which I suppose much reliance is placed to sustain the doctrine that the power over the question of suffrage is, to a certain extent, vested absolutely in the States. The second section of the first article of the Constitution is in these words:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

It has been assumed, upon this section of the Constitution, that each State has the power absolutely to fix the qualifications of electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature, and that therefore the power of Congress, if it existed at all in reference to the election of Representatives to Congress, was controlled by what the State might have done in reference to electors for members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature. But if gentlemen will look at the phraseology of this section as it stands they will see that it does not give power to the States in reference to the qualification of voters; that it does not give power to the United States in reference to the qualifications of voters; that it does not take power from the States, nor does it take power from the United States. It merely declares the fact that the voters for Representatives in Congress shall possess the qualifications of voters for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. It is an injunction to the States if they have the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters; it is an injunction to the national Government if the national Government has that power. But there is no declaration in this section that either has the power, and certainly not that either has the power to the exclusion of the other. But the fourth section of the same article of the Constitution further provides that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof."

If the provision ended here, the theory which is maintained by gentlemen who deny the propositions contained in this bill would be well supported by the Constitution:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof."

The word "manner," in this connection of course becomes important. All writers upon words have considered the power and scope of three words which have a great similarity of meaning, "mode," "method," and "manner," and it is uniformly agreed that "manner" is the largest and most comprehensive of the three in its scope. Patrick Henry, of Virginia—and I shall read his declarations to the House—gave his view of the meaning of the word "manner," which coincides with the view that I now take. It includes, as I maintain, everything relating to an election, from the qualification of the elector to the deposit of his ballot in the box. Here is set forth the power of the State. By the Constitution a State has original jurisdiction of the "times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives;" and it is from this provision of the Constitution that the State gets its power over the subject, so far as the Constitution of the United States is concerned.

Either one or the other of two things is true: either these words as herein employed in their scope and meaning cover the entire subject of elections, from the qualifications of the voter to the deposit of his ballot in the box, or else, by necessary legal inference, the States have not the power which they have been in the habit of exercising; for if this be a qualified and limited grant or recognition of authority, then what is not granted or recognized they do not possess. But the history of the facts from the first, and the recognition by Congress of the powers of the States, go to the extent of conceding to them entire scope and original control of the whole matter of voting, including the qualifications of the voter, his registration, and the deposit of his ballot in the box.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he means to affirm that the States possess no powers except those which are granted to them in and by the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have not said that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I supposed the rule to be entirely the other way; that the United States Government has no powers except those which have been granted to it. I understood the gentleman to declare that the States cannot possess the power which we claim they have of regulating the qualifications of voters, because the Constitution contains no grant of the power to them. That is the way in which I understood the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman misunderstands me. This is a declaration in the Constitution of the power of the States over the subject of voting. If it is a full and complete power over the whole subject it is what we maintain; but if it be not a full and complete power, then inasmuch as here is a declaration of the extent of the powers of the States, then the States are limited necessarily by the interpretation that is put upon this language; for if the Constitution of the United States says that States have certain powers, even though there be no negative in the declaration, they cannot go beyond the powers thus defined. Let me read what remains of this provision:

"But the Congress may at any time by law make"—

Very broad language—

"or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators."

Now, sir, taking the language of the Constitution itself, divested of all theories and traditions concerning the meaning put upon it by State-rights men, can anything be more clear than that the Congress of the United States has all the power which the States could exercise, except merely as to declaring where the Senators shall be chosen? Can there be any doubt that the powers granted to or recognized as existing in the States, whatever the extent of those powers may be, is the measure of the powers which Congress may exercise? And therefore, when a State-rights man proves that by the Constitution of the United States a State has a right to decide who shall exercise the elective franchise, he has proved also that Congress may do the same thing under this provision of the Constitution which says that Congress may make any regulations it chooses relating to this subject or may alter such regulations as have been made by the States.

This is no new doctrine. It was asserted, as I have already stated, in most of the conventions which ratified the Constitution of the United States. It was declared again and again in the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Hamilton, in the Federalist, says, speaking of the fourth section of the first article:

"I am greatly mistaken, notwithstanding, if there be any article in the whole plan more completely defensible than this. Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every Government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation."

Again he says:

"Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power of regulating elections for the national Government, in the hands of the State Legislatures, would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy. They could at any moment annihilate it by neglecting to provide for the choice of persons to administer its affairs."

In the several State conventions the ablest opponents of the Constitution based their objections to it upon the very ground that it gave to Congress the power which I am now advocating; and the defenders of the Constitution, so far as I have been able to ascertain, never denied the soundness of the theory on which those objections were based. Hear what Patrick Henry says. In the second volume of Elliott's Debates, page 149, Patrick Henry, speaking of the first section of the fourth article, giving to Congress power over the time, place, and manner of choosing officers, says:

"According to the mode prescribed, Congress may tell you that they have a right to make the vote of one gentleman go as far as the votes of one hundred poor men."

Can there be any broader declaration as to the power of Congress than that made by Patrick Henry in these words? Again, he continues:

"The power over the manner admits of the most dangerous latitude. They may modify it as they please. They may regulate the number of votes by the quantity of property without involving any repugnancy to the Constitution."

That was Patrick Henry's objection to the Constitution and to this particular provision. Replying to that objection, Mr. Madison, in the same volume, while he does not admit in terms the doctrine laid down by Patrick Henry, does not deny it, but asserts that the existence of this power is absolutely necessary to the existence of the Government. He says:

"With respect to the other point, it was thought that the regulation of the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent. Some States might regulate the elections on the principles of equality, and others might regulate them otherwise."

This is exactly the condition in which we are to-day. "Some States," says he, "may regulate the elections upon the principles of equality, and some States may regulate them otherwise."

"This diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some States, particularly South Carolina, with respect to Charleston, which has a representation of thirty members."

Thirty members were in the Legislature of South Carolina from the city of Charleston. What was the theory of Madison? That that provision of the Constitution enabled the Congress of the United States to go into South Carolina and decide that the city of Charleston should not have more members in the Legislature of South Carolina than she was entitled to on the principle of equality.

Mr. Madison says:

"Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government."

Forty thousand citizens of the United States are deprived of the right of suffrage in the State of Kentucky. What is here suggested by Mr. Madison is what the committee propose to-day. There are at least one hundred and fifty thousand citizens of this country who are denied the right of suffrage. Mr. Madison says that "it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government." He says further:

"It was found impossible to fix the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives in the Constitution. It was found necessary to leave the regulation of this, in the first place, to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. And considering the State government and General Government as distinct bodies, acting in different and independent capacities for the people, it was thought the particular regulations should be submitted to the former and the general regulations to the latter. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments the General Government might easily be dissolved; but if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures, the congressional control will very probably never be exercised. The power appears to me satisfactory and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution."

He says again, on page 305:

"With respect to the time, place, and manner of elections, I cannot think, notwithstanding the apprehensions of the honorable gentleman, that there is any danger, or, if abuse should take place, that there is not sufficient security. If all the people of the United States should be directed to go to elect in one place the members of the Government would be exasperated for the infamous regulation. Many would go to trample them under foot for their conduct, and they would be succeeded by men who would remove it. They would not dare to meet the universal hatred and detestation of the people, and run the risk of the certain dreadful consequences. We must keep within the compass of human probability. If a possibility be the cause of objection we must object to every Government in America. But the honorable gentleman may say that better guards may be provided. Let us consider the objection. The power of regulating the time, place, and manner of elections must be vested somewhere. It could not be fixed in the Constitution without involving great inconveniences. They could then have no authority to adjust the regulations to the changes of circumstances. The question then is, whether it ought to be fixed unalterably in the State governments or subject to the control of the General Government. Is it not obvious that the General Government would be destroyed without this control?"

Mr. James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, was one of the ablest of the statesmen engaged in framing the Constitution of the United States. He was also a member of the convention of Pennsylvania that ratified the Constitution. In the latter body he gave his opinion upon the question now under debate. He said:

"I hope, sir, that it was no crime to sow the seed of self preservation in the Federal Government. Without this clause it would not possess self-preserving power. By this clause the times, places, and manner of holding elections shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof. I think it highly proper that the Federal Government should throw the exercise of this power into the hands of the State Legislatures, but not that it should be placed there entirely without control."

Again he says, in support of the powers of Congress:

"But there is an additional reason still that shows the necessity of this provisional clause. The members of the Senate are elected by the State Legislatures. If those Legislatures possessed, uncontrolled, the power of prescribing the times, places, and manner of electing members of the House of Representatives, the members of one branch of the General Legislature would be the tenants at will of the electors of the other branch, and the General Government would lie prostrate at the mercy of the Legislatures of the several States."

I do not intend to follow the discussion in all of the States. I have read what was said by Patrick Henry and Mr. Madison in the Virginia convention, and by Mr. Wilson in that of Pennsylvania. There were in Massachusetts two very distinguished men, Caleb Strong, from the western part of that State, and Theophilus Parsons, from Essex county, both distinguished persons, and the latter among the most eminent jurists of his time in this country, and, indeed, I think it not extravagant to say one of the most eminent jurists of modern times. He said, speaking of this very power:

"But a State Legislature, under the influence of their Senators, who would have their fullest confidence, or under the influence of ambitious or popular characters, or in times of popular commotion and when faction and party spirit ran high, would introduce such regulations as would render the rights of the people insecure and of little value. They might make an unequal and partial division of the States into districts for the election of Representatives, or they might even disqualify one third of the electors. Without these powers in Congress the people can have no remedy. But the fourth section provides a remedy, a controlling power, in a Legislature, composed of Senators and Representatives of twelve States, without the influence of our conventions and factions, who will hear impartially and preserve and restore to the people their equal and sacred rights."

What was said by Caleb Strong is substantially the same as that uttered by Theophilus Parsons.

The reporter of the Massachusetts debates makes this note:

"Several other gentlemen went largely into the debate on the fourth section, which those in favor of it demonstrated to be necessary: first, as it may be used to correct a negligence in elections; secondly, as it will prevent the dissolution of the Government by designing and refractory States; thirdly, as it will operate as a check in favor of the people against any designs of the Federal Senate and their constituents, the State Legislatures, to deprive the people of their right of election; and fourthly, as it provides a remedy for the evil; should any State, by invasion or other cause, not have it in its power to appoint a place where the citizens thereof may meet to choose their Federal Representatives."

Similar debates took place in North Carolina, New Hampshire, South Carolina, Rhode Island, and New York. The opponents of the Constitution objected to the fourth section of the first article upon the ground that it gave to Congress complete jurisdiction of this whole subject; and its friends never denied, so far as I can ascertain, that such was its scope and design. What happened next? Four States—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New York—in ratifying the Constitution, demanded the amendment of the article relating to the powers of Congress over the subject of suffrage. I read the resolution adopted by Massachusetts:

"That Congress do not exercise the powers vested in them by the fourth section of the first article, but in cases where a State shall neglect or refuse to make the regulations therein mentioned, or shall make regulations subversive of the rights of the people to a free and equal representation in Congress, agreeably to the Constitution."

In seven of the conventions, at least, this provision of the Constitution had been assailed by most eminent men. What was done? The First Congress submitted twelve amendments to the Constitution, and neither of them touches the question raised by the four States.

What is the conclusion, then, of the whole matter upon the text of the original Constitution in reference to the question of suffrage. Why, first, that the power to make regulations concerning elections is vested in the States, and secondly, that the power of the General Government upon the subject of the franchise is just as comprehensive as the power of the States, and that we may make regulations as the States have made. This view is supported, first by the necessary theory of the Government that it cannot exist independently of the States if this power in the General Government is denied. It is also supported by the debates in the Convention that framed the Constitution itself. It is supported by the debates in the State conventions which ratified the Constitution, where the issue was distinctly made upon that question between the friends of the Constitution and its opponents. The opponents of the Constitution charged that it contemplated precisely what we now say it means; the supporters of the Constitution did deny that it contemplated precisely what we say it means, and upon that ground they advocated the provision. The opponents of the provision in four of the States sought the submission of an amendment to the people giving a different and more limited construction to the article. The Congress of the United States refused to submit such an amendment. This is conclusive evidence that all the men who participated in framing this Government were of opinion that the power to regulate elections was in the States, subject to the supreme control of the General Government; and this without any inquiry into other provisions of the Constitution, which give us ample basis for all the legislation we now propose.

I come next to the consideration of a provision of the Constitution on which I might safely rest for the exercise of this power, certainly as far as several States are concerned, even if all that is granted to Congress in the provisions relating to representation were wanting. I refer now to the provision of the Constitution by which the United States are to guaranty to each State a republican form of government. I read from the Federalist what is old and very well known. Mr. Hamilton says:

"In a confederacy founded upon republican principles and composed of republican members the superintending Government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic and monarchical measures."

I take it nobody will deny this. In the Pennsylvania convention Mr. Wilson treated the guarantee clause as justifying substantially what is now proposed. He says:

"In this system it is declared that the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. This being made the criterion of the right of suffrage, it is consequently secured, because the same Constitution guaranties to every State in the Union a republican form of government. The right of suffrage is fundamental to republics."

It is not necessary for my purpose to go further. What is the nature of the difficulty with which we are now dealing? Is it a difficulty in harmony with republican institutions and a republican form of government, or is it a difficulty which is antagonistic to republican institutions? What is the essence of an aristocracy? How is it distinguished from a republic? The essence of an aristocracy is in this, that the Government is in certain families made hereditary to the exclusion of others. That is all there is of it. You may limit this aristocracy to twelve men, you may enlarge it to a hundred, to a thousand, or to ten thousand; but if limited, if certain persons are included and certain others excluded, not for themselves merely but for all their posterity, you have an aristocracy. There is, I submit to this House, no other possible definition of an aristocracy; there is no other possible honest distinction between an aristocratic and a republican form of government.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: will not the position which he assumes require us, in order to make a State government republican in form, to confer suffrage also on females to the same extent that we do upon males?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have myself been rather broad and generous in times past in maintaining the right of people to vote. I see that there is a party coming which promises to go very far in advance of myself, with more rapid strides than I have been able to take. I am willing, for one, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] for the present should maintain the doctrine which he suggests in the question he puts to me, because I suppose it carries with it as an incident the result which I seek by this bill. If he will go with me in granting suffrage to all male citizens of this country twenty-one years of age, without regard to race or color, I will listen most attentively to any argument he shall make here, or anywhere else within my reach, in favor of the right of women to vote.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The question is, will you vote for it? We are doing precisely the same thing for you—listening to your argument; but we do not propose to go with you on this question, and we do not expect you will go with us on the other question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I was proceeding to consider the distinction between an aristocracy and a republic. I say without hesitation that none of those States in which men are denied the elective franchise for themselves and for all their posterity are republican. They are aristocracies more or less offensive to republican institutions and to republican government, and inasmuch as by the Constitution the United States has power, and it is made its duty to guaranty a republican form of government to each State, if upon observation we find, as I think we do find in Delaware, in Kentucky, in Maryland, in Ohio, and in Pennsylvania, that the governments are not republican, it becomes our duty to exercise the power vested in us by the Constitution and make those governments republican by law.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman a question just here. I would ask if he holds that the Constitution of the United States prohibits any State from regulating the right of suffrage? And if so, I ask the gentleman how he construes the tenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, I believe, was suggested by his own State of Massachusetts? I think when Massachusetts met in State convention to ratify the Constitution of the United States she instructed her delegates not to cease their efforts in the Federal Convention until they had obtained that amendment, which I will read:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

Mr. BOUTWELL. I must claim the floor. Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I should be very glad to hear the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We will give the gentleman farther time to answer it. I will move that the House give him farther time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Well, I will answer the question.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. If the power is not prohibited by the Constitution to a State, then it exists in the State.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have already argued that point upon the provision of the Constitution which gives to the States power over the time, places, and manner of holding elections. I cannot add anything to the statement I made upon that point.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. My question is, does the Constitution prohibit the States from regulating the matter of suffrage?

Mr. BOUTWELL. There is a power recognized in the States by the fourth section of the first article, and there is a power in the same section granted to the General Government concerning the matter of elections, and the tenth amendment to the Constitution, to which the gentleman refers, does not touch this case at all. The power given to the States to regulate the time, places, and manner of holding elections is a specified and distinct power, and it is not disturbed by the tenth amendment. The power given to Congress in the same article to alter those State regulations is a specific power also, and that is not touched by the tenth amendment to the Constitution.

I leave now that portion of my argument based upon the guarantee clause, and proceed to the consideration of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. If there were any doubt remaining in the mind of any person as to the power of Congress over this whole subject, as derived from the three provisions of the original text of the Constitution to which I have referred, I believe that every doubt must disappear upon an analysis of the fourteenth amendment. The first clause of the first section is in these words:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside."

Mark the words! Then comes the inhibition on the States:

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States."

By the first clause citizens of the United States are citizens of the States in which they reside. One of the immunities, then, and privileges of a citizen of the United States is that he shall be a citizen of the State where he resides, and the inhibition applies as well to the deprivation of rights derived directly from the States as to those rights derived directly from the United States Government. It is a comprehensive inhibition upon the States. They cannot deprive a citizen of the United States of any privilege or immunity which he may enjoy as a citizen of the United States; they cannot deprive him of any privilege or immunity which he may enjoy, or which any other citizen may enjoy as a citizen of the State in which he resides. This declaration in reference to the rights of citizens is for all or it is for nobody. We have certain privileges in this House, the two chief of which are, first, privilege from arrest in certain cases during the sessions and while traveling to and from our respective residences; and the other is, that we are not held answerable elsewhere for anything that we may say here.

Mr. Speaker, consider what is covered by the word "privileged," as used in the Constitution, not interpolated by me for the purpose of this debate. The rights to which I have referred are declared to be the privileges of members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. They are distinctions by which, under the Constitution, we are recognized and set apart from other men. They are privileges, in the language of the lexicographers, "peculiar benefits, advantages, immunities." They are for all of us equally. We are characterized in the Constitution as "members." We are as members endowed with certain privileges, and under that provision of the Constitution we are peers. What are the privileges under the Constitution of one member are the privileges of every other member.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has expired.

Mr. KNOTT obtained the floor; but yielded to Mr. ELDRIDGE, who said: I hope the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts will be extended.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot say how long.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not propose any limitation of the time.

No objection was made.

Mr. BOUTWELL resumed the floor.

Mr. WARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very well.

Mr. WARD. I find by reference to the bill now before the House that it proposes to affect the question of suffrage not only in reference to the election of members of Congress, but also in reference to the election of the presidential electors. I have no difficulty in relation to members of Congress, for I believe that we possess that power. But I would ask the gentleman whether this bill is not in violation of that provision of the Constitution which prescribes that presidential electors shall be appointed in such manner as the Legislatures of the several States may respectively direct?

Mr. BOUTWELL. So far as the features of this bill are concerned I would prefer to defer their consideration for the present.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, when my time expired, that under the Constitution the privileges of members of this House are for us all or they are for none of us. When you have established the right of one member here to the benefit of these privileges you have established the right of all the members of the House to the same privileges.

Now, what is the language of the section which I am considering?

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States."

I inquire how are you to distinguish between the various classes of persons in the several States? By the first clause of this section "all persons born or naturalized in the United States are citizens of the United States." They may have been born in Africa, in Denmark, in Ireland; they may be white, they may be black; but by the Constitution they are citizens of the United States, and by that same Constitution it is declared that the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States shall not be abridged by any State of this Union.

I say again, therefore, that that provision of the Constitution is for all the people or it is for none of them. Under that Constitution we cannot select and say that a man born in this country shall be entitled to certain privileges as a citizen to which a man born elsewhere and naturalized shall not be entitled. We cannot say that a white citizen shall enjoy privileges which are denied to a black citizen or to a naturalized citizen, white or black.

Next, is the right to vote one of the privileges of the citizen? I have here in my hand an authority from the State of Kentucky in which the characteristics of citizens are laid down by the supreme court of that State in most satisfactory and conclusive language, and I am willing to indorse it.

The opinion was given upon questions arising in an action of tort brought by a colored woman named Amy against a man named Smith, who claimed her as his slave. The action was in 1822, and the circumstances of the case were these: the woman was born a slave in the State of Pennsylvania, where she remained until the abolition of slavery was decreed in that State. She then went to Virginia, as I assume, before the admission of Kentucky. The man Smith, who claimed to be her master, used some brutality toward her for which she commenced an action against him.

The defense was that he was her master, that she was his slave. Her counsel maintained that, inasmuch as she was born in Pennsylvania, and was there when slavery was abolished in that State, she from the moment of the abolition of slavery there became not only free but a citizen of the United States; that having obtained in Pennsylvania the rights of a citizen, she was entitled to the benefit of that provision of the Constitution which says that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. How did the court meet this position? And this is the part of the opinion to which I wish to call the attention of the House. The court say:

"It was not, however, of that clause of the Constitution of the United States that the act of 1803 was contended by the plaintiff's counsel to be an infraction, but of the clause which provides that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States,' first clause, second section, and fourth article. To entitle the plaintiff to the benefit of this clause it is obviously necessary that she should be a citizen of some one of the United States; and it is accordingly urged by her counsel, in support of her title to that character, that she was before her removal from Pennsylvania a citizen of that State, and that by her removal to Virginia she became a citizen of the latter."

"Before we can determine whether she was a citizen or not of either of those States, it is necessary to ascertain what it is that constitutes a citizen. In England, birth in the country was alone sufficient to make any one a subject. Even a villain or a slave born within the king's allegiance is, according to the principles of the common law, a subject; but it never can be admitted that he is a citizen. One may, no doubt, be a citizen by birth as well as a subject, but subject and citizen are evidently words of different import, and it indisputably requires something more to make a citizen than it does to make a subject. It is, in fact, not the place of a man's birth, but the rights and privileges he may be entitled to enjoy which make him a citizen."

The term citizen is derived from the Latin word civis, and in its primary sense signifies one who is vested with the freedom and privileges of a city. At an early period after the subversion of the Roman empire, when civilization had again begun to progress, the cities in every part of Europe, either by usurpation or concession from their sovereigns, obtained extraordinary privileges in addition to those which were common to the other subjects of their respective countries; and one who was invested with these extraordinary privileges, whether he was an inhabitant of the city or not, or whether he was born in it or not, was deemed a citizen. (See Ree's Cyclopædia, under the word citizen.) In England a citizen is not only entitled to all the local privileges of the city to which he belongs, but he has also the right of electing and being elected to Parliament, which is itself rather an extraordinary privilege, since it does not belong to every class of subjects. (Com. Dig. Parliament, D. 6, 4 Inst. 6.)

"If we go back to Rome, whence the term citizen has its origin, we shall find in the illustrious period of her republic, that citizens were the highest class of subjects to whom the jus civitatis belonged, and that the jus civitatis conferred upon those who were in possession of it all rights and privileges, civil, political, and religious. (Butler's Horæ Juridicæ, 26, 27.)

"When the term came to be applied to the inhabitants of a State, it necessarily carried with it the same signification with reference to the privileges of the State which had been implied by it with reference to the privileges of a city, when it was applied to the inhabitants of the city; and it is in this sense that the term citizen is believed to be generally, if not universally, understood in the United States. This indeed evidently appears to be the sense in which the term is used in the clause of the Constitution which is under consideration; for the terms 'privileges and immunities,' which are expressive of the object intended to be secured to the citizens of each State in every other, plainly import, according to the best usages of our language, something more than those ordinary rights of personal security and property which by the courtesy of all civilized nations are extended to the citizens or subjects of other countries while they reside among them.

"No one can, therefore, in the correct sense of the term, be a citizen of a State who is not entitled, upon the terms prescribed by the institutions of the State, to all the rights and privileges conferred by those institutions upon the highest class of society. It is true that females and infants do not personally possess those rights and privileges in any State of the Union, but they are generally dependent upon adult males, through whom they enjoy the benefits of those rights and privileges; and it is a rule of common law, as well as of common sense, that females and infants should in this respect partake of the quality of those adult males who belong to the same class and condition in society, and of course they will or will not be citizens as the adult males of the same class are or are not so.

"Nor do we mean to say that it is necessary even for an adult to be a male citizen that he should be in the actual enjoyment of all those rights and privileges which belong to a citizen. He may not only not be in the actual enjoyment of those rights and privileges, but he may even not possess those qualifications of property, of age, or of residence which most of the States prescribe as requisites to the enjoyment of some of their highest privileges and immunities, and yet be a citizen. But to be a citizen it is necessary that he should be entitled to the enjoyment of those privileges and immunities upon the same terms upon which they are conferred upon other citizens, and unless he is so entitled he cannot, in the proper sense of the term, be a citizen."

Here is a full and I believe a fair statement of what constitutes a citizen. He must be in the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges of any other citizen.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I desire to inquire whether, when the fourteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution was under discussion in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, the gentleman himself, and other members of his party who took part in that discussion, did not concede the distinction between civil and political rights and privileges; and whether they did not also concede that this fourteenth article would not confer political rights upon the class intended to be benefited?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no recollection of anything of that sort, though it may be that some persons did make such a concession. I believe that gentlemen on the other side of the House generally claimed that it would confer such rights; and I cannot say but that some members on this side of the House may have disavowed that construction; but I was not one of them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire in this connection whether it was not conceded at that time that this fourteenth article recognized the existence on the part of the States of the right to regulate suffrage without the control of Congress, subject to the penalty that their representation in Congress might be curtailed if they should exclude from suffrage persons of a certain class?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will state my views on that point. Of course, I should not omit, in an argument upon this subject, the question suggested by the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.] I say, then, considering the first section of the fourteenth article of the amendments, that that section runs entirely in harmony with the previous provision of the Constitution concerning the rights of citizens. It is in harmony with the declaration made by the supreme court of the State of Kentucky, in the opinion from which I have just read, that it is an essential quality of citizenship that the citizen should enjoy the highest privileges that appertain to citizenship in the State or city of which he is a citizen. Therefore, when you prove to me that one man in the State of Kentucky votes for President, or for a Representative in Congress, or for members of the State Legislature, you have proved that every man having like qualifications of education or property has the same right. If you deny it to him you deny that to which by the Constitution he is entitled: the enjoyment of equal privileges and immunities as a citizen of the United States, and as a citizen of Kentucky in the State of Kentucky.

Then, sir, by the fifth section of the fourteenth article, Congress has power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the article. Does anybody doubt—in the presence of this provision of the Constitution, in view of the unlimited power under the fourteenth article to legislate so as to secure to citizens of the United States the privileges and immunities of citizens of any one of the States—does anybody doubt our duty?

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask, if by the first section of the fourteenth amendment it was intended to prevent the States from determining who should and who should not vote, why, when it provides that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States," it did not add, nor make discriminations among the citizens of the State itself in the exercise of the right of suffrage?

Mr. BOUTWELL. There was the plainest reason in the world. It was not necessary. The article provides, as it stands, that there can be no discrimination by the States among the citizens of the United States, who are as well citizens of the several States and entitled equally to the privileges of citizens.

I come now to the second section, upon which I know reliance will be placed by the opponents of the bill. It is there provided—

"SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

If gentlemen will consider these two sections together they will see how entirely in harmony they are with each other, and how wholly unsupported is the doctrine that there is in this second section any concession to a State to abridge or deny to a citizen the right to vote. By the second section there is a political penalty for doing that which in the first section it is declared the State has no right to do. I read the first section:

"SEC. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

It is here provided that there shall be no

abridgment of the privileges and immunities of citizens; and in the second section there is a penalty provided for a State that disregards the inhibition. We were then acting in the presence of the fact that many States of the Union were doing that which the first section declared they had no right to do. It was uncertain when Congress would exercise the power conferred by the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment, and in order that the States should not take advantage of their own wrong during the period while Congress might be inactive a penalty was provided. We knew that Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware were doing what they were inhibited from doing by the first section of the article, and we said that they should suffer in representation for so doing. Power was given to Congress to remedy this evil, and that power Congress is now called upon to exercise.

But, sir, consider the anomalous feature in our Government if the doctrine be successfully maintained that we cannot legislate on this subject. There are citizens in Kentucky and Maryland who, if the doctrine set forth by the opponents of this bill be a sound constitutional doctrine, are eligible to the office of President or Vice President of the United States, and yet who cannot vote for Representatives in Congress or even for a State, county, or town official. What is the qualification for the office of President? He must be a native citizen of the United States and thirty-five years of age. Nothing more. These are the only qualifications for the office of President. By the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution we have declared that all the black men in Maryland and other States shall be citizens of the United States. Certain State governments have for the present denied those people the right to vote, and yet one of them may be elected President of the United States and another Vice President. Is there such an anomaly in our Government? Are we prepared to admit its existence unless the Constitution imperatively requires it? The Constitution provides that any one twenty-five years of age, who has been a citizen for seven years, may be elected a Representative upon this floor, and colored men, although denied the right of suffrage in their own States, may be elected to legislate for the whole country. Thus is the General Government put in an anomalous and inconsistent position.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts has entirely ignored the question I put to him in regard to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. The question I desire to put is this: whether there is not in that amendment a distinct recognition of the existence of the power to regulate suffrage in the States themselves?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Oh, no; not the least.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I do not understand it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the right to vote for certain officers be denied or abridged, then certain political consequences follow; but in the first section there is a distinct declaration that this cannot lawfully be done. We only recognized the existing facts. We knew there were some States in which the wrong existed. It might require time before Congress could exercise its powers under the fifth section, and the country meant to say that while this state of things continued—a state of things unjust and contrary to the Constitution—the States should not have the benefit of their wrong doing.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. In view of the gentleman's position I ask him how it is possible that a State can disfranchise any citizen?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think they cannot properly or lawfully.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How can they ever cause this penalty to attach? How can they lessen their representation by any acts of their own?

Mr. BOUTWELL. A Legislature may do a thing which as matter of fact they are capable of doing, but which, considered in the light of the Constitution they have no right to do; and while we may have the power by which we can correct that misdoing, still not being in a condition to put that power in force we say meanwhile you shall not take advantage of your own wrong-doing.

This bill, then, is defensible, first on the original text of the Constitution; in which the subject of suffrage is considered; it is defensible upon the guarantee clause of the Constitution; it is defensible upon the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution; and it is defensible as the exercise of a necessary power in the Government. The power is essential to the existence and preservation of the Government itself; and was so regarded by the men who framed the Constitution of 1787.

Leaving the argument I come now to the presentation of certain reasons why we should pass this bill, and also submit the proposed amendment to the Constitution to the Legislatures of the several States.

Mr. PRUYN. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but as he has just stated that he has passed to another point, I would like to ask him, in view of his recent declaration, on what grounds the bill is defensible—whether he means that those grounds are cumulative or whether he would rest the whole on the original Constitution without the fourteenth article of amendment?

Mr. BOUTWELL. What I mean to say is, if either one of the three positions which I have taken is sound then the bill is defensible; that is to say, if my construction of the original provisions of the Constitution concerning the power of the national Government over the time, place, and manner of holding elections be correct, or if the power given to us under the guarantee clause of the Constitution be what I assert it to be, or if we rely exclusively upon the fourteenth article of amendment, that either of these constitutes a sufficient justification for what we now propose to do. But when we have the cumulative power—if it be possible to conceive of an accumulation of power in the Constitution—when we have the cumulative power of those three great provisions added to the supreme necessity of the case that the national Government should have the right to exercise those powers necessary for its own existence, I hold that there remains no longer a constitutional or logical reason why we should hesitate to act.

Mr. PRUYN. The statement is not quite satisfactory.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Before the gentleman proceeds to the consideration of the other matter I desire to have the benefit of his views upon a difficulty that occurs to my mind in his argument; not because I antagonize with the views he has presented, but simply that I may have the benefit of his views touching that difficulty. I understood the first proposition of the gentleman's argument to be substantially this: that if the Constitution had reposed in the States the unlimited power to regulate the matter of voting for Federal officers it would involve this mischief, to wit: that thereby the power would be placed in the States to withhold from the Government the election of Federal officers at all, and that that mischief might be fatal to the Government itself. Am I right in that statement?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Then the gentleman in passing to what is called the guarantee clause of the Constitution as the third point to be discussed, maintains that the clause operates as a limitation upon the power of the States to prohibit them from creating what the gentleman calls an aristocracy; in other words, prohibits them from confining the right to vote to such a number of people as that it would not be a republic. Now, the question that I wish to ask, and the difficulty in my mind that I wish the gentleman to remove is this, whether his last proposition does not destroy his first one, and whether, taking the two together, there is not found in the Constitution, in the guarantee clause, that very check upon the reduction of the representative franchise to such an extent as in his first proposition, he says, would or might overthrow the Government.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no difficulty in my own mind upon that point. The provision in the Constitution in the first article referred to relates exclusively to the subject of suffrage, and the second of the provisions which I have read, as I interpret it, gives to the General Government precisely that power over the subject of voting which the States themselves possess. When a difficulty arises in a State, relating solely to the matter of suffrage, we may legislate under and by virtue of these provisions of the Constitution and remedy that particular evil, but the provision in the Constitution in relation to the guarantee by the United States of a republican form of government to each State is a broader authority. It not only relates to the question of suffrage, including that, of course, but it also includes many other possible anti-republican evils or difficulties in a State. As for example the very case which the Supreme Court in the Rhode Island controversy suggested, that a State might establish a military government. Suppose they did so, as was done in France, by universal suffrage, it would be none the less an anti-republican proceeding, a military government antagonizing, superseding a republican government. We might not be able to reach it under the provisions of the first section of the Constitution relative to suffrage, and then we should be obliged to act under the great power vested in the United States to guaranty to each State a republican form of government. We could exert our power, political and military if necessary, to dispossess those people who through universal suffrage had taken military control of the State.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Still, Mr. Speaker, I fail to see how the difficulty is met by the proposition now suggested. If I understand what is now suggested, it is that the guarantee clause was meant to prevent more mischief or other mischief than the mere matter of the curtailment of the right of suffrage.

Mr. BOUTWELL. But includes that.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. And includes that too. But the difficulty still remains; I suppose, and I will repeat it; it is this: the first argument or proposition of the gentleman, which has exceeding force, taken by itself, is that if the power to regulate the matter of suffrage be left in the States unlimitedly, then he says the States have the power of the continued existence of the Government in their hands.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think I see more distinctly now what point the gentleman has in view.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. My point is this: is not that difficulty in your construction of this clause met and overcome by that which you concede to be included in the other clause?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no doubt about that; but then I can understand that in the work of framing machinery for a Government the Convention of 1787 could very properly have said: we will provide a special remedy for particular grievances or wrongs, to wit, we will give power of the General Government to make or alter any State regulation relating to the times, places, and manner of holding elections. The idea of investigating all the institutions of a State for the purpose of ascertaining whether its government is republican in form involves larger consequences than a mere inquiry as to whether the ballot is equally enjoyed by all the citizens of a State. They provided in the Constitution a special remedy for these particular difficulties, but in providing a larger remedy for other and greater difficulties they were in the nature of the case led to the use of language which included the subject of suffrage. But for the purposes of the particular inquiry in which we are now engaged, if the provision of the Constitution relating to the times, places, and manner of holding elections had been omitted and the guarantee clause included, we still should have had the necessary authority; or if the guarantee clause had been omitted and the provision relating to the times, places, and manner of holding elections had been included, we still should have constitutional power sufficient for the present exigency.

If I have made myself clear upon this point I desire now to pass to the consideration of those reasons operating upon my mind in favor of the passage of a bill, and the submission by joint resolution, also, of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. And I must speak very plainly, though my words may, as I anticipate they will, give opportunity for those who are opposed to this measure to indulge in criticism upon what I may say. Our object is to secure universal suffrage to all adult male citizens of this country. The power is in our hands, first, as a Congress, and secondly as a party responsible for what this Congress does. If we submit a constitutional amendment alone, we in a certain sense admit that the power for which I am now contending is wanting. More than that; there are but twenty-five States to which we at the present time could look for the ratification of this amendment. We have then to secure three other States in support of the proposition. We are to enter upon that work with a certain amount of prejudice against and traditional opposition to negro suffrage.

Sir, I doubt not that nine tenths of the Republican party of the country are in favor of manhood suffrage. One tenth of the party are not in favor of it, and they constitute the great obstacle in the way of perfecting this benign measure. For one, I am in favor of taking the responsibility of the position which we occupy. We are responsible for universal suffrage as one of the crowning measures of an administration of eight years' duration, to be continued for four years by the judgment of the people already pronounced. The great majority of the people—and in this connection I will say that by "the people" I mean those who on the 3d of November last supported General Grant for the Presidency—the great majority of them expect of us the consummation of this plan. We have at this moment the right and the power on our side. Why, then, not submit a bill alone? Because there is no provision in the Constitution by which the United States is denied the power of abridging the right of citizens to vote. There is, in the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution, a limitation upon the power of the States in that respect, but none upon the power of the United States. The amendment which we propose secures the people against any abridgment of their electoral power, either by the United States or by the States. In that alone there is sufficient reason to justify the amendment.

In the next place, although I am myself persuaded of the existence of the power, and that it covers all State officers, still a different argument may be made against the proposition to legislate in reference to State officers from that which can be made against the proposition contained in this bill. Exercising the power which we possess, we provide that members of the State Legislatures shall be elected by all the adult male citizens in the several States.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield to me at this point for a moment?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. If I have heard the gentleman aright, in the progress of his remarks he has said repeatedly that the drift of this proposition was to secure political power to the male adult citizens of the United States. Now, I would ask the gentleman if the proposed amendment as printed contains any such provision at all? Do I understand the gentleman aright as saying that the object is to secure the political power in the several States of this Union to the adult male citizens of the United States?

Mr. BOUTWELL. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I would call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this joint resolution as printed does not relate to the adult male citizens of the United States.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It does not speak of them as such. I do not desire now to discuss that particular provision of the proposed amendment. I will, however, listen at another time to any suggestion on that point the gentleman may desire to make, either in public or in private.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope I shall have the opportunity to move an amendment to this joint resolution, to improve its language.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Opportunity will certainly be given for amendment, as we desire to perfect this proposition.

If we rely exclusively upon a bill which when enacted is merely a law, and subject to congressional control and to all the vicissitudes of politics and changes of opinion, we cannot be assured of its fate in some future Congress. Therefore, if we have power to do what is contemplated in this bill, let us act. Having given to the colored people in several of the States the power to vote we have put into the politics of the country an element by which the amendment itself can be carried. I speak very plainly, because I have no processes in my own mind in reference to this or any other public measure which I am not at all times willing to disclose. There are one hundred and fifty thousand citizens of the United States who by this bill will be entitled to the elective franchise but who are now disfranchised—seventeen hundred in Connecticut, ten thousand in New York, five thousand in New Jersey, fourteen thousand in Pennsylvania, seven thousand in Ohio, twenty-four thousand in Missouri, forty-five thousand in Kentucky, four thousand in Delaware, thirty-five thousand in Maryland—who will rally to the support of this constitutional amendment if by the law they are enfranchised. These men have by the Constitution and by the judgment of the people of this country been declared citizens and entitled to all the rights of citizens. Now, in this struggle for the establishment of manhood suffrage in the country are we to decline the services of one hundred and fifty thousand men who are ready to do battle for us at the ballot-box in favor of human rights; not of their own rights merely, but of the rights of all men on this continent?

Sir, there can be no safety while we continue the wrong. If one hundred and fifty thousand black men may be disfranchised in ten States of this Union, if hundreds or thousands of naturalized citizens may be disfranchised in Rhode Island, where is the security? The foreigners naturalized in this country have acted under an opinion or impulse or prejudice against enfranchising the negroes; but when they see that their own class may be disfranchised, what security have they better than the negro who in Maryland is disfranchised? Some day or another the foreigners may desire to settle in South Carolina. South Carolina has a majority of black people. Suppose they disfranchise the natives of Ireland, or Germany, or the Scandinavian States. In view of such a contingency will the foreign citizens hesitate in this crisis when they have the power to settle this great question of human rights, not for negroes merely, but for white men? To white men born in this country, to white men born in other countries and coming here, as well as to negroes, there is no security while this great wrong continues. If we fail to act, and if, sir, there be a day of retribution for our omission to do our duty, as there has been a day of retribution for those men who omitted to do their duty upon another great question involving public crime, there can be no defense for us.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to inquire whether there is anything in this bill that will prevent any of the States from requiring of voters a property or an educational qualification?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not suppose there is. Mr. WELKER. Then the States may, under this bill, require such a qualification?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose they may. Mr. Speaker, there is a special duty which we owe to these black people. There is a special duty which we owe to the white people of the South. To day the blacks in the South are laboring under special disadvantages due to the circumstance that in Ohio and in other States of the North their kindred are not allowed to vote. When we shall have established universal manhood suffrage for the whole country we shall have given the black people in the South a position in the affairs of their respective States which they cannot command while their race is the subject of an unjust discrimination in other States of the Union. This question goes home as well to the white people of the South. Many of this class have been before a committee of this House asking for the removal of their political disabilities. I, for one, am not influenced by any resentment, by any malice, by any desire conceivable to myself, to delay for one moment their restoration to all the rights they formerly enjoyed. But, sir, I do not see how this House or this country can consent to relieve these men from their disabilities while those with whom they associate, and for whose conduct they are in some degree responsible, are oppressing our friends, the loyal men of the South.

Whenever we do justice to the black man in the North we improve his position, his capacity to take care of himself in the South. I know very well, from personal interviews with conservative men of the South, that to-day they are influenced in their opposition to negro suffrage by the fact that negro suffrage is not established in the old free States of the Union. The measures before us are a part of the great work of harmonizing the country, of pacifying all classes, of reconciling all interests.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican party must abide the judgment of posterity upon what it has done, but it must still move forward and consummate the great works it has undertaken. We need only courage, a fixed purpose to be just, with economy and honesty in administration. If to preserve our power in the country we are unjust we shall become timid. "Conscience doth make cowards of us all," and, becoming timid, the people will abandon us. Justice, honesty, economy, power on one side; injustice, timidity, ruin on the other.

Mr. BROOKS. I move the following amendments to the bill and joint resolution, in order to carry out the principles of the gentleman from Massachusetts and to do justice to millions of women:

Strike out the word "citizens" and insert "persons;" and insert before the word "race" "his or her;" and after the same word insert "sex, nativity, or age when over twelve years;" so the joint resolution and bill will read as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be held as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE.—

SECTION 1. The right of any person of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of his or her race, sex, nativity, or age when over twelve years, color, or previous condition of slavery of any citizen or class of citizens of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

A bill to secure equal privileges and immunities to citizens of the United States, and to enforce the provisions of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no State shall abridge or deny the right of any person of the United States to vote for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, or for Representatives in Congress, or for members of the Legislature of the State in which he may reside, by reason of his or her race, color, sex, nativity, or age when over twelve years, or previous condition of slavery; and any provisions in the laws or constitution of any State inconsistent with this section are hereby declared to be null and void.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That every person lawfully engaged in preparing a registry of voters, or in holding or conducting an election for any of the officers named in the first section of this act, who shall willfully refuse to register the name or to receive, count, return, or otherwise give the proper legal effect to the vote of any person entitled to vote for any officer named in the first section of this act, on account of his or her race, color, nativity, sex, or age, when over twelve years, or previous condition of slavery of such citizen, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $4,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall willfully hinder or obstruct, or attempt to hinder or obstruct any person on account of his or her race, sex, nativity, or age when over twelve years, color, or the previous condition of slavery of such citizen, in the exercise of his right to vote for the officers named in the first section of this act, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $3,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any person disqualified by section three of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and from whom such disability shall not have been removed by act of Congress, who shall exercise the powers and duties of any office therein specified, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and being convicted thereof shall be imprisoned and kept at hard labor for the term of two years; and an indictment for the same may be found at any time within ten years from the commission of the offense.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the district courts of the United States, within their respective districts, shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all offenses committed against this act, and the district attorneys, marshals and deputy marshals of the United States shall, and they are hereby specially authorized and required, at the expense of the United States, to institute proceedings against any person who shall violate the provisions of this act.

The amendments were ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move the following amendments:

In joint resolution, line nine, strike out the words "citizen of the" and insert in lieu thereof "inhabitant of and who has no residence other than in."

In the bill, section one, line three, strike out the word "citizen" and insert "inhabitant," and in line four, after the words "United States," insert "having no residence elsewhere than in the United States."

The amendment was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, as the other provisions of this measure will no doubt be fully and ably discussed by other gentlemen on this side of the House, I will confine myself in what I shall have to say, to the consideration of the fourth section of the bill, in connection with the third section of the fourteenth amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States, under which its enactment is not only sought to be justified, but claimed to be necessary. It is not my purpose, however, to enter into any discussion of the manner in which that amendment is said to have been ratified. I shall forego any remark upon the singular political phenomenon presented in the duplex character which has been ascribed to ten States of this Union—sovereign and coequal States when the concurrence of their will has been necessary to effect an alteration in the Federal compact, but subjugated provinces, prostrate and powerless at the feet of the conqueror, when it has suited the caprice, or the interest of a majority in Congress to annul their constitutions, dissolve their governments, abrogate their laws, destroy the harmony of their domestic relations, and rob their citizens of every guarantee in the Bill of Rights. I shall say nothing of the extraordinary means resorted to by the power which proposed this amendment, to secure its ratification according to the letter of the Constitution, and shall leave it to casuists of more subtlety and astuteness than I possess, to determine whether the spirit of that instrument has been consulted in the employment of those means. I shall not inquire whether Congress, for the purpose of procuring the formal ratification of a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution, can either justly or legally trample under foot the rights of a given number of States, throttle their governments, suspend or destroy their constitutions, strip their electors of the habiliments of citizenship, invest others with the elective franchise, create Legislatures, subservient to its will, and compel those Legislatures to give their assent to the amendment proposed under the penalty of having their respective States debarred from all participation whatever in the General Government, besides being deprived of the republican State governments guaranteed to them in the Constitution.

I shall not attempt to explore the sources of constitutional authority to ascertain whence it is claimed that the Federal Legislature derives such extraordinary powers; nor seek to determine the effect which such a condition of moral duress should have upon the validity of an amendment to the Constitution procured in such a manner. Still less shall I undertake to say that the course pursued toward several of the States of this Union to compel their ratification of this amendment has been consistent in every particular with the cardinal doctrine of the Declaration of Independence, that Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. But waiving a consideration of all these questions which have been already so often and so elaborately discussed by able intellects than my own, I will concede for the purposes of the argument I now propose to submit that this amendment has been duly ratified in accordance with both the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, and is to all intents and purposes, as much a part of that instrument as if it had been inserted in the original draft. As such it is nothing more nor less than a part of the lex scripta—simply a portion of the written law of the country; no more sacred, no more binding, and no more mysterious, either in effect or construction, than any other statutory provision passed in pursuance of the Constitution, although enacted by a different power and in a different mode from those pertaining to ordinary legislation, and it is consequently subject to the same rules that apply in the interpretation of all other statutes, and to no others.

I propose therefore to examine the third section of this amendment by the light of those long-settled canons of legal interpretation, which were recognized in the earliest dawn of our system of jurisprudence, and which have been adhered to and enforced by almost every enlightened jurist who has had occasion to advert to them from that time to the present moment. These rules are of the very essence of natural reason, and strict morality. They were ordained by the Divine Power when it endowed mankind with the capacity of discriminating between right and wrong. They are indicated by the plainest dictates of simple justice; and I undertake to say, sir, that no rational and unprejudiced mind can make a fair and impartial application of them to this section, without being satisfied that it has no retrospective operation at all, that it has no reference whatever to any person who was engaged in the late rebellion against the Government of the United States, but was intended to apply to those only, who should engage in rebellion or insurrection after its ratification. At any rate it so appears to my mind, and it is the truth of this particular proposition that I now desire to prove.

It is remarked by Dr. Lieber, in his Legal and Political Hermeneutics, that "every man, or body of persons making use of words does so in order to convey a certain meaning; and to find this precise meaning is the object of all interpretation." Hence the most natural and obvious of all the rules by which the rational mind seeks to ascertain the intention of the law-maker in the enactment of a particular statute, is the one so familiar to every member of the legal profession, that in construing a statute recourse must in the first instance be had to the words in which the legislative will has expressed itself. If they are plain and unambiguous, there investigation ceases. No matter what our own feelings, or convictions as to the policy, or expediency of the law may be; no matter what conclusions extraneous consideration might lead to, we are compelled to presume that the legislator meant what his words plainly imply, and we are not at liberty to go beyond them to determine the legislative intent, unless a rigid adherence to them would result in an absurdity, or palpably conflict with the context. This principle is abundantly sustained by authority. Vattel, in discussing the rules for the interpretation of treaties; book 2, chapter 17, section 262, says:

"The first general maxim of interpretation is, that it is not allowable to interpret what has no need of interpretation. When a deed is worded in clear and precise terms, when its meaning is evident, and leads to no absurd conclusion, there can be no reason for refusing to admit the meaning which such deed naturally presents. To go elsewhere in search of conjectures, in order to restrict or extend it, is an attempt to elude it."

The same rule was clearly, and concisely stated by the Supreme Court of the United States as a cardinal principle of legal construction in the case of the United States vs. Fisher and others, reported in 2 Cranch, page 358, in this language:

"Where a law is plain and unambiguous, whether it be expressed in general or limited terms, the Legislature should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and consequently there is no room left for construction."

But, sir, in all the vast number of cases, both in this country and in England, which I have examined upon this point, and which affirm the rule as I have stated it, I have nowhere found it more beautifully, more fully, or more forcibly and clearly expressed, than by the court of appeals of New York in Newel vs. The People, 3 Seld., 97; from which I will read the following.

The court says in this case:

"Whether we are considering an agreement between parties, a statute, or a constitution with a view to its interpretation, the thing we are to seek is the thought which it expresses. To ascertain this, the first resort in all cases, is to the natural signification of the words employed, in the order and grammatical arrangement in which the framers of the instrument have placed them. If thus regarded, the words embody a definite meaning which involves no absurdity, and no contradiction between different parts of the same writing; then the meaning apparent on the face of the instrument is the one which alone we are at liberty to say was intended to be conveyed. In such a case there is no room for construction. That which the words declare, is the meaning of the instrument, and neither courts, nor Legislatures, have a right to add to, or take away from that meaning."

But, sir, this principle has frequently been declared by the highest judicial authority known to our Government, to apply to the Constitution of the United States, as well as to every other statute, or instrument of writing whatever; for, as I said awhile ago, there is no good reason why the Constitution should be interpreted according to any other rules than those which apply to all other statute law. Chief Justice Marshall, the great original expounder of the Constitution of the United States, the splendid judicial luminary whose effulgence gilded the morning of our constitutional history and whose lingering beams will fringe the twilight of its existence, himself repeatedly so applied it. Here, in the case of Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, (4 Wheaton, 202) he says:

"It is well settled, that the spirit of the Constitution is to be respected no less than its letter, yet that spirit is to be collected chiefly from its words, and neither the practice of legislative bodies nor extrinsic circumstances can control its clear language."

Again, the same illustrious jurist and statesman, in the later case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, (9 Wheaton, 188) says:

"As men whose intentions require no concealment, generally employ words, which most directly, and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the patriots who framed our Constitution, and the people who adopted it, must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense, and to have meant what they said."

I might go on, sir, and cite authorities to this effect almost indefinitely; but taking it for granted that no impartial legal mind will question the correctness of the principle I have stated, that the meaning of a written law must in the first place be determined, if possible, from the words in which it is expressed, and that when they are plain, we are not at liberty to resort to extrinsic facts and circumstances to discover what the law-maker might have intended, I will ask attention to the words of this particular section, and see if we cannot, without the aid of any extraneous circumstance whatever, ascertain from them the idea they were intended to convey. The section reads as follows:

"No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States or under any State, who having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid and comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability."

Now, sir, if there is any obscurity in this language, it is not in the signification of the terms employed, but results, if at all, from the great number of words which the draftsman thought it necessary to use in enumerating the several positions and offices from which certain persons shall be excluded, and the various circumstances under which such persons are supposed to have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. When the text is analyzed the words will be found to have a plain and definite meaning, about which there can be no dispute; and, sir, it should be distinctly observed that the terms here made use of to denote the time of the commission of the criminal act for which the guilty party is to be disfranchised under this section, are the words "shall have," for these two words afford a key by which we can determine infallibly, whether this section was intended to be an ex post facto law or not. If in their plain and ordinary acceptation they denote an action which had taken place before the time at which they were employed in this connection, then this section was manifestly intended to operate retrospectively, but if, on the contrary, they signify, as here used, an action which is to transpire after they are made use of, then the section is as clearly prospective, and can have no reference to any one who had engaged in rebellion before it was enacted.

They must, however, refer to one or the other—the past or the future. They cannot refer to both. For, sir, in every mind capable of forming a conception of time at all, there are three distinct ideas—as distinct, in fact, as three things can possibly be—under one or the other of which the mind naturally and instinctively ranges every action, event, or condition of things of which it is capable of taking notice. I mean the ideas of the past, the present, and the future; and as words are the means devised by human reason, whereby the ideas of one mind may be clearly and distinctly manifested to another, every language spoken upon the earth must of necessity furnish signs by which these ideas of the past, the present, and the future may be unmistakably distinguished from each other, and these signs can no more be confounded with each other than the ideas themselves. If they could be, language would cease to have any definite signification, and degenerate into simply unmeaning jargon. Particularly is this true of written language, which may be said to be crystalized thought—ideas not only manifested but fixed, and made tangible and permanent, so as to reflect themselves without extraneous aid in whatever mind may be sufficiently instructed to read them, and more especially when those ideas are designed, as in this instance, to affect the most valued interests of the citizen, and the highest concerns of society.

What then, sir, does the expression "shall have engaged," as used in this section, mean? Does it refer to an action which had taken place before the enactment of this amendment, or to one that was to take place after its ratification? Now, if we assume that the intentions of those who proposed, as well as those who ratified this amendment required no concealment, that they aimed to use the words which would most directly and aptly express the ideas they intended to convey, and that they meant what they said, we are forced to the conclusion that they had no reference to past transactions at all; because if they had they would have said "no person shall be a Senator, &c., who has engaged in rebellion, &c.," or if they had intended to limit it to the late rebellion they would have said "no person shall be a Senator, &c., who engaged in the late rebellion, &c.," or if they had intended that the section should embrace both the past and the future, they would naturally have said "no person shall be a Senator, &c., who has engaged or may hereafter engage in rebellion," &c. And in either case their language would have been so plain "that the way-faring man, though a fool, need not err therein." The simplest child in the land could not mistake it.

But here, sir, instead of using any of these plain and simple expressions, which the most ordinary intellect in the country could not fail to understand as relating to the past, they employ a term to express the time of the criminal action which common usage, the established practice of our best speakers and writers, the authority of every standard author upon the philosophy and etymology of the English language, and the very nature of the language itself, concur in appropriating exclusively to the expression of our ideas of future action, and which never has been, and never can be employed to denote a past transaction without violating the plainest principles of common reason. Lindley Murray, and every other standard, or even respectable writer on English grammar, tell us in substance, if not in so many words, that "shall have" is the sign of the second future tense, which "denotes a future action, or event which will be accomplished at or before the time of some other future action or event;" and I challenge the production of a solitary instance in the entire range of our standard literature in which these words "shall have" have been used convertibly with any of the past tenses. And moreover, sir, if you will search the classic literature of any other cultivated language, ancient or modern, you will not find an instance in which the equivalent of these words has ever been used to express the idea of a past action; they always denote the future, and can no more be used to denote the past, than "to-morrow" can be employed to signify "yesterday," or the word "black" to convey the idea of "white." It is not only idle, but insulting to the reputation of those who framed this amendment, to say that they were so ignorant of the plainest principles of our language that they could not have made this section so clearly retroactive that it could not have been misunderstood by any child in the country if such had been their intention. To show that they could have done so if they had desired to, I would simply call attention to the very section for which this was finally adopted as a substitute. I will read it:

"Until the 4th day of July, 1870, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving it aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Representatives in Congress and for electors for President and Vice President of the United States."

This is the language of one who had nothing to conceal, who meant what he said—the language of Thaddeus Stevens. No one can mistake it, however simple he may be. But why, I would ask, was not the section under consideration, made to refer to the past in like pointed, plain, and unmistakable terms, if such had been the intention of the learned and distinguished men who framed it?

Now, had the framers of this section said "no person shall be a Senator, &c., who shall engage in rebellion, &c.," they would have expressed their idea it is true, but not with the strictest grammatical accuracy, for the word "shall" as there used refers to the unlimited future, without reference to any other future action or condition whatever; so that a man might really be a Senator and be guilty of rebellion, both in the future, for he might rebel after being a Senator, which although not within the intent is within the meaning of the language used. But if we will keep in mind the true definition of the second future tense, as laid down by all our grammarians and sanctioned by universal usage, that the words "shall have," when prefixed to a word denoting an action, indicate that the action will take place in future, and at or before the time of some other future action; and then imagine a wise and just legislator who would frame an act to disfranchise persons guilty of rebellion, in terms of the strictest grammatical accuracy, and at the same time avoid the most unjust, odious, and detestable of all tyrannical acts, ex post facto or retrospective legislation, we shall find him using language like this: "No person shall be a Senator, &c., who shall have engaged in rebellion," &c. For the expression "shall have engaged," &c., conveys two distinct ideas: one that the party to be disfranchised shall commit the offense for which his disqualification is to be the penalty, after the enactment of the law, and before another future act or condition, namely, his offer to assume the position or office for which his offense disqualified him.

Here, sir, it seems to me, the whole argument might rest; for if the principles I have stated be true, that men whose intentions require no concealment, will naturally imply the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, especially when those ideas are to constitute a new rule of civilization by which the highest interests of individuals and the gravest concerns of society are to be regulated and controlled, and that therefore the law-giver, where his words are plain, must be presumed to have intended what he said, regardless of whatever conclusions extraneous considerations might lead to, we are compelled to conclude that this section was intended to operate prospectively, and not as an ex post facto enactment. There is no possible escape from this, unless we are to assume that our language—the language of Shakespeare and of Milton, of Burke and of Webster, of Locke and of Bacon, of Blackstone and of Kent, the language of poetry, of eloquence, of philosophy, and of law—after all, furnishes us no adequate means of discriminating between the past and the future, but in its exceeding paucity exhibits the pitiable paradox of expressing two ideas as dissimilar as day and night by the use of the same term.

I must be pardoned, sir, for dwelling at such length upon a point which to the intelligent mind, it seems to me, must be too obvious to demand more than a simple statement; but I have deemed it necessary in this instance, because so many highly cultivated minds have hurried to the conclusion, that this provision is ex post facto, without having apparently had due regard, if indeed any whatever, to the peculiar verbiage in which it is expressed, and because I find, in a case to which I shall presently more particularly advert, that one of the barons of the exchequer, by a singular inattention to the rudiments of our language, was led to say that the expression "shall have" referred to the past tense; while another was guilty of the still stranger inaccuracy of supposing that they expressed the idea of both the past and future; notwithstanding which, however, the court held the language to be prospective only, and not retrospective.

But, sir, suppose we admit, for the sake of the argument, what is as absurd as to say that the same word may convey the idea of hot or cold, black or white, north or south, or any two opposite extremes, namely, that "shall have" may mean the past or the future, the question still recurs, which does the expression mean in this instance, the past or the future? Had this question been asked of some proud old civilian who gloried in venerating the remnants of right and justice which had survived the wreck of the ancient republic, at a time when the will of the prince under the despotism of the Roman empire was paramount to every obligation whatever, he would have gathered his toga around him in the conscious dignity of a just and upright man, and answered it in the language of the code:

"Leges et constitutiones futuris certum est dare formam negotiis, non ad facta præterita revocari, nisi nominatim et præterito tempore et adhuc pendenti negotiis cautum sit."

Had it been asked of Bracton, when our own system of jurisprudence was yet in its infancy, and the great cardinal principles of right and justice which have since made it the pride and glory of the Anglo-Saxon race, were struggling with ignorance, with despotism, and rapine, and outrage of every kind, he would have answered it in the words of that maxim, which wise and conscientious jurists have esteemed a fundamental rule of construction from that time to the present moment:

"Nova constitutis futuris formam debet imponere, non præteritis."

How, then, should it be answered by the jurist and statesman of America, who, in the advanced civilization of the nineteenth century, feels a just pride in the purity of his country's Constitution and the justice of her laws? Sir, the reply is obvious. There is something so repugnant to the commonest instincts of justice, so contrary to all our notions of morality, so revolting to every sentiment of honorable manhood, in the idea of inflicting a penalty upon our fellow-man by retroactive legislation, that even to deprive him by such means of the most insignificant right has ever been regarded as the very essence of the accursed spirit of despotism. It has, therefore, become a settled rule of legal construction, steadily adhered to both in England and this country, that no law is to have a retrospective operation, unless the intention of the legislator that it should so operate appears so plainly upon the face of the statute that it cannot possibly have any other meaning. This is no new principle peculiar to the jurisprudence of this country. It was plainly and emphatically recognized in the civil law, as is evident from the very maxim I have just quoted from the code:

"It is certain that the laws and constitutions are to present a form for future transactions, and not to be referred to matters already finished, unless specially named and (as) of a preceding time as a caution to those which are yet pending."—Code L. i. tit. xiv. sec. 7.

It was also an article in the constitution established for the French republic in 1795, that no law, criminal or civil, could have a retroactive effect; and the same limitation was laid down as a fundamental truth in the code in force under the sanction of the empire which succeeded, atrocious as the despotism of that empire is said to have been. It is no matter of wonder, then, that Sir Edward Coke should have reaffirmed the aphorism of Bracton, which is a substantial embodiment of the same great principle, as he did in his commentary upon the statute of Gloucester, or that the English courts, which so frequently thrust themselves as the last defense between the aggressions of the Government and the rights of the citizen, should have so constantly and persistently insisted upon the doctrine I have asserted as a cardinal rule of construction.

Blackstone, in his commentaries, treats it as a first principle, that all laws shall commence in futuro and operate prospectively; and if we go back to the reign of Charles II, in 1678, we will find the court of king's bench, in the case of Gilmore vs. Shuter, unanimously refusing to give a retrospective effect to a provision in the statute of frauds, because such a construction would make the act repugnant to common justice.

Again, if we examine the more modern case of Couch vs. Jeffries, in 4 Barrell, 2460, we will find the same court unanimously refusing to give a retrospective effect to a statute, because by so doing they would punish the plaintiff with costs. It is true, sir, there seems to have been an apparent departure from the principle in one or two cases in the Common Pleas and at Nisi Prius, but those cases were all reviewed in a comparatively recent case decided in the court of Exchequer, in which they are not only severely criticised but emphatically declared to be erroneous. I allude to the case of Moon vs. Durdan, reported in the second Exchequer reports, page 22, which fully sustains the doctrine for which I contend. This was an action brought on a wager, but before the trial an act of Parliament was passed providing—

"That no suit shall be brought or maintained in any court of law or equity for recovering any money or valuable thing alleged to be won upon any wager, or which shall have been deposited in the hands of any person to abide the event on which any wager shall have been made."

I read the very words of the statute, sir, because, it will be observed, they present a text very nearly parallel to that of the section we are considering; and it was contended that this statute operated to defeat the action. The court held, however, that it did not. But some of the learned barons lay down the rule I have stated so much more clearly and forcibly than I can myself, I will read from their opinions. Baron Rolfe says, after reciting the clause, I have read from the statute:

"The effect of this clause is to make void all wagers, and to prevent the bringing or maintaining any action for the recovery of money won on any wager; and the only question is whether its operation is retrospective, so as to affect past transactions and existing suits. The general rule is stated by Lord Coke in the second Institute—Nova constitutio futura formam imponere debet non preteritis—and the principle is one of such obvious convenience and justice, that it must always be adhered to in the construction of statutes, unless in cases where there is something on the face of the enactment putting it beyond doubt that the Legislature meant it to operate retrospectively."

Baron Alderson says, in the same case:

"In construing statutes the general rule, as it seems to me, which ought to guide us in their construction is that which has been stated. They are not to be supposed to apply to a past but a future state of circumstances."

Then further down, after giving instances in which a departure from the rule would work great mischief, he says, in conclusion:

"Here, no doubt, the Legislature were desirous of putting an end to gaming and wagers; but unless the words imperatively require it, we ought not to make their prohibition retrospective, for it is contrary to the first principles of justice to punish those who have offended against no law, and surely to take away existing rights without compensation is in the nature of punishment."

I will simply pause, sir, to ask if this principle is so sacred and important that one of the most learned courts that ever graced the English bench refused to give a statute a retrospective meaning, simply because by so doing they might deprive a set of gambling sharpers of the gains of their nefarious calling, we, as statesmen, are to consider this section in such a light as to sweep away without trial, the most important rights that can pertain to the citizen in society?

But, sir, a still more determined opposition, if possible, to giving statutes a retrospective effect has been manifested by the courts of this country than by those of Great Britain. The judges of the Supreme Court of the United States have several times spoken in the strongest terms of disapprobation of all retrospective laws which may affect a right. In the case of Calder and wife vs. Bull and wife, (3 Dal., 386,) the first, I believe, in which a distinction was drawn by that court between ex post facto laws and other varieties of retrospective legislation, Mr. Justice Patterson uses this language:

"I had an ardent desire to have extended the provision of the Constitution to retrospective laws in general, for there is neither policy nor safety in such laws, and therefore I have always had a strong aversion against them. It may, in general, be truly observed of retrospective laws of every description that they neither accord with sound legislation nor the fundamental principles of the social compact."

And in the later case of Ogden vs. Blackledge, reported in 2 Cranch, page 272, they considered the point too plain for argument that a statute could not retrospect so as to take away a vested civil right. The same doctrine was laid down by Chief Justice Story in Prince vs. United States, reported in 2 Gallison, 204, and has been affirmed in a great number of cases in the supreme courts of the various States in the most unequivocal terms. For instance, in Maine, in the case of Hastings vs. Lane, reported in 3 Shepley, page 134; in New Hampshire, in Woart vs. Winnick, 3 N. H., 481, and in Clark vs. Clark, 10 N. H., 386; in Vermont, in Briggs vs. Hubbard, 3 Vt., 86; in Massachusetts, in Somerset vs. Dighton, 12 Mass., 383; Medford vs. Learned, 16 Mass., 215, among others; in Connecticut, Perkins vs. Perkins, 7 Conn., 558; Plumb vs. Sawyer, 21 Conn., 351; and several other cases; in New York, in the case of Dash vs. Van Kleeck, 7 John., 477; Watkins vs. Haight, 18 John., 138; Sayer vs. Wisner, 8 Wend., 661, and quite a number of others; in Pennsylvania, in the case of Tyson vs. School Directors, 51 Penn. State R., 9; in Ohio, in the case of Allbyer vs. State, 10 Ohio N. S., 588; Indiana, State vs. Barber, 3 Ind., 258; in Illinois, in Thompson vs. Alexander, 11 Ills., 54; Price vs. Schuyler, 4 Gilman, 221; in Wisconsin, in the case of Atwood, 11 Wis., 422; in Iowa, in Bartruff vs. Renny, 15 Iowa, 257.

Of course, sir, I cannot in the limited time allowed me advert particularly to all of these cases, nor do I deem it necessary. I mention them merely that those who have a mind to, may examine them for themselves and see how sedulously our courts have adhered to the rule I am endeavoring to discuss. But there is one of them to which I will ask attention, because it has been cited as a leading case in many of the others into which the language of the distinguished judges has been copied, but mainly because the most profound and elaborate opinion in it was delivered by one of the purest men, as well as one of the most learned and upright judges that ever adorned the bench of this or any other country—a man whose memory will be revered and whose genius and acquirements will be admired as long as enlightened jurisprudence has a votary on earth. I allude to Chancellor Kent, who was then Chief Justice of the court, and the case is that of Dash vs. Van Kleeck, reported in 7 Johnson, page 477.

It is not necessary that I should enter into a statement of the facts of the case, and besides I have not time if I would, but I desire to read simply the principles laid down by the learned judges, for they confirm and place beyond controversy the view for which I am now contending. Mr. Justice Thompson, after having reviewed to considerable extent the authorities upon the very point I am now endeavoring to discuss, says:

"If such be the light in which retrospective laws ought to be received, how unjust the imputation against the Legislature that they intend a law to be of that description unless the most clear and unequivocal expressions are adopted!"

And Chief Justice Kent says in the same case, page 502:

"The very essence of a new law is a rule for future cases. The construction here contended for would make the statute operate unjustly. It would make it defeat a suit already brought upon a right already vested. This would be punishing an innocent party with costs as well as divesting him of a previously acquired right. Nothing could be more alarming than such a subversion of principle. A statute ought never to receive such a construction, if it be susceptible of any other, and the statute before us can have a reasonable object and full operation without it. We are to presume, out of respect to the law-giver, that the statute was not meant to operate retrospectively, and if we call to our attention the general sense of mankind on the subject of retrospective laws it will afford us the best reason to conclude that the Legislature did not intend, in this case, to set so pernicious a precedent. How can we possibly suppose that in so unimportant a case?"

"The Legislature coolly meant the prostration of a principle which has become venerable for the antiquity, and the universality of its sanction and is acknowledged as an element of jurisprudence?"

"It is a principle in the English common law as ancient as the law itself, that a statute, even of its omnipotent Parliament is not to have a retrospective effect."

Again, further over, on page 504, he says, after reviewing the authorities furnished by the civil law:

"Our constitutions do not admit the power assumed by the Roman prince, and the principle we are considering is now to be regarded as sacred. It is not pretended that we have any constitutional provision on the subject, nor have we for numerous other rights dear alike to freedom and justice. An ex post facto law, in the strict technical term, is usually understood to apply to criminal cases, and this is its meaning when used in the Constitution of the United States. Yet laws impairing previously acquired civil rights are equally within the reason of that prohibition and equally to be condemned."

"We have seen that the cases in the English and in the civil law apply to such rights; and we shall find upon further examination that there is no distinction in principle nor any recognized in practice between a law punishing a person criminally for a past innocent act, or punishing him civilly by depriving him of a lawfully acquired right. The distinction consists only in the degree of the oppression, and history teaches us that the Government which can deliberately violate the one right will soon cease to regard the other. There has not been, perhaps, a distinguished jurist or elementary writer within the last two centuries who has had occasion to take notice of introspective laws, either civil or criminal, but has mentioned them with caution, distrust, and disapprobation."

Then further down, after a most elaborate and critical review of the authorities upon the point, he concludes:

"This train of authority, declaratory of the common sense and reason of the most civilized States, ancient and modern, on the point before us, is sufficient, I apprehend, to put it at rest, and to cause not only the judicial but the legislative authority to bow to such a sanction."

And in this conclusion I presume every intelligent and impartial mind will concur.

Now, this section can have a prospective construction perfectly consistent with reason and justice, and in full harmony with the sense of all eminent and enlightened jurists for centuries past. If it is to be considered as applying only to the future, it may be with propriety regarded as a wise and just measure by which no one can be injured, for whoever shall engage in rebellion hereafter, will do so with full notice of the consequences beforehand, and if he sees proper to hazard these consequences, he can complain of no one but himself should they be visited upon him. Admitting, then, that the language of this section may be ambiguous, and may be considered as referring to the past or the future indifferently, to which, in the light of all the authority to which I have adverted, will we limit it? Will we assume to say for the Legislatures of twenty-seven States of this Union, as well as two thirds of each House of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, that they deliberately intended to prostrate a great principle, recognized as one of the fundamental elements in every enlightened system of jurisprudence upon the earth, and venerable not only for its antiquity, but the universality of its sanction? And shall we do this, too, in defiance of their plain words, in the face of all the authorities I have adduced, and in violation of the plainest dictates of natural justice, or will we give this section such a construction as accords with reason, with authority, with humanity and justice?

But, sir, these principles I have stated, and which I presume no intelligent mind will dispute, founded as they are in reason, and verified by such an irrefragable array of authority, acquire an accumulated weight when we come to consider this section in the light of another rule, which is as familiar to every legal mind as the alphabet, and which applies in this instance with peculiar force. I mean the well-settled rule, that penal statutes are always to be construed strictly, so that no one shall incur a penalty, unless the act which subjects him to it is clearly within both the spirit and the letter of the statute imposing it. For I imagine no one will have the hardihood to deny that this section is highly penal in its character. To say that a man may be deprived of all right to participate in the Government of his country, either State or Federal; that he may be singled out from his fellow-men and degraded in the political scale below the horse thief, the highway robber, and the midnight assassin, and yet suffer no punishment from his degradation, is worse than absurd; it is an insult to common sense. We had as well say that it would be no punishment to him to rob him of his property, deprive him of his liberty, or deny him any of the privileges of a member of society. So sacred has this rule ever been held that as far back as the reign of Edward VI we find it settled, that the law will rather endure that a particular offense should escape without punishment than it should be violated, and for the soundest reason too; for, as Chief Justice Best says in the case of Fletcher vs. Lord Sondes, (3 Bingham, 380:)

"If these rules be violated the fate of accused persons is decided by the arbitrary discretion of the judge, and not by the express authority of the law."

And must this rule, so wise, so just, so essential to the safety of the citizen, and so long established, be swept away with everything else in order to give this section a retrospective effect contrary to its plain meaning and the common sense of all mankind?

But, sir, passing from a consideration of the mere letter of the law, should we find that ambiguous, the next most obvious and natural means of ascertaining the will of the legislator is to explore the context and construe the whole instrument together, so that its various provisions may harmonize with each other; or, as Blackstone expresses it in the first book of his Commentaries, page 60:

"If the words happen to be still dubious we may establish their meaning from the context, with which it may be of singular use to compare a word or a sentence whenever they are ambiguous, equivocal, or intricate. Thus the preambles are often called in to help the construction of an act of Parliament. Of the same nature and use is the comparison of a law with other laws that are made by the same legislator that have some affinity with the subject or that expressly relate to the same point."

Considering this section, then, as a part of the Constitution, let us examine it by the light of other provisions contained in that instrument.

I have already alluded to the unqualified disapprobation, and disgust with which the wisest statesmen, and most enlightened jurists of all civilized countries have universally regarded every variety of retrospective legislation affecting previously acquired or existing rights; and, sir, it is not surprising that the people of these States after they had cut themselves loose from the monarchies of the Old World, and come to lay the foundations of a Federal Union, and Government, in which liberty should be protected, and justice administered according to the most enlarged views of enlightened jurisprudence, sought to protect themselves and their posterity from the detestable and dangerous engines of tyranny which had so often cursed the country from which they had just separated. With the long list of bloody attainders, and atrocious instances of retrospective legislation, which had disgraced the history of many of the older Governments of the world, fresh in their memories, they undertook to demonstrate the great problem that a Government might be established and sustained for the benefit of the governed, without a resort to any of those barbarous and inhuman measures justified under the specious plea of necessity by tyrants who claimed their prerogative by divine right. Consequently we find the wise and patriotic statesman to whom they assigned the duty of drafting the Constitution of the Government they designed to establish providing in the ninth section of the first article of that instrument, that—

"No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

This was intended as a limitation upon the powers of the General Government they were proposing to erect; but so thorough was their abhorrence and detestation of this iniquitous character of legislation that they provided in the very next section that "No State shall pass any bill of attainder or ex post facto law;" and when the people of the several States ratified the Constitution they, by that act, pledged their faith to each other, in the most solemn and emphatic manner, not only that the Federal Government should never enact such odious and despotic laws, but that the individual States would not themselves. And more than this, sir, as if this were not a sufficient safeguard to the rights of the citizen, or a sufficient expression of the utter detestation in which they held such inhuman acts, thirty of the States whose constitutions I have examined, and possibly some others whose constitutions I have not seen, have incorporated the same prohibition in the most pointed and emphatic terms in their own organic laws.

Now, I do not pretend to say, sir, that the Legislatures of three fourths of the States of this Union have not the power, according to the letter of the Constitution, to pass an ex post facto law under the guise of a constitutional amendment, should such a thing be proposed by two thirds of both Houses of Congress. They might even go further, and in the same manner abrogate the entire Bill of Rights, rob the people of a whole section of the country of their property without compensation, destroy the coördinated departments of the Government, and concentrate all its powers and functions in the same person, or do any other despotic and revolutionary act, and there would be no remedy for those affected by such tyrannical action except resistance, to be resorted to at their peril. But I do say, sir, that no such thing could be done without a most palpable and infamous breach of the faith solemnly pledged by the people of the several States to each other in their ratification of the Federal Constitution. And I say further that no ex post facto law could thus be passed unless two thirds of both Houses of Congress should ask the States to do what the Constitution declares they shall not do, and which they severally, by their ratification of that instrument, pledged themselves not to do.

Shall it be said then, sir, that Congress has placed itself in the questionable attitude of asking the State Legislatures to violate the faith thus solemnly pledged, or that the Legislatures of three fourths of the States have violated that faith by acceding to the proposition? Who will say that those who proposed, and those who ratified this amendment have deliberately said to the despotisms of the Old World, our plan of a just and free Government is a mistake, and a failure? Your engines of oppression, your sanguinary bills of attainder, your atrocious ex post facto laws are all right, in proof of which and that the fact may never be disputed we have placed upon the face of our Constitution one of the most glaring instances of sweeping retrospective legislation in the annals of the entire world can produce. Who will have the hardihood to contend that the Legislatures of twenty-seven States of this Union deliberately intended to do what their own State constitutions, the Constitution of the United States, and the common sense of mankind concur in condemning as immoral, unjust, and oppressive? Who will say that the American people ever consented to see one of the most conspicuous and venerable landmarks of liberty and justice thus removed from their Constitution? Yet, sir, we must admit all this if we insist that this section shall have a retroactive operation. For if retrospective at all, it comes clearly within the definition of an ex post facto law, as understood by the profession for centuries past; and if its framers meant that it should be so construed, they deliberately intended to incur all the imputations I have mentioned—imputations which for one I can never get my consent to make.

But again, sir, if we turn to section two of article second of the Constitution we will find that it confers upon the President the unlimited power of granting reprieves and pardons for all offenses against the United States except in cases of impeachment. This provision sprang from the noblest impulses of the human heart, the heaven-born sentiments of mercy and forgiveness, the remnants of pristine purity and perfection which survived the fall of the human race; and a similar power has been exercised by every Government that has ever existed on earth, savage or civilized, free or despotic. We know, too, that the President, in the exercise of this benign prerogative, extended the full and unconditional clemency of the Government, both by special pardons, and by proclamations of amnesty, issued in pursuance of acts of Congress, to many of those who will be affected by this amendment if it is to be construed retrospectively, long before it was even proposed, much less ratified by the States; and we know, moreover, that many of such persons have accepted and now hold offices under their respective States. Now, what the effect of such pardon was upon the political and social status of the recipient I will let the Supreme Court of the United States say. If gentlemen will turn to the case ex parte Garland, 4 Wallace, page 380, they will find the language which I will now read:

"The inquiry arises as to the effect and operation of a pardon, and on this point all the authorities agree. A pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offense and the guilt of the offender, and when the pardon is full it releases the punishment and blots out of existence the guilt, so that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense. If granted before conviction it prevents any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction from attaching. If granted after conviction it removes the penalties and disabilities, and restores him to all his civil rights. It makes him, as it were, a new man, and gives him a new credit and capacity."

Or if this will not do I will read from another authority, which I presume, will not be questioned in this House. I will quote from one who was the acknowledged autocrat of his party, whose intellect was always clear and incisive, and whose words were always deliberate and pointed. I allude to the late Hon. Thaddeus Stevens. In the debate upon the resolutions reported from the joint Committee on Reconstruction, for which this amendment was finally adopted as a substitute, Mr. Stevens said, in answer to a question by the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE:]

"I will answer that question. I do not know if the gentleman is a lawyer, but I suppose he has examined this question. A pardon, whether by the President having power or specially by act of Parliament or Congress, extinguishes the crime. After that there is no such crime in the individual. A man steals; he is pardoned; he is not then a thief, and you cannot call him one; or if you do you are liable to an action for slander."

Again, he says:

"The law says that a man convicted of felony shall not testify. You call him as a witness; the objector shows his conviction, and he shows his pardon, and he is no felon."

But, sir, we find no exception made in this section, of any recipient of executive clemency whatever. If it applies to one, it applies to all of the class mentioned, without a solitary exception; and if retrospective in its operation it amounts to a cool and deliberate recantation of the forgiveness extended under the beneficent power of pardon, in the name of the people of the United States, and in which their honor was most solemnly pledged. This is the conclusion, sir, from which no logic can absolve you. You cannot escape from it. The people of the United States, through their constitutional agent, extended their gracious pardon to these persons, saying: "Here, accept this; it destroys your guilt; it gives you a new credit in society; it makes the past oblivion; it restores to you every right of the most unoffending citizen." Yet if this section is retrospective it reaches out the strong hand of despotic and vindictive power, and snatches from the poor, defenseless recipient the priceless boon of forgiveness bestowed upon him by a generous and magnanimous people.

It may not be unjust to the reputation of the mob who howled around the palace of Pontius Pilate, clamoring for the blood of our Saviour, to suppose that they, in the heat of excitement, might have done such a thing; but who will dare to make such an insinuation against the honor and manhood of the Congress of the United States and of the Legislatures of twenty-seven States of this Union? I imagine, sir, that those who voted for this amendment would exclaim, with indignant scorn upon such a foul allusion, "What! is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" Yet, sir, every man who contends that this amendment is retrospective accuses all who were concerned in its enactment of this atrocious disregard of moral obligation and pledged faith; but as for me, I never can believe they intended thus to incur the reproachful criticism of mankind through all coming time. Never, sir; never!

But, sir, if we will go back to the preamble we will find the people of the United States solemnly declaring that the very first great object for which the Constitution was ordained, after the formation of a more perfect union, was "to establish justice." And now I would ask if this amendment was intended to give the lie to this solemn protestation of a great and virtuous people? Or did those who enacted it have such a contemptible opinion of the common sense of mankind as to suppose they would believe that justice is to be established by overthrowing, and trampling under foot its most cardinal principles? Did the Legislatures of twenty-seven States mean to say, that justice was to be established by the enactment of just such a law as is twice condemned in the Constitution of the United States, and again in the constitutions of thirty States of this Union, as unjust and oppressive? Did the Legislature of New Hampshire mean to say that the twenty-third section of their own bill of rights, which declares that "retrospective laws are highly injurious, oppressive, and unjust, and no such laws, therefore, should be made, either for the decision of civil causes or the punishment of crimes" is a lie, and that the way to establish justice and "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity" is by enacting just such laws as this clause in their own State constitution declares to be "highly injurious, unjust, and oppressive?" Did the Legislature of Massachusetts intend to say that this declaration in their own State constitution was a mistake:

"Laws made to punish for actions done before the existence of such laws, and which have not been declared crimes by preceding laws, are unjust, oppressive, and inconsistent with the fundamental principles of a free Government?"

I repeat, sir, did the framers of this amendment, or any of those who ratified it, suppose that the way to "establish justice" was to place upon the face of the Constitution itself an instance of injustice and tyranny excelling in atrocity even the despotic freak of Caligula, when he wrote his laws in small characters and hung them on high pillars, the better to ensnare the people? I say excelling in atrocity this strange freak of oppression, for the subjects of the Roman despot might by extraordinary means have ascertained the legislative will and governed themselves accordingly; but here the tyrant's vengeance, locked in his own bosom until the auspicious moment, is launched like a thunderbolt from a clear sky upon the unsuspecting victim while he is reposing with confidence under the ægis of his country's pardon.

But, sir, I never will believe that the makers of this law intended it to operate retrospectively. The reasons against such a conclusion are to my mind so overwhelming that, whatever others may choose to do, I will not do such injustice to their integrity and wisdom as to entertain it for a single moment.

"I will not do them wrong; I rather choose
To wrong the dead, to wrong myself and you,
Than I will wrong such honorable men."

But, sir, notwithstanding the words of this section have clearly a prospective meaning, and cannot be otherwise construed without a gross violation of the plainest principles of our language; notwithstanding the well-settled rule of legal construction, which compels us to abide by the words of a statute when they are plain; notwithstanding the universally recognized rule, that where the words leave it in doubt whether the law was intended to be retrospective or not we must out of respect to the lawgiver and the general sense of mankind always construe it as prospective; notwithstanding we cannot construe this section retrospectively without making it shamefully inconsistent with other provisions in the Constitution, as well as with the entire scope and genius of our Government; notwithstanding we cannot so construe it without making it the engine of the grossest injustice and oppression; notwithstanding we cannot give it such a construction without violating the pledged honor of the people of the United States, and ignoring the plainest dictates of common humanity—notwithstanding all this, I say, I may still be told that we know, and the country knows that this section was designed to disfranchise those who were engaged in the late rebellion; but, sir, this is simply a plain petitio principis—a mere begging of the question. For how do we know it? And how can we determine the intention of its makers, except by the means I have indicated? I may be told that the necessity of the occasion demanded that it should be so; but, sir, I deny it. I can well see how the experience of the late civil war may have taught our people the necessity of providing more stringent penalties for those who may engage in rebellion in future, for the dread of such penalties may tend to prevent the commission of the offense; but it is impossible for me to conceive how it can be necessary to create a new punishment for an offense which has already been committed. It cannot cure the wrong already done, nor will it tend to prevent its repetition in future. On the contrary, with no interest in or affection for a Government which deprives him of the rights which it accords to the felon reeking with crime, fresh from the cells of the penitentiary, and exasperated by the manifest injustice of such a punishment, the victim of it would only have fresh reasons for revolt. Besides, sir, in a Government like ours, whose paramount object it is "to establish justice," it can never be necessary to do injustice to any one.

"'Twill be recorded for a precedent,
And many an error, by the same example,
Will rush into the State."

Gentlemen should not forget that the inventor of the guillotine was himself a victim to the offspring of his own ingenuity, and that the precedents they establish may recoil upon themselves or their posterity.

Again, sir, I may be told that we know this section was intended to operate retrospectively, because such is the prevalent opinion in the country, which nobody disputes but myself. I am aware that the passions of the human heart have been stirred to their lowest depths by the late terrific civil war, and that the troubled deep has not yet been calmed. I know, too, in the general expectation of witnessing a grand exhibition of vengeance, the still small voice of justice is to a great extent unheeded; but are we, sir, to close our eyes upon the language of the written law of the country, and seek the legislative will in the crude impressions of the excited multitude? If so, I have nothing more to say. We are already in the vortex of anarchy, and it is idle to talk of law.

But, sir, it may be said that the debates upon this amendment in Congress show it to be retrospective. Apprehend, however, that no lawyer will take such a position, for although I have not time now to analyze the cases which verify it, I presume no gentleman of any respectable attainments in the profession will dispute me when I state it as a well-established rule, that for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the Legislature, no extraneous fact prior to the passage of the bill which is not itself a rule of law, or an act of legislation, can be inquired into, or in any way taken into view. If the speeches made in the Legislature which enacts a law are to control the plain words of the statute, then it is nonsense to reduce laws to writing at all, but all should be left to collect the legislative intent from the debates. And besides, while we may ascertain the views of those who participate in the discussion from the speeches made by them, we must at last rely upon the words of the statute itself for the ideas of those who take no part in the debate, for in that way only they choose to express their will. But it is a sufficient answer to all this to say that Congress did not make this law. It required the concurrent action of the Legislatures of twenty-seven States, embracing, perhaps, over two thousand different minds to give it the effect it has; and how have these Legislatures expressed their wills except by the simple words of the section itself?

And finally, sir, it may be insisted that this section should be regarded as having a retrospective effect because this Congress has so considered and acted upon it in numerous instances; but if gentlemen will recur to a passage I read a while ago, from the case of Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, they will find this point already answered by Chief Justice Marshall. I will repeat what he says:

"It is well settled that the spirit of the Constitution is to be respected no less than its letter, yet that spirit is to be collected chiefly from its words, and neither the practice of Legislatures, nor other extrinsic circumstances can control its clear language."

He made use of this language in reply to the position that the State insolvent laws did not conflict with the constitutional prohibition upon laws impairing the obligation of contracts, because such laws were supported by the unbroken practice of the State Legislatures for thirty years. And he says further:

"But if, in any case, the plain meaning of a provision, not contradicted by any other provision in the same instrument, is to be disregarded because we believe the framers of that instrument did not intend what they say, it must be one in which the absurdity and injustice of applying the provision to the case would be so monstrous that all mankind would without hesitation unite in rejecting the application."

That is to say, sir, no difference what we may believe to have been the motives and intentions of the framers of this section, from extrinsic circumstances, if the language of the section is plainly prospective in its terms, and if giving it such a construction will not render it inconsistent with other provisions of the Constitution, we are bound to regard it as prospective unless such a construction would be unhesitatingly pronounced by all mankind to be unjust, absurd, and monstrous.

Now, sir, if my reasoning has been correct, it must follow as an inevitable conclusion that the fourth section of the bill under consideration is not only unnecessary, but that it must lead to the most mischievous consequences, as it must of necessity, should it become a law, subject a large number of our citizens, who I consider it no disparagement to the gentleman from Massachusetts to say are as honorable and as well disposed toward this Government as either he or myself, besides cumbering our courts with a vast number of irritating and vexatious actions which cannot fail to promote discord, bitterness, and bad feeling wherever they exist without producing any good results. And I will add, sir, without any disrespect to any one, that it seems to me to be singularly cruel and unjust to subject men who honestly and conscientiously believe they have a perfect legal right to the offices they now hold, to a criminal prosecution for discharging the duties of those offices before their right to do so has been judicially denied.

I have now, sir, endeavored to discuss this question strictly from a legal stand-point; to consider it as I hope and trust it will be considered by a wise and upright judiciary should it ever be brought before the courts of the country. And if I have been tedious in the array of legal principles I have attempted to make it is because those principles are "like apples of gold in pictures of silver"—the calm and dispassionate opinions of wise and just men whose positions elevated them above the influence of passion and party strife, and who expressed them under every obligation which honor, morality, and religion could impose to speak the truth, maintain justice, and defend the right. Some of these principles may have occasionally been departed from, it is true, at a time when the division line between the great powers of Government were but feebly drawn and imperfectly understood, but such departures have never failed to be severely reprehended by all just and good men, and I think I may safely say that I have stated no legal proposition that may not now be considered the settled law of the land.

But I know, sir, that few if any, have had the temerity to venture upon the ground I occupy in regard to this question, and I may be ridiculed for groping amid the somber catacombs of the law while others are basking in the blaze of new and brilliant theories of government, but like Richelieu, "I appeal to time." When the passions and the prejudices of this hour shall have been forgotten, when some subject of the future empire shall look back upon the days of the old Republic when liberty was protected and justice administered by law, or when, as I would rather hope, our Government shall have reared again the ancient landmarks of the Constitution, and then, and perhaps not till then, will my position on this question be vindicated.

"Returning Justice lift aloft her scales,"

Mr. CULLOM obtained the floor.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask unanimous consent to move to recommit the bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency in relation to the resumption of specie payments.

Mr. BARNES. What is it?

Mr. LYNCH. It is a bill that has been made a special order.

No objection being made, the bill was recommended.

Mr. LYNCH. I move to reconsider its commitment; and I give notice that I shall call up the motion to reconsider on Monday next after the morning hour.

NEW MEXICO INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs submitting estimates of appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the Indian service in New Mexico; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

WILLIAM H. NEWMAN AND COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, leave was granted for the withdrawal of the papers filed and referred with House bill No. 902, to authorize the payment of the claim of William H. Newman & Co. and L. A. Van Hoffman & Co., of New York city.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. PRUYN. I ask leave of absence for four days, on account of the death of a relative; and also that I may have printed in the Globe hereafter, as part of the debates, the views which I hold on the bill and joint resolution which have been under discussion to-day.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

EMPLOYÉS IN PENSION BUREAU.

Mr. HARDING. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to report to the House of Representatives without delay the names of all clerks, messengers, and copyists who have been discharged from the Pension Bureau, Department of the Interior, since the adjournment of Congress in July, 1868; the numbers and names of all clerks, copyists, messengers, and laborers appointed in said bureau during that period, stating their actual place of residence, by whom recommended, the amount of compensation they now receive, how many were in the United States Army, and if any one of said clerks, messengers, copyists, or laborers have either served in the rebel army or have given aid or comfort to the so-called confederate States; also the amount of the contingent fund of the Pension Bureau that has been expended since the said adjournment of Congress in July, 1868, and for what purpose, stating the names and cost of all articles which cost over fifty dollars, and of whom purchased.

Mr. BROOKS. I think I must object to this persecution of the clerks.

MILITARY ROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. ANDERSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1762) to amend an act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES P. EARL.

Mr. BARNES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1763) for the relief of James P. Earl; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

JOHN AND WILLIAM MATTINGLY.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House the reasons why he pardoned John and William Mattingly, tried in circuit court, Kentucky district, in October, 1867, for having whisky in possession with intent to remove the same without payment of tax, convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of $32,000.

Mr. BROOKS. That is a Kentucky and not a New York matter. I object.

SUFFRAGE.

Mr. CULLOM resumed the floor.

Mr. SHANKS. If the gentleman will give way I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CULLOM. Before I do so I desire to state that a part of the remarks which I intend to make are not entirely pertinent to the subject under discussion to-day, and I would like to have the unanimous consent of the House to make them, so as not to be called to order upon that point. I should, of course, be subject to whatever rules the House may enforce as to any other point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Let him have it.

No objection was made.

Mr. SHANKS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BANKS: The petition of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, of New York city, praying for the passage of an act giving them the right of appeal from the judgment of the consular court at Yokohama, Japan, in the case of the steamer Hermann.

By Mr. COBB: The memorial of William H. Downs and others, citizens of Richland Centre, Wisconsin, on the subject of naturalization.

By Mr. COOK: A petition of the professors and faculty of certain medical colleges in the city of New York, and resolutions of the class of Bellevue Hospital Medical College, praying for the passage of a bill for the reorganization of the medical department of the Navy.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: A resolution of the council of the city of Cincinnati, asking for an appropriation to purchase a site for a custom-house and post office in said city.

Also, a protest from the saw manufacturers of Cincinnati, against an increase of duty on steel as proposed in House bill No. 1849.

By Mr. HAUGHEY: A memorial of the General Assembly of Alabama, asking a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Eufaula to Guntersville, in that State.

By Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts: The petition of John S. Burnell and others, praying for legislation protecting persons engaged in navigation from illegal exactions.

By Mr. JULIAN: A petition of 168 citizens of Dayton, Ohio, praying that in any proposed change or amendment of the Constitution of the United States to extend or regulate suffrage there shall be no distinction made between men and women.

Also, a petition of 49 citizens of Clyde, Ohio, praying the same.

Also, a memorial of the General Assembly of Alabama, asking congressional aid for the improvement of the Warrior river, in that State.

By Mr. ORTH: A petition of citizens of Warren county, Indiana, asking for the passage of a law preventing frauds in elections.

By Mr. ROBINSON: The petition of Osborn & Cammack, George C. Peters, Shepherd Knapp, and many others, for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate, in the harbor of New York.

By Mr. WARD: A petition of leading citizens of Steuben county, New York, in favor of the restoration of Commander R. S. May to the active list in the Navy.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 25, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday last was dispensed with.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of Hon. ALEXANDER RAMSEY, chosen by the Legislature of Minnesota as Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1869; which were read and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating an estimate of appropriation required to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the Indian service in New Mexico for the years ending June 30, 1866, and June 30, 1867; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, documents relating to the claim of Cowan & Dickinson for cotton taken for the defense of Knoxville, Tennessee; which was, on motion of Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, referred to the Committee on Claims.

WESTERN MILITARY CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the amendment to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 404) providing for the disposition of certain papers relative to military claims accruing in the Department of the West.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What order will the Senate take with reference to this bill?

Mr. GRIMES. I think the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] had charge of that matter, and as he is not present I suggest it lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie on the table.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN a member of the committee of conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 941) to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy and Marine corps.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Mary A. Lincoln, widow of the late Abraham Lincoln, who was assassinated while President of the United States, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Governor of Indiana, communicating a report of the sales made by that State of the land scrip received from the United States under the act of July 2, 1862, relative to agricultural colleges, and the appropriation of the proceeds of such sales; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of Rowland Cromelien, praying that he may be granted the right of way for an air-line railway to be laid under his patent from Washington, District of Columbia, to Annapolis, Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of Dr. Edward Delafield, president, Drs. Willard Parker, John T. Metcalf, T. M. Markoe, and others, professors and students of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of the city of New York, in favor of the bill for the reorganization of the medical corps of the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Augustus W. Puchard, of Boston, Massachusetts, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FERRY presented the petition of Littleton R. Edwards, praying the removal of political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRAGIN presented a petition of Dr. Cyrus B. Baker, of Claremont, New Hampshire, a contract surgeon in the Army during the late rebellion, asking that a pension may be granted to him; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Benjamin C. Stone, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of Nicholas K. Trout, praying the removal of the political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of members of the Clarksburg, West Virginia, bar, remonstrating against the removal of the circuit court of the United States for the district of West Virginia to Wheeling; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of Richard Charles Downes, praying the removal of political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARLAN presented the petition of Stark B. Taylor, bailiff of the Court of Claims, praying an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of merchants of New York, remonstrating against any new legislation to extend or renew the franchises of the Commercial Navigation Company; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1666) to repeal "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," to report it back with an amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to know the nature of that amendment. Will the Senator be good enough, to state it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state it, if the Senate desire it, although it occupies time to do so.

Mr. SUMNER. I merely wish to know the substance of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The substance of it is, that it leaves the heads of Departments, those gentlemen who are commonly called the Cabinet, subject to removal by the President during a recess of the Senate at his own will and pleasure. All other officers may be suspended by the President during a recess of the Senate, in his discretion, without requiring him to have specific evidence, as it is thought the old law did require, although I do not think that is the proper construction of it. That is the whole substance of the reported amendment.

I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 774) to amend an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, to report it back, and to move that it be indefinitely postponed, because the subject is covered by the amendment which we have reported to the other bill.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 811) to provide for the reduction of the military forces, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1487) to declare and fix the status of the corps of judge advocates of the Army, reported it with amendments.

Mr. ABBOTT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Brevet Brigadier General Orlando Brown, late captain and assistant quartermaster United States volunteers, praying to be relieved from all liability for property expended under General Orders No. 46 issued by General BUTLER for the issue of public property, reported a bill (S. No. 830) for the relief of Orlando Brown; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 752) to incorporate the Washington Market Company, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, recommending an appropriation for the purchase or rent of a building for the accommodation of the clerical force in the offices of the Commissioner of Pensions and Commissioner of Patents, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 204) relating to the Department of the Interior; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up Senate joint resolution No. 202 for consideration.

Mr. CONNESS. I object, this morning.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee. What is the resolution?

Mr. HOWARD. The resolution is entitled a resolution more effectually to secure the faithful completion of the Union Pacific railroad and its branches, according to law.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will lie over for to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion cannot be entertained at this time, objection being made.

SENATOR FROM GEORGIA.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of Joshua Hill as Senator from Georgia, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That Joshua Hill, claiming to be Senator-elect from Georgia, ought not now to be permitted to take a seat in this body.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the report be printed, and in the mean time the resolution, with the credentials, can lie on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to present my own separate views, as a minority of the committee, in that case. I do not agree with the majority report. I submit in writing my reasons for disagreeing with the majority, which I ask shall take the same course as that given to the majority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That course will be taken and that order made if there be no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, it was my intention also to submit a minority report upon the credentials of Mr. Hill as Senator from Georgia, but my health during the past week has been such that it was impossible for me to prepare it. I shall desire to present my views, however, which do not agree with those of the majority of the committee, when the case shall come up for consideration.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 647.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not in order at present.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 831) relating to the supreme court of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROSS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 205) authorizing the diversion of certain moneys appropriated for and belonging to the Kansas tribe of Indians; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 206) relating to the mileage of Charles Westmoreland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to call up, merely for the purpose of reference, House bill No. 65, for the relief of William McGarrahan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that bill was postponed indefinitely at the last session.

Mr. MORTON. I understand that, but I do not understand that that kills the bill. I do not understand that that prevents its being taken up at this session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to advise the honorable Senator that he cannot take up that bill and have it referred without a controversy.

Mr. CONNESS. It cannot be taken up anyhow. It does not belong to the business of the session.

Mr. MORTON. Well, Mr. President, I hope that my motion will not be disposed of in that very summary way, by saying "it cannot be taken up anyhow."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said it could be taken up and referred; but I supposed from the honorable Senator's remark that he presumed there would be no objection, and that therefore it was proper to proceed with its consideration at this time. I only wish to notify the Senator that if he proposes to take up that bill and recommit it to another committee there will be discussion. That is all.

Mr. MORTON. It is true that this bill was postponed at the last session, and perhaps it is proper that there should be some remarks made about it.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to inquire if it was postponed indefinitely?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. What, then, I inquire of the Chair, is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not had time to consider this question, but believes that according to the practice of the Senate an indefinite postponement disposes of the bill, and it is not before the Senate. The bill now referred to has gone back to the House of Representatives, where it belongs, it being a House bill, and is not now before the Senate. That is the opinion of the Chair, but the question is rather new.

Mr. MORTON. I call the attention of the Chair to the twenty-first joint rule, adopted in August, 1848, which is as follows:

"After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of Congress all bills, resolutions, or reports, which originated in either House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined in either House, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place."

I suppose that under the operation of that rule, if it means anything, it would be proper to take up this bill at this session on motion. That is the construction which I have given to it, and which others have given to it. If the Senate has ever come to a different conclusion, has ever given a practical construction to this rule otherwise, I do not know it.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will allow me to make a suggestion. I do not know of any objection to his offering a bill precisely like that which he wishes to take up, and moving its reference; but it seems to me that the rule which he has just read does not apply to this case. It seems to me that this bill has been definitely disposed of by the Senate and is not now pending. I do not wish to discuss the matter. I should not have interfered at all if I had not once submitted a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill which is pending. I did not press my motion in opposition to this case. I supposed that this was a mere formal matter, and that the bill would be referred without any discussion. It seems that cannot be done, and I hope the Senator will allow me to urge on the motion which I submitted some time ago.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the Senate Committee ought to have an opportunity to consider this bill. If the disposition of it is to be regarded as final, it was not under such circumstances as enabled an understanding of it by the Senate, and if the Chair can regard it as undisposed of finally I think it will promote the right. That is my impression about it. I had supposed that a vote indefinitely to postpone was a vote to postpone for that session, and that the business would be in the control of the body at the next session, provided a final adjournment of the Congress had not in the mean time taken place. There is no rule of the body that has taken this business away from the Senate; on the contrary there is a rule of the body that keeps it before the Senate for the purpose of consideration at this session, provided the vote indefinitely to postpone is not a vote against the bill upon its merits, which cannot be reviewed except upon a motion to reconsider. I have not understood that force to be given to a vote of indefinite postponement. It is but a postponement. It is not a vote upon the merits, as I conceive, and therefore I hope the motion of my colleague can be heard by the Senate. I think it will be well that this bill shall be considered by another committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is new to the Chair, but the inclination of his mind is that indefinite postponements in the Senate have been considered as a final disposition of the matter. The Chair is aware that there is a joint rule which continues bills from session to session of the same Congress where they are undisposed of; but in the Senate, though not aware that the precise case now presented has arisen directly, the Chair believes that an indefinite postponement has always been treated as a final disposition of the subject-matter. But the question is an important one, and the Chair instead of deciding it will refer it to the Senate to decide; and the question for the Senate will be, whether the motion now to take up a bill that was indefinitely postponed at the last session is in order.

Mr. SUMNER. As there is a question of order involved in that motion, or at least a question with regard to the usage of the Senate, I desire to say that while I have regretted, with such knowledge as I have, that the motion for indefinite postponement of this bill was made and acted on by the Senate, I do not see any way to rectify it now during the present session. I believe that a motion to postpone indefinitely, when made and carried, is what the name implies, an indefinite postponement of the measure. It takes it, I should say, for the existing Congress out of the jurisdiction; it is a final disposition for that Congress. So I have always regarded the rule, and such I believe to have been the practice. Were the question presented in any other form, were the proposition that the bill should be introduced again, I should favor it; but I do not see any way of reviving the old bill; it is a corpse; I do not think it can be resuscitated.

Mr. SHERMAN. Jefferson's Manual lays down a rule which I think settles the matter. The Senate uses a different mode of postponement from that which is used in Parliament, and Jefferson in stating the equivalent motions says that a parliamentary postponement indefinite is equivalent in the Senate to a postponement to a day beyond the session, and that is all he says about it. It would seem that that modifies the general effect of a motion to postpone. A motion to postpone indefinitely in the Senate is simply equivalent to a motion to postpone to a day beyond the session. Jefferson treats them as equivalent motions, as will be seen by reference to his Manual, at page 198 of the compilation in my hand.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, this is an important question, and the intimations of the Chair and of the Senator from Ohio are a little different from what I have usually understood the rule to be. I have some extracts here which I will read on this point:

"Indefinite postponement is peculiar to our legislative assemblies; and the nearest proceeding to it which could take place, according to the forms of Parliament, would be to discharge the order for its consideration on a particular day without renewing it."—Cushing, 1335.

"The motion to postpone indefinitely is of American origin, and peculiar to legislative assemblies in this country, in which it is used. In the House of Representatives it is provided by a rule that when a question is postponed indefinitely, it shall not be acted upon again at the same session."—Cushing, 1336.

"If they wish to suppress a bill for the whole of that session, they postpone it indefinitely. This quashes the proposition for that session."—Jefferson's Manual, 143.

"When a question is postponed indefinitely, the same shall not be acted on again during the session."—Barclay, 36; House Rule, 142.

"In the Senate if they wish to suppress it for the whole of that session, they postpone it indefinitely."—Barclay, 95; 3 Hatsell, 183.

The result according to parliamentary law of an indefinite postponement is to arrest any further action on the proposition at the same session, and carry it to the next session, and hence the twenty-first joint rule becomes applicable. It seems to me that that is the principle of parliamentary law generally, and it is the rule of convenience in one sense. What is imported by the words "a motion to postpone indefinitely?" According to the understanding of that rule by all the parliamentary authorities, that disposes of the subject for the session, but for no longer period; and without going over the forms of referring the subject again to a committee and having a report of the committee, the result of the parliamentary law seems to be, and I think it is consistent with good sense, that at the next session the subject may be taken up as though it had not been acted upon at all, as unfinished business of the preceding session.

I have not referred to the rules of the House of Representatives to see whether they have a special rule relating to the subject or not, but as quoted in the extracts which I have read the rule of the House is specifically that a motion to postpone indefinitely prevailing only disposes of the subject for that session, and that is confirmatory of the parliamentary law as quoted from Jefferson's Manual.

Well, Mr. President, if the Senate have no express rule upon that point, and the House has, there ought to be as much homogeneity as possible between the proceedings and rules of the two Houses. The fact, then, that the House of Representatives has provided by a definite rule that the effect of this motion prevailing shall be simply to postpone the subject for the session, and leave it to be taken up at the next session, in the absence of any rule of the Senate on the subject we ought to conform to the rule of the House; and, according to the quotation I have read from Jefferson's Manual, that seems to be the effect and the principle of the general parliamentary law.

Sir, it seems to me that a motion to postpone indefinitely is not equivalent to a rejection. The latter is a specific motion referring to the merits of the proposition, and to the whole of its merits. Where that motion is made and prevails there is a specific judgment of the body against the merits of the proposition, and it stands rejected until it is renewed according to the forms of parliamentary law; but where the motion is not to reject, but simply to postpone indefinitely, it is not an equivalent motion; because many members of the Senate might be willing to vote for an indefinite postponement who would not vote for a specific motion to reject. It seems to me that the parliamentary law, as it is referred to in these extracts, and the fact of a positive rule upon the point existing in the House of Representatives, to which for convenience the Senate ought to conform if it has not a rule of its own, ought to lead the Senate to the decision that such a motion as that prevailing only disposes of the subject for that particular session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. When I first looked at this question, my attention having been called to it, I had the same impression which seemed to prevail with other members of the Senate, that a motion to postpone indefinitely, if it prevailed, was equivalent to the rejection of a bill. I, however, took a little pains to examine the authorities on the subject, and I came precisely to the conclusion, on seeing those authorities, to which the Senator from Kentucky has arrived, that that was an entire misapprehension, and that under the parliamentary law the effect was simply to postpone the bill so that it could not be acted upon at the session at which the motion was made and prevailed. If that is the case—and that was the conclusion to which I came, and about which I think, on looking at the authorities, there can be no doubt—the result is that this bill is simply unfinished business, business which we did not finish at that session, but postponed the consideration of, so that it could not be again considered at that session. The result of that is that under our general rule the bill comes over to this session as unfinished business, and may properly be called up as it has been called up by the honorable Senator from Indiana.

I was glad to come to that result in my own mind simply for the reason that on looking at some of the papers in the case, which I was requested to do, I became convinced that Mr. McGarrahan had labored under a misapprehension, which had arisen from conversation and a letter of one of the committee that considered the bill. He had every reason to believe that the bill was to go over to this session in the ordinary course of business. Any one would draw that inference from the letter which was written, and which is in print, on the subject from one of the committee. He was requested or advised to get other testimony, and he left with a design to get other testimony, on the strength of what may be called an implied assurance that the matter was not to be considered until he had had an opportunity to obtain it. Under those circumstances, leaving the city, and leaving the matter in nobody's charge, and it being a matter of very great and vital importance to himself—whether he is right or wrong I do not undertake to say—it happened that on the very last night of the session the subject was called up and the bill indefinitely postponed without any objection or any understanding certainly on the part of those, if there were such, who had looked into Mr. McGarrahan's case and believed that he was right. As he was evidently taken by surprise, however innocently it might have been done, and however properly it might have been done, it is no more than right, if within the rules his bill can be considered fairly, that it should be considered before the Senate; and, believing it to be entirely within the rule, I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, inasmuch as Mr. McGarrahan has sent a circular around the Senate complaining of bad treatment, and there has been a great deal said about his case, and inasmuch as I have been complained of by Mr. McGarrahan in connection with the case, before this motion passes from the Senate I desire to review the claim sufficiently to let the Senate understand its general characteristics; for I believe there never was a bill before this body with regard to which there was such an erroneous impression prevailing. I think it due to the committee who made the report that that report should be first read. I wish to have it read as a part of my remarks, and then I shall have further remarks to make with regard to this subject. I want the whole transaction brought before the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the merits of the bill will not be discussed on the motion now before the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. The merits of the bill have been alluded to, and the fact that Mr. McGarrahan has been badly treated and advantage taken of him has also been alluded to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken; the merits of the bill have not been alluded to by me, and I believe I am the only one who has spoken of it. All that I said was in relation to the manner in which it was disposed of. I said I had no opinion upon the merits of the bill itself. I did not go into the merits of it, and if the Senator does he must not plead the example of anybody else.

Mr. STEWART. The two Senators from Indiana have stated that they thought the bill deserved consideration on its merits, and did not like the way it was disposed of.

Mr. MORTON. I did not say so.

Mr. STEWART. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. MORTON. But I will say so if I get the opportunity.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the report of the committee read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And then let the report that was made in the House of Representatives be read also.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; and then I shall have some remarks to make on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that the preliminary question of order had better be settled first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers were all sent back to the House of Representatives with the bill. According to our practice, where there is an indefinite postponement the bill and accompanying papers go back to the House in which it originated, and the papers in this case have gone there.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the twenty-first joint rule read. I think that will settle the matter.

The Chief Clerk read the twenty-first joint rule, as follows:

"21. After six days from the commencement of a second or subsequent session of Congress all bills, resolutions, or reports which originated in either House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined in either House, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place."

Mr. SUMNER. I had proposed to call the attention of the Senate to that joint rule, which seems to me to govern this case. I observed a moment ago, when I was up, that so far as I was aware the unbroken usage of the Senate had been to treat the indefinite postponement of any measure as a final disposition of it by that Congress, not merely by the session in which the motion prevailed, but by that Congress. I had never looked at the books to see to what extent in their language they sustained what I thought was the usage of the Senate, but my attention has been called to this twenty-first rule, which, at the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, has now been read by the Secretary, and it seems to me that it governs this case. By that rule—

"All bills, resolutions, or reports which originated in either House, and at the close of the next preceding session remained undetermined in either House, shall be resumed and acted on in the same manner as if an adjournment had not taken place."

The operative words of that rule which are applicable to this case are "remained undetermined." When the motion to indefinitely postpone is made and carried does not that determine the question? Can you say afterward that the matter which has been indefinitely postponed has "remained undetermined." I submit that you cannot, and I submit further that this rule is possibly the secret, if I may so express myself, of what I believe has been the invariable usage of the Senate. I am not aware that any matter indefinitely postponed has been revived during the same Congress. I may be mistaken. That I give as my recollection, and I now adduce this rule as sustaining the usage.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The words of the rule, "remained undetermined," must of course be construed with reference to what the immediate phrase means. For instance, if, as the Senator assumes, on the ground that he does not recollect anything to the contrary, an indefinite postponement means a rejection, then he is right; it is then definitely determined. But if the true construction of the phrase "indefinite postponement" is not rejection, but a postponement to another session, then it does remain undetermined, for it goes over to be determined at the next session. So that the phrase "remained undetermined" must be taken with reference to the operation of the motion to indefinitely postpone. That the honorable Senator does not remember anything to the contrary does not prove what the true construction of this indefinite postponement is—what it means. I remember no case, either, and perhaps there has been none since the Senator from Massachusetts and myself have been members of the Senate; but that proves nothing except that this is the first time that the question arises. I stated that I had the same impression. It was because when a matter is indefinitely postponed it is usually the case that by common consent it is a matter that should not be further considered, and therefore the question has not arisen. But has the Senator been able to point us to any precedent? Has he been able to discover anywhere a decision that goes the length of saying that an indefinite postponement of a bill is a rejection of that bill? Not at all. Neither is it within the memory of any Senator; neither is it to be found in any book. On the contrary, in all the books it is found that this proceeding, being peculiar to this country, the universal reading of it is that it only carries a bill over to the next succeeding session, and does not determine it. That cannot be overcome by the want of recollection of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, or my want of recollection, or anybody else's. The question is, has the question arisen and been determined? If it has not, now is the time to determine it on a motion which properly presents the question itself.

Mr. CONNESS. The determination of this question does not rest with the memory or the want of knowledge on the part of my honorable friend from Massachusetts, as stated by the Senator from Maine, because there is no want of that kind. There is a rule on the subject—a rule that illustrates and explains what indefinite postponement in the Senate means. What is the rule? It is a rule of universal usage, namely, that the other House, the body in which a measure originates which has been indefinitely postponed, are always informed by a message, an official communication, that the bill, giving its number, has been rejected or indefinitely postponed, as the case may be. We do not inform the House, nor does the House inform the Senate, when a bill is postponed to a day certain, when it is referred to a committee for consideration, or when it is in any of the stages by which it is before the body. But when it is definitely disposed of, when the Senate has said that they will postpone it indefinitely, which means to postpone it to a day after the session, which is not a legislative day, and therefore a day upon which it dies and has ceased to be, then an official communication is sent by the body that does that act to the body in which the bill originated, informing them of that form of rejection. I will ask the Chair or the Clerk, familiar with the proceedings of this body, whether there has ever been an exception to that official information being conveyed?

I have no objection to the reintroduction of this bill. I facilitated for Mr. McGarrahan when his bill was before this body the most thorough examination of the subject; and an exhaustive investigation of the subject has been made. Let it be made again, if necessary, but let not the rules of this body and the usage of this body from the time it begun be set aside for the purpose of resuscitating a measure. I have never heard before of any exposition of the motion of indefinite postponement but the one stated by the Senator from Kentucky, that it is a postponement to a day beyond the session. In addition to that, it prohibits the reintroduction during that session, after the indefinite postponement, of that measure again; but in addition to that prohibition it is a rejection, for it is a postponement to a day that is not a legislative day, and the moment that the motion passes it dies.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of Saturday is before the Senate, being the bill (S. No. 256) relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, on which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Nevada I will move, in pursuance of the notice I gave a week ago, to postpone the present and all prior orders with a view to take up Senate bill No. 793, in relation to the public debt and the currency.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to introduce some amendments which I propose to the bill, in order that they may be printed?

Mr. SHERMAN. That can be done as soon as it is taken up.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senate will proceed with the consideration of the bill mentioned by the Chair, Senate bill No. 256, which is the regular order of the day. I think we shall not be occupied long upon that bill before we come to the final disposition of it. We have spent so much time upon it, both at the former session and at this session, that it appears to me due to the parties in interest, who claim our consideration, that we should proceed and dispose of the case. Let them know what their fate is to be. If we intend to come to their aid, let us do so; and if we do not, let us say so plainly; but let us finish the bill. I shall be entirely willing to take up the bill to which the Senator from Ohio has alluded the moment this is disposed of, but I think it is due to the parties who have presented this claim that they should have a prompt answer upon this subject. It is a very important subject to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that it is necessary for me to enlarge upon this question. I thought it was the general understanding during the whole of the past week that the subject of the finances should be taken up at this time and disposed of. The Senate ought to consider whatever it does in regard to the public debt and the currency with great deliberation. It is a subject of vital importance, far outweighing all railroad bills of any character. I trust, therefore, we may now at this period of the session take it up and decide upon whatever action we may agree upon. In regard to this Central Branch railroad bill, I know it will consume a good deal of time; and the state of the public business is now such that we must proceed to act upon those bills of general importance on which we can have a vote of the Senate. To-morrow, I am informed, several appropriation bills will be brought before us; Thursday has been already set apart for the consideration of the constitutional amendment; and I take it, if we take up this bill, the natural weight of the subject will require the attention of the Senate at least three days. I trust, therefore, that no opposition will be made to this motion. The Senator from Michigan can get the attention of the Senate at some other time to this railroad measure. At any rate, the question of a subsidy to a railroad is of far less importance than the general subject relating to the public debt and the currency.

Mr. MORTON. The chairman of the Committee on Finance gave notice early last week that he would move to take up his bill on that subject to-day. I think it is due to him that he should be allowed to do it, and that the pending business, the railroad bill, should be displaced long enough to enable him to make his speech. I am in favor of the railroad bill, but I think it ought to give way long enough to allow the chairman of the Committee on Finance to take up his bill and make his speech on the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish it to be taken up for that purpose or to be placed on that ground.

Mr. NYE. The honorable Senator from Ohio took three days in the discussion here of a bill providing for a railroad from Washington to New York, and I suppose the bill he now proposes to take up will occupy quite as long. We have now got so near the disposition of the Central Branch railroad question that I think it would be economy of time to dispose of it. It is quite as important as that other railroad bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to my friend from Nevada that I would unquestionably have moved to postpone that or any other bill, even although I was very much in favor of its passage.

Mr. NYE. So was I; but it seems to me we are so near the end of the discussion on this bill that we had better let it be decided, and then take up the Senator's bill and sit it out. I am willing, for one, to stay here as long as the Senator desires us to stay in order to dispose of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the order of the day be postponed for the purpose of taking up the currency bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that the friends of this bill will stand by it and let us come to a test vote upon it. I therefore ask for the yeas and nays on this motion, with a view to test the sense of the Senate on the question of its further consideration at this session.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the consent of the Senate to present some amendments to the bill called up by the Senator from Ohio, and have them printed. I do not ask even to have them read, but I desire to present them that they may be printed before the bill shall be finally disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be received and the order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. To which bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Senate bill No. 728 and Senate bill No. 793, reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POMEROY. I think it will not be long before we can get a vote on the railroad bill. We should have reached it on Saturday, in my opinion, but for the obituary notice from the House; and I believe now it will be an economy of time to reach a vote upon it to-day. I hope it will not be postponed. Will the Chair state the question? I do not know precisely what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the unfinished business, being the Central Branch railroad bill, for the purpose of taking up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Ohio, on the subject of the public debt and the currency.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Catell, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Howe, McCree, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, Spencer, Wade, and Williams—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Cameron, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Pomeroy, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Welch—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Corbett, Fowler, Henderson, Kellogg, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Salisbury, Sprague, Stewart, Tipton, Warner, Whyte, Wiley, Wilson, and Yates—15.

So the motion was not agreed to.

CENTRAL BRANCH PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 236) relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. CORBETT, to insert at the end of the bill the following proviso:

And provided further, That no more Government bonds shall be issued to said company, but that the Government shall guaranty the interest on said company's bonds for thirty years on the completion of each section of twenty miles of said road, and the interest shall be paid at the Treasury of the United States; and to secure the payment of such interest all earnings of said road for services performed for the Government, and five per cent. of its gross earnings, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I was about to remark in regard to this bill when interrupted on Saturday that I believe the parties interested in this central branch road have some equity; that they might reasonably suppose at the time they undertook this enterprise that they would have a connection with the Union Pacific, eastern division, so as to make the enterprise a success. They would have had that connection but for the legislation that was had here, and their enterprise would have been a success. It appears that they did not ask for that legislation, but protested against it. At the time, however, that that bill was under consideration I knew nothing of the protest. It was not before the Committee on the Pacific Railroad of the Senate, according to my recollection. I saw nothing of it.

If they had been allowed to make this connection, as was anticipated by the law, the road would have been a much shorter one than it will be to go to the one hundredth meridian. It would not have been more than one hundred and fifty miles in length at the outside.

They have had subsidies for one hundred miles. Of course the point where they would unite would be a little indefinite, but I think one hundred and fifty miles would be the outside of the length of this road if it had been constructed as originally contemplated.

These parties now come here and ask for relief. I believe they should have some relief. The question then arises, what kind of relief should they have? It seems to me every fair-minded man would say they should have such relief as would enable them to build the road to a point where they could have a connection and make the road available. That will be fair, in my estimation of the transaction. They having been deprived of that connection without any fault on their part, as I believe to be the fact, Congress, if it is to act upon the subject, should act in the light of giving them such relief as will place them in as good a position, or something near as good a position, as they would have been in but for our previous legislation. It is claimed that they ought to be allowed to have bonds to the full extent—one hundred and fifty miles; that that is the only relief which will be adequate.

I think Congress made a mistake. I do not know that I ought to say it was a mistake either, because it was necessary to offer great inducements to get the Pacific railroad started, but they have not sufficiently protected the Government in providing for these railroads. The law as it now stands allows the companies to issue a first mortgage to an amount equal to the bonds issued by the Government. The subsidy here is $16,000 a mile. The company may put upon the line first-mortgage bonds for the same amount. From the report of the Secretary of the Interior on the Union Pacific railroad, it appears that that road has issued its first mortgage bonds and sold them upon the market, as well as received the bonds of the Government. These mortgage bonds are a first lien upon the property of the company. It appears from the statement that I saw from the Secretary of the Interior that there was a much larger amount realized by the bonds that the Government issued and the first-mortgage bonds that the company issued than was necessary to build the road; that from fifteen to twenty millions more had been issued than had been appropriated in the building of the road. In what condition does that leave the Government? These parties, if they were disposed to do so—I do not know that the company have done so; I hope they have not—might make a dividend on the surplus, get rich in building the road, and then allow the road to be sold under the first-mortgage bonds by the mortgagees, and thus the Government would be entirely without remedy. That may be done on the Union Pacific railroad. It may be done on this road if we follow the same kind of legislation. Experience teaches us that that legislation does not sufficiently protect the Government.

The amendment which I sent to the Chair on Saturday last, which was carefully prepared by the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] provides that for the amount of bonds guaranteed by the Government the Government shall have the first lien upon the road. It also provides that the lands which are donated by the Government shall be appropriated to the construction of the road. It also provides for paying off this debt. It gives the company sufficient credit to build the road; it gives them their connection, and saves the Government, and prevents the existence of a first mortgage that might be foreclosed, and thus place the road in the hands of third parties and deprive the Government of any remedy for the bonds issued.

Now, I do not believe we ought to indulge in any more of that class of legislation. If $16,000 a mile is not enough, make the amount sufficient to build the road, because this cuts them off from raising money elsewhere; because the Government takes all the security, both the land and the road, and is empowered to enforce that security in case the payment is not promptly made. In that way you protect the Government; at the same time the road is built and these parties are relieved, and they have a longer piece of road than they originally contemplated having; they have a connection with the Union Pacific; they have a connection without competition from the eastern division. They will be in a great deal better position than they otherwise would, because if the eastern division had made the connection on the one hundredth meridian it would have been a competing road to the Atchison branch. The Atchison branch will be a much better road without that competing road seventy-five miles off than it would otherwise be. If we guaranty a sufficient sum to enable them to build the road, and take ample security to the Government, they will be placed, I say, in a better position than they would be if they were to build another fifty miles of this road and make the connection with the Union Pacific, eastern division, and have a competing road. It seems to me that this is fair. As to the exact amount of bonds to be guaranteed, let that be fixed at the lowest rate that will build a road over the plains which can be ascertained. I cannot vote for issuing any more bonds direct, and allowing the companies to make a first mortgage, because in that way the Government may be deprived of any redress or any payment back of the money. I do not like that kind of legislation. This is all I have to say about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to say a few words with reference to this bill, more by way of explanation of the reasons why I shall vote for it than for the purpose or with the expectation of throwing any new light on the subject, because it is perfectly well understood now, I think.

When the bill was up at the last session my impressions were very much against it. Those impressions were strengthened by the very able attack upon it that was made by the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] to all of which I listened and with which I was disposed to concur. Had the vote been taken at that time, I should unquestionably have voted against the bill; but at the request of a gentleman who came here as the agent of the parties interested, and who was attending to the bill, I took the papers home with me and examined the question at my leisure and gave it as careful consideration as I could with such papers as were before me, and the result was that I came to a conclusion that, however reluctant I might be to do so, I could not help voting for some relief to these parties. I say I was reluctant to come to that conclusion, because I have been opposed to the general course of the legislation of Congress with regard to these railroads. I was one of the very few members of Congress who did not vote for the original Pacific railroad bill, and of course I did not vote for the second bill, which was passed to explain it and to give still greater privileges.

The reason of my non-action at that time was not that I was not in favor of a Pacific railroad, but I believed that if one was built it should be built by the Government itself and owned by the Government, and I did not think that we had sufficient light on the subject to justify us in supporting the bill that was introduced, which not only provided for one main trunk but for three lines converging to a point, running through States of the Union for a very considerable portion of their distance. I thought that the bill was brought about, not as a good bill in itself except so far as the object was concerned, but as a bill that was produced by the junction of different competing interests, to which the great interest of the Government was sacrificed, and therefore I did not give it my assent, although in favor of the main matter. That kind of legislation, to which I was much opposed, prejudiced me very much against the whole system and everything connected with it. I have not voted, to my knowledge, for any of the subsequent subsidies that have been granted or anything that has been done in relation to them, but have been content to let the matter go along without making what I knew would be a fruitless opposition, being really and strongly in favor of having a railroad to the Pacific built if we could get one built upon some plan. One reason why I have held myself aloof from the subsequent bills which have been proposed is that I saw that the legislation we had then has led to all sorts of schemes. I have trembled for the Treasury when I have seen the extent of the schemes that were brought before Congress for making other railroads, and seen the powerful interest that has been brought here in order to effect the purposes desired. I believe, sir, there is a better appearance of things now; that light is dawning on the public mind, and that we may really hope to check some of this very bad legislation and corrupting legislation, in my judgment, to a very great extent.

Now, sir, with regard to this particular bill, how does it stand? I can add nothing to the very clear exposition that was made by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] the other day. It seems that the three arms (if I may so call them) at this end of this railroad were authorized. I do not remember the names of them; but I will call them the northern, central, and southern. They were all to converge to a point on the one hundredth meridian, and they were all granted a certain amount of lands and a certain amount of subsidy. The object, manifestly, as shown by the original bill authorizing the construction of the Pacific railroad, was that they should all converge to a certain point, and there the main trunk line should begin. The bill was so drawn as to give certain privileges to all of these lines; but that idea was specifically kept in view.

Now, with regard to this central branch, what was the legislation? It was simply this, if I understand it—and if I am wrong I shall be very glad to be corrected; in fact I should be glad to find some good ground on which I can vote against this subsidy, as I have been disposed to do against all others—the central branch was granted a subsidy for one hundred miles and there to stop; it was to have no more. But what was granted it in addition? The privilege to join either of the other lines. That privilege was specifically granted to it just as it pleased, if I recollect aright; it could connect with which one it liked, and thus become a part of the Pacific railroad proper. Well, sir, what did it do? It obtained subscriptions. It waited. Why did it wait? It waited because it wished to ascertain what was to be the location of these other lines with either of which it might join. A certain time was given within which that location should be made and a map filed; and that was to determine the course of these several roads. This company having no right to a subsidy beyond the one hundred miles, but having this privilege of junction, as I understood it, waited until the other location seemed to be completed. The time of filing the map, the time of making the location was concluded. The point was reached. Apparently on the face of the paper, on the face of the earth, the route of these railroads was laid down. It then makes its selection to join what is called, I believe, the eastern division railroad. It did not commence its operations, it made no finality until that thing had been done; and that was all under the legislation of Congress.

Now, sir, what was manifest? It was perfectly manifest that this central branch was of no sort of value, and could be of no sort of value unless with the privilege of joining one of the other roads or continuing its construction, and a provision was inserted in the bill that if any of these roads should fail to construct its line either of the others might go on and avail itself of all the privileges and make the same construction, and thus become a part of the Pacific railroad. This company having waited until the final step seemed to be taken and the map filed and the eastern division had located (so far as the map went) its road up the Republican fork, so called, then the central branch began. It obtained subscriptions to the amount of $1,000,000; it borrowed money and made its mortgages; it took its bonds and sold them; and it constructed its one hundred miles of railroad, or got so far that the road might be considered as constructed, when what took place? It had gone entirely out of the direction of the northern line; it had concluded to join the eastern division, so called, or the southern line; it made its road accordingly to join that eastern division; it expended its money; it went to a point, and there it stopped, so far as the Government was concerned.

Then, sir, what does Congress do? The eastern division, notwithstanding that its time had expired for filing its map, notwithstanding that it had located its road, came here and asked Congress for permission to change its direction. Congress, without considering the rights of this other company, without considering the effect that such a change was to have upon this other company, granted permission to the eastern division to change its location; and not only gave that permission, but gave it all the lands and all the subsidies that it would have been entitled to if it had kept it on according to its original location. The proper way to do, in my judgment, if it did anything in regard to it at that period, was to say to the eastern division company, "You can change your location if you please, but the subsidies and the land must be given to this other road to enable it to reach the point of junction." Congress did no such thing; but it gave the subsidies and the land to this very eastern division, and left the central branch, having thus expended its money and made its bonds and finished its road, or at least gone so far that it could not recede, precisely at a point where the road itself, according to all the information I can get on the subject and as I should judge from its location, must necessarily, if it stops there, be utterly without any value.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many miles were actually built at the time the act of 1866 was passed?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I presume the one hundred miles were not entirely finished, but a large portion of the road was built.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like for information to ask my friend, who has examined the subject, to tell us if he knows, and if he does what is the source of his information, just how many miles of this central branch had been actually constructed at the time Congress passed the act of 1866 that permitted the divergence of the eastern division?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That I am unable to do, because I am not sufficiently familiar with the subject. My understanding is that enough was built to render it impossible for the company, with any regard to their interests, to change the direction in which they were going.

Mr. POMEROY. If it is of any importance I suppose I can answer the question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator can do so afterward. I am merely explaining why I shall vote as I proposed to do. Although at the last session I understood the facts to be pretty much as I have stated them, I was not disposed then even to give my vote for the bill, for the simple reason that here at the time the act was passed granting leave to change the location of the eastern division the then president of the central branch, as I understood, was in this body a Senator and not objecting and not stating to this body what the objections were on the part of the central branch; at any rate not stating them so that I understood the objections. If an agent of the company was present, a person standing in that relation to it, and was disposed to submit to this change and not inform this body fully and thoroughly what the effect of it would be, and when at the same time the chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee informed the Senate that it did not affect the rights of the Government or the rights of any other road, as I recollect, I was willing to let it go; but I am credibly informed, informed on authority and on proof which I certainly cannot resist, that the moment the mass of gentlemen engaged in this work, who had put their money in it, became informed of the condition of things they came directly on here to resist it.

Mr. HOWARD. One moment, if the Senator from Maine will allow me. The Senator refers to a remark made by me in the discussion of that bill in 1866 when it was before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWARD. It is probable I made some such remark as that which he refers to, but it grew out of this circumstance. I desire to set myself right on the subject. Whoever will read the sixteenth section of the amendatory act of 1864, and consider it in the light of construction, will, I think, come to the conclusion that this central branch company had the right to proceed onward with its work and to form a connection with the Omaha branch; as therein expressed—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator oblige me by deferring his explanation until I get through?

Mr. HOWARD. Just allow me one word further now. It was the doubt that grew out of the construction of that section and the uncertainty of that language that finally induced the Secretary of the Interior to withhold the lands and the bonds from this company.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was remarking, sir, that as soon as the persons who were interested by having subscribed their money learned that this matter was in agitation, they came directly to Washington to arrest the passage of that bill, but it was too late to arrest it in the Senate. They presented their remonstrance to the House of Representatives, and vigorously pressed it, stating the effect it would have upon them. That went to the committee—and, as I am informed, the Pacific Railroad Committee of the House were opposed to the bill—but by the power that was exerted by a great man, then living, over the House, and who seemed to have different opinions, the bill was taken out of the hands of the committee and passed through the House and became a law. Now, I am not disposed to punish men who were concerned in this road who honestly put in their money, and who actually resisted that bill in good faith when they ascertained what the facts were, because they did not ascertain them early. The original wrong was done here in this Chamber, in my judgment. We should have refused, in the first place, to grant that privilege of diverging, or if we had granted it, we should have granted it only on the condition that the other road, which was thus left out in the cold, should have the right to the subsidies and the lands which were originally to be given to the eastern division provided it reached the point to which it professed to desire to go. We did not do that. We allowed them to go off in another direction, as I understand now, and I understand it definitely from them; I did not at the last session. They have no idea of joining the central line, the great trunk line, but propose to go off in another direction. They have already received the original amount, probably, of the lands and the subsidies which they would be entitled to receive if they went to this point. I do not know exactly how that is; but what is the result? The result is that we held out the inducement to this company, which we have confined to one hundred miles so far as our subsidies and lands are concerned, to make their road in order to become a part of the great Pacific railroad system, and when they have dipped themselves in so heavily and so deeply that they cannot recede without very heavy loss, we then turn round to them and deprive them of the great privilege by which alone they could make the whole matter desirable to them as an investment.

Under such circumstances I cannot but think that they have a very strong equitable claim upon this Government; and I think, moreover, that notwithstanding Congress gave permission to the eastern division to go off in another direction, as it did, had I been at the head of the Interior Department my decision would have been that when they chose to do it, even under congressional permission, they failed to perform the very first condition which would entitle them to any further subsidies and lands, and that this central branch company, if it took up the work and continued it, would be entitled to these subsidies and lands. But the decision has been different, and being different they are left without any redress unless we choose to afford them redress.

Now, sir, what that aid, what that redress should be I have not examined the question sufficiently to decide. I understand that by continuing their road at their own expense some twenty or thirty miles further than the point where they now end they would probably have struck the eastern division had it been continued up the Republican fork. Even then the distance which they would have to go from that point, (and which perhaps they must do at their own expense,) in order to reach the other road on the one hundredth meridian, the point of departure, if I may so express it, of the Pacific railroad, would be more than one hundred and fifty miles, for which it is proposed here to grant them subsidies. If so, in my judgment they are entitled to the aid for one hundred and fifty miles given by this bill; whether this specific aid is sufficient or not I am unable to say; perhaps $16,000 a mile is too much; perhaps aid in another direction might be given them which would be more for the advantage of the Government; but that they should receive the aid of the Government to enable them to reach the point for which they originally started is, in my judgment, a very clear matter of equitable consideration.

I was struck also by the remark made by the honorable Senator from Indiana, to the effect that having built one hundred miles of road, and the Government having already advanced them $1,600,000, it is for the interest of the Government to do something not to have that a dead loss as well as to have all the benefits of the road lost to the country.

This is the simple explanation which I wished to make for my own proposed action on the subject which, as I stated before, is a course of action which I adopt very reluctantly, for it is against all my preferences.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I did not intend to take any part in the debate upon this bill; and I should not, I think, have taken any part but for the fact that the bill is now pressed very persistently by many members of this body to whose judgment I am very much in the habit of deferring, and to whose judgment I feel under some obligation to defer. I have no reason in the world for opposing this bill except that, in my judgment, it is a great injury and a great wrong to the public interest. That is a consideration that weighs, or ought to weigh, equally upon every member of the Senate; and therefore I feel called upon, since I cannot come to the conclusion that other Senators do in reference to this matter, to state why I cannot do it.

I listened, charmed, as I am very much in the habit of being when I do listen, to the honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. Nye] the other day, and I have listened this morning to the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. Fessenden.] Being utterly unable to concur with either of them in the conclusions to which they come, it seemed to me that I was called upon to apologize, for whenever I do listen to the Senator from Nevada I generally feel obliged either to vote with him or apologize. As I cannot go with him, I am up here now to send my "regrets."

Mr. President, I am utterly unable to understand, after all that has been said, that the legislation of 1866, which has been so often referred to, was in violation of any legal right then vested in what is now known as the Central Branch Pacific Railroad Company. Every right which that company had at the time that act passed it seems to me that company still has. What were the rights vested in that company by the original act under which it claims—for it claims as the assignee of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company of Missouri. The right to extend a line of railway from the termination of the Hannibal and St. Joseph road by the way of Atchison, in Kansas, either to connect with the line of railway up the Kaw valley, now known as the eastern division, or with the line running from Omaha through Nebraska to the one hundredth meridian, taking its choice to connect with either, but with the privilege of a subsidy in lands or money for the extent of one hundred miles, and one hundred miles only. Those were the rights vested in that organization by that legislation. Those rights they still have. They can still connect with the Omaha line; they can still connect with the Kaw valley line as they choose; they have had the whole subsidy which that act conferred upon them. Of what wrong, then, can they complain? Why, it is said for them that they have built one hundred miles and they have not touched either line.

Mr. President, there is not a line in any one of the acts which ever intimated that they would strike either of those roads in one hundred miles. They could have struck the Kansas line—the Kaw valley line—in one hundred miles; they could have struck it in fifty miles. There was, when the first act was pending before the Senate, a determined effort on the part of many Senators to compel them to connect, or in other words to limit, their subsidy to fifty miles, with the view of compelling them to connect with the Kaw valley line at or near Topeka, in the State of Kansas; and that proposition was supported by both of the then Senators from Kansas, and it was supported by a former Senator from the State of New Hampshire who took a deep interest in the prosecution of that bill, (Mr. Clark.)

I say, sir, there was not a syllable in any one of those acts which undertook to guaranty or secure in any way to the central branch company a connection in one hundred miles. They could run their line as they pleased, run it in what direction they pleased, take a long line or a short one, to a junction with either the Kaw valley line on the south or the Omaha line on the north; but subjected to this condition always, that the Government would grant them subsidies in land or money only to the extent of one hundred miles. They have had the whole surface of the country between the Kaw valley and the Platte valley open to them; they have chosen their own route, and they have prosecuted it on a line which would not have effected a junction with the Kansas branch if it had gone up the Republican valley, is not within fifty miles, so the report here shows, of a junction with that branch of road if that company (the Kansas company) had pursued their way up the Republican fork.

How, then, is the central branch company injured in any one of its legal rights by the act of 1866? What did the act of 1866 do? Why, Mr. President, under the original act inaugurating the Pacific railroad enterprise the company charged with the building of the Kansas branch could have gone up the Smoky Hill fork. There was nothing in that act which required them to go up the Republican fork. They could go where they pleased. The termini of that branch were fixed by that act, and only the termini. One end was the mouth of the Kansas river; the other was a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude anywhere between the southern bank of the Republican fork and the northern bank of the Platte river. And those were the only conditions imposed upon that company, the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Railroad Company, in locating the line of their road; they could reach that meridian of longitude either up the Republican fork or up the Smoky Hill fork, or south of both; only, if they kept far south, as they might, till they struck the one hundredth meridian, then they would have to run north on that meridian until they struck the initial point of the road running from that meridian west to the Pacific. All that the act of 1867 did, therefore, was to release the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Railroad Company from the obligation of touching that initial point at all. How can the central branch say that they are injured by that? This company might have taken a line which would have carried them two hundred miles distant from the present terminus of the central branch road.

The Senator from Maine, speaking upon this point, does not claim that it was the act of 1866 which interfered with the rights of the central branch company. He does not claim that the central branch company acted in the faith of any legislation of ours, but—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Entirely so.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will not dispute with me if he understands what I am about to say. I will accept his corrections if I do not state him correctly. I understood him to say that the central branch company did not locate their road in view of any legislation of ours, but they waited until the Leavenworth company had located their line; and when they found that the Leavenworth company had located their line up the Republican fork then they took their direction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will observe, if he will excuse me for interrupting him, as I wish to be understood, that the act limited the time within which the location by the filing of a map should be made. They waited until the expiration of that period. In the mean time the eastern division filed its map and thus located its direction. Relying upon that legislation, the time had expired within which they could do it, and it having been done within the time the central branch company then made its location.

Mr. HOWE. But, Mr. President, it was the act of the company and not the act of Congress which misled the central branch company, if they were misled at all. Because the Leavenworth company had mapped out a line of road up the Republican fork, therefore the central branch inferred that they were going to build upon that line. That was a very natural inference; but there was nothing in the act of location which debarred the Leavenworth company from changing its mind, and nothing in any act of Congress which debarred that company from appealing to Congress for the right to change its line.

The question of law presented here, Mr. President, is simply this: because the central branch company was authorized by act of Congress to connect with the Kaw valley line, was the Kaw valley line bound to locate its line with reference to the convenience of the central branch company? That is the whole question of law. Was this an easement in the rights of the Kaw valley line granted to the central branch company, or did both companies stand like all other companies, simply upon the rights vested in them respectively by the different acts of Congress, coupled with the right in each one of them to come to the national Legislature for such additional aid or privileges as either might require? I cannot see anything in any of these acts which gave the central branch company any control over the Kaw valley line in the execution of its chartered privileges.

Mr. President, perhaps the central branch company, when it had prosecuted its enterprise up to 1866, was interested in having the Kaw valley road constructed up the Republican fork. I say perhaps it was interested in having that done. How can we say so? How can Congress say so? When the central branch company obtained from us its chartered rights it had not determined whether it wanted to connect with the southern line or with the northern line, with the branch from Omaha or the branch from Kansas City; it therefore took the right to connect with either. The Senator from Maine says that it commenced the execution of its enterprise by aiming to a junction with the Kaw valley line. Very well. I think that was wise, perhaps; at all events we have no occasion to question the wisdom of that choice. It chose to aim toward the Kaw valley line. But Senators may say they did so in the belief that the Kaw valley line would go on to a junction with the Omaha or with the main line from the one hundredth meridian.

How do we know that? The projectors, the managers, the controllers of the Kaw valley line finally determined that it was not for their interest to connect with the Omaha line at all. If not for their interest, why should we conclude that it was for the interest of the central branch? The Kaw valley line is still being prosecuted toward the Pacific ocean in another direction widely divergent from that pursued by the Omaha line. How could we say in 1866, how can we say to-day, that it was not the judgment of the friends of the central branch road that they should unite their fortunes on the eastern division, going up the Kaw valley, going up the Smoky Hill fork, and going on toward the Pacific ocean over the line which that company is now pursuing? Sir, we cannot settle that.

I make these remarks with the view of suggesting that if Congress had known precisely what the attitude of these several companies was in 1866, when the act of July 3, of that year, was passed, we were not authorized to conclude that the changing of the line of the eastern division was an injury to the central branch. We had as much evidence to believe that it would be profitable to the central branch company to go to the Pacific over the route now pursued by the eastern division company as it is to the eastern division company itself.

But, Mr. President, I stand here to say that Congress is not responsible for the act of July 3, 1866, no matter how seriously or injuriously it may affect the interests of the central branch company. I stand here to say that the central branch company itself is responsible for it. If that act had purported to take from the central branch company its right to build a mile of road, its right to a dollar of subsidy, and the central branch company had acted in reference to it as they did in reference to the act we passed, the mouth of the central branch company would have been closed against all right of complaint on their part. I have no right to convey the farm of my friend from Vermont; but if I do convey it and he stands by and sees me do it, he cannot question the title which you take from me in his presence with full knowledge of the act without a word of protest against it; by the fact of his keeping silence when the conveyance was made he is estopped from questioning your right to the property conveyed. Sir, was not this the attitude of the central branch company when the act of July 3, 1866, passed in these two Houses? This point was made at the last session of Congress. Attention was called then to the fact that one of the officers of the company was at that time on the floor of the Senate, and, instead of objecting to the passage of that bill was urging it.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, I corrected that several times, and I take this opportunity to correct it again. I not only did not urge it, but opposed it, as I have shown from the Globe.

Mr. HOWE. I beg the Senator's pardon if he has corrected it. My attention had not been called to that fact. I understood the Senator from Maine to repeat that this morning.

Mr. POMEROY. I rose to correct him, and he said he wished I would wait until he got through; but I corrected that at the last session.

Mr. HOWE. I certainly stand corrected, then, as to the attitude of the Senator from Kansas. I ought, therefore, to waive that position. I did not rely upon it then. The mere silence or the mere support of an officer of the company here I do not feel authorized to regard as conclusive upon the rights of the constituency which he represented to a certain extent, for it is only to a certain extent that any single officer of a corporation can represent the stockholders. I was in some doubt as to whether I was authorized to conclude that the company itself knew of the pendency of the act of July 3, 1866; but the fact that they did know of it was put beyond all controversy the other day by the Senator from Michigan; [Mr.

HOWARD,] who presents here what purports to be a copy of a remonstrance which he says—and I have no disposition to question the accuracy of his statement—was presented in the House of Representatives. That remonstrance shows this fact conclusively, that the company did know of the pendency of that act. It does not conclusively show that they knew it until the 21st of June, if I remember rightly. The remonstrance bears date on that day. It was presented in the House of Representatives on the 22d of June. The bill had been reported early in March preceding.

Many of the gentlemen who signed that paper reside in Massachusetts, others in New York. Mails go between this locality and those every little while—more than once in three months, at all events. Now, I cannot help coming to the conclusion that that intelligent railroad corporation did know of the pendency of the bill while it was in the Senate. The Senator from Maine has come to the contrary conclusion. He thinks they did not know anything about it until the 21st of June, 1866. I do not know that he is wrong, and therefore I do not know that I am right, but I think it fairer to conclude that they were not so excessively stupid, so very sleepy upon this great right, which they now insist was infringed upon, as that conclusion of the honorable Senator would make them out to be. I think they must have known of the pendency of the bill long before it passed the Senate. What, then, was manifestly their duty if they meant to be governed by good faith toward Congress? Why, if they held that to be an infringement of their rights they should have come to the Senate as well as to the House of Representatives, and have said so.

It is not enough for them to ask the judgment of one House of Congress upon their rights. It takes the concurrence of both Houses to pass a law granting or infringing rights; and they were as much bound to take the judgment of both Houses upon the question which interested them as the judgment of one; and I feel therefore authorized, I feel compelled, because of the fact that this bill went through here without a remonstrance from any of them, and from the fact that we never heard that a remonstrance was made on their part anywhere until within a day or two, to come to this conclusion, that the company deliberated at first upon the question whether they should let that bill pass both Houses, and then insist that they were clothed with the rights which the eastern division company had and could take the subsidy which had been granted to them in order to build up the valley of the Republican fork, or whether they should conclude that they had no such right, and should remonstrate against the passage of the bill.

It seems to me they deliberated upon that question. What their conclusion was finally I am not satisfied. It is said they presented this remonstrance and urged it to the House. The remonstrance says that this act of 1866 is a violation of their rights, or at least that it is an injury to their interests, because it will cut them off from a connection with the Omaha line. The remonstrance concedes the law of the case to be as it is settled by the Secretary of the Interior, the law of the case to be as I insist it is. The language of the remonstrance is a plain concession that they had no right to any subsidy beyond the one hundred miles, whether that bill passed or not; and that, therefore, if the bill did pass, there would be no power of making a connection except at their own cost. But I rather conclude, Mr. President, that they did not press that point. The balance of the evidence goes to satisfy me that they came to the conclusion that their best hold, as the boys say sometimes, was to let the bill pass, and then insist that the Government was bound to give them the subsidy which was originally provided for making a connection with the Omaha line. If that was their conclusion it seems to me they did not act in good faith toward the two Houses of Congress; and if it was not their conclusion, it seems to me they did not act in good faith toward the two Houses, because they did not inform the judgment of both Houses as to the precise manner in which their interests were involved in the bill of 1866. But suppose I am wrong on both these points, I have two questions yet to suggest. If their rights were injuriously affected by the passage of the act of 1866, and this company was innocent in reference to the passage of that bill, these two questions remain to be considered: how much was the central branch injured by that act, and who should pay the damage? What was the damage and who should pay it? Upon the latter point I have no doubt whatever. If by our act we have destroyed the value of the franchises belonging to the central branch company, we should pay the bill; we should not take it out of the Treasury of the United States; it is our act. I wish the Senate to attend to the fact that you are about to vote a fine on the nation of something like two million dollars and take it out of the Treasury to make amends for an injurious and oppressive act of our own.

Mr. President, I do not like to do that. When I am found guilty of any conduct which subjects me to a penalty I would prefer either to put my hand in my pocket and pay it, if I can find the means there, or to call on my friends privately to help me out; but to impose a penalty on an innocent people whom we represent I do not believe is right. I do not feel that we ought to vote this penalty upon the people. But, sir, if the people are to be held responsible for it, if our constituency and not ourselves have got to make good these damages, then what should be the damages assessed upon the people? What is the franchise which is injured? The right to connect with either the eastern division or the Omaha branch; but that right is open to them. They were entitled to a subsidy for one hundred miles. That subsidy they have got, but they say the road is valueless. Well, sir, admit that to be so, what then is the injury that is inflicted upon the company? They certainly cannot be injured beyond the amount of money they have invested in the road. How much is that? I heard it said here the other day that it was $1,000,000; that they had invested $1,000,000 in the construction of that branch of one hundred miles. I think it absolutely impossible that any such amount of money can have been invested by the stockholders; but suppose it has been, how much better is it for us to take $1,000,000 out of the Treasury and pay it to the company and thus own the road they have built, with all the stock they have on it, and dispose of it as we see fit; how much better is that, I say, than to give them $2,000,000 more—for what purpose? To extend this very road to a connection with the Omaha branch. To what end so far as the public interests are concerned? Why, Mr. President, do you know who owns that Omaha line? Who owns the equity of redemption I cannot say just now; but I can remind the Senate of this, that the United States have a mortgage on it amounting to $32,000 a mile. That is a pretty important interest in that road.

We are interested in the success of that road as a mortgage, because unless it does succeed, unless it earns money to pay its running expenses and to pay its interest, we are losers to this extent: we have invested $16,000 a mile, and there is a mortgage ahead of ours to the amount of $16,000 more a mile. What is the effect of this road which they ask us to allow them build to a junction with that road? It is to divide the business over that line for the first two or three hundred miles. The whole value of this road is to be subtracted directly from the value of that Omaha branch, or the eastern division; because every pound of freight and every passenger that go over this new line, if you construct it, will, without the new line, go over one or the other of those roads on which we hold these heavy mortgages to-day. Now, looking to the interest of the United States as the mortgagee of these two existing lines, who can doubt that it is vastly better for us that this competing line should not be built than that it should be built? If it does no business, then it will be of no use to those who build it. If it does any business, whatever it does is a wrong, or if not a wrong it is an injury to the existing roads, in which we have the heaviest interest.

Mr. President, there is another fact which ought to be kept in mind by the Senate. This central branch road is now within about thirty miles of a junction with the eastern division. They decline that now, and they want to make a connection with the Omaha branch, and they want us to give them a subsidy for one hundred and fifty miles to connect with that branch, when, by the construction of about thirty miles, they can connect with the eastern division. I think it would be vastly better for the United States, and I do not know how we can come to the conclusion that it would not be just as well for the central branch company to connect now with the eastern division as to connect with the Omaha branch, unless there is money to be made in the construction of the road, mile by mile. If we are disposed to grant to this company $16,000 a mile of Government bonds, with the right to sell their own bonds, sustained by a prior mortgage to the same amount, I am inclined to think there is money to be made by the building of the road if the road should never be of any value in the world. It cannot cost any $32,000 a mile, for I understand that they are now in the valley of the Blue river—it is so located on the map; they are in the valley of the Blue river, which comes right down from the neighborhood of Fort Kearny. That is a plain; and how slight the difficulties of construction are will be made manifest by some figures which I take from a survey of the Omaha branch or line of road. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to them.

For the first three hundred miles from Omaha west the railroad only rises in the net eighteen hundred and eighty feet. The whole number of feet of ascent in three hundred miles is twenty-three hundred and thirty-two, and the whole descent is four hundred and fifty-two, making a net ascent of eighteen hundred and eighty feet—a little over six feet to the mile, and almost a regular grade from one point to the other. Well, Mr. President, this road, if they go on with it from the valley of the Blue river, where it now is, and follow that up, will strike this very highest point, being twenty-seven hundred and ninety feet above the surface of the water in the Missouri river at Omaha. The labor of grading there is almost nothing; the cost of the road is the iron and the ties. It is because of these considerations that I said just now I was utterly unable to believe that the central branch company had invested $1,000,000 of their funds in the construction of these one hundred miles of road in addition to the $16,000 a mile of the company's bonds and the $16,000 a mile of Government subsidy.

I have to say then, Mr. President, first, that no legal right of this company has been infringed by any act of Congress; second, that if it has been done, it has been done with the knowledge and the tacit consent of the central branch company, and they are estopped from making any complaint; third, that if they are to be heard in complaint, and if damages are to be awarded them, we who committed the wrong ought to pay the money; and, fourth, that if we will not pay it but will vote it out of the Treasury, then we ought not to vote any such sum of money as is asked here, but that it would be infinitely better for the Government to pay the money they say they have spent and take the franchise off their hands, take the road ourselves, and make the best disposition of it we can. It is better for us to pay that $1,000,000 which they say they have already put into it, and own that hundred miles of road, than to pay for building one hundred and fifty miles more, paying out of the Treasury $2,000,000 of money just to build a new rival to compete with roads we already have so large an interest in.

Mr. President, though I acknowledge my obligation to apologize when I differ from other Senators about me, I am not so sure after all that I should have stated even my apology if I were not reminded of the fact that I stand here in the Senate of the United States surrounded by the very same illustrious Senators who stood here recently for three weeks protesting in the name of the national poverty that they could not pay $7,000 out of the Treasury to a girl, an orphan, who was admitted during the debate to be loyal, for her homestead which the Government had taken and used, upon the pretext that her next door neighbors were rebels. When we feel called upon by the national necessities to insist upon so stern a rule of law as the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators about me instructed us in then, I feel called upon to look very carefully into the claims of a corporation which comes here and asks an appropriation of $2,000,000, not to benefit the United States, but every dollar of which is to be taken out, subtracted from property interests already owned by the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, this bill involves $2,400,000; but that is no answer to it if equity requires it. It involves nineteen hundred thousand acres of land; but that is no answer to it if equity requires it at our hands. The nation is suffering under a great debt, and every discerning person sees the over-mastering urgency of frugality and scrutiny of all claims upon the Treasury; but that is no answer if equity requires it. But, Mr. President, equity is absolute truth, complete justice; and the amount of land and of money involved in this bill makes it proper for every one to consider with some care whether the considerations belonging to it do establish that equity whereof we have heard so much.

Since it was considered before I, too, have reviewed carefully and dispassionately as I was able the facts which then were before the Senate, and I have endeavored to comprehend the grounds upon which we were to proceed if in truth the bill should be passed. As I understand the argument in favor of the bill, it proceeds upon four allegations:

1. That the corporation for which the subsidy is proposed acquired by act of Congress the right to build a railroad where one has been built, and by so building to reach and enjoy a connection with the main trunk railroad to the Pacific ocean.

2. That this connection was to be by uniting, in the valley of the Republican fork of the Kaw river, with the eastern division Pacific railway; that the law required the eastern division to go through the Republican valley to the main line; and that, relying upon the law, and expecting it to be observed, the claimants invested large sums of money and built their road where it is, and where it would have intersected the eastern division had its original route been adhered to. That was the gravamen of the argument of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

3. That after the rights of the claimants became thus vested the eastern division was caused or permitted by Congress to abandon its route and to change its course before reaching the point at which a union would have occurred with the claimants' road.

4. That the grants of money provided in the pending bill are necessary to put the claimants in statu quo.

I think, Mr. President, that the most ardent advocate of the bill will admit that I have stated fully and fairly the grounds upon which it proceeds. Upon such a case all fair minds ought to meet in the same conclusion. But all of these propositions are necessary to round out this equity; indeed, to found it at all. If any one of them is untrue it is an answer to the pending proposition. Sir, I believe every one of them to be false, not in some particular or particulars only, but in the entire scope which gives value to any proposition which is the foundation of this argument.

Now, let me examine them, as briefly as I may, in order. First, I ask, had the claimants a right to build their road where they have built it, and by so building to find a connection at their western terminus? Did Congress ever stipulate for this? These claimants are the successors of the Atchison and Pike's Peak Railroad Company. That company was the assignee of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company of a right the precise nature of which the statute states. What was it?

"That the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company of Missouri may extend its road from St. Joseph via Atchison."

I ask the attention of the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to that fact, and I want to show him in legislative history the part which it plays in this case, and which it deserves to play in the conclusion to which he comes—

"via Atchison, to connect and unite with the road through Kansas, upon filing its assent to the provisions of this act, upon the same terms and conditions in all respects, for one hundred miles in length next to the Missouri river," * * * and may for this purpose use any railroad charter which has been or may be granted by the Legislature of Kansas."

In order that all Senators should see the great public benefit of this proposed completion in the aspect in which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] commented upon it, they ought to read the assignment which I have here from the Hannibal and St. Joseph road to the Atchison and Pike's Peak road, and then they would learn that the assignment was made upon the fundamental condition that this central branch was to be built, operated, and preserved for the exclusive benefit and connection of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, never to be used in connection with competing roads, but exclusively for them; and they would learn also that this Atchison and Pike's Peak Company entered into a covenant, in which, in the language of it, they submitted to and obeyed—that is the expression—and agreed to do all these requisitions if the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company would give them the assignment and pardon the delay which had occurred in their own case, not, as I understand, for the reasons asserted by the honorable Senator from Maine.

Let me not, however, be diverted from the point to which I want to call the attention of the Senate just here. The statute said they might extend their road via Atchison from St. Joseph. Was that west? Was that northwest toward Denver? No, sir; it was southwest. How far might they extend it? One hundred miles from where? From Atchison? No, sir; from Saint Joseph, not one hundred and twenty-one miles from Saint Joseph, but one hundred miles from there via Atchison. They might select for themselves any charter existing under the laws of Kansas with which to do it. What charter did they select? The Atchison and Pike's Peak charter. Between what termini was that to operate? St. Joseph and Denver? Atchison and Denver? No, sir; but Atchison and Pike's Peak.

The honorable Senator from Kansas, [Mr. POMEROY,] at the last session, corrected my geography in reference to Pike's Peak. He thought I supposed it to be much further south than in truth it is, and he left upon my mind the impression that one who began at Atchison and journeyed westward, even as far to the north as this road points, would some time or other encounter Pike's Peak. Since that time, Mr. President, I have seen Pike's Peak—a vision not to be forgotten—and as I saw it in its picturesque vastness, with its cap hidden in the clouds, I could not help wishing that it might be seen of that multitude of Americans who turn their backs upon their own country, which they never traverse in its unending stretch and grandeur, and bend their steps to the Alps, the Rhine, and the Pyrenees. But there it stands, plain to be seen, more than ninety miles in a straight line south of Denver. Did any human being, geographer or railway discoverer, ever suppose that under a charter to operate from Atchison to Pike's Peak a railway was to be laid on the ground pointing toward Denver and reaching, first, Irving, and then Clifton, on the Republican fork of the Kaw river? No, sir; never. Did any man ever suppose that one hundred miles from St. Joseph, even one hundred miles from Atchison—not running with the sinuosity which nature requires of railroads, but in an air line—that one hundred miles in the direction taken by these claimants would touch a point in the Republican fork where a union could be effected? No man ever supposed that who had passed over the ground; no man ever supposed it who had consulted a map. Do you suppose, Mr. President, that when this permission thus to extend one hundred miles was granted it had entered into the mind of man to conceive such an idea as I have stated? The geography forbids it; the facts forbid it; the selection of this charter to go toward Pike's Peak, referred to in the treaty with the Kickapoo Indians, forbids it.

But, sir, we are not left to general conjectures on this subject. I can show the Senate that this right, with the violation of which we are now charged, was obtained by the representation not only that a hundred miles but that fifty miles were to insure this connection. I can show the Senate that not only was the idea disclaimed of going on the route pursued by these claimants, but that Topeka, falling within fifty miles, was the point to which the claimants or the assignors of the claimants wished to go, and the point to which permission was intended to be granted by the act of which so much has been said. Further, Manhattan—that point to be touched by running down the Big Blue valley, where nature has graded a natural road-bed for this track, referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin—Manhattan, that point where now this connection ought to have been made, was the furthest westward suggested by anybody when Congress was petitioned to give this privilege of extension. Let us see whether I am right in that. I have here the Globe giving the proceedings and debates upon it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What page do you read from?

Mr. CONKLING. Page 2777 Congressional Globe, part three, second session Thirty-Seventh Congress, 1861-62:

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will now read seriatim and in order the several amendments which have been indicated for a separate vote.

"The Secretary read the first excepted amendment, which was in the third line of the thirteenth section to insert the words: 'via Atchison.'"

Just those two words constituted the amendment, and when those two words had been inserted, as they were, the act came to read and to speak as it does on the statute-book to-day. Now observe what followed:

"Mr. CLARK. The reason that influenced the committee in making the amendment was that there is already a railroad from St. Joseph to Atchison, which can be used if a proper agreement can be made with the company, and there will probably be no difficulty about it; but if there cannot be an agreement made with that company an independent road can be made from St. Joseph directly to the Kansas and Pawnee road, and I propose, after the amendments of the committee shall have been gone through with, to strike out the words 'one hundred'—"

"That is, before 'miles'—"

"and insert 'fifty' in the sixth line of this section, so that this road from St. Joseph shall be made to strike the Pawnee and Leavenworth railroad much earlier, and not run the branch out so far west, and thus save the money of the Government. My object is to take advantage of twenty miles of road which have been built, and strike off fifty miles from that which is to be built, and save expense to the Government."

Senators will understand that if they have the map in their minds. The Platte county road, as it is called, existed at that time from Atchison to St. Joseph. That is about twenty-one miles long, is it not?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. About twenty-one miles, the Senator says. One hundred miles was the greatest distance provided for. Mr. Clark said his purpose was to move an amendment making it fifty, implying that they might use this twenty-one miles, which would make seventy-one miles in all. Then what followed?

"Mr. POMEROY. I trust the amendment will be concurred in. The remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire are very just and very appropriate. The Senator from Missouri lives at St. Joseph, and perhaps, as a local matter to him personally, it might be inconvenient not to have the road stop there; but consulting the public interest, I think there can be no question as to the propriety of bringing the road into the Kaw valley by the nearest possible route. A straight line from St. Joseph to Topeka, the capital of our State, in the Kaw valley, passes directly through Atchison. Instead of being a right angle, it does not take a quarter of a section out of a straight line. Perhaps I ought to say that I live at Atchison; I do not disguise that fact; but my friend from Missouri lives at St. Joseph."

Further on in the debate Mr. Clark says:

"I apprehend that it does not make it too short, but I want to strike the main branch at the earliest practicable point, so that we shall not build so much length of branches. That is my desire about it; and by going by the way of Atchison we secure that point so far, and then they can run in the same direction or incline a little further west, if necessary, by the most practicable route, to strike the Pawnee and Leavenworth road as soon as possible. The Government certainly has no interest in extending these roads so far west to give away its money."

"Mr. POMEROY. Fifty miles will make the connection in the Kaw valley, building from Atchison to the Kaw valley, but it will not from St. Joseph to the Kaw valley. Building a road from where they now run the cars fifty miles will reach the valley."

"Mr. CLARK. That is what I intend. Fifty miles from Atchison to the Pawnee road."

Let me read a little further to complete this history:

"Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The theory of the bill is to have the St. Joseph branch a hundred miles long, to unite at Fort Riley or Manhattan."

That was the theory of the bill before this amendment was offered—Fort Riley or Manhattan.

"The Senator proposes to shorten it fifty miles, and compel them to unite with the main branch at the seat of government of Kansas, Topeka. Of course that is best for our State, and I think it will be as well for the project, and therefore I shall vote for it."

Again:

"Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The practical result of the Senator's proposition will be to compel the St. Joseph road to meet the other at the seat of government of Kansas."

That is, the practical operation of putting in "via Atchison," which was the amendment as the vote taken will show, was to compel this road to seek the earliest practicable connection, which was there conceded to be the seat of government of Kansas, Topeka. Immediately following that remark—

"The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 15"

Both the Senators from Kansas voting for that amendment.

Mr. President, nothing, I think, can be more incontestable than that that amendment was introduced to the end, as explained by the chairman of the committee, that the shortest distance might suffice; and no suggestion was made that a junction was to be sought in any event further west than Fort Riley or Manhattan. They are places very near together.

Let me go a little further to show how this was. I have in my hands a map—"a sectional map of Kansas, compiled from the United States surveys by Robert L. Ream, 1866." This road had then been projected, and this legislation was upon the statute-books—had been for years. According to the statement of everybody here, even of those who believe that money had been invested in such a way that making a connection at Manhattan would have occasioned a loss upon them after the change from the Republican to the Smoky Hill, even those who believe that and all others are aware of the fact that in 1866 these claimants had carried on their work to a considerable extent—precisely how far, I shall endeavor in a moment to show. Therefore it was known of all men, and it was in advertisements, where this road was to go and what it was to do. What is its route on this map? I wish Senators would look at it. They will not find a road running west; they will not find a road running northwest; they will not find a road heading for Denver, but they will find a road running toward Pike's Peak, making a connection with the eastern division road precisely where it now lies on the ground awaiting and inviting a connection. Here is the railroad extending from Atchison, the southern terminus of the Platte county road, right down to Manhattan, where its hundred miles brought it into a connection with the eastern division. And up to that time, think you, Mr. President, it ever had occurred to anybody that the road was to be placed where it was subsequently placed by these parties?

I say, then, to complete my observations upon this point, that it is not true that these claimants or their assignors ever had or ever could have supposed they had a right to build a road in the direction which they selected and find at the end of a hundred miles a connection with any other road.

If this be so, the very first and most substantial part of progress toward a justification of the bill must fail. They had the right by this legislation to make a connection with the eastern division; they had a right to go one hundred miles from St. Joseph to do it; and they had a right to select any charter under which they chose to operate. Selecting the charter they did, had they operated under the charter and laid down their rails where the law and the understanding implied, there they would have found a connection, and there is the connection to-day, as I think I shall be able to show the Senate, much more valuable than the one for which the bill provides. The Senator from Wisconsin talked about presumptions. I will beg his attention presently to some facts which will show that we are not left to presumptions or surmises in order to ascertain whether a connection with the eastern division, where it is now, would or would not be more desirable than a connection upon an impracticable route up the Republican fork of the Kaw river.

Let me, Mr. President, as I wish to be brief upon this subject, come to the next point in the argument. Did the claimants—and I would crave, if I might, the attention of the honorable Senator from Maine especially to this point—did the claimants build their road where it is, relying upon the eastern division to traverse the Republican valley? Did they even build west of the point of connection, as represented to Congress, so as to make it inconvenient to go there before they knew that the Republican valley route was abandoned as impracticable? Let us look at that for a moment.

The act of July 1, 1862, gave the eastern division company three years within which to file their map. They might file a map, and then another map perfecting and changing it, as all companies do. For three years the absolute right existed in the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western road, as it was then called, thus to file and refile maps and surveys. But, sir, in the mean time, as we all too well remember, flagrant war broke out and paralyzed all railway construction and railway surveys. An interval occurred during which it was impossible to press forward the work. Nothing was done, in substance, before the war. About thirty miles only of the four hundred miles now existing were built anterior to the war, and, in truth, nothing of substance was or could be done upon this route until the downfall of the rebellion.

On the 21st of February, 1866, as I have the proof here to show, Mr. John D. Perry, the president of the eastern division railway, addressed to the honorable Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN,] then Secretary of the Interior, a note stating the comparative results of the surveys made by the company up the Smoky Hill fork to Denver and up the Republican fork, which showed the former, on account of timber for construction and coal for fuel, and a saving of one hundred and thirty-four miles to Denver, to be the superior route, and stating that the board of directors had accordingly adopted it, and ordered a map to be filed showing that as the general route of the company's road, claiming the right to do so under the ninth section of the act of 1864. I beg the attention of honorable Senators to that date. That was the 21st of February, 1866. But in the mean time the three years during all of which they had the indisputed right thus to change their route, according to the view of the Attorney General, had elapsed, because he held that the time ran inexorably, war or no war, and therefore, although their right had existed, and although they had been deprived of that right by the existence of war, still time marched on, and therefore they had been caught simply upon the point of time.

Now, Mr. President, bear in mind this was February 21, 1866, and at that time I affirm it was perfectly well known to these claimants and matter of record in Congress that no road was to be built up the Republican fork, but that the eastern division was to traverse the Smoky Hill valley of the Kaw river. Let me see whether I am right in that. I think I do not exaggerate the materiality of the point. If it be true that at the commencement of the year 1866, and at a period anterior to the investment of these alleged moneys, the claimants perfectly well understood not only that they had no license to lay a road where they did, but that if they should lay their road there and continue it to the Republican fork they would find no railway there to meet them, then I think that equity must be enlarged even beyond the scope of the declamation to which we have been treated.

I read from the debates of the Senate on the 21st of March, 1866:

"Mr. POMEROY. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up the bill (S. No. 145) for a grant of lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Northern Kansas railroad and telegraph.

"The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The route of the proposed railroad is from Elwood, on the Missouri river, in Kansas, opposite St. Joseph, in Missouri, west through Marysville to a junction with the Pacific railroad, eastern division, on the Republican river, in Kansas."

"Mr. BROWN. I move to amend the bill in section one, line eight, by inserting after the words 'Republican river' the words 'or at some point east of the hundredth meridian'; so that it will read:

"That there be, and hereby is, granted to the State of Kansas, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the Northern Kansas railroad, to wit: from Elwood, on the Missouri river, in Kansas, and opposite the city of St. Joseph, in the State of Missouri, west through Marysville, to a junction with the Pacific railroad, eastern division, on the Republican river or at some point east of the hundredth meridian, in Kansas, every alternate section," &c.

"Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not insist upon that amendment. If the Union Pacific railroad runs up the Smoky Hill route they cannot form a junction east of the hundredth meridian.

"Mr. BROWN. They can form a junction with the other branch by striking out the words 'eastern division.' All I desire is to give them a connection in any event.

"Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The probability is that the two roads will be separated—that the northern branch will run on the north side of the Platte, and the eastern division branch will run up the Smoky Hill. In that case they will be permitted to connect at any point.

"Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Missouri will strike out the words 'eastern division,' he will accomplish all that he desires.

"Mr. BROWN. I propose to strike out those words. "Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Why limit them at all? Why not permit them either to connect with the Union Pacific or with the Northern Pacific at any point?"

"Mr. BROWN. That will suit just as well; and if the Senator will draw up an amendment in that shape I shall have no objection to it.

"Mr. POMEROY. The only difficulty about that is that the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company have got the grant south of the road leading from Omaha. I have no objection to the amendment, but I am satisfied they cannot do that.

"Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Senator from Missouri will accomplish his object by striking out the words 'eastern division on the Republican river'; so that it will read:

"To a junction with the Pacific railroad in Kansas, every alternate section of land," &c.

"Mr. BROWN. Very well; I accept that. "THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as modified.

"The amendment was agreed to. "The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in.

"The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed."

Because the eastern division was to run up the Smoky Hill, and because the fact was accepted by the Senate, an amendment was adopted striking out a connection with the eastern division in the valley of the Republican fork, and it was put simply that they might run westward of that valley.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the honorable Senator from New York allow me to call his attention to one fact?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. That debate, as I understand, took place on the 21st of March, 1866. On the 4th of March, 1866, this central branch company had filed its map with the Secretary of the Interior as it now exists; and in June, 1865, the eastern division—

Mr. CONKLING. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but I beg him to consider that afterward. I am coming to those precise points, and unless he wishes to set me right on some matter of fact, I crave of the Senator the privilege of finishing my remarks, if he will do me the favor to allow me to do so.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to set the Senator right with respect to the filing of the map of the eastern division.

Mr. CONKLING. I have not alluded to any such thing. Without being discourteous, I beg the Senator to allow me to proceed, unless I fall into some error of fact. I have made no reference to that subject, and therefore I cannot have misstated the fact. I have made no reference whatever to the time when that map was filed. The point, from which I am sure the honorable Senator does not wish to divert me or the Senate, is this: that at this time, on the 21st of March, 1866, such proceedings took place in the Senate that Mr. Lane, of Kansas, said this:

"The Senator from Missouri will accomplish his object by striking out the words 'eastern division on the Republican river,' so that it will read: 'to a junction with the Pacific railroad in Kansas, every alternate section of land,' &c.

I am calling attention to the fact not only that these claimants knew that no connection was to be gained by going up the Republican valley, but that so thoroughly was that fact established that Congress based legislation upon it, instituted special alterations in the bill then pending, as reported by the committee, in order that those might be too late who come now to say that the central branch, or anybody else, believed at that time that a connection was to be gained by traversing the Republican valley.

Now, Mr. President, at this time had the central branch of the Pacific railroad or its stockholders, invested large sums of money? At this time had the railroad been built from Atchison to Irving, where it lies now? At this time had the railroad been built or graded from Atchison to a point from which it would have been inconvenient or uneconomical to proceed to Topeka or to Manhattan? That is the point to which the whole course of equity must go at this juncture of the discussion. Let us see; this was March, 1866. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury addressed to me on the 22d June, 1868, in answer to a letter of inquiry:

SIR: In reply to your inquiries I have the honor to state that the first section of twenty miles of the Atchison and Pike's Peak railroad (now Union Pacific Railroad Company, Central Branch) was accepted by the President of the United States July 12, 1866, and bonds of the United States to the amount of $320,000 were issued on said section by this Department on the 27th of July, 1866, bearing date July 19, 1866.

Yours, respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH.

Mr. President, we all know the hot-foot with which all these owners of subsidies make haste to bring to a technical and formal completion each section of their road, to the end that they may acquire at once the bonds which follow its completion, and we shall therefore understand how much of diligence there was in this case, and how nearly it fixes the date. We have, then, the fact that on the 12th day of July, 1866, twenty miles had been finished. I have no doubt that additional miles had been graded; and I had in my possession at the end of the last session, in a bundle of papers, the evidence precisely how far it was graded, but I have searched for it in vain. But let us concede, for the sake of the argument, that when twenty miles had been completed twenty more miles had been graded and were all ready to be ironed. It was not so; but let us suppose it was. Did that reach any point which made Topeka inconvenient? I ask Senators to look at the map. More emphatically, did it reach a point which made Manhattan a deviation from the route which they were pursuing? No, sir; not at all. On the contrary, twenty miles and forty miles were in the direction, as the whole road, lying as it does now, is sufficiently in the direction, of a connection at Manhattan. How can it be true, then, even in the estimation of those who believe that this was a losing business, or a costly business, that any stockholder invested money in the central branch upon the faith of a connection in the valley of the Republican fork? It cannot be so, even if you admit that they had a right to select the route they did, which they had not.

But let me ask the attention of the Senate to the next point for a moment. Is it true that Congress, after the claimants' rights vested, ever caused or permitted a change of route of the eastern division before it reached a point at which a union would have occurred with the road the claimants were authorized to build? What did Congress do? The war had paralyzed railroad operations in that region of country, had arrested surveys, and for upward of two years the eastern division had been lying on its oars. The rebellion was prostrated and work was resumed. Comparative surveys began, and on the 21st of February, 1866, the president of the road addressed to the Interior Department a letter saying that the surveys which they had thus been able to complete demonstrated that the Republican valley route was one hundred and thirty-four miles longer than the Smoky Hill route, demonstrated that it was deficient in fuel, deficient in timber for construction, and that the other route was the best. Congress extended the time until the next December within which the eastern division company might do precisely what all the time it had for three years the right to do, of which right it had been practically deprived by the interruption of the war. That was all, sir; and that act was passed on the 3d day of July, 1866, nine days before the claimants' first twenty miles were completed.

Mr. President, let me pause here only for a moment, to ask the Senate to consider the true nature of this legislative act which has been spoken of as one changing the route of the eastern division, giving that company a right to go on a new route, and described otherwise as influential upon this question. What was it? For three years they had the absolute right to complete and perfect their surveys and their maps, and during all those three years no human being had a right to estop them or Congress by predicating any act upon any hypothesis as to what they would do. When they came with such diligence as they could use after the war was over to present their perfect surveys, the Attorney General, in an opinion which I have here, said no, this is only the right which the law gives them; but they are cut off by the statute of limitations, if I may so say. That was not his language, but the substance of it. In other words, he said the three years began on the passage of the original act, on the 1st of July, 1862, and it therefore expired on the 1st of July, 1865, and now some months had intervened, and technically they were cut off. What did Congress do? Simply released them from the statute of limitations.

I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts nearest to me, [Mr. WILSON,] for I have heard him observe upon this, (although the question whether it was wise or not is of no materiality here,) whether it was exceptional legislation to relieve from the statute of limitations a party who by the war had been hindered and prevented from a diligent pursuit of his rights? Did we not pass laws abrogating the statute of limitations for other parties, and were they more meritorious than these? Will that honorable Senator say that it would have been wise for us to coerce the eastern division to build a road one hundred and thirty-four miles in addition to the necessary length by a route which their survey showed was deficient in timber for construction and fuel for use; and that, forsooth, because the long scissors of the rebellion had reached and clipped their movements?

What harm came to these claimants from it? As I have shown, in the meantime they had done nothing which they would not have done had they intended to end their road at Manhattan, or even at Topeka; and yet we are gravely asked now to find it not only as a general proposition, argued as such questions usually are, that it is wise and right to grant this subsidy, but that such a wrong was done by Congress, that such injustice befell these parties because we released the eastern division from the rigorous operation of the statute of limitations, that by existing law, as it is sometimes said, according to some refined and perfected equity, as I have heard it repeated, we are bound to make the enormous provision proposed by this bill. Why, sir, since I traversed this ground, as I have done during the interval between the last discussion and now, when I have heard this plea urged many times in private and put forward in papers as a part of the unexampled diligence in the lobby by which this claim has been pressed, I have felt inclined to exclaim, as another man did on a different occasion, "Oh, that in England there might be a tax upon hypocrisy!"

Now, Mr. President, the bill and the argument propose that subsidies shall begin, not where the eastern division would have been found had it gone through the Republican valley, but at the western terminus of the central branch. This implies that there is no intervening space there. This implies that a hundred miles from St. Joseph, Missouri, would have carried the claimants in the direction they took to a connection in the Republican valley. When I pointed out that a long interval existed here over which no past act of Congress and no past understanding could be stretched by any perversion or imagination, I was told by the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad had fallen into a mistake when they said that there was an interval of fifty miles. Said the honorable Senator from Kansas, "I am as much amazed at the Senator from New York as if he were to say it is fifty miles from Albany to Troy; I have driven over it repeatedly, and it is not fifteen miles;" and so the debates, which I have here, report the honorable Senator from Kansas. Sir, here is a map [exhibiting it] made by Franklin Fanning, the chief engineer of this central branch company, sworn to by him in an oath annexed to it, giving the route of the road, and giving the sections; and if any Senator doubts that one hundred miles could never have carried these parties to a connection, if any Senator doubts that this bill is a douceur, a gratuity upon their own showing of $640,000, which they never could have received under preëxisting understandings, I beg that Senator to look for one moment at this map, where he can count in a moment by the sections the distance. There starts the road at Atchison, and runs to Irving, in the valley of the Big Blue, and at Clifton is the point in the Republican valley at which they aim, and there are the sections to count the townships, six miles each, showing precisely what, according to their own survey, this interval is.

Mr. DAVIS. How much is the interval?

Mr. CONKLING. I will count it. It is in a straight line by townships, six in number; and six times six are thirty-six; so that if they could run in an air-line, which the Senator will see the surveyed route does not at all propose to do, then there would be an interval of the length which I stated in answer to the honorable Senator's question.

Now, Mr. President, has the genius or the ability of Benjamin R. Curtis enabled him to devise an argument showing that from the western terminus of their road they have a plausible claim for subsidies? I beg Senators to look at that argument, and they will find no such thing; and I think Judge Curtis is in no danger of stultifying himself by writing even an argument to that effect. I do not call it an opinion, because it is no opinion in any professional or truthful sense of that word.

But, again, suppose I am mistaken in these propositions; suppose, in truth, they were authorized to make a connection not within the one hundred miles, but wherever they pleased; suppose the eastern division was bound to go there, and Congress is to blame because it did not go there, then a very important question remains. Suppose the claimants were right in going northwest to Irving, as they have done; suppose they were entitled to a connection there and have lost it by the act or privity of Congress, are such subsidies as these necessary or appropriate to make them whole?

Since this bill was under discussion before—the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] I think forgot it—an act has been passed by the Senate extending and fixing the route of the eastern division, so that it extends now, according to that bill, to Cheyenne Wells. From Cheyenne Wells it is to go to Denver, and from the city of Cheyenne, which is on the Union Pacific road, a railroad is to be built to Denver, making a connection; so that under the legislation—completed as far as this body is concerned—there is to be a continuous rail, I say to the honorable Senator from Indiana, not only from Manhattan to the main trunk Pacific railroad, but from Atchison, from St. Joseph, from Hannibal, from Indianapolis, from Harrisburg, from New York.

Mr. YATES. I ask the Senator if he will yield for a motion to go into executive session?

Mr. CONKLING. I do not wish, certainly, when I am on the floor, to interpose what might seem to be somewhat of mine against any wish of other Senators. If the Senator wishes to test the sense of the Senate on that motion I will yield for it, of course.

Mr. YATES. If the Senator will yield I move that the Senate go into executive session. ["No!" "No!"]

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 18, noes 24.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President—

* Mr. CONKLING. I beg my honorable friend not to divert me any further. I would do almost anything for him; but I want to bring my remarks to a conclusion very soon, which I will do if he will allow me to go on.

Mr. CAMERON. I will not do "almost anything," but I will do anything for my friend from New York. Of course, I shall not interfere with his wishes.

Mr. CONKLING. I see the disposition of the honorable Senator to oblige me, and therefore I will go on.

At this point, Mr. President, I should neglect the purpose I have in view if I did not make clear to the understanding of Senators who do me the honor to listen to my remarks that upon undisputed facts the eastern division sought the Smoky Hill route in preference to the Republican valley, because it was not only more practicable, not only abounding in fuel to a greater extent and in timber for construction, but especially and primarily because it gave a connection with Denver and the Union Pacific railroad one hundred and thirty-four miles nearer than the route up the Republican valley. I should fail equally if I omitted to press the point that the eastern division, as it is now located and extended by the act of the Senate, passes precisely where it was designed to pass originally, at every point east of the furthest west of all the points at which a union could have been made by the claimants within one hundred miles; and that it furnishes not only a connection for the claimants with the main trunk road, but the very connection the loss of which they mourn. It furnishes a connection with the eastern division railway, shortened by one hundred and thirty-four miles and improved in its location.

This, as we all remember, was one of the arguments and the chief argument upon which, near the close of the last session, the bill to which I refer succeeded in the Senate. It was stated by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN], a member of the Pacific Railway Committee, when the bill was taken up, that his support of it in committee and his view of it in the Senate was that it would furnish to the claimants here their long-lost connection and dispense with the urgency and the materiality of this measure. It did so, why? Because, carrying the road by the aid of the Government to Cheyenne Wells, it carried it so far that those who have traversed that country well know that a road coming, as it will, from the city of Cheyenne to Denver will go along the Cherry Creek valley and meet this road at Cheyenne Wells, and only a short line will be necessary to do it. Therefore, I say that bill accomplished that purpose, and gave to these claimants the connection which they insist they lost.

Their western terminus now is Irving. If Senators will take the trouble to consult the map they will see that a valley runs from Irving to Manhattan. I understood it to be stated in this Chamber at the last session—I have not looked at the report of debates, and therefore I will not make the allegation—but I understood it to be stated that it was over sixty miles from the existing western terminus of the eastern division to Manhattan or Junction City. I could not then deny, I felt hardly at liberty to doubt, that statement. Now, having passed over the ground, I am able to doubt it, and prudently to say to the Senate that thirty-five miles of railroad from the western existing terminus will give the claimants a connection, at Junction City, at Fort Riley, at Manhattan, as they please, less than thirty-five miles at Manhattan and thirty-five miles at Junction City.

Can any Senator see a reason, even taking the whole argument made in favor of the bill, why we should supply them a connection, by giving one hundred and fifty miles of subsidies, when thirty-five miles of construction will give them the same connection which they sought originally, and by a route looking to their ultimate destination, shortened one hundred and thirty-four miles?

But, again, Mr. President, not only are bonds and lands for one hundred and fifty miles proposed, fifty miles of which no existing law and no past understanding can be stretched to cover, but the same rate of subsidies is insisted upon which was thought proper on the 2d of July, 1864. Have Senators thought of the rate of these subsidies, and the propriety of that rate? On the 2d of July, 1864, when this rate was fixed, gold was $2 30 and foreign rails cost $1 27 a ton, currency. Now, when we propose to fix them, gold is less than one dollar and forty cents and rails cost, I should think, about eighty dollars a ton. That is not far from the mark; if it is not exactly the mark some Senator will correct me. Look at labor, freights, materials, every element of value and every increment of cost. At the time when this tariff was established the expense of railroad construction was perhaps not double but nearly double its present cost; and yet, in spite of all the facts, as I insist, we are to find that the claimants have been damnedified, and then by way of putting them in status quo, we are not to furnish them thirty-five miles of construction, which is the whole necessity to restore the old and lost connection, but we are to furnish them one hundred and fifty miles—and at what prices? At twice the cost measured by the gold market, the iron market, the material and the freight market, which, in truth, the present justifies.

Mr. President, there are a good many other considerations about this measure with which I do not mean to detain the Senate. There are one or two to which I venture to call attention before taking my seat. The lands which are sought here do not belong to the United States at all. I had information of that sort when the former debate took place, but I had not knowledge, and it was disposed of upon the statement made by an honorable Senator of his recollection or information. Now, I affirm that these lands proposed to be given do not belong to the Government at all, and hence, I suppose, is the retroactive and peculiar phraseology of the bill, not proceeding straight to the point of saying that lands are granted, but constructively acting back and speaking behind some past legislation in point of time. Sir, these lands have gone by act of Congress to the St. Joseph and Denver Railroad Company. The honorable Senator from Michigan thought before that the acts were contemporaneous—the act chartering the St. Joseph and Denver Railroad Company and the act extending the time to file the map which led to the adoption of the Smoky Hill route.

That will be found to be an error; and upon his recollection the honorable Senator founded the suggestion that the lands could not have gone to the company of which I speak, because the acts being contemporaneous would not lead to that conclusion. The act under which the Smoky Hill route was adopted, and which transferred to other lands the right of the eastern division, was passed on the 3d of July, 1866. The St. Joseph and Denver Railroad Company act was passed on the 23d of July, 1866, and it carried these very lands. Now, that I need not speak in the air on that subject, I ask the attention of the Senate to the notes accompanying "Keeler's map of the United States territory," where it will be found that the St. Joseph and Denver Railroad Company received a land grant by the act of the 23d of July, 1866, for a road running from St. Joseph city to Denver city, and running, I will say to Senators, a large part of the way within ten miles of this central branch, and in some instances within five miles. To that company has been set off and assigned land to the amount of one million seven hundred thousand acres in alternate sections along its route, the very lands which it is proposed now to subject by retroactive legislation to the claimants here.

Mr. President, what is to be said of the equity of the St. Joseph and Denver Railway Company, a corporation which received no money subsidies—simply a grant of lands—a company which is proceeding to build its road from St. Joseph to Denver? What is to be said to them, to their equities, when, by legislation relating back and ousting them of vested rights, we have deprived them of the lands to which they are entitled by our own legislation, and which have been set off to them by departmental action? I was told at the last session that these lands were in a rainless region, comparatively very valueless. Oh, no, Mr. President, not that. I have passed over them on horseback and looked at them carefully since we talked of it before. There is very little land there which will not bear not only buffalo grass but gramma grass—the gramma grass of Mexico, almost as nutritious as oats. There are very few places where the seed of a sunflower dropped—and that is a pretty good test of the soil—will not spring up into vigorous and luxuriant growth. There is a very narrow belt which will not in the progress of time serve, and well serve, for grazing, if not for agriculture.

These lands then are of value, and they have inured by act of Congress to the St. Joseph and Denver Railroad Company; and now, although the subsidy has once been given in equivalent quantity to the eastern division, it is proposed to give it over again to the claimants and thus leave ourselves naked, absolutely naked of all defense against these other claimants, when they come here saying, "We received no subsidy in money; we received simply these grants of land; we have possessed them; we have embarked our money; we have entered upon our project of improvement, and with no fault, no laches, no blame in us, we have been ruthlessly robbed by Congress after diligently prosecuting the work they set before us."

It was said, Mr. President, that this company existed only on paper—was a thing without a local habitation if it had a name. I have taken some pains to learn how that is, and I have in my hand a statement furnished me by the Representative of the district in which this road starts; and I beg to read, as it is very brief, the questions and answers:

"1. When did the St. Joseph and Denver Railroad Company begin to build its road?"

The answer is—

"Prior to 1860; work was stopped on account of the rebellion."

"Troy, in Kansas, is about twelve miles from St. Joseph—the distance is not less than twelve miles; it may be greater."

"The road is graded fifteen miles, as I was informed some two weeks since"—

This letter was written some eight months ago, I should say—

"by Judge Woodson, the managing director of the St. Joseph and Denver City Railroad Company; the track is being laid and will be laid, to Troy by the 1st April, proximo."

That was last April.

"The available assets of the company, as shown by the official statements of its officers, exceed $1,000,000. As soon as it is built to a point where its land grant can be made available it will be able to command ample means for its further construction."

"It has encountered many difficulties so far, because it has to be prosecuted as an enterprise in competition with the central branch Pacific road, which has received subsidies from the Government sufficient for its construction. I cannot say how far it will be built this season. It is the purpose of the company to build it without unnecessary delay. The business of the country demands the speedy construction of this road, and it will be built."

"The route of the road runs from St. Joseph, Missouri, via Marysville, in Kansas, to Denver City, Colorado."

"It claims and is entitled to all the public lands (ten sections per mile) within a distance of twenty miles on each side of the road which are not included in the grant to the Central Branch Pacific railroad."

For the first one hundred miles they are included; but beyond that, according to this statement, they are claimed by this company:

"The Central Branch Pacific railroad, having the prior grant, absorbs all the land for the length of that road—one hundred miles; the St. Joseph and Denver City road takes the remainder to the one hundredth degree of longitude."

That is not signed by Mr. LOAN; the signature is accidentally omitted. I have a note which he sent immediately afterward, saying that it had just occurred to him that he had forgotten to sign it, and now affixes his signature to it.

Thus, Mr. President, you see not only that these lands have reverted to another party, but that, pursuing by private enterprise without Government subsidy its work, a road is being constructed parallel with the central branch, running at times within a very short distance of it, which will furnish it a second connection onward to Denver and the main branch Pacific road.

There is, Mr. President, one other subject. I will endeavor to confine myself to that, although this debate is, if not tempting, provocative of continuance. When it is gravely charged that those who object to this bill are coming very near advocating repudiation one naturally feels like justifying the faith that is in him, and particularly if he believes as I believe, that in all that cloud of railroad bills which would darken legislation if they could fairly get loose upon it, there is not one less meritorious than this, it is rather difficult to abstain from assigning, perhaps at undue length, the reasons which occur. We have been told that this was a hardship and bad investment. I wish, Mr. President, that I could step into the shoes of these unfortunates; I wish I could receive a true account of the sums that have been realized and an assignment of the franchises and ownership of this road. Such an assignment would bring to me among other things "the celebrated Kickapoo lands"—I speak now in the language of an advertisement which I am going to read—would bring to me a body of land which alone (rejecting all grants) added to the $16,000 a mile of Government subsidies renders this investment a harvest to those who enjoy it. I have the Atchison Daily Press of Monday evening, June 1, 1866. It is broadly occupied—the present occupant of the chair [Mr. ANTHONY] would understand how to describe it with an utter contempt of the columns which ordinarily divide matters in newspapers—with this advertisement:

"Land, Land.—The Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company now offer for sale their land within a district forty by one hundred miles in extent, containing in the aggregate one million two hundred and eighty thousand acres, and including the celebrated Kickapoo Indian reservation."

"Land on three, four, six, and ten years' credit. "Land at one, two, three, five, and ten dollars per acre."

There are various other things which I do not read, but here is one item:

"The Kickapoo lands are not taxable."

In another newspaper, The Weekly Free Press, published at Atchison, Kansas, on the second of May, 1868, I find on both sides an advertisement, illustrated by wood-cuts, I suppose, and well illustrated, looking to the direction which they took in going via Atchison toward Pike's Peak:

"The Central Branch Union Pacific railroad, diverging from the city of Atchison, has reached a point in its construction most encouraging to its managers and to the varied interests which are so visibly affected by the operations of this great enterprise."

And then follows an enumeration of these lands, and there appears a map giving the location and direction, at which I wish that every Senator might look; but more especially there appears on the other side of the sheet a map giving the location and extent of the Kickapoo reservation, and giving some other facts about this line:

"Along the line of the railroad, as shown in the accompanying map, and for a distance of twenty miles on either side of the same, the railroad company are offering for sale and settlement all the unoccupied odd sections of land, amounting to several hundred thousand acres, at prices ranging from one to ten dollars per acre, and upon terms to suit the purchaser."

And in the same paper I find other matter stating that—

"Land ranges all the way from the Government price to four, ten, fifteen, twenty, and forty dollars per acre, according to the location and the improvements."

These Kickapoo lands came to the central branch under a treaty which might properly be made a part of this case, and I think those who understand the value of these lands will not say that I am far out of the way in stating that they have been sold for more than eight dollars an acre, and that more than half a million dollars in money has been already realized from the sale of the Kickapoo lands.

It occurs to me that that form of statement may be open to some criticism. I do not mean that the money has been paid down, but I mean the lands have been sold and the money paid or abundantly secured with interest, as I am informed and believed.

Can anybody credit, in the light of notorious facts concerning the cost of railroad construction, that with such a patrimony as is referred to in these advertisements a company has been impoverished by constructing a railway across a flat country, with a subsidy of $16,000 a mile from the Government, and first mortgage bonds of their own for $16,000 more a mile? I am persuaded, Mr. President, that in fact no hardship exists in this case, that this investment has been not only a good but a most desirable one, one saleable in the market upon large terms of profit. Therefore, sir, I conclude—

First. That the claimants laid their road where they did at their peril without authority of law, and certainly without any right either to expect or claim a connection.

Second. That had they built it where it was designed to go, where Colton in the map of Kansas lays it down, a junction would have been found within one hundred miles at Topeka, Manhattan, or Fort Riley.

Third. That by extending the time to the eastern division no injury was wrought to the claimants, because then they had done nothing committing them to a location which they could not change.

Fourth. That in every aspect of the case the relief proposed is excessive, inordinate, unjustifiable.

Thus, Mr. President, I have assigned (in a manner prolix and tedious to the Senate, I fear) my reasons, which are not as fresh in my mind as they were some months ago, for believing this bill an unmeritorious one. It has been pressed upon us with great persistence—I do not refer to what has occurred within this Chamber, I beg to say to honorable Senators. It has been pressed upon us by that lion which roars sometimes, as we heard from an honorable Senator awhile ago; it has been pressed upon us by the roaring lion of the lobby, with an assiduity, with a pertinacity, with an enterprise never equalled during my brief experience in this body as far as I know. Every stone has been turned, every nerve has been strained, every confusion has been produced, to which effort was added.

And now at last, Mr. President, it seems to me the facts lead inexorably to the conclusion that this is the naked case of a party seeking subsidies, who not only has no special or extraordinary right, but who stands already as the recipient of great Congressional favor. So regarding it, it falls in my estimation within that category, within that class of measures forbidden, not by a ranting and affected economy, not by a mode of conducting legislation properly the subject of criticism anywhere, but forbidden by that conscientious circumspection which behoves every man now when called to pass upon a question between the burdened people of this country and claimants approaching the public Treasury. It seems to me, Mr. President, if there be anything in the pretensions of gentlemen, if there be any deference to the public judgment, if there be any respect for the facts in the presence of which we stand, anything in the situation of the nation groaning under a burden of taxation which every man is compelled to remember, there is something which should take effect upon a measure like this.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I desire to say but a very few words—

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator allow me to offer an amendment to be printed?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

SUFFRAGE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. DIXON. I gave notice on Saturday of an amendment to the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution affecting suffrage in the several States. I now ask that the amendment be printed. It is in line four, to strike out the words "Legislatures in the several States" and insert "conventions in the several States to be elected in the manner prescribed by the laws of said States," and in line six to strike out the word "Legislatures" and insert "conventions." I submit this amendment for the purpose of having it printed with the other amendments.

The amendment was received, and ordered to be printed.

WESTERN MILITARY CLAIMS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Wisconsin will give way for a moment, I desire to call attention to a joint resolution on which the House of Representatives has asked for a committee of conference.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will yield if the pending measure is not displaced.

On motion by Mr. TRUMBULL, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendment to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 404) providing for the disposition of certain papers relating to the military claims accruing in the department of the West, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. TRUMBULL, it was Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendment to the said resolution disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President—
Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. With the permission of the Senator, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not wish to prevent the taking of the sense of the Senate on that subject if they feel disposed to vote on that motion. I will yield to allow the sense of the Senate to be taken on that question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice that I shall try to get up the finance bill to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, January 25, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. CHARLES E. LORD, of Vermont.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of the States, and Territories for bills and joint resolutions to be referred to their appropriate committees and not to be brought back upon a motion to reconsider, during which resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented, beginning with the State of Maine.

THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. KELSEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1764) to provide for funding and paying the national debt, and for taxing interest-bearing bonds hereafter issued by the United States and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

RELIEF OF PAYMASTERS.

Mr. MORRELL introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1765) for the relief of paymasters; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COLLECTION DISTRICTS.

Mr. THOMAS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1766) to amend the act of February 25, 1867, entitled "An act to change certain collection districts in Maryland and Virginia;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PROTECTION OF THE REVENUE.

Mr. HEATON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1767) to repeal the fourteenth section of an act entitled "An act to protect the revenue, and for other purposes," approved July 28, 1866; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

SOUTH CAROLINA ELECTION.

Mr. WHITTEMORE introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 415) for a select committee of seven to investigate irregularities in the recent election in the State of South Carolina, especially in the third and fourth congressional districts of said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

DISABILITIES OF CITIZENS OF GEORGIA.

Mr. CLIFT introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1768) to relieve from legal and political disabilities certain citizens of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. CLIFT also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1769) asking an appropriation to improve the navigation of the Savannah river; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

DISABILITIES OF CHARLES C. CROWE.

Mr. CALLIS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1770) to relieve from all political disabilities Charles C. Crowe, a citizen of the State of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. CALLIS. I ask that the bill be printed.

Mr. BECK. I object to the printing of bills asking relief from disabilities. There are a great number of them, and there is no occasion to print them.

The SPEAKER. It is not usual to print such bills.

CANAL AROUND BIG MUSSEL SHOALS.

Mr. HAUGHEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1771) for the construction of a canal around the Big Mussel shoals in the Tennessee river; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DISABILITIES OF SAMUEL M. MORROW.

Mr. HAUGHEY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1772) to relieve Samuel M. Morrow, of Alabama, from legal and political disabilities; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

REDUCTION OF OCEAN POSTAGE.

Mr. KELLOGG introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 416) directing the Postmaster General to open negotiations with the several European Governments with whom we have postal treaties for a further reduction of the rates of international postage; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. KELLOGG presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, respecting the national aid for internal improvements in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ALABAMA LAND GRANT.

Mr. KELLOGG also presented a memorial and joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Alabama, relative to a grant of lands for railroad purposes; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

Mr. KELLOGG also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 417) for the removal of legal and political disabilities from certain citizens of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

LAND GRANTS TO ALABAMA.

Mr. BUCKLEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1773) to revive and renew certain grants of public lands to the State of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

REPRESENTATION OF FREEDMEN.

Mr. PIERCE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1774) making provision for the representation of two fifths of such persons as heretofore have been held in slavery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN E. REESIDE.

Mr. GARFIELD introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 418) for the relief of John E. Reeside and his sub-contractors; which was read a first and second time, referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CAUSES REMOVED FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1775) to amend the act of July 18, 1867, for the removal of causes from State to Federal courts; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JOHN T. KIRK.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1776) for the relief of John T. Kirk, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee of Claims.

POST ROUTE IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. HAWKINS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1777) to establish a post route in Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

AUGUSTINE AND LOUISA HOLTZMAN.

Mr. HUNTER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1778) for the relief of Augustine Holtzman and Louisa Holtzman, his wife, of Indiana, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

J. C. M'QUISTON AND J. D. SKEEN.

Mr. HUNTER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1779) for the relief of John C. McQuiston and Jeremiah D. Skeen, of Indiana, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CHARLES RICHARDS.

Mr. COBURN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1780) for the relief of Charles Richards; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

NATIONAL CEMETERIES.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 419) in relation to printing the collection of the proceedings at the soldiers' graves in May last; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

WILLIAM H. H. ALDEN.

Mr. COOK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1781) to increase the pension of William H. H. Alden; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SCHOONER CARASSO MARINO.

Mr. BURR introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1782) to authorize the registry of the schooner Carasso Marino; which was read a first and second time, and referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Commerce.

JOHN GOTHARD.

Mr. GRAVELY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1783) for the relief of John Gothard, guardian of minor child of John A. Gothard, late of company D, eighth Missouri State cavalry; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. GRAVELY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1784) to amend an act entitled "An act granting land to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific ocean," approved July 27, 1866, and to facilitate the early construction of the Atlantic and Pacific railroad, the Texas Pacific railroad, the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, the Southern Continental railroad, and Southern Pacific railroad, (of California;) which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROOTS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1785) to perfect and complete railroad and telegraph communication with the Pacific ocean; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FERRY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1786) to restore pensions to soldiers employed in the civil service and withheld prior to June, 1866; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ABIGAIL REYNOLDS.

Mr. UPSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1787) increasing the pension of Abigail Reynolds, widow of Benoni Reynolds, a soldier of the revolutionary war; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812.

BARKS MARY JANE AND CAMBRIA.

Mr. DRIGGS introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 420) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to the bark Mary Jane and the bark Cambria; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

COURTS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1788) to amend an act to reorganize the courts of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

IOWA AND KANSAS RAILROAD.

Mr. PRICE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1789) to authorize the construction of a railroad from Davenport, in the State of Iowa, to Topeka, in the State of Kansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

WAR DEPARTMENT—INDIAN BUREAU.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, memorializing Congress in favor of the transfer of the control of Indian affairs from the Department of the Interior to the War Department; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SCHOOL LANDS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. TAFTE introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 421) explanatory of an act to authorize the selection of school districts in lieu of the sixteenth section within the twelve miles square reservation, in the State of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

IOWA AND NEBRASKA RAILROAD.

Mr. TAFTE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1790) granting land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Sioux City, Iowa, to Columbus, Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

COLUMBIA RIVER RAILROAD.

Mr. FLANDERS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1791) authorizing the counties of Walla-Walla, Klickitat, Skamania, and Clarke, of the Territory of Washington, to aid in the construction of the Columbia River railroad; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS.

Mr. CHILCOTT presented a joint resolution (H. R. No. 422) relative to depredations committed by the Sioux, Cheyenne, Arapaho and Kiowa Indians on the western frontier settlements; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

POST ROADS IN IDAHO.

Mr. HOLBROOK introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1792) establishing post roads in the Territory of Idaho; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ALABAMA CLAIMS TREATY.

Mr. ROBINSON introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 423) protesting against the ratification of the treaty for the settlement of the Alabama claims; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF LOYAL MEN IN THE SOUTH.

Mr. CORLEY introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 424) for the better protection of loyal men at the South; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

JAMES M. MARTIN.

Mr. CORLEY also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1793) to remove the political disabilities of James M. Martin, a citizen of South Carolina; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

SOUTHERN EXPRESS COMPANY.

Mr. PRINCE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1794) to incorporate the Southern Express Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT OF THE INDIANS.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1795) to create a department of Indian affairs, and to provide for the consolidation, civilization, and government of the Indian tribes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying memorial, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the memorial which I have presented in connection with the bill just referred is from the representatives of seven yearly meetings of the religious society of Friends in fifteen States—Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Michigan, Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Kansas. This document presents in a clear and brief manner the condition of Indian affairs in this country, and will, I think, be interesting to all the members of the House. I desire, therefore, that the memorial be ordered to be printed in the Globe. There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the undersigned, representatives of seven yearly meetings of the religious society of Friends in the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Michigan, Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Kansas, respectfully represents:

That we have met in the city of Baltimore unitedly to consider our Christian duty in reference to the present condition of the Indians of our country.

While thus engaged, having before us the report of the joint special committee of Congress upon the "condition of the Indian tribes," printed January 26, 1867, and that of the "Indian peace commission, January 14, 1868," and subsequent reports of the civil and military proceedings in reference to the Indians, we have realized the deep responsibility which rests upon all members of a community professing to be Christians in their dealings and intercourse with the feeble remnants of the aboriginal inhabitants of this land.

In contemplating the disgraceful facts revealed in those reports and the admission of our own witnesses that our wars with the Indians, which have been almost constant, have been uniformly caused by injustice on the part of our white citizens and of Government officials,* we are reminded of the fact that the treaty of the Indians with William Penn was faithfully kept during the seventy years in which the government of Pennsylvania was administered upon the principles of its founder; and history tells us that "while the surrounding colonies were ever and anon at war with the Indians, and the scalping-knife and tomahawk brought death and terror to many a hearth, the Pennsylvanians and all their possessions remained unharmed." "The Indians remembered the treaty with the sons of Onas (Penn) and kept it inviolate."

Is there any reason to suppose that the Indians of the present day are less disposed to be faithful to their engagements than were their ancestors? The testimony of Colonel Bent, confirmed by other witnesses, before the joint committee above referred to, states, after thirty-six years' experience in the vicinity of the Indians against whom the United States Army is now engaged in hostile operations, that nearly every instance of difficulties between the Indians and the whites during his residence there were from aggressions on the Indians by the whites. And after giving an interesting detail of the causes which have directly or indirectly led to the present deplorable state of affairs, this experienced witness closed his testimony with these remarkable words: "If the matter were left to me I would guaranty with my life that in three months I could have all the Indians along the Arkansas at peace without the expense of war."

But we do not desire to dwell upon the sickening history of the past except to guard against its repetition in the future. While the white men whose brutal murders have brought upon many innocent settlers the vengeance of an outraged savage foetill go unpunished, and with blood upon their hands demand the extermination of the Indians, many of the tribes, both innocent and guilty of retaliation, have been destroyed by the sword, and their survivors have been reduced to subjection and have submitted themselves to the sense of justice in the white man's breast.

*"But it is said that our wars with them have been almost constant. Have we been uniformly unjust? We answer unhesitatingly, yes." See Peace Commissioners' Report, signed by Taylor, Henderson, Sherman, Harney, Sanborn, Terry, Tappan, and Augur, January 7, 1863.

While we have no sympathy with wrong or outrage of any kind, we cannot but express the hope that the further shedding of blood shall cease, and that the leniency which becomes a powerful nation may be extended to the children of the forest, who have been struggling for their right to live upon the soil of their ancestors.

"Mercy to him that shows it, is the rule
And righteous limitation of its act,
By which Heaven moves in pardoning guilty man;
And he that shows none, being ripe in years,
And conscious of the outrage he commits,
Shall seek it, and not find it, in his turn."

We have watched with deep interest and highly appreciate the evident desire of Congress to remedy the gross evils and abuses of our Indian system. We have no doubt that the proposal to place the Indian affairs in the control of the War Department has been dictated by motives of humanity, both to the interest of the Indians and the honor of the nation. While, however, we sympathize with our fellow-citizens in their desire to remedy these evils, we feel anxious that no retrograde course shall be adopted in these respects. The reasons which induced Congress in former years to remove these affairs from the War Department still exist, if possible, in greater degree. The loathsome disease which has destroyed thousands, and which now enfeebles and degrades most of the tribes, must be traced to licentious intercourse between the soldiers and the Indians. The demoralization to all parties from this cause is beyond estimate, and we respectfully submit that every consideration of principle and honor demand that the untutored Indian, who now looks to us for the arts of civilized life, upon which he must hereafter mainly depend, should be kept as far as possible from contact with dissolute and licentious men.

When we reflect upon the boundless evils of such contact, and the outrages to which they have been subjected, we can appreciate the remark of the indignant chief who said to your commissioners, "The white people treat us worse than the wolves do."

As professing Christians we have the utmost reliance upon the power of God upon the human heart; and we are confident that the faithful exercise of the principles and commands of our Lord Jesus Christ will be found sufficient to solve the Indian question without military aid. If we have heretofore failed to convert these heathen to the adoption of those principles, it is not because they are deficient in strength for their object, but because of the corruption and unfaithfulness of men whose examples have dishonored the Christian name. "Whatever our people may choose to say of the insincerity or duplicity of the Indian would fail to express the estimate entertained by many Indians of the white man's character in this respect."

The evils which arise from the exercise of arbitrary power by subordinate military men is more than enough to counteract the good which might be expected from the influence of officers of high character for principle and honor; and we are forced to conclude that the experience of military influence as a whole in the past is no warrant to expect a more favorable result in the future.

We therefore have roid with much satisfaction the bill before the Senate, introduced by the Senator from Kansas, "to create a department of Indian affairs, and to provide for the consolidation, civilization, and government of the Indian tribes." We believe that in its general features it is well adapted to secure the important reforms so loudly called for. Let the effort be made in good faith to promote their education, their industry, their morality. Invite the assistance of the philanthropic and Christian effort which has been so valuable an aid in the elevation of the freedmen, and render it possible for justice and good example to restore that confidence which has been lost by injustice and cruelty.

We are informed that the policy of our neighbors on our northern frontier has resulted in peace with the Indians for a hundred years. It is our belief that the sooner the tribal relation is broken up, and the Indian population permanently attached to the land, and brought under the same laws, privileges, and responsibilities with the rest of the community, the better it will be for the whole country. The three hundred thousand Indians will then become a valuable aid in the development of the national wealth; and the tax-paying inhabitants of the land will be spared from contributing the untold millions now worse than wasted in Indian wars. So long as these lands continue to be held in common they will present irresistible temptation to avaricious men, and schemes for obtaining possession of them, such as that which was last year denounced by the House committee as a shameful outrage, will continue to be devised. We cannot refrain from expressing the hope that the bill above referred to may contain a provision which will hereafter effectually prevent all men from attempting thus to enrich themselves at the expense of the national honor.

The last occasion upon which the representatives of our religious society appeared unitedly before you was during the darkest days of our country's history. Congress then listened with patient interest to our appeals in behalf of the rights of conscience, and granted relief. We now rejoice that the subject of our appeal is on behalf of humanity, in the interests of peace, and for the practical maintenance of the principles of Christianity. We desire that in legislating upon the rights and interests of the aboriginal inhabitants of our highly favored land, you may remember that "righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people." May you be enabled, as representatives of a Christian nation, to legislate respecting the Indians in the fear of the Almighty, and be guided by His wisdom. On the one side is weakness, and on the other is power; therefore justice and mercy, kindness and liberality, commensurate with its greatness, concern alike the honor and the interests of the nation.

We desire to strengthen the hands of those who fearlessly advocate the right, and to remind all that the eye of Omnipotence rests upon us.

It is our prayer that the result of your action may redound to your own peace and to the interests and happiness of all the inhabitants of the land.

Signed on behalf of the representatives of the meetings aforesaid:

JOHN BUTLER,
ENOCH HOAG,
WILLIAM WOOD,
WILLIAM B. COLLINS,
AUGUSTUS TABER,
BENJAMIN TATHAM,
WILLIAM C. TABER,
GEORGE HOWLAND, Jr.,
GILBERT CONGDON,
RICHARD M. JANNEY,
FRANCIS T. KING,
JAMES C. THOMAS,
JAMES CAREY.

BALTIMORE, 1st Mo. 21, 1869.

PROTECTION OF CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. McKEE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1796) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means of their vindication," approved April 9, 1866, and to provide for its effectual enforcement; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SURETIES OF OTIS A. WHITEHEAD.

Mr. ROBERTSON introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1797) to relieve the sureties of Otis A. Whitehead, additional paymaster, from liability; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EUROPEAN MAIL CONTRACT.

Mr. GRISWOLD introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1798) to authorize a postal contract for the conveyance of the European mails with Francis Skiddy and others; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

RAILROAD IN IDAHO.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1799) to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Boise, in Idaho Territory, to the Humboldt river; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF ARKANSAS REPRESENTATIVES.

The SPEAKER. The call of the States for bills and joint resolutions having been completed, the next business in order is the calling of the States and Territories for resolutions, commencing with the State of Indiana, where the call rested at the expiration of the morning hour on Monday last.

Mr. SHANKS. In behalf of the delegation from Arkansas I offer the following resolution, and demand the previous question:

Whereas Representatives from the States of Louisiana and Tennessee were admitted to seats and paid for the full Congress within a few days of the close of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, while those States were represented in the confederate congress, and while the Representatives from Tennessee were admitted to seats and paid in full for the Thirty-Ninth Congress at nearly the same period in said Congress that the State of Arkansas was admitted to representation in the present Congress: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the members of this House from the State of Arkansas be paid for the full term of the Fortieth Congress; and that the heirs of James Hinds be paid the amount that would be due to him to the date of his death, and his successor be paid from that date.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. "I move to lay it on the table."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like to make an inquiry as to what the precedents are in reference to members elected after the congressional term commences.

The SPEAKER. The resolution in its language states what the gentleman claims are the precedents.

Mr. UPSON. It does not state all the precedents.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask leave to state the precedents.

The SPEAKER. There are two undebatable motions pending.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The gentleman himself has cut off debate by calling the previous question.

Mr. KERR. I desire to say on this subject that there is no precedent in this country.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to debate.

Mr. MAYNARD. Allow me to make a suggestion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Regular order.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will then ask a parliamentary question. Would it not be in order to move to refer the resolution to the Committee of Elections, or on Reconstruction, so that some general proposition might be brought in?

The SPEAKER. It would not pending the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. Another parliamentary question. If the present motion fails and the previous question is not sustained, will it not then be in order to move to refer the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will if some gentleman does not rise to debate it, when it must go over under the rule.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to ask when those members were elected?

Several members objected.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays on laying the resolution on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 78, nays 88, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Brouwell, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Calkins, Cary, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Delano, Elin, Eldridge, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Halsey, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Judd, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Loughridge, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Mercur, Moorhead, Niblack, Orth, Paine, Pike, Plants, Poland, Price, Baum, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Spaulding, Stevens, Stone, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Beck, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Boyden, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Rodrick R. Butler, Callis, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cliff, Cobb, Corley, Dawes, Deweese, Dockery, Donnelly, Eckley, Edward, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Golladay, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Grover, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Knott, Lash, Logan, Mallory, Maynard, Miller, Morrill, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, O'Neill, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Polesy, Prince, Randall, Robertson, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Starkweather, Stokes, Stover, Taffe, Thomas, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernum, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, Windom, and Young—88.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Axtell, Banks, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyer, Broomall, Coburn, Cornell, Covode, Cullum, Dickey, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Fox, Griswold, Haight, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Johnson, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Marshall, McKee, Moore, Morrissey, Mullins, Myers, Nunn, Pettis, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Prayn, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Sigreaves, Stewart, Sypher, Taber, Taylor, Tift, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and Wood—56.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The question recurred upon seconding the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the previous question is not seconded, will it be in order to move to refer the resolution so that it may be made to include all these gentlemen from the reconstructed States?

Mr. SHANKS. I object to a stump speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has intimated his intention to move to refer the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Why does the gentleman from Indiana confine his resolution to the Arkansas members?

Mr. SHANKS. The gentleman objects to those I have in the resolution. There will be time enough to attend to the others afterward.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. SHANKS. I cannot yield for that purpose.

The question was put on seconding the previous question; and there were—ayes 57, noes 76.

So the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and on that motion I move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman withdraw the previous question to allow me to move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. MAYNARD. No, sir; I am in favor of the proposition, and I know where it would go if it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations; it would go to the tomb of the Capulets.

Mr. POLAND. It seems to me that it would be more appropriate to refer this resolution to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for that motion to be made?

Mr. MAYNARD. I prefer that it should go to the Committee on Reconstruction; they have had the general subject before them.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections will not be called again this session.

Mr. MAYNARD. The Committee on Reconstruction can report at any time.

The question was put on seconding the previous question; and there were—ayes 79, noes 60.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred upon ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Will it be in order for the gentleman from Indiana to accept an amendment to the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot accept it unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope this question will be disposed of, and then the gentleman can bring his matter before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 63, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Boyden, Brewster, Buckle, Benjamin B. Butler, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Corley, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Jewkes, Eggleston, Dodge, Donnelly, Eekley, Edwards, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Perry, Fields, French, Gurfield, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Henton, Higby, Hopkins, Richard D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kelley, Kollogg, Koontz, Lash, Lincoln, Loan, Lynch, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Miller, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Nicholson, Norris, O'Neill, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Ross, Pike, Polisy, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Ross, Shanks, Smith, Starkweather, Stokes, Stone, Stover, Taff, Thomas, John Trimble, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Young—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Baker, Baldwin, Barnum, Beatty, Beck, Benton, Blair, Boutwell, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Roderick B. Butler, Calk, Cary, Chanler, Cook, Eia, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Halstead, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, Marvin, McCormick, McCullough, Mercer, Newsham, Niblack, Orth, Phelps, Plants, Poland, Randall, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spaulding, Stevens, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aiken, Van Trump, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodward—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Barnes, Boies, Bowen, Boyer, Burr, Covode, Dickey, Dixon, Driggs, James T. Elliott, Fox, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Johnson, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Logan, Loughridge, Marshall, Moore, Morrissey, Mungen, Myers, New-comb, Nunn, Pettis, Pike, Pomeroy, Pruyn, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Sypher, Taber, Taylor, Tift, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Wood—52.

So the main question was ordered.

The question was put on Mr. MAYNARD's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the resolution was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES, INDIANA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Governor of Indiana, transmitting a report of the sales made by that State of the land scrip issued by the United States under the act of July 2, 1862, relative to agricultural colleges, and of the appropriation of the proceeds of such sales; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

SUFFRAGE.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired. The House resumes the consideration of House joint resolution No. 402, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in relation to suffrage, upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have been informed that some members who desire to speak upon this subject have not yet prepared themselves. I would therefore suggest that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Wednesday next after the reading of the Journal, with the understanding that if there is any desire, as there probably will be, for a morning hour, I will then yield to a motion to postpone the subject until after the morning hour.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to yield for such a motion, with the understanding that when the House resumes the consideration of this subject I shall be entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly; I would not ask the gentleman to give up his right to the floor. I now move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Wednesday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 667) to enable the Holly, Wayne, and Monroe Railway Company, in the State of Michigan, to have the subscriptions to its capital duly stamped; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 209) donating cannon for a monument to the memory of the late President, Abraham Lincoln.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to Senate joint resolution No. 173, respecting the provisional governments of Virginia and Texas, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

DENVER PACIFIC RAILWAY.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of Senate bill No. 570, for a grant of lands granting the right of way over the public lands to the Denver Pacific Railway and Telegraph Company, and for other purposes, upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LOGAN addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SCHENCK obtained the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will yield to me for a moment I desire to make one explanation. I intend, as I have said, to move at a suitable opportunity the reference of this measure to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. I will not make that motion now, as a matter of course, because I do not want to cut off debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the hour of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr.

SCHENCK] will probably be the closing hour of the debate on this bill. But the debate can proceed upon the motion to refer; and if the gentleman from Ohio yields for that motion it can now be entered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not yield for that purpose. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Speaker, I have sought the floor for a few moments on this question for the reason that it has been announced by two or three opponents of this measure that the vote on the bill before the House is to decide the question of railroad aid for this session. I do not believe it, sir; for I do not think the principle involved in the other bills—I refer especially to the one I introduced the other day—is involved in this one.

But I have taken the floor more particularly for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to a refutation of the old and long-accepted maxim that "figures will not lie." I believe that, arranged in certain forms, figures are the greatest liars on earth; and I think they have been so arranged in this House. I refer to a statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] in opening the discussion on this question, that one hundred and eighty-five million acres of public land had been granted to railroads, and that that was one third of all the public domain of this country. Now, sir, the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office shows that the present public domain of the United States is 1,834,998,000 acres. If that statement be correct, even if one hundred and eighty-five million acres have been granted to railroads, instead of our having given away one third of the public domain we have only given away one tenth.

I now call attention to the actual facts with reference to these grants of land. There have been granted, according to the same report, to all the railroads of this country, exclusive of the Pacific railroads, 57,588,581 acres. These grants were made to the States of Illinois, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Missouri, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, and California. Of the grants thus made over fourteen million acres were granted to the southern States, and consisted of graduated lands which had been long in the market and would not bring twelve and a half cents per acre. In granting those lands to the southern States Congress at once raised the price of all the other lands in their vicinity to $2 50 per acre, and large quantities were sold at that price. Now, if I owned a quantity of land that was not worth twelve and a half cents an acre and by giving away one half of it I could get $2 50 per acre for the rest, I think it would be a very good speculation on my part.

Mr. SYPHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot, if it comes out of my time. The total amount granted to the States of Illinois, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, and California is 39,692,000 acres. Of this amount 21,000,000 are all that have ever yet been certified to all the railroad companies in the United States. Now, in these States I have named as having received grants of 39,692,000 acres there were, as shown by the census of 1860, an increase in the national wealth from 1850 to 1860 of $3,170,000,000. The entire increase of the national wealth in all the States during the same period was $8,925,000,000. So that more than one third of the entire increase of national wealth was in the States which have received the land grants. Now, estimating the same increase from 1860 to 1870, and that the whole national wealth in 1870 will be $30,000,000,000, you will have in these land grant States one fifth of the entire wealth of the nation. If we shall have to levy by taxation $350,000,000 per annum to carry on the Government, these land-grant States in which railroads have been built by donations of public lands—which lands would have been worthless if no railroads had been built—will pay $70,000,000 per annum of that amount.

Even if we have given away thirty-nine million acres of land, and have thereby built up this vast empire, which is paying into the Treasury $70,000,000 per annum, is it not a good speculation? The average percentage of increase in the country from 1850 to 1860 was one hundred and twenty-six; the decimal ratio of increase in wealth in the land-grant States I have named has been almost worthless if it had not been for this system of internal improvements. I claim, then, that in so far as we have tested the system it has proved most profitable.

Now, one word further. Of the one hundred and eighty-five million acres thus heralded to the country as having been given to railroads thirty-five millions or more were given to the Union Pacific, making ninety-two millions as the sum total that has been withdrawn from settlement. There are now of the one hundred and eighty-five million acres thus nominally granted ninety-three million acres open to settlement to-day just the same as it has ever been. The whole amount of lands granted to Pacific railroads would make a strip across the continent of only from eighty to one hundred miles in width, including sage plains and deserts. Our vast public domain stretches sixteen or seventeen hundred miles north and south. So that if we estimate this whole amount as having been given away as stated, it will be but one acre out of seventeen of these vast plains in the West—one sixteenth instead of one third, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois. And if by giving away one acre in sixteen we can secure the settlement and improvement of that great country, I ask how the nation can make a better investment?

I presume my time has about expired, and I will merely add that so far as this question of economy is concerned I will go with him who goes furthest in all measures of true economy; but I do not believe the time has come when this nation should close business and appoint an executor. I believe that we may increase in prosperity and wealth in the future as we have done in the past; but if the theories and policy of the gentleman from Illinois be adopted we may as well hang crape on our doors and advertise to the world that our executors have been appointed and that the business of the great Republic is to be closed out.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KELSEY.] Mr. KELSEY. I ask leave to print in the Globe some remarks upon a bill which I introduced this morning in relation to funding and paying the interest on the national debt.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not care whether the few remarks I propose to make are printed or not. I make them for the purpose of defining my position, as the phrase is among politicians, upon the subject which is now before the House. In submitting a few remarks upon the bill with the amendments before us I shall endeavor not to become at all excited. I have no interest, no prejudice, no feeling to be stimulated into any excessive action by the consideration of this matter; least of all shall I attempt to scold anybody here for differing from me in opinion in regard to the aid to be extended to public railroads. I regard the bill before us as one that does not call for that wide debate which has been entered into in regard to it. It is not a proposition to build a road to the Pacific. Such propositions we shall probably have hereafter in addition to that which already has the sanction of the Government, and when they come, undeterred by any popular clamor, if I can find the bills which provide for such improvements guarded and hedged around to my satisfaction with those provisions which will prevent an abuse of the privilege I intend and expect, if I am here, to vote for them.

I hold that connection with the Pacific by some railroad system is an absolute essential to this country. I believe that if the Union and Central Pacific roads had not been commenced and completed to the extent to which they have now gone, with a prospect of speedy accomplishment in the near future, we should not be holding the Pacific States at this time as a part of this Union. I believe that the laying of these great iron clamps across the continent to hold the two coasts together is a necessity; that we cannot expect to keep the union of these States which shall bind together the eastern and western sides of the continent if it is to be upon the condition of the citizens of one part reaching the other for all time by passing through a foreign country; and I believe this to be the conviction of the people generally, and the conviction of the party to which, in politics, I belong.

What, then, is it that we have before us to-day? The Union Pacific road together with the Central Pacific road, making a chain of communication across the continent, are speedily approaching completion. It is now proposed, taking up what has been done in reference to another public improvement, to provide for a little link of fifty-four miles, upon the same terms and in the same way, with a view of making it, as it were, a branch of the Union Pacific road, and at the same time affording a good start for the Southern Pacific road across the continent. Now, I am in favor of this little bill for these reasons: I want it as a branch to the Union Pacific road, and I want it as a start for the Southern Pacific road.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has introduced a substitute for this bill, which sets forth a scheme for the construction hereafter of these railroads. As carefully as I could, in the short time allowed me, I have read and thought upon this substitute as an amendment to the pending bill. And although I am not ready to vote for it and set aside what we have done or proposed to do in regard to the matter now before the House, still I find in the plan of the gentleman's chalking out, an outline at least, of what I conceive will be in the future an improvement upon all these schemes. And although I will not vote for his bill now as a substitute for the one before us, I think I may safely pledge him in advance that when we come to build the Southern Pacific railroad and the Northern Pacific railroad he and I will be found together endeavoring to adopt such guards and to hedge around every such charter and every such act of legislation in such a way that there will not be such abuses committed as have been complained of in reference to the Union Pacific railroad.

I am not standing here to defend the Union Pacific railroad. I know as well as the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] and as well as other gentlemen, how very apt, in the legislation of Congress, or of any other body, men are to enter into schemes of public improvement with a view to their own advantage, and how very apt they are to push that advantage to the utmost possible extent of profit to themselves. In one sense this is right and we must submit to it; for we cannot propose to any company or class of men, with any expectation that they will accept the privileges we offer them, that they shall out of pure benevolence and patriotism undertake any great public work. I believe, however, that there has been too much money made out of this railroad building under acts of Congress. I believe that this popular clamor against the Union Pacific Railroad Company does not rest fairly upon any aversion on the part of the people to the execution of the work. It rests upon and grows out of supposed abuses, perhaps upon abuses actually existing, on the part of those who have been carrying out these schemes of the General Government.

I said I was not actuated by prejudice, by the general outcry against these things; nor will I be influenced by anything of that sort. But I am afraid the gentleman from Illinois who addressed the House a few days ago [Mr. WASHBURN] yielded a little to that feeling.

When he gave us one of his customary lectures on extravagance, in which he is in the habit of assuming everybody but himself to be in the wrong, I am afraid he gave way to his imagination a little instead of confining himself strictly to the facts. So far as I could collect the statistics for the purpose, I have looked into some of the declarations made by the gentleman which were intended to prejudice the minds of members and to secure their votes against the bill now before us. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOW] has already alluded to one of his statements. The gentleman from Illinois told us that one third of all the public lands had already been given to these railroads. The gentleman from Minnesota showed from the record that one tenth is the utmost amount that has yet been given for that purpose.

Again, the gentleman from Illinois said, if I understand him aright, that there had been presented to this very road seven million six hundred and eighty thousand acres of land. I find upon investigation that perhaps three million three hundred thousand acres, a little less than one half the amount he named, will cover the whole subsidy in lands. The gentleman also said that in round numbers the sum of $25,000,000 had been given for the purpose of building these railroads. I find by an estimate of these lands, founded upon the best data I have been able to obtain from the Land Office and from other sources, that about four million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars would cover all, being less than one fifth of the amount stated by the gentleman in that flight of imagination to which he treated us.

I mention these things for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the condition of this debate, and to justify the course which I take, because it is not grounded upon this general outcry and these large imaginative calculations of what has been appropriated to these purposes, but is founded upon the facts of the case as nearly as I can ascertain them. Now, sir, why should we not pursue the policy which I have indicated? I hold that in governmental matters the best way ordinarily to get along is to do just as a sagacious individual would do in the management of his own affairs. Suppose I have lands lying out upon one of the prairies, remote from settlement, and I divide the tract into town lots or a number of small farms, how do I get those lands taken up? I offer to give to any mechanic who will go and settle there, to any one who will establish a small store or a church or a school, some of these lands free of charge, the occupation and the improvements thus made enhancing the value of the remainder of the tract. And when I sell my lands I sell them at first at a very low rate, expecting that the settlement of a portion will further enhance the value of the remainder of my possessions. Upon a similar ground I justify these appropriations of public lands and this pecuniary aid given by the Government to assist in opening up and developing the remote regions of the West by making highways of trade and travel through them.

This is the principle which actuated this House many years ago, during my earlier term of service here, when we granted, for the purpose of building the Illinois Central railroad, a very large portion of the public domain. It is very possible that we did not hedge around that measure with sufficient precautions to prevent a great monopolizing company from making a vast amount of money. Yet, though a great corporation may have feathered its nest out of that grant of public lands, I for one do not now regret that it was made, because the effect of it was to open up that which is to become probably before many years the second State of the Union, the great State of Illinois, and to give it an impetus which will set it forward in the way of development and progress perhaps a century. And it lies least of all in the mouth of any of the citizens of Illinois to object to appropriations of this kind when their own State is one of the most extraordinary monuments of the wisdom of a policy of this kind pursued by the General Government.

But I will not multiply instances of this sort; they are familiar to every gentleman. I hold that it is a wise policy to open up our western possessions by liberal grants in order to induce settlement, progress, improvement, from all of which we shall have returns a thousand fold in the shape of increased resources, the Government deriving directly in the form of taxation more than all it appropriates in thus developing the country.

I have already alluded to the necessity, so far as these Pacific railways are concerned, of improvements of this kind for political objects, in order that the East and the West may be kept together. Now, I have indicated a purpose to vote hereafter for extending the aid of the Government to probably two other Pacific railroads. There is a reason for this to be found in the very fact that we have established one such railroad. In the first place it will be neither convenient nor wise for the people of the Atlantic coast and the people of the Pacific to be bound together by but a single line of travel. Here in the city of Washington we have been too long hung to the rest of the United States by but a single thread of railroad from Baltimore to this point. This exhibits upon a small scale the uncertainty, the inconvenience, the danger which we should experience upon a large scale from having but a single line of railway connecting the East with the Pacific coast. And when gentlemen are afraid of monopolies let them take care that they do not establish the greatest of all monopolies by building up one of these roads and refusing aid to any other.

It is in order that we may be connected by a sufficient number of these iron clamps to bind us together across the continent, and in order that one may not obtain too great an influence on the councils of the nation and in the administration of the Government, that I would give rivals to them. I believe it to be needed on both accounts, both for the purposes of the people of the United States and their convenience and to prevent that very monopoly which gentlemen are so afraid of. But, as I said before, I sustain this bill here to make this connecting link of fifty-four miles upon the old system, with full readiness to declare, when we come to those larger roads extending across the continent, that guards like those which the gentleman from Illinois has proposed, or we may hereafter devise, ought to be resorted to, and made as clear, as plain, and as secure as possible.

My friend from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN,] who last addressed the House, informed us that we are going against the wishes of the people. I do not believe it. I do not believe the people are opposed to these great works of public improvement, but look at them as truly as any gentleman here can, and as understandingly; and I do not wish to depreciate their intelligence on that point. But I believe they are opposed to and are watching with jealous anxiety the abuses likely to spring from going forward with these roads without the guards I have indicated. But I do not mean to yield to a popular clamor which strikes at the whole system and the whole policy because that system and that policy have been abused. On the other hand I am not influenced by the intimation of the gentleman who has just closed his speech that we are going to do something not agreeable to the wishes of the President-elect. In the first place, I take issue with him on the fact. I believe I happen to know from the most authentic sources of information that while General Grant is opposed generally to the large and loose subsidies which have been made, and especially in the present embarrassed condition of the country, he has thought it very hard that this little road, in the light in which I have been presenting it, should not have this chance with the rest, as a branch of the Union Pacific and as needed for military purposes, and as, perhaps, affording a starting point for another road extending to the Pacific through Lower California. But if it were true that it was against the wish and opinion of the President-elect I must admit I shall vote according to my own judgment and sense of duty to the country undeterred by any intimation of that character. I shall be sorry to differ from any one so respectable as General Grant, but it is my vote and not his to be given here to-day and on all future occasions when I vote; and I think I shall be respected, and every gentleman, more for giving a vote of that kind independently and according to the dictates of my judgment by General Grant himself, the President-elect, than if I were to seek to find out first what he wants and then record my vote accordingly.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will yield to me right here, as he seems evidently to have misunderstood what I said. I did not say that General Grant had expressed any opinion about this road. I have never in my life talked with him on the subject. But, sir, I said this: that this company was asking this House to vote against the opinion of their constituents, against the platform upon which they were nominated, and against the understood and expressed views of the President-elect. The gentleman knows that is what I said. I do not use General Grant's name here as a scarecrow. I only made the remark which I have stated.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not suppose that any one is more independent than my friend from Illinois on most of these matters; but I did understand it was thrown out as a reason why we should not vote for this bill, or a bill of this kind, that it was contrary to the expressed wish of the President-elect.

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; but I was referring to the modesty of this corporation in asking us to do it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Corporations have not been very modest. They are a sort of embodied idealism, and cannot well blush. [Laughter.] I wish I could say the same in regard to individuals, for if corporations cannot be either modest or impudent because of the want of personality that is not true in regard to individuals, and some might be more modest than they are.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be drawn away from the course of general remark I was pursuing. The gentleman from Illinois certainly did say, if I did not misunderstand him, that the true way was to let the country in the interior build its own roads. I do not think they can. If the country between this and the Pacific were like the country in my district or in yours, Mr. Speaker, or in your State anywhere, or in mine, I should be very far from coming to a conclusion that they needed or were entitled to any aid from the House to enable them to build their public improvements. But it happens, as I illustrated before, that this is a great unsettled country which we desire to fill with population, to fill with enterprise, over which we wish to extend all the conditions of civilization, and it is necessary for us, for the development of our great domain, to grant some of it away in order to accomplish that object. That is the whole of the argument.

To come back to where I commenced. This bill is not one which involves the necessity of inquiring into this whole subject of building a road to the Pacific. It is a bill which simply proposes to go on with a system which, whether it has been sufficiently guarded or not, has now become a well established system, and build up one little link of fifty-four miles, so as to secure an eastern branch to the Union Pacific railroad and afford a starting point for a southern Pacific railroad, if we should hereafter build a southern Pacific road; and that is the whole object.

Mr. DELANO. I ask my colleague to yield to me for a question.

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. DELANO. Is my colleague able to say there is a design, a real purpose, to run this road to Denver?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not know.

Mr. DELANO. That is a point to which I wish to call his attention. The bill as originally shaped does not require the company, as I understand it, to proceed toward Denver. They may use the subsidy so as to direct the line of the road to a point toward Albuquerque with a view ultimately to the completion of a new line across the mountains to San Francisco.

Mr. SCHENCK. I can only give my belief.

Mr. DELANO. I wish to say further that I have proposed an amendment which, if adopted, would require them so to appropriate this fund as to go to Denver and make connection with another road which connects with the Union Pacific; and it seems to me, if there is an honest purpose to accomplish what is said to be the intended object, this will be done. If it is not, we may then understand that this is a scheme to enable them to go further on this new line and then call upon us for more subsidies.

Mr. LOGAN. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me, I will explain this from the map in a word; and I hope that I will not be considered as taking up too much of the gentleman's time. If the gentlemen in the House will direct their attention to the bill itself they will find that this is the language—that this road is to connect at or near Cheyenne Wells, in Colorado, and not further west than the meridian of said Cheyenne Wells. You will find that Cheyenne Wells is thirty miles south of the line of the road, and taking the meridian of Cheyenne Wells running in that direction they may strike the meridian of Cheyenne Wells thirty miles south in the direction of Albuquerque, which will make one hundred and twenty miles of subsidy to be given them.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand my friend from Illinois that if we go on and grant a subsidy for fifty-four miles on the same principle we have granted it to the Union Pacific railroad they will have nothing to get along to Cheyenne Wells without a subsidy, and will give their lands away to build a road up to Denver. If it be so, so much the better. Then by the grant of a subsidy for these fifty-four miles we secure more than we have secured before. I think an arrangement will be made to answer my colleague on the subject. I think a road will be built to connect with Denver, and it is in that connection I am willing to grant a road to Cheyenne Wells, which is recommended by General Grant, General Sherman, and others, for military purposes—for Army transportation to a point where there is forage and fuel to be had, which cannot be had conveniently east of that point.

Mr. Speaker, I was saying, when interrupted, that this is a bill which does not touch the merits of any general policy on this subject, and when I vote for this bill I propose to vote for it with the reserved understanding that while this may accomplish the building of the road, which may hereafter become the main stem to Cheyenne Wells, and its connection by indirection also successfully with Denver City, thus making it part of the Union Pacific as an eastern branch, when we come to legislating in regard to the two or three other lines across the continent, to try and improve on that legislation so far as the guards and restrictions are concerned under which the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific have been built.

The gentleman from California desires a little of my time, and I would like to know how much I have left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twenty-four minutes remaining.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield, then, to the gentleman from California for ten minutes.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that an opportunity would have been afforded to those of us who live in the extreme West to have had each an hour in the discussion of this important railroad question, but as it is apparent that it is the disposition of the House to close this debate and come to a vote, I shall take advantage of the generous offer of my friend from Ohio, and in the ten minutes allowed me submit a few remarks.

First, sir, let me say that I cannot agree with my friend from Indiana in the declaration he has made in reference to the Pacific coast and as to the probable result if we do not complete this railroad system. I admit, sir, that there was great danger; but I will say to him and all others in this House that while the generation who entered the Pacific slope, whose homes are scattered upon the Atlantic coast and in the midst of all the older States, survive and control the States of the Pacific coast there is not the least danger of their becoming a fragment by themselves. The only danger is that if the clamor raised in this House should be taken up and carried out into the country and sustained, and no further progress made in building these roads across the continent, then, when the generation now growing up upon the Pacific coast, who have not gone from the East, secures the control it may act very differently. Then, indeed, there may be great danger unless we have these great improvements stretching across the continent and binding it together in a firm Union.

We have not our first road yet built. It was commenced in the midst of the throes of the rebellion. Then the line was located and the enterprise begun, and it was almost impossible to organize the company—and I wish my friend from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] to hear this—it was almost impossible to organize the company, I repeat, and to raise the means necessary to carry it on, even with the second subsidy in 1864. The demand of this Government during the rebellion was so great for the raw products of the country for its own use that it was almost impossible to make any progress whatever with the construction of the Pacific railroad. And it will be borne in mind by gentlemen of this House that its great progress has been since the ranks of the rebels were broken and dispersed, and the Government has ceased to have so great a demand for men in the Army, or their employment in the field in raising supplies for the men in the Army. When that demand on the part of the Government existed it was almost impossible to employ men in the building of the road except at almost fabulous prices. Since the close of the rebellion, however, the construction of the road has gone on with a remarkable rapidity. Its enormity is now spoken of. Men fail to go back to the beginning to see what the necessities of the times were in reference to this matter. If the country had been at peace when this great improvement was commenced, if everything then was as favorable as now, it would have been a monstrosity to grant such a subsidy in money and land to any corporation. I am opposed to any such grant hereafter to the extent in which it was given to that road; but I do not yield to the clamor which has been raised here, because when the grant was made the times demanded it. Now that roads can be built on more reasonable terms I do not believe that our grants should be so extensive, and while I ask members to see to it that the interest and convenience of the country shall be cared for I also insist that our legislation shall be properly protected and restricted.

It has been attempted to be shown that these bonds are standing as a public indebtedness as against these companies. On this point I will state that these roads have not been the cause of any expense to the Government, except it may be in the lands which have been appropriated to aid in their construction. They are saving the Government harmless in regard to the payment of interest. It is so in reference to the great amounts of subsidy granted to the Union and Central Pacific railroads; and how is it in regard to the particular road now before this body? It is a fact well known, and can be sustained, that they have not only been paying interest to the Government, but the Government has now on hand a fund over and above that as a sinking fund for the payment of the principal of the bonds.

But members of the House say that in this bill we are carrying out something different from what was originally intended. If, with the subsidy that has been given to extend the road fifty-four miles, another road is to be constructed in the direction of Denver, and that makes it a different thing, then I say it is for that very reason I shall more heartily sustain the proposition now before the House. The objection of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] although the change of route from the Republican fork to the Smoky Hill route may have injured another road which the Government was aiding, does not militate at all against the proposition urged by my friend from Ohio and others, that we must have more than one road across the continent if we wish to bind the Pacific and Atlantic firmly together.

Mr. PRICE. I ask the gentleman from California whether he does not know that in July, 1863, this same company came here and asked Congress to allow them to swing off—

Mr. HIGBY. That has been up before, and I cannot yield to the gentleman any further. The gentleman is referring to the very thing I spoke of, and if he had heard what I said he would have known that what he objects to is one of the reasons why I support this very bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's ten minutes have expired.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire, Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, and Mr. JULIAN were, by unanimous consent, granted leave to print their remarks as part of the debates. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SCHENCK. How many minutes remain of my time?

The SPEAKER. Fourteen.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL,] and then the remaining four minutes to his colleague, [Mr. COVODE,] who has charge of the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I am so hoarse from a bad cold that I doubt whether I can speak so as to be heard, and I regret very much that I have not my remarks written out so that I might have them printed instead of attempting to say one word at this time.

I am sorry to find that in the discussion a great deal has been insinuated about fraudulent transactions and corrupt corporations—of men and corporations taking grants of land and money from the Government and failing to devote them to the purposes for which they were designed. If such be true, let us have facts, and not mere insinuations. I will not dwell on that branch of the subject, brought in here to prejudice the proposed legislation, but come at once to the bill before us. What is it? It contains two or three clear and distinct propositions. In the first place, the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, finds itself over four hundred miles beyond Kansas City. There the road has stopped, and the Senate has passed the bill proposing to give a subsidy of $16,000 in bonds a mile for building fifty-four miles to Cheyenne Wells.

Mr. UPSON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. O'NEILL. Ask it.

Mr. UPSON. Can the gentleman say whether it is $16,000 a mile or $32,000?

Mr. O'NEILL. I take it from the bill itself, and from my knowledge of the credit and integrity of the gentlemen interested in this great enterprise, that they only want what the Government is asked to give them, $16,000 a mile for these fifty-four miles, amounting in all to an appropriation, or rather a subsidy, of $864,000.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish the gentleman would state how he gathers from this bill that the subsidy is only for fifty-four miles.

Mr. O'NEILL. If it does not say so in positive language that is its meaning, and any gentleman of ordinary intelligence who reads the bill and understands the provisions of existing laws giving subsidies to this company must see that its intention is to carry the road from its present terminus to Cheyenne Wells, a distance of fifty-four miles, for which the subsidy of $16,000 per mile is desired. The bill actually and unequivocally fixes the point, Cheyenne Wells, at which the subsidy is to cease. There can be no mistake about this.

Both in word and intention it is so clear that demonstration is not needed. Survey and measurement have determined the distance, so that neither the company nor the Government could by any possibility increase or diminish it.

Mr. LOGAN. It does not say so.

Mr. O'NEILL. I advert to another proposition, which is this: that the eastern division proposes to transfer its land grants to the Denver Pacific Railroad Company, incorporated by the Territory of Colorado, upon the condition that the latter company build its road from Denver to Cheyenne, the point of connection with the Union Pacific railroad. The purpose of the eastern division is to make its line through Cheyenne Wells to Denver, thence from Denver to Cheyenne, thus giving it at a comparative early day a connection by the Union Pacific railroad with the Pacific ocean at San Francisco. Who can doubt this? Why would the eastern division so readily surrender its land grants? Why be so charitable, so benevolent? Why, amid the turmoil and the trouble and the remarks and the criticisms of members of Congress, and after a struggle for years, would that company be willing to give up its thousands of acres of land if the object were not to push forward the great work, as designed by this bill, of making a junction with the Union Pacific road? It seems wonderful to me how any gentleman can allege that Denver is not to be reached, when by legislation the eastern division asks to be permitted to give up in this respect its franchises, its rights, and its grant of lands to another company. To be sure, to make the connections complete the road must be built from Cheyenne Wells to Denver, a distance of one hundred and seventy or more miles, as I understand.

Mr. LOGAN. I will give it exact—it is one hundred and ninety-four miles.

Mr. O'NEILL. Now, does this road intend to stop at Cheyenne Wells? Why, Mr. Speaker, the very advantages to be gained of an unbroken line to the Pacific ocean by way of the Union Pacific railroad is a sufficient answer to such a question. The enterprise of the eastern division company has now equipped and in running order four hundred and five miles of road from Kansas City west, and has connections east to St. Louis of two hundred and eighty-three miles. The vast interests and yearly increasing population of the territory traversed by these nearly seven hundred miles of continuous railroad are demanding that they may have facilities for business and travel toward the Pacific coast. I cannot imagine why the House should desire to defeat the bill. The argument that there is a design to go by a more southern route, by Albuquerque to the Pacific, has no bearing upon the question now under discussion. The present purpose is to get to the Union Pacific railroad, and if hereafter, under more propitious circumstances, the eastern division can build a southern line, why let it be done, but do not stop the efforts now making, and which the passage of this bill will certainly bring to success, for the completion of the road from Kansas City to Denver and Cheyenne.

The subsidies already paid to the eastern division amount to some six million dollars. From statistics which I have examined, and which I know to be correct, the Government in the last two years has saved $2,000,000 in freight by the difference in charges between the rates of this company and the transportation by wagons and other means of carriage. Private individuals have also been benefited in this respect, and both Government and individuals by each mile's extension of this road will reap the advantages which would follow our favorable action. The amount of subsidy here asked, $864,000, I know is not a trifling sum of money; but comparing it with the vastness of this enterprise, and especially taking into consideration the immense gain to the country by helping on this work, it sinks almost to insignificance. While the more northern line to the Pacific has been carried more than one thousand miles beyond Omaha, let us cherish also this, a route accommodating a population and business further south. I feel as if the country wanted us to aid such enterprises, and while some of the ideas of gentlemen relative to the influence of corporations are entertained by me, still I cannot stop to consider such things when I find the great interests of this continent are at stake, and that thirty-five millions of people, the most thriving on earth, are making such progress as justifies us in legislating so as closely to connect the Atlantic and the Pacific. I cannot hesitate to vote for the bill in the shape it came from the Senate.

Mr. COVODE. In the brief time allowed me I cannot permit myself to be interrupted. From the temper of the House I am satisfied that the time has come to settle this matter, and before sitting down I propose to call for the previous question.

Mr. LOGAN. I want a fair show in the fight, and I shall move to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. COVODE. I do not yield for that purpose. It has been represented that this company does not intend to build to Denver. I am satisfied that it does. I tell gentlemen that the time is coming when we will have to grapple with the institutions of Asia, and that, too, on the Pacific coast. The time is coming, and in this age, when civilization will no longer travel west, and when on the Pacific coast we will have to meet and grapple with the institutions of Asia. It becomes us, therefore, to occupy that territory first with our own people. As my time is up I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill and amendments be laid on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House, so that we may have every gentleman here to show his hand on this subject.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 71.

So the motion that there be a call of the House was disagreed to.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to lay on the table.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 86, nays 92, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Bontwell, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Buckland, Burr, Cary, Chandler, Churchill, Reader W. Clark, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Callom, Delano, Elia, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Golladay, Grover, Halsey, Harding, Hawkins, Hopkins, Richard D. Hubbard, Jencks, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Kootz, Laffin, William Lawrence, Longbridge, Marshall, McCarthy, McCullough, Moorhead, Orth, Paine, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raun, Ross, Sawyer, Seofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Sypher, Trowbridge, Unson, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodward—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Barnum, Beck, Benjamin, Blackburn, Boies, Bowen, Boyden, Bromwell, Buckley, Calkins, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Coburn, Corley, Covode, Dowses, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Eliot, Hitt, French, Getz, Glossbrenner, Goss, Gore, Gravely, Griswold, Hamilton, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Alexander H. Jones, Kelley, Kellogg, Ketcham, Kitchen, Lash, Loan, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCormick, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Mullins, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, O'Neill, Peters, Pettis, Pierce, Pile, Poland, Polisy, Prince, Robertson, Robinson, Root, Schenck, Smith, Stevens, Stokes, Stover, Taffe, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Aukon, Robert T. Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Whittemore, Windom, and Woodbridge—92.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, James M. Ashley, Banks, Blaine, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. Butler, Dawes, Dickey, Dixon, Edwards, Fox, Haight, Hill, Holman, Asabel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Kerr, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Moore, Morrissey, Munger, Myers, Niblack, Nunn, Pomeroy, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Taylor, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, Wood, and Young—44.

So the House refused to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania, stated that he was paired with his colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who would have voted in the negative, while he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. NIBLACK stated that he was paired with Mr. VAN WYCK, or he would have voted to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

Mr. O'NEILL stated that his colleague, [Mr. MYERS,] who would have voted in the negative, was detained at home by sickness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. DELANO. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. If the previous question is not seconded will a motion to recommit be in order?

The SPEAKER. A motion to refer will be in order. The bill has never been referred.

Mr. DELANO. In that case I will move to refer it.

Mr. JULIAN. If the previous question is not seconded will it not be in order to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee on the Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] has indicated a desire to move its reference to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and by the usage that gentleman will be recognized.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 57, noes 87.

Mr. BOYDEN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. BOYDEN and LOGAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 86.

So the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to refer the bill with the pending amendments and substitute to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. JULIAN. I move to amend by substituting the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LOGAN. I accept the amendment.

Mr. JULIAN. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill with the pending amendments and substitute were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands—ayes 82, noes 64.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, was granted ten days' leave of absence.

GAUGING AND INSPECTING LIQUORS.

Mr. McCULLOUGH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolutions; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue inform this House at an early day at what rate he has fixed the fees of gaugers for gauging and inspecting liquors under the act of Congress approved July 20, 1868, section fifty-three; and whether he has authorized the gaugers to charge by the package or gallon; and whether the rates so fixed has been made uniform throughout the United States.

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue further inform this House, at as early a day as practicable, how much revenue has been raised from inspecting and gauging liquors under said act up to the 1st of January, 1869.

BUILDINGS IN WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 23d instant, in relation to buildings or premises in the city of Washington occupied by the Interior Department under leases for rent; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the special order, being the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. LYNCIL. I rise to a privileged motion. I call up the motion I made on Saturday last to reconsider the reference of the bill in regard to resumption of specie payment to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be called up now. The gentleman from Illinois moves to suspend the rules, which includes the rule by which the gentleman from Maine would be entitled to call up his motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will yield to allow my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] to offer a resolution.

REPRESENTATION OF GEORGIA.

Mr. PAINE. I send to the Clerk's desk for action now a resolution. I do not offer it as a report from the Committee on Reconstruction, but I will state to the House that it has the approval of a majority of the members of that committee. It cannot properly be regarded as a report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is provided by the reconstruction act, passed March 2, 1867, that until the people of the lately rebellious States shall be by law admitted to representation in Congress, any civil Government which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only, and that no persons shall be eligible to office in such provisional governments who are disqualified for office by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States; and whereas it is reported that the Legislature of Georgia has expelled the colored members thereof and admitted to their seats white men who received minorities of votes at the polls, and that members of said Legislature who had been elected thereto by the votes of colored men joined in such action, and that twenty-seven disqualified white men hold seats in said Legislature in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution and of the reconstruction acts of Congress; and whereas Senators from Georgia have not yet been admitted to the Senate of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Reconstruction be ordered to inquire and report whether any, and if any what, further action ought to be taken during the Fortyeth Congress respecting the representation of Georgia in this House.

Mr. ROSS. I object.

Mr. PAINE. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of receiving and agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BINGHAM. This question has already been referred to the committee in the form of a bill. The committee therefore have power over it now. I refer to the bill of the gentleman from Massachusetts referred to the committee two weeks ago.

Mr. PAINE. I hardly like to dispute what the gentleman says, but I cannot—

Mr. ROSS. I object to debate.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Journal will show what I say.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask my friend to withdraw the resolution. I cannot yield for a vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. PAINE. My understanding with the gentleman compels me to withdraw the resolution now, the yeas and nays being ordered. I give notice, however, that as soon as I can get the floor I will move to suspend the rules for the purpose of agreeing to the resolution.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to make a statement in regard to the business of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to say to the House that there are two bills in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, one in relation to an amendment of the tariff, and the other a general amendment of the revenue laws, on which the Committee of Ways and Means desire to get action of the House if possible at this session in time for the passage of the bills. There is no danger but that the appropriation bills will go through before the end of the session. I do not make any motion hostile to that of the gentleman from Illinois now, because the legislative appropriation bill is partially completed in Committee of the Whole; but I give notice that whenever that bill is out of the way, and before another appropriation bill is taken up, I shall endeavor to have a test question in the House whether, instead of taking up an appropriation bill, they will not proceed to consider those two bills, the tariff bill and the internal revenue bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that the Indian appropriation bill is also pending in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SCHENCK. It has not been made a special order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It can be made one very easily.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to ask the Chair whether, if the motion of the gentleman from Illinois be voted down, my motion will then be in order to take up the bill in relation to specie payments?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine would then be privileged, if the Chair should give him the floor, to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill in relation to specie payments was recommitted on Saturday.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now ask for a vote on my motion.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope my friend on the Committee on Appropriations will not insist on that motion.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 71, noes 70.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the negative.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SPALDING, and WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 61.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 79, not voting 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Blackburn, Boles, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Buckley, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Cary, Corley, Covode, De-weese, Dodge, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, French, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Gove, Gravely, Grover, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kerr, Knott, Lash, Loan, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, Miller, Mullins, Mungon, Newsham, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Polsley, Pruyn, Randall, Ross, Shanks, Spalding, Taffe, Upson, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Whittemore, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Bailey, Barnes, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Churchill, Clift, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Donnelly, Driggs, Eli, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Hamilton, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hunter, Jenckes, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Loughridge, Lynch, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Norris, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pottis, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Root, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Smith, Starkweather, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Trowbridge, Burt Van Horn, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, and John T. Wilson—79.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Dawes, Delano, Diekey, Dixon, Dockery, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Fox, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Johnson, Kellogg, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, McCormick, Moore, Morrissey, Myers, Newcomb, Nunn, Orth, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Shel-labarger, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Stone, Sypher, Taber, Taylor, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Wyck, Cadwal-ader C. Washburn, Windom, Wood, and Young—61.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of R. Cromelien, of Washington, District of Columbia, for a grant of the right of way for an air-line railroad from Washington, District of Columbia, to Annapolis, Maryland.

By Mr. BEAMAN: The petition of John Retallach and 35 others, citizens of Detroit, Michigan, praying for action upon the civil service bill, for the passage of the new tax bill, &c.

By Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts: A memorial of citizens of Buffalo, New York, against resumption of specie payment, and asking such action as will improve the present paper currency.

Also, a petition of citizens of Buffalo, New York, to Congress to give earnest consideration to the financial measure introduced by General BUTLER in the House of Representatives.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Illinois, approving and indorsing the views of General BUTLER on finance, as expressed in his bill and sustained by his speech, and pledging their earnest and cordial support in this contest of legal might against natural right.

Also, the memorial of Alfred S. Reid, of Campbell county, Virginia, for removal of disabilities.

By Mr. DONNELLY: The memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of St. Paul, in the State of Minnesota, in favor of the early construction of the Northern Pacific railroad, and of a branch road from the Union Pacific railroad, via Sioux City, to the head of Lake Superior.

By Mr. DRIGGS: A petition of 100 citizens of New York and Philadelphia, manufacturers of chemicals, praying Congress to levy an increased duty upon cryolite, in order to protect works in this country in the manufacture of soda ash and other similar products.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: A protest against the increase of duties on refined sugars, from all the wholesale grocers of Cincinnati.

By Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts: The petition of William Thwing, for the passage of an act to authorize the issue of a register to the ship Alhambra.

Also, the petition of John Moriarty, of Boston, Massachusetts, a private in company K, third United States artillery, for bounty.

By Mr. HUNTER: The petition of S. W. Skinner, administrator of the estate of John H. Skinner, deceased, praying relief for supplies furnished the Union armies in Virginia from the 18th day of November, 1862, to the 1st day of May, 1865.

By Mr. JULIAN: The petition of R. S. Ward, for special relief for services rendered in the late war for the Union.

By Mr. MULLINS: The petition of Newton Dickens, a private soldier in company A, eleventh Tennessee mounted infantry, to have his name placed on the rolls of said company.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The petition of Ragon, Dickey & Casson and a number of others, citizens of Evansville, Indiana, remonstrating against any further increase of duty on sugar.

By Mr. O'NEILL: A petition of importers and others, merchants of the city of Philadelphia, asking for the reduction of the duty on foreign salt to fifty per cent. over cost.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The memorial of Adam Jewett and 150 others, citizens of Montgomery county, Ohio, praying Congress to abolish the franking privilege.

Also, a memorial of grocers, citizens of Ohio, praying Congress to make no change in the tariff on sugars.

Also, the petition of Mary Maloy, widow of John D. Maloy, late private company H, ninth regiment West Virginia volunteers, for arrears of pension.

Also, the memorial of E. M. Davis, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to repeal the law making gold a legal tender, and asking for a new money system.

Also, a memorial of grocers of St. Louis, Missouri, praying Congress to make no change in the tariff on sugars.

By Mr. THOMAS: A petition of citizens of Annapolis, Maryland, asking Congress to exert its constitutional powers to secure to the people of that State a State government republican in form.

By Mr. UPSON: The petition of Comfort Tyler and 18 others, citizens of St. Joseph county, Michigan, praying for an increase of pension to Abigail Reynolds, widow of Benoni Reynolds, a soldier in the revolutionary war.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 26, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion by Mr. MORTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

WESTERN MILITARY CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. MCCREERY the committee of conference on the part of the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 404) providing for the disposition of certain papers relating to military claims accruing in the department of the West.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the report of the commissioners to revise the statutes of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States, and ordered to be printed.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented the credentials of Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, elected by the Legislature of Massachusetts a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1869; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Judson A. Mosman, of Natick, Massachusetts, executor of Arthur L. Hyde, praying to be allowed the same bounty to which the father, if living, of Arthur L. Hyde, deceased, late a private in company B, second Massachusetts cavalry volunteers, would be entitled; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Josiah Quincy, and others, harbor commissioners of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, stating the necessity of certain improvements in the harbor of Boston, and of appropriations in order to carry them out; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of Steuben county, New York, in favor of the passage of a law granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented sundry affidavits of citizens of Vermont, in favor of the bill (S. No. 759) to extend the patent granted to G. V. Blodgett and P. T. Sweet for an oven for baking; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. DRAKE presented resolutions of the Union Merchants' Exchange of St. Louis, against any further extension of the provision of the bankrupt act requiring the payment out of the bankrupt's assets of fifty per cent. of his liabilities; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POOL presented the petition of Joseph Ward and others, members of the thirteenth Tennessee cavalry, praying that the Secretary of War be directed, on their application, to remove any charge of desertion that may stand upon the rolls against them; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of North Carolina, praying that William B. Beville be relieved from the political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of fishermen on the waters of eastern North Carolina, praying the reduction of the duty and tax on salt; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ANTHONY presented a petition of citizens of Rhode Island, praying that the right of suffrage be extended to women; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VICKERS. I present the petition of Rowland Cromelien, asking the passage of an act granting him the right of way for an air-line railway to be laid, under his patent, from Washington city to Annapolis, Maryland. I ask that a portion of it may be read. ["Oh, no."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objections.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object. It is not usual to read petitions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading is objected to. What disposition will the Senator make of the paper?

Mr. VICKERS. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ABBOTT presented a petition of Dr. A. B. Sams, praying compensation for services rendered as contract surgeon in the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Wilmington, North Carolina, praying for the erection of a post office building suitable for the accommodation of the increasing postal business of the city, and suggesting an appropriation of $15,000 for the erection of a good and substantial building; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that the right of suffrage be extended to women; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a series of resolutions in the nature of a petition adopted by the council of the Union League of Winchester, Virginia, in which they set forth that a few disfranchised rebels and others in sympathy with them are making a strenuous effort to obtain the removal of the disabilities of one Judge Parker, of Virginia, so that he may continue on the bench. They set forth the character and conduct of this Judge Parker, and also a charge to the grand jury which he delivered during the rebellion. I have heard of this person before, and I will say that if our great historian, Richard Hildreth, were alive, I would recommend this Judge Parker to him as a proper subject for an additional chapter in his book entitled "atrocious judges." I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of Phebe Wood and Sylvia Ann Wood, praying remuneration for the invention of a plow by their father, Jethro Wood; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 255) to reorganize the Treasury Department, to report it back to the Senate, and to say that the committee have given the subject a great deal of attention, but have not been able to report a bill likely to meet the assent of Congress during the present session; but as several bills are before other committees of the body to reorganize different Departments of the Government, and as they ought all to be considered together and ought to form a harmonious whole, the committee have concluded, on the whole, it is best not to report a bill at this session, but ask the passage of the following resolution for the reorganization of the civil service:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That a joint committee, to be composed of three members of the Senate and five members of the House of Representatives, shall be appointed at the beginning of the next session, in the same manner as other joint committees are appointed, which shall continue during the Forty-First Congress, and shall have leave to sit during the recess of that Congress, and whose duty it shall be to examine and report upon the expediency of reorganizing the civil service in the several Departments of the Government, the clerical force necessary in each, the rate of compensation, and such regulations as will secure a more economical and efficient performance of the civil service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the resolution at this time. No objection being made, the question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state at the request of Senators that I have reported back from the Committee on Finance the bill introduced by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] and after having spent much time upon it and not being able to agree upon a bill likely to pass at the present session of Congress, and there being other bills to reorganize other Departments of the Government—the Army, Navy, Post Office, and other Departments—which have been referred to different committees, we thought the whole subject ought to be acted upon together, because great changes have been made by the war in the different Departments, and they ought all to be reorganized so as to adapt them to the changes in service in peace. We therefore thought it better to have the whole subject of the reorganization of the Executive Departments, the clerical force in each, the amount of compensation, &c., sent to a special committee to be organized in this way with the view to consider that special subject.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Senator whether the resolution is not confined to the civil service alone?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; the civil service in the Departments. As a matter of course there is in the War Department a branch of the civil service.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is confined to the Departments entirely.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. It does not affect the military or naval service, but the civil service entirely of the various Departments, including the War and Navy Departments. We thought it was better to adopt this course.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire whether it is not unusual to direct now the appointment of a committee by the next Congress?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that it is always done.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me say one word, if the Senator will allow me. This is a concurrent resolution; the House of Representatives is to concur; and the resolution directs that a committee shall be constituted of five members of that House joining three on the part of this body. Those members are not elected; the Congress is not in existence in which this is to take place. Now, I think it would be a very unusual thing, taking the House part of the resolution, for the Fortieth Congress in the House to create a committee to be appointed by the next House, of a special character. Suppose we were to adopt a resolution that a committee of three members of this body should be appointed to join a committee of five members to be constituted by the House, and suppose then the House were to pass a resolution, or were asked by the Senate to pass a resolution, directing that the next House of Representatives, not now in being, should appoint a given committee of a given number for a given purpose, special in its character. I do not know but that there may be some example of this; I remember none, and it seems to be a very unusual proceeding.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can state to the Senator that there are not only many precedents, but it is the common way. Committees are organized, sometimes special, sometimes standing, in one Congress, and continue Congress after Congress. It is true the committees are organized in that Congress. All the standing committees of this body are made in pursuance of resolutions of the body, and joint committees are made in pursuance of joint resolutions, as for instance, the Committee on the Conduct of the War, and the Committee on Retrenchment. All joint committees are made by a concurrent resolution of the two Houses. We confined this committee to the Forty-First Congress, because it is supposed that having a specific duty to perform it can be confined and limited to that term.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Committee on Retrenchment, to which the Senator has alluded, was only appointed for a particular Congress, and by the Congress that appointed it, and when the new Congress came in that Congress, after it came in, revived the committee. Now, I entirely agree, having read the resolution at the desk, to the propriety of accomplishing the purpose the Senator from Ohio has in view. I think if a joint committee charged with that specific duty and with nothing else could sit during the next recess and really devote themselves to attempting to reorganize the details of the Departments, they would accomplish a very great good indeed. While, therefore, I am in favor of the amendment which is suggested, I am troubled by the same difficulty that the Senator from New York has as to the legal possibility of our adopting this resolution, so as that it shall have any binding effect after the 4th of March. The House of Representatives by its Speaker cannot under this resolution appoint a committee after the 4th March without a further resolution of the House authorizing him to do so, and creating such a committee, and of course if it is to be a concurrent committee by concurrent action, whatever indispensably required the action of the Forty-First House of Representatives would necessarily require the concurrence of the Senate during the same period of time. Therefore I confess I am unable to see what effect this resolution can have after the 4th of March that it will not derive from action which must be taken then.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the Senator will accomplish the purpose by moving to strike out the words "at the beginning of the next session." I see they are underlined, and were an afterthought evidently.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; they were adopted by the committee.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will strike out the words "at the beginning of the next session" the resolution will read right.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then it will be subject to the objection made by Senators, that we are attempting, during this Congress, to make a committee to serve during the next Congress. There is no difficulty in this Congress prescribing that the next Congress shall have certain committees. Suppose the next Congress should repeal the resolution. If Senators are in favor of the object, this resolution will accomplish it, and it is very simple and very important.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it is very important, but I do not see how we can do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will have the force of a law or joint resolution, binding on the two Houses until it is changed. That is all there is of it.

Mr. POMEROY. I am in favor of the object sought to be accomplished by this resolution. I think the Departments should be reorganized. I think there ought to be different grades of clerkships, beginning down as low as $800, $1,000, $1,200, and so along, and they ought to be open to all persons. As it now is there are a few lower grades to which women can be appointed, but they cannot be promoted. I want to see that system changed in any reorganization that may be made.

Mr. GRIMES. I propose that this matter lie on the table until gentlemen familiar with the rules and parliamentary law shall decide what course we ought to pursue, and in the mean time we can go on with the business of the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. There is no question of parliamentary law involved in this resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. I thought there was. There is a long discussion going on about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope it will be disposed of now. I do not want to call it up again. I believe it meets general assent.

Mr. GRIMES. So that we can get a vote I do not care what is done with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his motion?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "at the beginning of the next session;" so that it will read:

That a joint committee, composed of three members of the Senate and five members of the House of Representatives, shall be appointed in the same manner as other joint committees are appointed, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to read the present standing rule of the Senate on the subject of committees:

"The following standing committees shall be appointed at the commencement of each session."

The very words that are used here. That rule was made on the 5th of March, 1857, and has been continued from that time to this.

Mr. POMEROY. This is a proposition to organize a new committee. It does not interfere at all with the standing committees provided for nor the manner of their appointment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The resolution was adopted.

CHARLES WESTMORELAND.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 206) relating to the mileage of Charles Westmoreland, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage; and if there be no objection I should like to have it passed at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Secretary of the Senate, out of the appropriation for the payment of the messengers of the respective States, for conveying to the seat of Government the votes of electors of the States for President and Vice President, in trust for Charles Westmoreland, the only child of the late Charles Westmoreland, the person appointed by the electors of California to deliver to the President of the Senate a list of the votes of California for President and Vice President for 1868, and who died at Panama on his way to the seat of Government with that list, the sum to which he would have been entitled had he reached the seat of Government and delivered the same; and the receipt of the Secretary of the Senate is to be a sufficient voucher therefor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state briefly, if necessary, that Mr. Westmoreland was chosen to bring the vote of California to Washington and died of the small-pox at Panama and left an only son, fourteen or fifteen years old, in impoverished circumstances.

Mr. MORTON. No wife?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No wife or other relative, except sisters and brothers. This resolution provides that the money shall be paid into the hands of the Secretary of the Senate in trust for this boy.

Mr. GRIMES. Has he a guardian?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir. The object is to get the money out of the hands of some person who may perhaps get it and misapply it. The Secretary of the Senate is a personal friend of Mr. Westmoreland and has all his papers, and everything he has is transmitted to the Secretary of the Senate, and he holds the matter in trust for this boy.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1564) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1870, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1596) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, reported it with amendments.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles Weile, late United States consul at Tumbes, Peru, praying that investigation be had in relation to the treatment he received while consul at Tumbes by the authorities of that place, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back to the Senate with the request to be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

In making this report I add a statement that a treaty has just been negotiated between the United States and Peru, although it has not yet received the sanction of the Senate, for the hearing of all claims of American citizens, and also of Peruvians; and it will be for Mr. Weile, if he chooses, to prosecute his claim before the commission constituted by that treaty. It is on that account that the committee at this time ask to be discharged from the further consideration of these papers.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of Margarette S. Morse, administratrix of the estate of Isaac E. Morse, deceased, praying compensation for services rendered by him as commissioner to New Granada, reported adversely thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 833) for the reorganization of the Navy of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 834) to incorporate the Southern Express Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLOGG asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 835) to aid in the construction of the Pacific Central Transit railway and telegraph from the city of New Orleans, Louisiana, to some point on the Rio Grande river, Texas, in the direction of San Blas, on the Pacific coast; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DRAKE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 836) for the relief of Celestia P. Hartt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 837) for the relief of Mrs. Sallie V. Griffin; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 15th instant, a statement of the tracts of land selected by members of the Grand river band of the Ottawa and Chippewa Indians under the treaty of July 31, 1855; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 14, 1868, further information concerning the battle on the Washita river; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating an estimate of appropriation required for surveying Indian reserves for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, there was a question of order left undisposed of yesterday morning which I hope will be disposed of this morning; and for the purpose of having it disposed of I renew the motion to take up House bill No. 65, for the relief of William McGarrahan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this motion a question of order was raised, which the Chair proposed to submit to the Senate for determination.

Mr. MORTON. At the last session—on the last night of the session, I believe—this bill was indefinitely postponed. I now move to call up the bill, and the objection is made that by the indefinite postponement the bill was killed. I insist that it is saved by the operation of the twenty-first joint rule. All the authorities state the effect of an indefinite postponement to be simply to prevent the taking of further action during that session. It is not in the nature of a rejection of the bill; it is not a judgment on the merits of it; but it is a determination that no further action shall take place at that session. The authorities were read yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] and I need not read them again; but every authority states the result of the motion to be that no further action can be taken at the same session.

I admit that that would have the effect of killing the bill if that session and the session following were not connected together. But for such connection the end of the session would have the effect to destroy all the unfinished business of the session, and bills on their third reading could not now be taken up and passed. The end of the session, if there were not some provision to the contrary, would in fact destroy all pending business; and it was to prevent that very thing that the twenty-first joint rule was adopted by which the two sessions are connected together and the unfinished business is saved. This is clearly unfinished business; and it is saved by the operation of the twenty-first joint rule that connects the two sessions together. Mr. Cushing says that a motion to postpone indefinitely is peculiar to American parliamentary law, and that it is equivalent to a motion in England to discharge the order for the consideration of a bill on a particular day without renewing it. He does not put it on the ground that it is a determination of the merits of the question. It is not in the nature of a rejection of the bill. Again, he says:

"The motion to postpone indefinitely is of American origin, and peculiar to legislative assemblies in this country in which it is used. In the House of Representatives it is provided by a rule that when a question is postponed indefinitely it shall not be acted upon again at the same session."

But now we connect the two sessions together by the operation of the twenty-first joint rule; and this is just as clearly unfinished business as any other business that would be carried over by the operation of that rule. Were it not for that rule all the business would die at the end of the session, even without an indefinite postponement; but the twenty-first joint rule comes in and carries over all unfinished business, and by the same force of reasoning takes up as unfinished business anything that has been indefinitely postponed. It seems to me that there is no resisting the force of the twenty-first joint rule; it is within the reason of the law and for the convenience of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not profess to be as familiar with the practice of the Senate as some other gentlemen; but at the same time I am astonished to find any Senator of experience supporting this proposition. It is conceded to be, and I believe that it has been the invariable practice of the Senate from time immemorial, to regard the indefinite postponement of a bill as equivalent to a rejection, and no exception can be adduced to that practice. It has been customary here since I have been in the Senate for the chairman of a committee in reporting bills adversely, where it was desirable to end the matter, to ask at once for their indefinite postponement. I will invite the attention of the Senate to a proceeding which transpired here three or four days ago on the part of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee. He reported back a bundle of bills to which the committee did not assent, and proceeded to say: "For the purpose of removing this business from the Calendar I move the indefinite postponement of these bills;" and when they are indefinitely postponed they are taken off the Calendar and regarded as finished and settled business.

Mr. GRIMES. That was at this session. How would it be in regard to bills indefinitely postponed at the last session?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would ask if the Secretary ever puts a bill indefinitely postponed at the last session on the Calendar for this session? Every motion, resolution, or bill pending at the adjournment of the last session goes upon the Calendar for this session; but every motion, resolution, or bill that was indefinitely postponed at the last session, if it originated in the House of Representatives, is returned by the Secretary of the Senate to the House with a notice that it has been rejected by the Senate, and therefore it cannot, in the nature of things, be put upon the Calendar, for it has gone beyond the jurisdiction of the Senate.

Now I ask, if this invariable practice is to be overturned for the particular benefit of this claimant, in what condition will it leave the Senate and the business of the Senate? Is it possible after a bill has been discussed and indefinitely postponed, that that is equivalent to its lying on the table that it may be called up at any time by any Senator, and so the business of the Senate perpetuated, and there be no end to discussion? It is not customary in the Senate to move for the rejection of a bill; but it is customary, with a view of killing it, to move its indefinite postponement.

Now, sir, I wish to refer to the authorities that were cited yesterday by the Senator from Kentucky; and I say his authorities, according to the argument of the Senator from Indiana, prove the correctness of the position which I have assumed. All those authorities are to the effect that the indefinite postponement of a bill puts off its consideration beyond the end of the session, or at any rate prevents any further consideration of the bill at that session. When those authorities were written every bill that was pending during the session expired with the termination of the session, so that those authorities are equivalent to saying that the indefinite postponement of a bill destroys its existence, because when those authorities were written the business of each session expired with that session. Now, the Senator from Indiana says that the twenty-first joint rule makes both sessions one. If it does, then according to those authorities this bill which has been indefinitely postponed cannot be reconsidered at the same session, and therefore the authorities which he cites are adverse to the position which he assumes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the Senator does not correctly represent my colleague. My colleague said the effect of the twenty-first joint rule was for the first time to continue the business from one session to another, and that it did not become dead by the adjournment. That is his position, and therefore the motion to postpone indefinitely is not a motion that destroys the measure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the position; and the argument which I make upon that position is entirely proper and legitimate. The authority is:

"If they wish to suppress a bill for the whole of that session, they postpone it indefinitely. This quashes the proposition for that session."

That ruling was made when the business expired with the end of the session. It is equivalent to saying that when a bill is indefinitely postponed it cannot be reconsidered during that session; and if this joint rule makes these two sessions one as to that business, then the meaning of this authority is that this bill, when it has been once indefinitely postponed, cannot be reconsidered during the entire session made one by this joint rule. If the authority means anything it means that. All that this authority proves, that the indefinite postponement of a bill defeats it, is equivalent to a paradox, for it kills it for that session; and if Congress has adopted a rule by which one session is dovetailed into another, then it is one session as to this bill, and it cannot be reconsidered.

Sir, I think this proceeding is most extraordinary for other reasons. I call the attention of the Senate to the twentieth rule, which says:

"But no motion for the reconsideration of any vote shall be in order after the bill, resolution, message, amendment, or motion upon which the vote was taken shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate, announcing their decision."

It is acknowledged that this bill has been indefinitely postponed, and has been returned to the House of Representatives with the papers, and the House has been notified that the bill has been rejected by the Senate; and here is a rule which absolutely provides that no bill shall be reconsidered by the Senate after it has gone beyond its control or possession. Now, sir, how can the Senate proceed? What motion is made? To take up a bill for the purpose of considering it before the Senate, when the bill has been rejected, and is in the other House, in the possession of the other House, under a notice of rejection from the Senate. Can this Senate proceed to act upon a bill in that condition when the rule is imperative that no action can be taken when a bill is beyond the control of the body? Moreover, the twentieth rule provides—

"Nor shall any motion for reconsideration be in order unless made on the same day on which the vote was taken, or within the two next days of actual session of the Senate thereafter."

Now, five months have elapsed since action upon this bill. How can it be reconsidered? Does the Senator suppose he can take up this bill and refer it to a committee without reconsidering the vote upon its indefinite postponement? If there was any person with that intention at the time this bill was indefinitely postponed the motion to reconsider that vote under this rule must have been made within two days. This is an absolute rule; and unless a motion is made to reconsider a vote within two days that vote is conclusive upon the bill under this rule.

Mr. MORTON. This is not a motion to reconsider at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not a motion to reconsider?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know it is not a motion to reconsider in form; but if the bill were here no action could be taken upon it by the Senate. Will the Senate, after a bill has been rejected, entertain a motion in regard to it? Suppose that a vote had been taken upon the passage of the bill and the Senator, five months after the bill had been rejected in that way, had proposed to take it up and refer it to a committee, would it not be a good answer to say that that bill had been rejected by the Senate and the vote had never been reconsidered? This vote of indefinite postponement had some effect on the bill. It had some other effect than laying it on the table. That is very certain. And if it had the effect which has always been attached to it by the practice of the Senate no action can be taken without a reconsideration of the vote indefinitely postponing it; and the Senate will not proceed in this way to do a vain thing, to take up this bill or to consider it for one moment when it is positively certain under this rule that no action can be taken on it; there can be no reconsideration.

The twenty-first joint rule is the only rule upon which any proceeding of this nature can be based, and that rule only relates to business that remains undetermined in either House. I think the invariable usage and practice of the Senate has grown into a rule on this subject, and I hope that no sympathy will induce the Senate to overturn a practice so well settled, and which tends so much to promote the business of the Senate. I have nothing to say about McGarrahan or about his claim at this time. If it ever becomes necessary to discuss that I may have something to say on that subject; but I consider it foreign to this discussion. Under this invariable practice, and in view of the fact that the bill is now in the possession of the House of Representatives, that this vote of indefinite postponement has been regarded as a rejection, and that no motion to reconsider would be in order at this time, even if the bill was before the Senate, it seems to me extraordinary that an effort should be made to subvert the settled practice of the Senate. Mr. McGarrahan can introduce another bill—there is no objection to that—and have the question considered in the Senate again.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there not this objection: it is perfectly well understood that if this bill is finally disposed of the Commissioner of the General Land Office will then issue his patents to other parties, and that will close the matter. Is not that the whole secret?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that that is the case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am so informed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I presume the Senator has much information derived from Mr. McGarrahan that is not in the possession of myself or others, but be that as it may, I suppose that if a bill was introduced and was pending here the Commissioner might be induced to withhold any patent in reference to these lands until the bill pending could be determined. I do not know anything about the proceedings before the Commissioner one way or the other.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Here is a letter laid on the table addressed by Senators to the Commissioner, requesting patents to be issued. Has the Senator seen it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not seen it, and know nothing about it.

Mr. STEWART. I know something about it, and I shall have a word to say about it. Since this paper has been alluded to I wish to call the attention of the Senate to it. It is presented here, I suppose, by Mr. McGarrahan with the intention of making it appear that he has been unfairly dealt with in this transaction. It is a request by three Senators, myself among the number, after the disposition of this matter, that the laws of Congress might go into effect, and that the miners owning this land might proceed to have their patents. For now about two years the act of 1866, which permitted miners on the mineral lands to obtain patents, has been suspended without authority of law by the request of Mr. McGarrahan, and at the suggestion of members of Congress they have been kept out of their rights under the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who are the adverse claiming parties?

Mr. STEWART. There are several mining companies; the principal one is the New Idria Mining Company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A corporation?

Mr. STEWART. That is, a corporation located originally under the mining rules and under the mineral land laws would be entitled to a patent. Mr. McGarrahan has for about two years and more prevented those people from proceeding under the laws to acquire the rights that the law give. The Department has obeyed the request of committees of Congress and members of Congress to suspend action until Mr. McGarrahan could have an opportunity to have his claim determined by Congress. There was no authority of law for this suspension; and it was a great hardship to the other parties. When the bill was indefinitely postponed, believing that that was the end of it, and knowing that it ought to be the end of it,

I requested that these parties might have their rights under the law.

Now, Mr. McGarrahan's claim is simply this: in 1844 one Vincente Gomez, a clerk in the department of California, applied for a grant, but no grant was issued, and no possession was taken under the application. A confirmation was applied for to the board of land commissioners, and they rejected it.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the Senator will not go into the merits of the claim.

Mr. STEWART. I simply wish to make a brief statement.

Mr. POMEROY. There is no question before the Senate as to the merits of the case.

Mr. STEWART. I think it necessary to make a few remarks in justification of my course, and I will detain the Senate but a moment. The claim was rejected by the land commission, and it was subsequently confirmed in a manner which, in the estimation of the Supreme Court, threw great discredit upon the judiciary. A man by the name of Pacificus Ord had acquired one half the interest in the claim, and he was attorney for the claim. He was, in the mean time, appointed district attorney for the United States. He appointed Mr. Hartman to appear for the other side, and then went into court and consented to a decree, saying that the United States had no objection to the confirmation of the claim.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEWART. Wait until I get through.

Mr. DAVIS. What has all the Senator is now saying to do with the question before the Senate?

Mr. STEWART. I refuse to be interrupted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make the point of order that it is not in order to argue the merits of the case on a mere question of order.

Mr. STEWART. I am not proposing to argue the merits of the question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know what the Senator proposes to do; but he is doing it. He is talking of the merits of the question, and of nothing else.

Mr. CONNESS. I only rise, sir, to say that the honorable Senator from Maine discussed the merits of this case yesterday in discussing the question of order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all; I made no allusion to the merits.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I will read, if necessary, from the Globe.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish the Senator would. I have read it myself. I said that I had no opinion about the merits one way or other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. STEWART. I only wish to show the reason for my conduct which is exhibited here to the Senate. The claim went before the Supreme Court, and they rejected it in about as severe an opinion as you will find in the records of that court, on the ground of the fraudulent proceeding that had been had. In the mean time some distance from the pretended location mines were discovered and parties went on in good faith to develop those mines. When they were about to acquire the title, as they were entitled to do under the laws of Congress, Mr. McGarrahan asked on his own survey that Congress should grant him this land. While the case was being examined, at the request of committees of Congress the proceedings were suspended in the Department; but when the thing was over, as I supposed, I requested that those parties should have their rights under existing laws, and I contend that I had as much right to do that as other members of Congress had to ask that persons having rights under existing laws should be prevented from asserting those rights until Mr. McGarrahan could work a claim through Congress which had been repudiated as fraudulent by the Supreme Court of the United States. I say the matter has been held up entirely too long, and I believe it was the duty of the Department to issue a patent before this to the other parties complying with the law; but it is still withheld, and this motion now comes up. So far as I am concerned, I would as lief this motion should prevail as have a new bill introduced, except for one reason—that I want the case examined in the other House again. I believe the committee in the other House were misled as to material facts in the case. The committee in this House has examined it, and, as I am informed by the chairman, gave the claimant five long sessions in which to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday comes before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I move to lay aside the unfinished business informally, for the purpose of having this question of order settled. The Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Nevada have spoken out the morning hour. As I do not wish to trouble the Senate with this matter again, I should be glad to have the unfinished business laid aside informally for a short time until it can be settled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. POMEROY. I will make no objection if it can be done informally.

Mr. CONNESS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it will require a motion to test the sense of the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I move, then, that the unfinished business be laid aside informally until this question be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It cannot be done informally except by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As I am entitled to the floor on the unfinished business, I desire to say that personally I have no objection to laying it aside, but that bill is in the hands of the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and although I happen to have the floor I have no right to pre-judge the rights of that committee to the consideration of the bill by the Senate. If it lies over informally by unanimous consent, so that it does not lose its place, I shall make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to proceeding informally with the question which has been before the Senate?

Mr. CONNESS. I object to proceeding informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That being the case, the question is on the motion that the order of the day be postponed for the purpose of proceeding with this matter.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have not yielded the floor for such a motion. I have the floor on the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a point of order. I state this question of order for the consideration of the Chair: we are now engaged in the morning hour with a question of order; it does not relate to the merits of any proposition before the Senate, but it relates to the rights of the Senate itself as a privileged question; and therefore I suggest to the Chair that that privileged question will override any matter of business that comes up at one o'clock, and hence that it does not need any motion or consent that we proceed with the consideration of this question of order. It is not a question on the merits of anything, and must be proceeded with until the Senate itself shall decide to lay it aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not aware that that has any priority over any other business. The unfinished business supersedes everything else at one o'clock, unless it be some privileged motion; but the Chair does not recognize this question of order as a privileged question.

Mr. POMEROY. The question before the Senate is not on a motion to take up or to proceed to the consideration of a bill, but it is an appeal from the decision of the Chair on a question of order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. No; the Chair submits the question to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the same thing.

Mr. POMEROY. The Chair submitted to the Senate the question whether the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] could be entertained. It is not a question on the taking up of a bill. If it was it would be superseded by the expiration of the morning hour. The question before the Senate is the question which the Chair has submitted to the Senate, whether they will sustain the point of order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. With the consent of my colleague, I will move that the prior order be postponed for one hour for the consideration of this question; and I will, in connection with that motion, appeal to the Senator from Wisconsin to postpone his speech for that length of time—say, not exceeding one hour.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the regular order can lie over informally for one hour I have no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My motion will have that effect, if the Senator will listen to it. My motion is that the regular order be postponed for not exceeding one hour, and that the further consideration of this question of order be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the opinion of the Chair that the point of order made on the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] has no priority over other business, but is superseded at this time by the unfinished business of yesterday. Now the motion is to postpone the unfinished business for one hour.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not exceeding one hour.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senate will not do that. I did not understand the Senator from Wisconsin to have yielded the floor to such a motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I yielded with the understanding that the regular business before the Senate is postponed informally for one hour.

Mr. CONNESS. That has been objected to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I did not yield for the purpose of allowing a motion to be made to displace the pending order. I feel that on that subject I ought to consult those who have charge of the bill, the Pacific Railroad Committee.

Mr. HOWARD. It is quite manifest that no such informal postponement can be agreed to, and I hope therefore the unfinished business will be proceeded with.

Mr. SHERMAN. I gave notice yesterday of my intention to move to-day to take up the currency and debt bill. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to give me the floor now for that purpose; and I give notice that I shall make the motion as soon as I can get the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Wisconsin to yield the floor for the purpose of considering the motion to postpone for one hour the order of the day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have not yielded for any motion to postpone. I have expressed my willingness to yield, provided the unfinished business was laid aside informally by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That cannot be done, because objection is made; and it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to yield the floor to me that I may make this motion: that the further consideration of the pending order be suspended or postponed, not exceeding one hour, that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the question which has been before it. That will allow the Senator to make his speech after awhile.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If it is unanimously understood that I take the floor at the end of the hour on the regular order I have no objection; but beyond that I cannot yield.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is the effect of it.

Mr. POMEROY. As soon as this question of order is disposed of, or at the end of the hour, the Senator will be entitled to the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield the floor for the purpose mentioned?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do, with that understanding.

Mr. CONNESS. With what understanding? Let us understand the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the understanding that the Senator from Wisconsin resumes the floor at the end of the hour.

Mr. CONNESS. That is an informal laying over of the regular order, is it not? To that I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can only decide questions as they come up. The Senator from Wisconsin yields for the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.] The question is on that motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Senator from California to object.

Mr. CONNESS. I did.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think the effect of the motion will be to displace the standing order unless it is done by unanimous consent, and therefore I will go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin does not yield the floor. Senate bill No. 256 is now before the body.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I would be glad to yield if I could do so without prejudicing the bill of which the Committee on the Pacific Railroad has charge.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask the Chair one question? I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, if the Senate adopt a resolution postponing the present order not exceeding one hour for the further investigation of the question that has been before the Senate, there is any doubt that upon the disposal of this present business the Senator from Wisconsin will have the floor on the railroad bill? Is there any doubt, as a question of order, on that matter? I think it is right that the Chair should disembarass us about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not very dexterous in these questions of order, and can hardly dispose of them as they arise, and therefore is not disposed to anticipate them. Still there is no objection to stating what is the view of the Chair on the point now suggested. If the Senate should now postpone the regular order for one hour the Chair would regard it as the understanding that the unfinished business should resume its place after that hour was ended. Believing that to be the sense of the Senate, the Chair would endeavor to enforce it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin to yield to me that I may move that the Senate postpone the present order not exceeding one hour, until the Senate shall dispose of the question of order now pending, and that upon the disposal of that question the regular business in order shall be at once resumed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was of the impression that that understanding to which the Chair has referred must be the unanimous understanding of the Senate. If the Chair is of a different opinion, if the vote of the Senate is sufficient to postpone it for a single hour, of course I have no personal objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The ruling of the Chair would be of no consequence; the whole matter is under the control of the Senate; but what has been indicated would be the view of the Chair under the circumstances stated.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With that understanding, the Chair having intimated his opinion on that question as to what would be the result, I am willing to yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the understanding?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That if we postpone for one hour the pending bill, on which I now have the floor, at the end of the hour it will be resumed, and I shall then be entitled to the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Part of my motion is that as soon as the business which has just been displaced is disposed of by the Senate the consideration of the business now regularly before the Senate shall be at once resumed, on which the Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With that understanding I shall yield to allow the Senator to make the motion, for I have no personal wish to prevent it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion now is, that the prior order be superseded for not exceeding one hour, and that then the unfinished business shall be resumed again.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want it distinctly understood that whenever I can get the floor, and it is in order—it is not now, for the Senator from Wisconsin still holds the floor—I wish to take the sense of the Senate as to whether they will consume more time in discussing a private bill, or will go to the consideration of public business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be under the control of the Senate, like everything else.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will then go on and say what little I have to say on the pending bill.

CENTRAL BRANCH PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin does not yield the floor, and the bill (S. No. 256) relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company is now before the Senate, the question being on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. CORBETT.]

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to occupy the attention of the Senate beyond a very few minutes, because I believe that the friends of the measure before the Senate expect that after a very little more discussion they will be able to come to a vote, and what is desired is to have this question, which has been discussed in the Senate at the last session, and once or twice during the present session, come to a vote, take the sense of the Senate on it, let it be disposed of, and be out of the way of all other business. We agreed when we entered on the construction of the Pacific railroad in its imperative necessity, its necessity to bind the East and West together, and for the purpose of making absolutely sure the construction of the road we gave to the company much larger bounties and subsidies than we should probably be willing to do now or should have done then if we had known then what we know. And it is very likely that we consented to the building of more branches to the Pacific railroad than we should have consented to if we had known how easy the road at last was to be constructed. But for the purpose of making its construction sure the policy adopted by Congress was to combine and concentrate the railroad interests of this country upon a single line, and the great struggle in this body, I well remember, was to determine the point from which the main line should begin.

Those who were interested in the railroads from Chicago desired that point to be as far north as possible. Those who were interested in the railroads going from St. Louis were interested in carrying the line further south. They could agree upon the points of departure where these branches were to begin; but they could not agree, and Congress could not agree, upon the point where all these branches should be brought together; and what did they do? To resolve the question they left that point to be determined by the President of the United States, because Congress could not determine it themselves. Before that point was determined by the President it is true the roads reaching from St. Louis were looking to a more southerly connection; they were looking up the Smoky Hill; they were looking in a direction directly west toward Denver, in Colorado; and that explains very much of what was referred to by the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] that there was a time when these roads were looking to a direct westerly direction. But after the President had fixed the point, then under the law the maps were to be filed, and they were filed; and when those maps were filed in pursuance of the law they fixed the general line of the Pacific railroad and for the branches of the Pacific railroad, so that those branches when the maps were filed were fixed, and if they were not fixed by law they were fixed under the law, and without a new law no company and no person had any power to change the general line.

Now, what was done? When the President fixed the point on the one hundredth meridian at which these roads should concentrate this eastern division located its road up the Republican fork and filed its map, and by its location under the law that was the route which was fixed and became the legal route, binding upon the Government, binding upon the parties, and that route could not be changed unless Congress should interfere and by law permit the road to be diverged.

What further was provided? And we come now precisely to the point in this case, and on which I desire to say a few words, and it is all I wish to say. Sir, do you believe that Congress in passing a law would not make any provision whereby one branch, like the central branch, starting from Atchison and going directly west, was to connect with another branch, and thus go on its lines to the one hundredth meridian in case this eastern division should not build? No, sir. Congress made two provisions—that in order to get this Atchison branch in connection with the main trunk of the Pacific road it might do one of two things: first, it might be consolidated with the eastern division, and they go on and build together from the point of junction to the one hundredth meridian; but it provided, secondly, that in case the eastern division should not build, then the central branch itself should take up the line and make toward the point of junction and go on and build to the one hundredth meridian, to the point which was established by the President. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the language of the statute on that subject, and that is all the point to which I wish to direct their attention, because I could add nothing, if I should undertake it, to the clear statement which was made by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] as to the general facts of this case, and I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate in attempting it. But to this one point I desire to call the attention of the Senate:

"And in case any company authorized thereto shall not enter into such consolidated organization, such company, upon the completion of its road as hereinbefore provided, shall be entitled to, and is hereby authorized to continue and extend the same under the circumstances, and in accordance with the provisions of this section, and to have all the benefits thereof, as fully and completely as are herein provided touching such consolidated organization."

Under the law as it stands the opinion of the best lawyers has been given that if the company should go on and build their line upon the road, they might, by law, call upon the Secretary of the Interior, and by mandamus compel him to issue the bonds of the Government. Such has been the opinion of many good lawyers under the act as it stands. But, sir, to avoid any uncertainty about it, the company desire that Congress should declare, and in the bill which is now pending before the Senate they ask permission to unite with the main trunk of the railroad, for it is now the main trunk, from Omaha to the one hundredth meridian at a point some forty or fifty miles east of the one hundredth meridian, which would make the distance some forty or fifty miles shorter than it would be if they should continue the whole length of their line to the one hundredth meridian. Therefore, if the construction given to the law is correct, the bill now pending before Congress is a bill to authorize this central branch to make its connection with the Pacific railroad at a point forty or fifty or sixty miles further east than the one hundredth meridian, and thus save the Government the subsidies in bonds and lands on from forty to sixty miles.

Mr. President, I desired simply to call the attention of the Senate to this point, not to occupy its time. I accidentally was upon the floor when the Senate adjourned yesterday, not for the purpose of taking up its time, but of calling attention to that single point, in the hope that the Senate might dispose of the question which has been discussed at considerable length at the last session and at the present session; and without any disposition on my part to occupy the time of the Senate, or stand in the way of any business of the Senate, I desire, if possible, to bring this matter, as far as I am concerned at least, to a termination.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words on this subject before the vote is taken. Some Senators who have expressed themselves favorable to the passage of this bill have stated that if it were a new question they would vote against it. Well, sir, if it were a new question and an isolated proposition to grant bonds of the Government of the United States to aid in the construction of one hundred and fifty miles of railroad lying anywhere out in the plains, I suppose that no member of this body would cast a vote in its favor; but it is because it is not a new proposition, because the proposed improvement does not stand isolated and alone, but is a part of the primary plan for the Union Pacific railroad originally provided for by law, that it commands the support of members of the Senate. I judge that no one would at this time vote for a subsidy in bonds to aid in the construction of a local line of road, whether lying in the State of Kansas or elsewhere. The real question, I suppose, is, whether this is a necessary part of the railroad plan provided by Congress in 1862 and in 1864; and whether the company referred to in this bill has acquired rights, legal or equitable, that obligates Congress to grant them the relief that is proposed in the bill. In opposition to the suggestion that they have these rights, it has been stated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] and the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] that in their opinion this company never had a right under the law to make a connection with the eastern division railroad, so called.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no! I hope the Senator will not cite me for any such proposition as that. My proposition was that they had a right to a connection which must have been east of the meridian of Fort Riley; that no stretch or construction of their power could carry them to a connection north and west of that point.

Mr. HARLAN. I am happy to hear the Senator's explanation, but it would not have been needed had he waited until my sentence was concluded. What I began to say was that the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] denied that this company had the right to form a connection with the eastern division road in the valley of the Republican river on the line of road which they adopted. I am right now, I believe, and I remember the Senator cited in support of his position a passage from the Globe indicating that some member of this body, in 1862 or 1864, when this question was pending, moved to strike out one hundred miles and insert fifty miles, and that the two Senators from Kansas then occupying seats on this floor said that fifty miles was sufficient to give them a connection at Topeka, or some other point named by the honorable Senator, but he neglected to state that although that motion was made, and although it was sustained by the two Senators then representing the State of Kansas, the Senate voted down the proposition. The Senate voted that fifty miles was not enough to make the connection where the Senate intended the connection should be made, and retained the one hundred mile clause as it now stands in both the laws of 1862 and 1864. So that the only legal or logical inference that can be drawn from the citation of facts made by that Senator is that the Senate believed that an eligible connection could not be made short of one hundred miles, and that it probably could be made within that limit.

But, Mr. President, the first material question to be settled is, did Congress intend that this "central branch" should have a connection with and be a part of the Union Pacific railroad? This, I think, is clearly settled by the statutes. No one denies or can deny that it is one of the branches provided for in both the acts of 1862 and 1864; and the text of these laws will show that Congress intended that all the branches should be connected directly or indirectly with the trunk line. I read first from the twelfth section of the act of 1862, which provides:

"The track upon the entire line of railroad and branches shall be of uniform width, to be determined by the President of the United States, so that when completed cars can be run from the Missouri river to the Pacific coast."

I read again from section seventeen of the same act, where forfeitures are provided:

"Provided, That if said roads are not completed so as to form a continuous line of railroad, ready for use, from the Missouri river to the navigable waters of the Sacramento river, in California, by the 1st day of July, 1876, the whole of all said railroads before mentioned and to be constructed under the provisions of this act, together with all their furniture, fixtures, rolling-stock, machine shops, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and property of every kind and character, shall be forfeited to and be taken possession of by the United States."

You will perceive, Mr. President, that it was contemplated that each of these branches and the trunk line should be constructed as one uniform road, furnishing a connection from each point named on the Missouri river, by each branch and the trunk line, to the navigable waters of the Pacific; and it was provided that if any of these companies failed to fulfill its part of the engagement—that is, to build the sections which it obligated itself to construct—the whole of its property should be forfeited. This provision was incorporated in the amended act of 1864. The first part of the fifteenth section of that act reads as follows:

"That the several companies authorized to construct the aforesaid roads are hereby required to operate and use said roads and telegraph for all purposes of communication, travel, and transportation, so far as the public and the Government are concerned, as one continuous line."

In order that this might be made more secure, if possible, the following provision was incorporated in the law of 1862. I read now from the ninth section of that act:

"And said railroad through Kansas shall be so located between the mouth of the Kansas river as aforesaid and the aforesaid point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude, that these several railroads from Missouri and Iowa herein authorized to connect with the same can make connection within the limits prescribed in this act, provided the same can be done without deviating from the general direction of the whole line to the Pacific coast, the route in Kansas west of the meridian of Fort Riley to the aforesaid point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude to be subject to the approval of the President of the United States, and to be determined by him on actual survey. And said Kansas company may proceed to build said railroad to the aforesaid point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich, in the Territory of Nebraska."

That settles the question whether it was contemplated at that time that the road might go by the Smoky Hill river, which lies entirely in the State of Kansas. Reading these two clauses in connection shows plainly that the intention was that the President of the United States should so control the location of these branches as to enable each one to form its junction within the limits indicated in the law. The specific direction of the statutes that these branches and the trunk line should all connect—the penalty annexed of forfeiture of their whole property if they failed to connect in such a way as to be used as one through road from the Missouri to the Pacific—and the authority with which the President is clothed to compel a connection, seems to me to preclude all cavil as to the right of this central branch to a connection with the trunk line.

This being settled by the language of the law itself, I come to the next pertinent question to this discussion; and that is, how was this connection intended to be secured? The statute settles this also by providing that this central branch road shall be so constructed as to connect with the Union Pacific, eastern division road, and by the use of the last-named road connect with the trunk road on the one hundredth meridian, at a point to be fixed by the President of the United States, between the southern border of the valley of the Republican river and the northern border of the valley of the Platte river. But this part of the line of the eastern division road has not been built. It is insisted, however, by honorable Senators in this discussion that this central branch can nevertheless secure the contemplated connection by building thirty-five miles over to the line of the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division. But the Senator neglected to state that that is itself a road ending out on the plains, and has no connection whatever with the Union Pacific railroad, and cannot have without building at least four hundred miles of road, as I think, judging from the appearance of the map. If this central branch were to construct the proposed thirty-five miles and connect with the eastern division road on its new line as now located, and follow it to its present terminus, it would then be further from an available connection with the trunk line than its present terminus in the valley of the Republican river. Not being able to secure the contemplated connection with the trunk road by diverging over to the line of the eastern division road as at present located, how shall this connection be secured? The statute settles this question also.

The law provides, as recited by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] that if any company authorized to build any part of this trunk road or the branches should fail to do so any other company complying with its contract might proceed to build that omitted section and enjoy the same privileges granted to the company failing to construct. That is the condition in which this company finds itself situated to-day.

To form a through line from Atchison to the navigable waters of the Sacramento river four companies are each authorized to build different sections of the line. This central branch company was authorized to construct one hundred miles; the eastern division, the section lying between the west end of this one hundred miles and the one hundredth meridian, a distance of something over two hundred miles to the trunk road; the Union Pacific railroad, a number of miles undetermined, stretching out toward California; and a California company, an unnamed number of miles eastward, to form a junction with the Union Pacific Railroad Company's line. These four companies were authorized to build different parts of this through line, including this branch. It was provided that any one of them, the others failing, might build the whole work. Three of them are building in good faith. The trunk line, it is believed, will soon be completed. This central branch road has built its proportion of the line. There is a link left out. Now they claim that under the law they have a right to proceed and build that omitted link, to give them the contemplated connection with the Union Pacific railroad. This company make this claim because the law says so; it says that if any company shall fail to build the part assigned to it for construction any other company authorized to build any part of the whole work and completing its part within the time stipulated in the law may proceed to construct the omitted section. The law also provided that if they fail to so build and connect, so as to secure a through road, they shall forfeit their whole interest to the United States.

But the eastern division company did not construct the omitted links in this line up the Republican river, because Congress in 1866 passed a law authorizing the eastern division railroad company to change the location of its route, and it did thus change its route, and build up the valley of the Smoky Hill river. I think Senators cannot avoid coming to the conclusion that if that bill had not passed this company would have had the right, the eastern division company failing, to put in this link of road. I am at a loss to perceive how the passage of that act could affect the rights of the central branch company. The change of location from the Republican to the Smoky Hill river was not their act; it was the act of another corporation, but a change which could not have occurred without the concurrence of Congress. This action of that company was beyond the control of the central branch company, as was this congressional legislation. All they could do they did do. They protested against the passage of the law, proceeded with their work until their one hundred miles were completed, and then appealed to Congress for justice.

But the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] concluded his able and exhaustive argument yesterday by informing the Senate and the country that this company was, at least, entitled to no sympathy; whatever might be the rights of the company under the law they were not entitled to sympathy, for they had already received enormous grants. He read from a newspaper advertisement, in which it was stated that they derived, or were to derive, from the national Government one million two hundred and eighty thousand acres of land lying on each side of this one hundred miles of road. The Senator omitted to state that the public lands had at the time of the passage of the law been so far exhausted that there was not within the limits of the grant, subject to its provisions, to exceed the amount of about two hundred and twenty-five thousand acres. He left the Senate to infer that they were entitled to receive and would receive the whole amount of one million two hundred and eighty thousand acres of land, when, in fact, the law conveys to them less than a quarter of a million. He also read an advertisement from which, it seemed to me, he desired the inference to be drawn that this company had derived enormous sums of money from the sale of Indian lands acquired under a treaty from the Kickapoo Indians. I do not know personally what the facts are in that case, and can only state the representations made to me by the gentlemen who are connected with this enterprise. They say that they were entitled to one hundred and twenty-three thousand acres of land from the Kickapoo Indians, under the treaty referred to, by paying those Indians $1 25 an acre—more than the original worth of the land if the railroad had not been constructed; and if those lands are now worth, as I have no doubt they are, much more than $1 25 per acre, it is an accretion of value growing out of the investment of their own money in this improvement; an accretion of value, however, which accrues equally to the lands of the United States and of the citizens of Kansas lying within the vicinity of the line of the road.

The Senator from New York insists that they had ample notice that the location of the eastern division road would be changed from the Republican river over to the Smoky Hill river, and that if they invested money they did it with a full knowledge of the contemplated change of route, and are therefore not entitled to relief. The law providing for the change was enacted, I believe, on the 3d day of July, 1866. And the gentlemen engaged in this work represent to me that their books show that previous to that date they had paid in on stock out of the pockets of the stockholders $600,000 in cash, and that they had sold their first-mortgage bonds to the amount of about three hundred thousand dollars, the whole of which had been expended in the construction of the road. They invested the greater part of this large amount after the time had expired during which the eastern division company had the legal right to change their location.

The Senator stated, however, that it was but a few days after the passage of that law—the act of July 3, 1866—they presented to the Government as complete their first section of twenty miles of road. He cited the fact correctly, but the inference, it seemed to me, might be drawn from his mode of stating it, that they had not put any money into this enterprise worth mentioning before July 3, 1866, when the fact, as I understand it from other sources than that of the company itself, was, that they had before that period nearly completed twenty miles and had forty other miles well under headway, twenty of them almost ready to be presented to the Government for acceptance. And at this time, as I have been told, this company has paid in the whole of its stock at par, has expended in the construction of the road something like one million dollars, and has exhausted in the same way the bonds derived from the national Government, amounting to $1,600,000, and perhaps an equal amount of their first-mortgage bonds; so that at this time they have invested the whole of their stock, counting it at par, as I understand, and the money derived from the sale of the Government bonds.

That reminds me that the Senator from New York seemed to wish it to be inferred that the right to use this large amount of Government and first-mortgage bonds was proof positive of the great wealth acquired by the company from this enterprise, when in fact they are merely evidence of the company's indebtedness. Under the law the company is bound to pay the Government bonds, principal and interest, at maturity, and, of course, both the interest and principal of its own bonds. Suppose these bonds had been issued and drawn from the Treasury and locked up in the company's safe, what advantage would they be to the company? If I draw my own note bearing interest, payable by myself, and put that note in my pocket, although it may be negotiable paper, does it enhance the value of my assets? It affects me neither the one way nor the other until I part with the paper; but when I part with the paper for a consideration, it is evidence of a debt owed by me to another. So with this company; if they have drawn and sold $1,600,000 of Government bonds, and have issued and sold $1,600,000 of first-mortgage bonds, being $3,200,000 in the aggregate, it is merely evidence that the company is in debt to the amount of $3,200,000, which they are obligated to pay, interest and principal, at maturity. To arrive at the actual value of this work you must first foot up the assets of the company; then foot up the debts of the company, and subtract the smaller from the greater, and you will then perceive whether the work is of any real value to the holders as at present situated. Add to the value of their lands the value of the road and fixtures and rolling-stock; then subtract the aggregate amount of their debts, including both Government and first-mortgage bonds, and you will have the sum total of the company's wealth. And this nominal value might prove to be worthless. For it is a kind of property, except the lands, which rapidly deteriorates with use and time. Its value will depend on the income over and above the expenses and repairs. And the gentlemen representing this company tell me that the road does not yield more than enough to keep up the running expenses. But they believe that if they shall be permitted to proceed to build the omitted section in the line, so as to give them the connection they were entitled to under the laws of 1862 and 1864, it will make the whole property of real value. I suppose that in the decision of this question the votes of Senators must turn on their opinion of the vested rights of this company. If the enactment of the law offering this company the right to construct the one hundred miles and the additional privilege to build the additional link leading up to the trunk line at the one hundredth meridian, if the eastern division should fail to build it, and the acceptance of this proposition by this central branch company is in the nature of a contract, it must be carried out in good faith.

It may be to the interest of the Government pecuniarily to break faith with its citizens; it may be that the essence of this contract can be avoided by a close and narrow construction of its own statutes; but the original intention is plain. I do not know how other Senators may view that subject. I have not thought, however, it ever was an advantage in the long run either to an individual or to a Government to break faith; and hence, I have not thought that the proposition to avoid the payment of the national debt in whole or in part was either creditable or wise. I know the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who has opposed the passage of this bill earnestly—and I have no doubt honestly—takes a different view of the obligation of the Government to keep faith with other contracting parties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator alludes to me, I beg leave to correct him. I am for keeping the Government faith with this company just as much as with everybody else. I only differ with the Senator as to what the Government faith is; and I am willing to speak frankly on this subject, as I hope he is on the subject of the public debt, one way or the other.

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly; I have no doubt of that. No one ever dreamed of accusing the Senator from Vermont of want of frankness; and I have always been and always shall be equally frank on the subject to which he refers. I was about to remark that there were those a few months since who thought the laws authorizing the sale of Government bonds could be so construed as to authorize the Government to pay them in greenbacks; that is, in its own paper, without interest, and thus avoid the payment of the interest. This always seemed to me very much like repudiating the interest. Afterward, the President of the United States, in a grave paper sent to Congress at the beginning of the session, proposed to pay the interest for a few years, but thought the law might be so construed, or at least the equities of the case might justify, at the end of a given number of years, the repudiation of the principal. Now, Mr. President, it may be that a narrow, lawyer-like construction of these statutes would justify the conclusion to which the honorable Senator comes. He may find by a close analysis of these statutes, (though I am unable to agree with him,) that the Government is not technically and legally bound to grant the relief sought by this company in the passage of this bill; but there can be no question of the original intention of Congress when the laws were passed. I suppose that what is meant by keeping faith is to carry out a contract as originally intended between the two contracting parties, and that neither is at liberty to seek to evade the real meaning of the contract by a technical construction of phrases. In this case the original purpose was to authorize this company to build one hundred miles of road, and at the end of this one hundred miles to form a connection with the eastern division road, giving them a connection with the main trunk line at the one hundredth meridian, with the distinct agreement on the part of the Government that if the eastern division company failed to build that link this company might put it in on the same terms proposed to the eastern division company.

The eastern division company has failed to build the road where it would afford this connection. This company is therefore in precisely the dilemma contemplated by Congress when the laws of 1862 and 1864 were enacted; and they now merely ask that this Government shall keep faith with its contractors—keep faith with its private citizens, with those who have invested their private funds to build a great work in the success of which the Government was supposed to be greatly interested. Looking at this subject as I do I cannot vote otherwise than in favor of this bill.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President, in 1866, when the proposition was introduced into the House of Representatives to authorize the Union Pacific road, eastern division, to refile its map and to change the location of its road, I opposed it, and I opposed it because the persons who had invested in the Hannibal and St. Joseph road, which is now called the Central Branch Pacific railroad, complained that if this map was refilled and the location of the road changed they would be left in the wilderness and would suffer in their interests. Now they come here and claim that the law, as originally passed, gives them a right, the route of that road having been changed, to make a connection with the main trunk of the Union Pacific railroad. It looks to me like an afterthought.

By the ninth section of the act of July 1, 1862, the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, is authorized to run its line from the mouth of the Kansas river, by way of Topeka and Lawrence, to the one hundredth meridian. By the thirteenth section of the same act the Hannibal and St. Joseph company is authorized to build its road for a hundred miles westward to unite with this Union Pacific, eastern division, or to go north and form a connection with the main trunk of the Union Pacific railroad; and it is stipulated expressly in the act that in no case shall they receive land grants and subsidies for more than one hundred miles:

"But in no event shall lands or bonds be given to said company, as herein directed, to aid in the construction of their said road for a greater distance than one hundred miles."

In a memorial which has been presented to the Senate on this subject it is claimed that whenever any one of these branches should fail to make connection the other branches were entitled to go forward and build the road so as to make a connection with the main trunk of the road. Now, sir, I can find nothing in the law itself authorizing any such construction. In the twelfth section of the act of July 2, 1864, I find this:

"And if the Union Pacific Railroad Company shall not be proceeding in good faith to build the said railroad through the Territories when the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Railroad Company, now known as the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, shall have completed their road to the one hundredth degree of longitude, then the last-named company may proceed to make said road westward until it meets and connects with the Central Pacific Railroad Company on the same line."

That is, if the main trunk of the Union Pacific railroad fails to proceed with the road through the Territories, then this Union Pacific, eastern division, may continue the road. There is not a word in that section which authorizes the Hannibal and St. Joseph road to take up and continue the road if the Union Pacific, eastern division, should fail to make the connection.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me—I know he intends to be exactly right—the privilege claimed is not found in the twelfth section, but in the sixteenth section.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Very well; I will refer to the sixteenth section. I know they put great stress upon the construction given to that sixteenth section by their paid counsel, Judge Curtis. But, sir, is there anything in the sixteenth section of this act that will justify the construction which their paid counsel puts upon it? Let me read it. This sixteenth section authorizes a combination or consolidation of these various railroad companies, and it goes on to say:

"And in case, upon the completion by such consolidated organization of the roads, or either of them, of the companies so consolidated, any other of the road or roads of either of the other companies authorized as aforesaid (and forming, or intended or necessary to form, a portion of a continuous line from each of the several points on the Missouri river, hereinafter designated, to the Pacific coast) shall not have constructed the number of miles of its said road within the time herein required, such consolidated organization is hereby authorized to continue the construction of its road and telegraph in the general direction and route upon which such incomplete or unconstructed road is hereinbefore authorized to be built, until such continuation of the road of such consolidated organization shall reach the constructed road and telegraph of said other company, and at such point to connect and unite therewith."

It is simply this, nothing more and nothing less: that several of these companies may consolidate into one company, and then, if any one of the companies failing or refusing to enter into this consolidation shall not complete its road, the consolidated companies may go forward and complete that road.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My honorable friend does not pay attention to another clause, which provides that if one of the companies will not consolidate then the other company may go and do the same thing. That is the point in it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman point it out?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir. It is on page 363 of the Statutes, just above the middle of it:

"And in case any company authorized thereto—"

What? To enter into the consolidation—

"shall not enter into such consolidated organization, such company, upon the completion of its road as hereinbefore provided, shall be entitled to, and is hereby authorized to continue and extend the same under the circumstances and in accordance with the provisions of this section, and to have all the benefits thereof as fully and completely as are herein provided touching such consolidated organization."

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. They are to have all the privileges which the original law allows them. Now, then, it rests with the gentleman to prove that the original law authorized the Hannibal and St. Joseph company to continue the road, if the eastern division should fail to make the connection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the eastern division was authorized to go up and have lands and bonds all the way to the one hundredth meridian. The central branch was to go out one hundred miles, expecting to connect there with the eastern division, and then this law comes in and provides that if the eastern division turns off down toward New Mexico the central branch may take up the line of march and go to the one hundredth meridian. That is the substance of it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I do not so understand it. Furthermore, if that was the interpretation, why does not this company accept of that condition? I have no objection to their making a connection with the main branch. I only object to their coming here and asking a land grant and a subsidy of $16,000 a mile for the continuation of this road, when the original law said they should receive the subsidy and the land grant for only one hundred miles, and they have got the full amount specified.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will answer the honorable Senator that question. He asks, why do they not go on under the law? That involves a law suit which would take at least two or three years to determine. They must first apply to the Secretary of the Interior, and if he refuses to give them the lands and bonds they must then apply to the supreme court of the District of Columbia for a mandamus to compel it to be done. The litigation will go on there between the parties interested, which will delay the thing for a year or two. There may then be an appeal from that decision to the Supreme Court of the United States; and we know that when a case goes on the docket of that court it must stay there two years in its natural order before it can be reached; and here are three or four years gone before the thing can come to a determination in the courts.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Mr. President, that is not the point. The point is not whether this Hannibal and St. Joseph road or central branch shall make connection with the main trunk. It is whether they shall receive this land grant and this subsidy for making that connection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. They claim, and I understand their counsel has given them to believe, that under the law as it stands, and to which I have referred, they are legally authorized to do it; but what they ask is that they may be permitted to connect with the main line sixty miles nearer, to avoid a litigation of four or five years, so far as they are concerned, and to avoid, so far as the Government is concerned, should the litigation be decided in favor of the company, the payment of bonds and lands for about sixty miles further than they will be granted under the pending bill. So it is economy to the Government, and avoids litigation to the company.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Then we are to understand from the gentleman that this company come here to ask that the privileges which they have by the law now be taken from them. Is that what they are here for, to have land grants and subsidies taken from them which the original law allows them?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. They ask leave, instead of going to the one hundredth meridian, to join the main road at Fort Kearny, which is sixty miles nearer, and, as a matter of course, the Government will not be required to grant them lands and bonds for the sixty miles between Fort Kearny and the one hundredth meridian. They want to go on and get the connection. The very thing for which they ever went into this operation was to be a branch of the Pacific railroad. How can they be a branch of the Pacific railroad and not touch the Pacific railroad?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I hope the Senator will allow me to finish my remarks. By the original law of 1862 the Union Pacific, eastern division, was authorized to file its map and locate its road at any time within three years, and it could change the filing of its map or the location of its road at any time within that period. By the thirteenth section of that law the Hannibal and St. Joseph Company is authorized to build its road from the Missouri river one hundred miles westward and make connection either with the main branch of the Union Pacific or with the eastern division of the Union Pacific. The time having expired within which the eastern division could refile its map and change the direction of its road, that company came to Congress and asked permission to change the direction of its road from the Republican to the Smoky Hill route, and that privilege was granted; and now this company comes here and asks permission to continue its road one hundred and fifty miles and to have a land grant made to it and subsidies of $16,000 a mile granted to it to build that road, while the original law said explicitly that it should have only the subsidy and the land grant for one hundred miles. The law was explicit in that matter. What they want is to enlarge this outpouring of money from the public Treasury for their benefit.

Mr. President, the other day we refused to give $7,000 to a lady who came here and claimed it, when it had been taken from her by the authority of the United States Government. There was no question that her property had been taken. Here is, at best, a doubtful claim. In my mind there is but little doubt about it; but in the minds of some there is a doubt. We are asked to pay out of the public Treasury, when it is burdened and our people are weighed down by taxation, $2,400,000, and to burden the industry of this country to that extent, and to put off the day of the payment of our public indebtedness. Sir, I think our duty to our constituents requires us to look well to the foundations of this claim. I believe there is nothing whatever in the law requiring us to make this payment, and I am confident, indeed I know, that at the time the subject came into the House of Representatives that was the understanding of the parties who deemed themselves injured by the change of the direction of the Union Pacific, eastern division; and I voted with them, because some of them are my friends, and I should be sorry in any way to injure their interests or to do them harm. They understood that the change of direction cut them off from any right of connection, with subsidies and land grants, with the main branch of the Union Pacific; and now, sir, though I should be glad to accommodate them, my sense of duty to my constituents and the country leads me to vote against this claim.

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, I shall not spend any time in making an argument on this bill, because I suppose it does not need it, and if it did sufficient argument has been already made. But some questions of fact have been brought into the discussion, in which I have been referred to, that I desire briefly to correct. The Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] in his argument yesterday, stated that it was designed in 1862, when the original law was passed, and that I supported such an amendment to limit the extent of this branch to fifty miles. That was so; but the Senate thought differently, and voted the amendment down.

Mr. CONKLING. I did not state any such thing. I would not interrupt the Senator if he did not misstate my position. I did not refer to any such amendment; I referred simply to the amendment inserting the words "via Atchison."

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator referred—I have his words before me—to the amendment offered by Mr. Clark, limiting the subsidy to fifty miles, and that was supported, he said, by the Senators from Kansas, Mr. Lane and Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HURLAN,] in his remarks this morning, has alluded to that subject and given the history of it as everybody understands it. The then Senator from California, Mr. McDougall, sitting beside me, opposed the motion to limit it to one hundred miles, and the Senate sustained it by a vote of 22 for it and 17 against it; so that, whatever might have been the choice of the Senators from Kansas on the passage of that bill, it was overruled by the Senate, and the distance was left at one hundred miles.

Now, sir, as a question has arisen between the Senator from New York and myself in regard to the distance from Atchison to the Republican valley at Clifton, in a straight line, I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to the official facts from the map used by the Senator himself. This map is official; one of the surveyed maps made by Mr. Ream, who was then a clerk in the surveyor general's office. The first standard parallel, which he ran himself, or assisted in running, starts from Atchison and runs directly west, and strikes this town of Clifton on the Republican river, within half a section. It is just nineteen townships from Atchison to Clifton on the Republican river. Six times nineteen are one hundred and fourteen miles. I said in my remarks a year ago that it would not exceed fifteen miles beyond the distance of one hundred miles, and the Senator from New York says it is over fifty. The misunderstanding between the Senator and myself grows out of this fact: I was speaking of the distance in a straight line, and the Senator was speaking of the meandering course of a railroad. With his view of the matter the Senator from New York is clearly right. But when I was speaking of the distance I meant the distance in a straight line, and that is one hundred and fourteen miles, or, perhaps, one hundred and fifteen miles. So that the statement which I made a year ago was not only substantially, but accurately correct with the view which I then had in speaking of the distance from Atchison to the Republican river in a straight line, as it was intended when this bill passed Congress, after they voted down the amendment to limit it to fifty miles, and extended it to one hundred. From that time it has been the intention of the parties connected with this road that the connection should be in the Republican valley, at or near Clifton, which is exactly one hundred and fourteen or one hundred and fifteen miles from Atchison; but it was put in "one hundred miles," because the valley of the Republican is a very wide valley, and that was practically near enough for a connection, because the railroads do not follow the banks of the river. It is timber there. They are always in the valley, on what is called the second bottom, as near the bluffs as they can go. That valley is some seven miles wide, so that practically the connection, as the bill originally stood, was within the distance allowed by law, and there would have been no complaint.

The Senator from New York says further—I read from the Globe of to-day—

"Their western terminus now is Irving."

The fact is it is Waterville, some eight or ten miles from Irving up the Blue:

"If Senators will take the trouble to consult the map, they will see that a valley runs from Irving to Manhattan."

There is the valley of the Blue from Irving to Manhattan, but instead of being west, it is east of south. The road is already built up to the meridian of Fort Riley, which is seventeen miles further west than Manhattan:

"I understood it to be stated in this Chamber at the last session—I have not looked at the report of debates, and therefore I will not make the allegation—but I understood it to be stated that it was over sixty miles from the existing western terminus of the eastern division to Manhattan or Junction City. I could not then deny. I felt hardly at liberty to doubt, that statement. Now, having passed over the ground, I am able to doubt it, and prudently to say to the Senate that thirty-five miles of railroad from the western existing terminus will give the claimants a connection, at Junction City, at Fort Riley, at Manhattan, as they please, less than thirty-five miles at Manhattan and thirty-five miles at Junction City."

If the Senator has passed over that ground from the western terminus of this road since the subject was up in debate before, it is a mystery to me. I was living there all summer, and I did not hear of the Senator's going over this ground. I heard of his going up the Kansas valley, forty or fifty miles from this road, on the car, at the rate of twenty or thirty miles an hour; but that he could have passed over this ground, forty miles distant from that road, and hence knows from experience that the distance is greater than was represented, is not only new but surprising to me. I have the map before me, and the distance in a straight line from the terminus of this road to Fort Riley is exactly forty-two miles. There is no traveled road and no railroad that can be made within forty-two miles. I think perhaps a railroad might be made within fifty miles. Forty-two miles is the exact distance in a straight line. My own opinion is that by making an exact right angle fifty miles would reach the valley of the Kansas and make a connection with the eastern division of the Union Pacific railroad. But to do that there must be an exact right angle, because the road is now built to an exact parallel with Fort Riley west. It would not be for the public interest to build the road in that way; it would be ruinous to the road; it would be a measure that no one understanding either railroads or the country could recommend. I have never known a railroad going west to make an exact right angle and turn south.

I do not care to pursue this subject. These are merely technical inaccuracies. I have no feeling about it, but I wanted to show that the remarks which I had previously made were substantially correct. The proposed grant of subsidy to this railroad is based precisely on this ground: it is believed that this company have equitable if not legal rights. I remember the argument of the Senator from Maryland, (Mr. Johnson,) now abroad, at great length on this subject at the last session, in which I thought he made a clear statement that their rights were perfect in the law, and he said in so many words that he was surprised that the Secretary of the Interior did not so regard it. My own opinion in regard to that would not be valuable, but that their equities are strong, commanding, equal to law itself, is controlling with me. I would just as lief have a good case of equity before the people of this country as to have a law. Some men say that our bonds are not in the law required to be paid in gold; but those who hold them believe they have an equitable requirement, because that was the understanding, that the parties who negotiated them let them take them with that understanding; and I say now I would as lief have an understanding, fair and honest, before the American people as to have a law.

I know a State in this Union that ran its indebtedness beyond what the Constitution allowed. The constitution said their State indebtedness should never exceed so much, and yet the Legislature, by appropriation, did exceed it in building their State capitol. A party undertook to repudiate it, but when the question was submitted to the people, they said good faith required that they should live up to those contracts although they were against law, and the party that tried to repudiate those obligations went into oblivion. I say now that the American people will be just to good faith, to what was the understanding between the parties at the time the contract was made. Technicalities and legal quibbles will not be sustained by the people of any State in this Union. All I have to say is that it is believed in my State that good faith toward these parties, under the law, and considering the manner in which they have constructed this road, entitles them to a connection at the point where they desire to make it.

Let me say, also, that no criticism has ever been made about this road. You have had reports that other roads were not made correctly. The parties building this road have not been subject to criticism on that point. They never lost a bridge or a culvert. Their road is of such a character that no one has ever questioned it. That accounts for the fact that they spent $32,000 a mile upon it, as their sworn statements show. But, sir, being anxious for a vote, I will not pursue the argument further.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, this is a bill to give to a railroad corporation, established for individual profit and gain, the bonds of the United States Government, bearing six per cent. interest, for $16,000 for each mile of railroad constructed, and to the extent of one hundred and fifty miles, making altogether the sum of $2,400,000; and this in addition to its very liberal grant of land. One hundred and fifty miles is an extent as great as can be constructed during the present year, but if Congress shall make this grant there is nothing to prevent the company from obtaining a similar subsidy next year, or in any following year until the road shall reach the Pacific; for as long as Congress will give, railroad corporations will apply, as it is much more convenient and agreeable to wealthy shareholders for the public Treasury to furnish the money to construct their roads than to advance it from their own private fortunes. In view of the present condition of our finances and the heavy taxation required to meet the current expenses of the Government and the interest on the public debt, Congress ought not, in my opinion, to entertain a proposition of this kind. An individual loaded with debt which he finds himself troubled in meeting will naturally put off all expenditures save those of absolute necessity until his indebtedness falls within his ability. Why should not the representatives of the people do likewise? I cannot vote for this bill, nor can I vote for any like measure, nor indeed for any measure that takes money from the Treasury, unless in pursuance of an existing law, or unless required for the credit or for the honor of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. CORBETT.]

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the amendment of the honorable Senator from Oregon will be rejected, not so much because I object seriously to the principle embraced in it, but because it is wanting in analogy to the measure itself and to the whole system of Pacific railroad legislation now existing upon our statute-books.

I support the present bill, Mr. President, because I religiously believe that justice and equity require its passage, for in my opinion it is only carrying out fairly the assurances of the Government given to this company in previous legislation. Of this I cannot entertain a doubt. I vote for the bill upon the same principle that if I were a chancellor I would decide a case in equity in favor of the party asking relief. In brief, I vote for it because I honestly believe that we have held out by our legislation assurances to this company which we are bound in honor and in justice to keep good and in full faith. To leave them in their present condition is to withdraw from them those assurances and the benefits which they had a right under the statute to claim at our hands, as I believe.

The honorable Senator from New York yesterday, in the elaborate argument which he presented to the Senate, with all the grace and gravity of which he is so eminently a master, told the Senate and the country that one ground upon which this bill was supported was:

"That the corporation for which the subsidy is proposed acquired by act of Congress the right to build a railroad where one has been built, and by so building—

That is, building exactly between the two termini of the present finished road—

"to reach and enjoy a connection with the main trunk railroad to the Pacific ocean."

But the honorable Senator stating, as he endeavored to do, the proposition clearly and conclusively, characterizes it as follows; that is, I understand the honorable Senator as denying that our legislation gave to the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, in other words, the present central branch, a right to form a connection with the Kansas road, that is, the eastern division. If I misunderstood the honorable Senator, he will have the goodness to correct me.

Mr. CONKLING. I would not venture to interrupt the Senator but by his invitation. He did entirely misunderstand me, and I can state in a word, if he wishes me to do so, what my position was.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; if I misunderstood the Senator, then I stand corrected.

Mr. CONKLING. Precisely what I stated was this: that the amendment "via Atchison" was placed in the bill upon the declarations at the time, all around, that its purpose was to direct and restrain the course of the road, so that it should make its connection with the eastern division, but make it east of the meridian of Fort Riley, and Topeka was the place there referred to.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, it is of very little use, as the experience of the honorable Senator will demonstrate, to refer to the debates in a legislative body for the purpose of giving a construction to the acts which it passes. There is no source of information or enlightenment so deceptive, so uncertain, as legislative debates. I therefore discard entirely all interpretation arising from the debates in the body, and should always, as I do now, feel myself bound only by the enacted statutes and by the proper legal construction to be given to them.

Now, sir, the central branch indubitably, by the very language of the statute, had an undoubted right to form a connection with the eastern division, whether the distance of one hundred miles along which it received its cash subsidies and lands reached that connection or not. They had a right to form a connection, and it is because they have been practically deprived of the enjoyment and benefit of that right that this bill has been brought before the Senate. The thirteenth section of the act of 1862 declares:

"That the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company of Missouri may extend its road from St. Joseph via Atchison, to connect and unite with the road through Kansas."

That has never been repealed, and stands as the law to-day. It has that right. It was given the company by the act of incorporation of the Pacific Railroad Company of 1862. At that time, as is well known, what is now called the Eastern Division of the Pacific Railroad Company had projected its route from a point on the Missouri river near Leavenworth, up the Republican river, the Republican fork, so-called. If gentlemen will make inquiry in the Department of the Interior they will discover a copy of the original map of the company. When the act of 1862, therefore, was passed it was passed in reference to that projected line up the Republican fork. In proof of this let me cite for the attention of Senators the ninth section of the act of 1862. Its language is:

"And in case the general route or line of road from the Missouri river to the Rocky mountains should be so located as to require a departure northwardly from the proposed line of said Kansas railroad before it reaches the meridian of longitude aforesaid," &c.

Showing that Congress at that time were cognizant of the fact that there was a projected line of road in existence known as the line of what is now the Eastern Division of the Pacific Railroad Company, and that that line, according to its map, ran up the Republican fork. It was with that line that this charter in its thirteenth section authorized the central branch to connect itself. That right, by subsequent legislation, by the act of 1866, has been practically and for all beneficial purposes taken away from this company, although by the sixteenth section of the act of 1864, amendatory of the original charter of 1862, it is declared that—

"In case any company authorized thereto shall not enter into such consolidated organization, such company, upon the completion of its road as hereinbefore provided, shall be entitled to, and is hereby authorized to continue and extend the same under the circumstances, and in accordance with the provisions of this section, and to have all the benefits thereof, as fully and completely as are herein"—

That is, in this act, and not, as inferred by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, in the act of 1862—

"herein provided touching such consolidated organization."

Whether the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior in withholding from the central branch its lands and bonds upon the passage of the act of the 3d of July, 1866, was correct or incorrect, I shall not stand here to argue. It is sufficient for me to be convinced that here was a bona fide assurance held out to the central branch that it should have the privilege of forming a connection with the eastern division, and thus a connection with the main stem of the Union Pacific Railroad Company from Omaha westward to the Pacific ocean. As this company has been deprived of this privilege, I propose to make the damage to them good so far as I reasonably can, and I think the present bill is a reasonable approach to such an indemnification.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have felt desirous to receive light on this subject from others, and I will state in a few words the light as it strikes my mind that I have received upon it. According to my reading of the act of July 1, 1862, the eastern division of the Union Pacific railroad was to be located between the southern margin of the Republican fork and the northern margin of the Plattefork, in the now State of Nebraska. I admit that there is something in the act of 1862 which gives a pledge to all concerned that the general line of the eastern division of the Pacific railroad shall be located between the southern margin of the Republican fork and the northern margin of the Platte river, situated in the State of Nebraska.

The gentlemen who advocate this bill here concede that there is no legal obligation upon Congress to pass it, but, in the language of the honorable Senator from Michigan and others, they contend that there is a strong equity that binds the Senate morally to pass the measure now under consideration. I have not reached that conclusion, for reasons which I will briefly state. As I understand the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Kansas, if the eastern division of the Union Pacific railroad had been located along the Republican fork, it would have fulfilled any pledge, express or implied, that was given by the act of 1862 to the company who are interested in the present measure or any other company or individual. If that be true what cause of complaint in justice or equity have the company who are interested in the pending measure? Their cause of complaint is simply this, according to their own showing: the act of 1862, they say, located the line of the eastern division of the Union Pacific railroad in the valley of the Republican fork—

Mr. HOWARD. The act of 1862 recognized that location as one already established by the company.

Mr. DAVIS. That is my proposition, and it is the reading of the law of 1862, as I understand it, and I have just read it. Then, if there is a departure from the line upon the Republican fork, and the present central branch company located their road with a view to a union with the line running along the Republican fork, and they have been balked or defeated in carrying out that intention, to that extent they have an equitable claim upon Congress, and to no other extent whatever. I understand that there are two branches of the eastern line of the Pacific railroad located. One is called the Omaha branch; that is, the northern branch; and the other is now called the Smoky Hill branch.

This central branch, as it is termed, is an intervening branch, whose object was when its charter was passed to unite with the more southern branch, or that branch which they expected to pass up the valley of the Republican fork. The complaint of this corporation and their friends on this floor is, that they were defeated or balked in their purpose of uniting their road with the line of the eastern division that was to run along the valley of the Republican fork, and that they were defeated by the line of that company being changed from the Republican fork to the Smoky Hill fork. I think those are the facts and premises that will enable the Senate to comprehend the full equity and all the equity of the company which is now making complaint. Their original object was to get to the eastern division of the Union Pacific railroad that would pass along the valley of the Republican fork. By the action of the directory and of the power that controlled that road, the intimation from the law and from their surveys that they intended to locate their road along the Republican fork has been modified by a change of the road to the Smoky Hill fork and to its fixed location along the valley of that fork.

Now, what do I understand to be the object of the present bill, and of the present directory of what is called the central branch line? They want to change their original purpose of uniting with the Republican fork road, and to unite with the Omaha branch; and they say that the transfer of the route from the Republican fork to the Smoky Hill fork gives to them an equity upon Congress to enable them to unite with the Omaha branch, although they did not contemplate any such union originally. I say that no such equity as this arises upon the facts; no such equity as this arises upon the legislation which the honorable gentlemen have presented to the Senate as having been heretofore adopted by Congress. On the contrary, the whole of the equity they have, all that they have a pretext to claim, is to give them aid to reach the road that they expected to run up the Republican fork along its line up the Smoky Hill fork. I concede to gentlemen on their own facts, their own premises, their own principles of legislation, that they have a right to an equity, growing out of the fact that this legislation was not consummated in the location of the roads, as the present company expected it would be by the transfer of the line from the Republican fork to the Smoky Hill fork. Concede all that to be true, and that an equity arises in favor of the central branch company upon that state of fact, the utmost limit of that equity is to enable this company to reach the southern branch, which they expected to run up the Republican fork at its new location in the Smoky Hill fork.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I think that in the statement which he makes of this matter there are two very material omissions: first, the purpose of the central branch was not to run any railroad up in the direction of the Smoky Hill fork, which does not go to the main line of the Pacific railroad at all. It goes off to New Mexico. That is the way it points. But the original purpose was to unite with the Union Pacific railroad upon the one hundredth meridian, and the mode of union was by connecting with the road which located its line up to the one hundredth meridian at the point fixed by the President. Their purpose was to go on the Pacific railroad and be a branch of the Pacific railroad, not to be a branch of a railroad running up the Smoky Hill, which is no part of the Pacific railroad at all, but a new railroad—a railroad which is running directly west.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not understand the facts to be as stated by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The map shows it, I think, very clearly.

Mr. CONKLING. On the contrary, if the honorable Senator from Kentucky will pardon me for a moment, the eastern division Pacific railway runs now to the town of Sheridan, and perhaps it has reached twelve miles beyond, to Fort Wallace. That, as the map shows, and as everybody who has passed over the road knows, is in the direction by the best route of attaining a union with the Union Pacific railroad.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. At what point?

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will restrain his impatience I will endeavor to inform him at what point.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not impatient.

Mr. CONKLING. Let me make my statement. The papers on file in the Interior Department show that the eastern division selected this route on which they are located in preference to the other because of more timber and fuel, but especially because it was one hundred and thirty-four miles shorter to reach the very destination of which we are speaking. The Senator from Wisconsin asks, where will it attain the Union Pacific railroad? I will endeavor to tell him where. It is proceeding up the Smoky Hill fork. It has reached Sheridan, and perhaps Fort Wallace. Its route is to Cheyenne Wells, as fixed by a bill which has passed this body. From there the route is down the valley of the Cherry creek to Denver, and Denver is about one hundred miles from the City of Cheyenne, which is one of the stations on the Union Pacific railroad; and Denver is made a point under the act of 1866, and not only so, but under other acts and under various actions taken by all these parties in interest.

Now, sir, subsidy or no subsidy, from the City of Denver to the City of Cheyenne a road is to be built as certain as destiny and progress in that region; so that the only link to be supplied to-day is between Fort Wallace and Denver. That is not a long road; and it is the shortest space of country which can be traversed either between Fort Riley or any point west of Fort Riley, and the best possible connection with the Union Pacific railroad, which the honorable Senator from Kentucky denominates the Omaha branch. Then there has been no diversion even if the eastern division should be able at some future time to make Santa Fé, and proceeding on to unite with a road which has a charter far below San Francisco on the other side, because nevertheless iron would be laid, and continuous iron as it is bound to be, from Sheridan to Denver and thence to Cheyenne.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. From Denver to a connection? Will the honorable Senator now give us the route? From Denver where are you going to strike the Pacific railroad?

Mr. CONKLING. Which one; the Union road?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator ever been there?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have been at Denver.

Mr. CONKLING. Then if the Senator has been there he is familiar with the stage route from Denver to Cheyenne, which is driven, as he knows, now in a good deal less than twenty-four hours.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Cheyenne is this side of Denver. I am talking about going beyond Denver.

Mr. CONKLING. I am surprised that the honorable Senator should say that Cheyenne is this side of Denver. If he will look at the time-table of the Union Pacific Railroad Company he will find that Cheyenne is on its route, a town of twenty-seven thousand inhabitants, which, like Jonah's gourd, sprang up almost in a night.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I supposed the Senator was referring to Cheyenne Wells, a point to which the eastern division road is to go, as the Senator says.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator ask me the route from Cheyenne Wells to Denver?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I can very well see that there may be a line from Denver to Cheyenne. Cheyenne is a point on the Union Pacific railroad; but what is the distance, and in what direction is it?

Mr. CONKLING. Why, sir, it is a route which runs from Denver to Burlington, taking the first considerable place, and right on northwest by a route which nature has graded not only for stage-coaches but for railroads, to the City of Cheyenne. I passed over a large part of the way in the night, although a very bright moonlight night, in a stage-coach, and the horses went on and ran a considerable part of the way. The prairie rolled a little at times, but I believe only twice to any extent; and we passed one river where there was a slight descent in reaching the bridge by which we passed it, a remarkable level belt of country, over which Wells, Fargo & Co. drive their stages twice every twenty-four hours. That is the route.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I only asked the honorable Senator the direction. How many miles north of Denver is Cheyenne?

Mr. CONKLING. I believe the surveys will show that the best route for a railroad between those termini would be about one hundred and nine or one hundred and ten miles in length. I think that is the distance as it was stated to me by the drivers of the coaches and by the residents there.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In what direction—north, south, east, or west?

Mr. CONKLING. In a northwest direction.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it is about time for me to claim the floor again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the interpellation between the honorable Senators has satisfied me that I was right in the conception that the change of the route of the eastern division railroad from the Republican fork to the Smoky Hill fork was simply a change of the location of a short section of the Union Pacific railroad east, and was not intended to reach a new and a distant southwestern terminus at all. If I understand the project of the Union Pacific railroad it is this: there are two divisions, one west coming from the Pacific ocean or its waters east, and the other proceeding from the Missouri river west to unite with the western branch. I do not understand that the change to the Smoky Hill route has at all altered the purpose of the managers of those two joint roads in forming a union between the eastern and the western divisions. On the contrary I understand that the change from the Republican fork to the Smoky Hill valley will lessen the distance one hundred and thirty-five miles, and that in addition to that it furnishes much more of timber to apply to the use of ties in constructing the road, and goes through a coal region that will enable it to get the fuel to propel the engines.

Now, Mr. President, if we are to consider equities here we must consider the equities in all of their bearings. If what is now termed the central branch company have been diverted from their purpose of uniting with a road that was to run up the Republican fork, they have received some equivalents, and what are those equivalents? First, they get upon a common line, between the Pacific and the Atlantic waters, of this railroad that is one hundred and thirty-five miles shorter than the line which was held out to them and which they say they have been disappointed in not having reached by reason of the change of route to the Smoky Hill fork. Then it furnishes the main line with the necessary timber to construct it in the formation of ties, and it furnishes an indefinite supply of coal for the purpose of propelling the engines along the common road, and of course along all the branch roads that may unite with it.

Then, Mr. President, I think that the equivalents which the present company are to receive in a distance shortened one hundred and thirty-five miles, in the material for supplying the ties to construct the road, and in the fuel for the running of the engines, ought to compensate them, and more than compensate them, for the additional distance they will have to run their road to unite with the eastern division of the Pacific railroad along the Smoky Hill line. But if I am mistaken in that, what would be the consequence? The honorable Senator from New York, who has investigated this subject so thoroughly and who understands it so well, says that there are two or three points along the Smoky Hill route where this Central Branch railroad may unite with it within a distance of thirty-five miles. Then what is all this pother and complaint on the part of the present central branch company? That the change to the Smoky Hill route has given them an addition of at the utmost thirty-five miles to unite with that route; and uniting with that route they will have one hundred and thirty-five miles less of railroad to run either east or west, and they will have the facilities of timber to construct the road and coal to propel their engines. The utmost that could be claimed by that company upon the most latitudinous construction of their equity arising under the legislation and the location of these two branches would be this: that Congress ought to give them an equivalent to enable them to reach the Smoky Hill line of road within the distance of thirty-five miles. The equity they ask in the form of this bill is enormously greater than that. Are they entitled to any such equity? I maintain not; and I meet gentlemen upon their own facts and their own principles of equity growing out of those facts. Congress never held out to the present central branch company any inducements or facilities for uniting with the Omaha branch. That is not the representation. That is not their complaint. Their complaint is, that the road on the Republican fork was transferred by the directory of the eastern division a little further south, and that instead of being allowed to unite with the eastern division in the valley of the Republican fork, they have been thrown over into the Smoky Hill valley. If they were disposed to ask nothing but equity, and even liberal equity, all they could ask would be some aid from Congress to enable them to reach that road in the Smoky Hill valley, to which it has been transferred. The present bill, though, being for entirely different purposes, to unite with a different road, and at an enormously great cost, it does not commend itself to my mind on any equity whatever, and I therefore shall vote against it.

Mr. CRAGIN. I desire to say just a word or two in reply to the Senator from Kentucky. The Senator from Kentucky, and the Senator from New York also, have argued this question as though the central branch might with perfect propriety and without any great inconvenience unite with the eastern division in its route up the Smoky Hill fork. Now those Senators ought to know, and I presume do know, that it is no purpose of the eastern division to ever unite with the Union Pacific railroad. When they came here and got permission to turn their route from the Republican fork up the Smoky Hill fork, it was for the purpose, and the only purpose, of making theirs an independent line to the Pacific ocean. They meant to go through New Mexico. They had General Palmer, now the Governor of Illinois, surveying through New Mexico and making reports upon the subject. It is not the purpose to-day of the eastern division ever to unite with the Union Pacific, if they can avoid it. It is true that in all human probability there will be a railroad built through Colorado from Cheyenne Wells to Cheyenne at some time, by private corporations, and the Union Pacific may in that way be connected with the eastern division; but the eastern division proper mean, if it is possible, to continue their line as an independent line through to California, and that is the reason the central branch have no wish to connect with them. They wish to connect with the Union Pacific road, which they had a right to do under the original legislation. They do not wish to be put on to the eastern division now, which is aiming through New Mexico, and to await the events which must transpire before that road can be built. There is where the trouble is, and the only trouble.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the honorable Senator state that the eastern division of the Pacific railroad as located along the Smoky Hill fork does not contemplate a union with the western division of the Pacific railroad?

Mr. CRAGIN. I state that the eastern division company wish theirs to be an independent road, and mean to have it so if possible. I know that fact.

Mr. DAVIS. My understanding is that Denver and the City of Cheyenne are in the line of these roads, and that the Smoky Hill branch contemplates a union that will take them both to the cities of Denver and Cheyenne. According to my understanding that is one of the great objects of the men who manage the eastern division of the Pacific railroad. I have no doubt that those objects will be secured by a line of railroad connecting the section that runs through the Smoky Hill valley on to Denver, and on to the City of Cheyenne. If that be so, all this central branch company, as it is termed, desire—all it can ask in good faith—is to have the privilege of uniting on that line of railroad.

Mr. CRAGIN. I understand I was mistaken in saying that the General Palmer who made the surveys to which I referred is now Governor of Illinois. I had an impression that he was the same person, but I now understand it was General Palmer of St. Louis.

I will say but a word further. When the eastern division company came here in 1866 and got permission to turn their line up the Smoky Hill fork, they did not want any condition put upon the bill that they should unite at all with the Union Pacific railroad; but the chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee, seeing or mistrusting what they were aiming at in that bill, secured the insertion of a provision that they should unite with the Union Pacific railroad at a point not more than fifty miles west of the meridian of Denver. They accepted that, because they could not get the bill without it, meaning at the same time never to make any union there, but to go on through New Mexico as an independent line. I know from talking with the officers of that road that that is their purpose now, if they can get Congress to aid them. If they should fail in that, ultimately they may be compelled to unite at Cheyenne through Colorado; but they do not mean to do it.

Mr. COLE. Mr. President, I have been precluded from earlier offering any remarks on this bill by the fact of my having been paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. RAMEY;] but his recent return removes that disability, and I am, therefore, at liberty to offer a few words in relation to it for the consideration of the Senate.

It seems to me that this bill will in no sense facilitate the great object the Government had in view in offering subsidies to railroad companies. The great aim was to facilitate communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. This bill will not contribute, so far as I can see, to this great end; and there is, therefore, as much propriety, or nearly as much, in granting a subsidy to any road within any other State than Kansas or Nebraska as in granting aid to this road.

When the bill for the construction of a Pacific railroad was first considered there was great contention as to where the terminus at this end should be; and it finally resulted in recognizing some four separate termini for that great road on the eastern end. The Sioux City branch was one claiming assistance from the General Government. The Omaha claimed assistance; the Hannibal and St. Joseph road, of which this road is the successor, claimed assistance; and the Kansas road proper claimed assistance. In order that this great measure might pass Congress, in order to allay opposition, these four separate branches were subsidized by the General Government. It was, however, as I am informed, for I was not a member of Congress at that time, a pretty clear understanding that this Hannibal and St. Joseph road should receive but one hundred miles of subsidy for so much aid as it might give to this grand scheme for a Pacific railroad. This much was conceded to it with an understanding, as I supposed, that it should join either of the great branches of the work, either the Union Pacific railroad or the railroad known as the eastern division or Kansas branch. We are now told that their plans have been in some measure thwarted by the permission given by Congress to the railroad known as the eastern division to change the line that they originally selected from one which was to connect with the Union Pacific railroad at this side of the one hundredth meridian of west longitude, and run up the Smoky Hill fork; and this claim is put upon the ground that the Government is to regard itself as the insurer of this Hannibal and St. Joseph road or its successors against any loss from such action of Congress. They may have an equitable claim for some assistance; and I recognize an equitable claim before Congress as equal to any other; but see to what extent we are insuring them. We are asked now not to enable them to join one or the other of these roads at the nearest point, but to accord them $2,400,000 more of bonds. It is better, in my judgment, that we should take off their hands the whole concern, pay them all their expenditures of every nature whatsoever, and let the road go to destruction; if it must, rather than we should pay this enormously large additional sum to the $1,600,000 which have already been paid.

Mr. President, I do not know where the nearest point of connection of this road is to one of the others, nor do I care how many miles of railroad will be required to make such connection. It is sufficient for me to know that they have received this large aid, which to me seems more like a gratuity, at the outset, of $1,600,000—more like a concession to a railroad company within a State than so much donation to facilitate the construction of a road to the Pacific.

I am quite willing, Mr. President, to vote for any measure that will facilitate communication across this continent; and I am not content with one line of railroad across. We are happily approaching the time when one grand road will be completed, but that, I am sure, will be found insufficient. I at the same time believe every effort put forth by the Government, and every reasonable expenditure that the Government chooses to make to facilitate communication between the two oceans, will be a judicious and wise expenditure; but I cannot say that the bill now before the Congress will tend in that direction at all, or is more than aiding a railroad within a State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. CORBETT.]

Mr. CONKLING. Before the immediate point passes from the attention of the Senate which was suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CRAGIN.] I wish to state one fact. I understood him to confront the Senator from Kentucky by saying that the eastern division did not intend to go to the Union Pacific road, but to make an independent route of its own southerly to the Pacific ocean. It is of no consequence what corporation owns the road or the links of road which establish a continuous track by which the claimants can go to the Union Pacific railroad. The eastern division has now gone to Sheridan or Fort Wallace. A railroad company is organized (and that fact has been overlooked by the Senator from Wisconsin who interrogated me) to construct a road from Denver to Cheyenne. Not only so, the road is graded all the way, and as I am told since this debate arose by a very excellent authority, a railroad man and a man of science, who has recently been there and knows all about it, one half the ties are already out and the road is to be completed in a very short time from the City of Cheyenne to the City of Denver. In addition to that, a bill has been passed by the Senate, which I hold in my hand, turning over to the Denver and Pacific Railroad Company the lands lying along their route. Thus we have the assurance of a road and its recognition by the Senate and aid extended to it. Now, the only remaining link to-day to be supplied is between Denver and Fort Wallace. That is a short line, and, as every Senator knows who is familiar with the topography of the country, a naturally graded one. The Smoky Hill river runs until it becomes invisible, is lost in the sands, but still they will tell you the current is running under the sands. It runs until you reach that depression caused by the valley of Cherry creek; so that there is a natural grade from Fort Wallace to the City of Denver, with no cuts, no tunnels, no impediments interposed by nature beyond the necessity of bridging a few trivial streams.

Now, Mr. President, it will not do for any Senator to vote for this bill and excuse himself by saying that the eastern division is trying to go to the Pacific ocean. Let the eastern division go where it pleases; the iron is on the ground to Fort Wallace; the iron is to be on the ground from Denver City to Cheyenne City; and that is one of the stations where the Union Pacific railroad runs daily now with its trains. Thus the only link to be supplied is between Fort Wallace and Denver—a link certain to be supplied although the eastern division Pacific railway should be dissolved as an organization to-day. Thus the Senator from Kentucky is quite right in saying that the central branch have their connection simply transplanted from one fork of the Kaw river to the other fork, on which fork it becomes one hundred and thirty-four miles less in distance in order to attain Denver.

Confessedly, according to this sworn map, and every other map, as they have laid their road, one hundred miles from St. Joseph would not have carried them within sixty-five miles of a connection on the Republican fork. As they have counted their one hundred miles, starting from Atchison, and thus gaining twenty-one miles, still forty-five miles of distance at least, as the railroad runs, is left as an interval between their present western terminus and that point on the Republican fork where they say they wished to touch the eastern division. The committee reporting this bill states in the report that it is over fifty miles in a straight line. I think that is an exaggeration. A straight line would reach it before; but taking the curvatures necessary to this road, and shown in the projected route of the road, forty-five miles would not cover the space to be traversed between their present western terminus and the road-bed which they say should have been occupied by the eastern division on the Republican fork.

Now, then, take the statement of the honorable Senator from Kansas, that it is forty-two miles from the present existing terminus to Fort Riley, and then they gain unquestionably in distance if without any subsidy or aid whatever they turn their road southerly and make the present connection. The forty-five or fifty miles (be the distance what it may) which now exist between the terminus and the Republican fork, they must have traversed themselves at their own expense originally. When, by going a less distance, bearing more to the south, they find a connection, is not their equity more than answered by the superiority of the route and its greater brevity? If not, why not? No Senator has vouchsafed an answer, I believe, to that inquiry.

Mr. President, one single further suggestion. The honorable Senator from Iowa and the honorable Senator from Kansas, inadvertently, no doubt, but ingeniously if it had been intentional, attributed to me a reference in the Globe to a vote upon the proposition to substitute fifty miles for one hundred miles in the bill giving the right of extension to the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company. I did not refer at all to that amendment. I referred to the vote taken and the debate had upon an amendment of two words only, although very significant words, "via Atchison." I have the bound volume of the Globe here to produce if the Senator doubts it. I say upon that amendment arose the question whether these claimants should be permitted to proceed westerly as they have done—they have proceeded north-westerly in truth—or whether they should be restricted to a direction far southerly of west so as to make their union with the eastern division east of the meridian of Fort Riley. That was the amendment to which I referred; that was the amendment to which the then Senator from Kansas, Mr. Lane, spoke when he said "This means Topeka, and I am willing to vote for it in that way;" and upon that remark, with that explanation, the vote was taken, the vote being two to one, and both Senators from Kansas supporting that amendment.

The fifty-mile amendment was an entirely different thing, and arose in this way: if the one hundred miles were to be counted from St. Joseph it was not too far in round numbers. If, however, the Platte county road which was twenty-one miles in length between St. Joseph and Atchison was to be adopted, and the one hundred miles started at the southern end of that road, to wit, twenty-one miles from St. Joseph, then of course the distance would be different. Mr. Clark stated that his purpose was to move an amendment, making it fifty miles from Atchison, which would have been seventy-one miles in all. In place of that amendment prevailing the language was left to stand as we find it, "one hundred miles from St. Joseph, Missouri," which would have allowed them, going to Topeka, a subsidy of seventy-one or seventy-two or seventy-three miles—without being precise—but "one hundred miles" was left in as being abundantly large in round numbers to enable them to go from St. Joseph to the proposed connection with the eastern division.

Now, my point is—and there is no answer to it, I submit, upon the record and the language of the law by any interpretation whatever—that they were to find a connection within one hundred miles from St. Joseph, and all sense and reason and geography show us that that connection within one hundred miles was impossible by more than sixty miles if it was to be sought by the route and direction which they took. Ergo, it follows, not only in equity, but in law, strictly, honestly, substantially, and not technically, that these beneficiaries should have gone where they were permitted to go with their one hundred miles in some direction which would have enabled them, within the one hundred miles, to gain the connection which was allotted to them. In place of that they chose to turn their progress far toward the north pole, not to run southwest, nor even west, but north of west, so that the expiration of the one hundred miles, even counted from Atchison, left them an unironed and unspanned interval which the Committee on the Pacific Railroad think was over fifty miles in a direct line.

That is the proposition; and I submit with great deference it is a proposition which has not been answered in this debate, which cannot be answered from the record or the language of the law. Therefore, I concur with the honorable Senator from Kentucky in his conclusion; and I go further, and say that if they build a road the distance stated by the honorable Senator from Kansas, from their present western termination to Junction City, Fort Riley, Manhattan, wherever he pleases to make the connection, that distance will be less by a number of miles than the construction of roads originally necessary to enable themselves to gain the connection which they insist they have lost.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from New York affirms that the central branch was bound to form its connection with the eastern division within the limit of one hundred miles, and insists that this objection, as he calls it, has not been and cannot be answered. I do not propose to answer that objection myself merely, but I shall read from the statute itself, and let the Senate judge whether the statute be or be not an answer to that question. Section thirteen of the act of 1862, so often referred to, answers it. It declares—

"That the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company of Missouri may extend its road from St. Joseph via Atchison, to connect and unite the road through Kansas."

Without prescribing any limit whatever within which that connection may be formed, it gives it the right to form the connection absolutely and without limitation. At the same time it proceeds and declares "that in no event shall lands or bonds be given to said company as herein directed to aid in the construction of their said road for a greater distance than one hundred miles." The subsidy extended exactly one hundred miles—that distance, no more, no less. But the same statute in the same breath declares that this branch, now known as the central branch, shall have the right to form a connection with the eastern division or Kansas branch.

I think, sir, the statute has answered the gentleman's objection; I will not assume to answer it. At the same time I must be allowed to express my surprise at so broad a declaration in the very teeth of the statute.

A word further, sir. The Senator says to this company, "Why not proceed and form your connection with the eastern division by diverting your line to the southwest and forming the connection about forty miles to the south, and pursue your traffic with the eastern division on its route out to Cheyenne Wells?" This, sir, is very cold comfort to the complaining company. Sir, when the act of 1862 was passed, as the Senator from New York knows, or may know if he will examine the facts, the eastern division had already mapped its route to the northwest up the Republican fork. That fact is recognized in the statute itself, in the ninth section, as I have stated before; recognized by Congress as the route up which the eastern division was to pass. As early as June, 1865, the eastern division filed a map of its route, and the lands upon it were withdrawn from market by direction of the Secretary of the Interior. I hold in my hand a memorandum which I took from the books of the Department of the Interior on the subject, in which it is said:

"The Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, June 30, 1865, filed in the Interior Department a map defining the general route of its road from a point on the line dividing the States of Kansas and Missouri to Fort Riley, and from thence up the Republican to the one hundredth meridian."

That was the status of legislation and of action upon this subject at the time of the passage of the act of 3d July, 1866, allowing the eastern division to deflect to the southwest and go up the Smoky Hill fork. It was with reference to this map already laid down and filed in the office of the Interior Department that the present company mentioned in this bill, the central branch company, proceeded to build its line of road and to invest its money. It was under the expectation and the assurance of the Government that it should form a connection with the main stem of the Union Pacific railroad up the valley of the Republican fork, and not up the valley of the Smoky Hill. There, sir, is the gist of this whole question, that we have taken by our legislation from this company the right which they previously possessed of forming a connection with the eastern division on its way up the Republican fork, and thence to a junction with the main stem of the Omaha branch. That right has been rendered entirely valueless to them by allowing the eastern division to pass up the Smoky Hill fork.

On the 4th of March, 1866, the eastern division again filed a map showing the definite location of its road. It was filed by the company in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and the lands along its entire length were withdrawn from market. That was as early as the 4th of March, 1866, nearly a year after the filing of the first map which I have mentioned.

The filing of these maps, the legislation which took place here with reference to the status of these lines at the time, furnish the ground of equity for which this company now contends. They had a right to go up the Republican fork to form a connection with the eastern division on that route, and it was never contemplated until the legislation of July 3, 1866, that the eastern division would be permitted to deflect its line off in the direction of the Smoky Hill fork. There is the disappointment to this company; there is our failure to keep the assurance which we had given to this company in our previous legislation.

The honorable Senator makes an allusion to the report of the committee on this subject as to the distance between the present terminus of the completed line of the central branch and the old line of the eastern division on its way up the Republican. The language of the report, which the Senator did not see fit to read, is as follows:

"From the point where the central branch now terminates to the old route of the eastern division on the Republican fork is in a direct line about fifty miles; but the central branch company have not filed a map of their route over this intervening space."

How the honorable Senator has ascertained that that distance instead, of being about fifty miles, as the committee state in their report, is over sixty miles, is more than I am able to answer. Perhaps he has visited even that locality, and by the help of chain-men and ax-men and other assistants, such as surveyors have in the woods, he has taken the pains to run out the exact distance of that interval.

Mr. CONKLING. I made no such statement as the Senator puts in my mouth, I beg to say to him. I stated that if the one hundred miles had begun at St. Joseph, as the law said, in place of Atchison, it would have been over sixty miles. That was my statement; not that it was that distance, counting from Atchison.

Mr. HOWARD. I understood the Senator to say that the distance from the terminus of the present completed line of this road, a geographical point easily ascertained, to the whole route of the eastern division up the Republican fork was sixty miles, or more than sixty miles. Now, sir, I do not know, nor did the committee who made this report know, what that exact distance was. We arrived at it by counting the townships upon the maps of the public surveys as well as we could. I understand, however, from persons who pretend to know accurately, that that distance falls far short of fifty miles; that it is not more than ten or twelve miles. How accurate my information may be I do not know. It is not material, however, to this question. Be it greater or smaller, it was the right of the company to pass over this intervening space from the end of its hundred miles of subsidy and construct its road so as to connect with the route of the eastern division on its way up the Republican fork. That right, by our legislation, as I have often remarked, has been taken away. The company no longer enjoys this privilege under the law, as decided by the Secretary of the Interior; and it is to make the law such as it was manifestly intended to be by the act of 1864, that is, to give this central branch company the right to construct the unconstructed line of another branch, that this bill is now brought before Congress.

I hope, Mr. President, Senators will pardon me for the suggestion, but I really hope that we shall now come to a vote on this bill. I think it has been discussed sufficiently to enable every Senator to understand its merits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. CORBETT.]

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President—

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Oregon will pardon me a moment, I wish to ask my honorable friend from Michigan a question for information. I should like to inquire from him, as chairman of the committee, who can inform us undoubtedly, at what date it was that this central branch company under whatever name it may then have operated first filed its map and location for this line of road?

Mr. HOWARD. I am not able to state with precision at what time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do not the papers you have show?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it was the 4th of March, 1866.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand my friend from Michigan that that is specifically the time; in the spring of 1866—March, 1866?

Mr. HOWARD. I think so, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a matter possibly of considerable consequence.

Mr. HOWARD. It might have been earlier; it is not material, however.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I understand it, then, the first step of this company was taken in March, 1866; just about the time the bill was introduced to make the change of the other line.

Mr. HARLAN. I have in my hand a copy of a map of the general location of the Atchison and Pike's Peak railroad, now called the Central Branch Union Pacific railroad, filed in the Department of the Interior January 27, 1868.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That you speak of as the general location.

Mr. HARLAN. Yes; the first filing.

Mr. HOWARD. Showing their intention.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, in offering the amendment that I proposed I was in hopes that I might meet with a corresponding disposition on the part of the advocates of this bill, and that so we should meet half way. I was desirous that we should not increase our debt to this extent of two and a half million dollars, or thereabouts.

My proposition was to allow interest upon $10,000 a mile for the term of thirty years; that the Government might pay this interest for that term, but not the principal. That, of course, does not increase our debt, but increases the revenue we must raise annually to pay the interest. But, Mr. President, those who advocate this bill are not disposed to accept my amendment. From the conversations I have had with those who advocate the bill I am satisfied that they are determined to vote to this road $10,000 a mile in Government bonds, besides its large grant of land, and also to allow the company to mortgage the road for $10,000 a mile more, making $32,000 a mile. It seems to me that this is asking more of Congress than we should be willing to vote.

It is my opinion that it was the duty of those representing this road here to protest against the divergence of the eastern division at the time that was allowed, in such a manner that the Senate should understand that if that divergence was allowed this branch would claim a subsidy for one hundred and fifty miles additional to enable it to connect with the Omaha branch. If they had so stated to the Senate at that time I do not believe the Senate would have voted to allow that divergence to be made.

But, sir, it appears that a connection can be made by the central branch with the other road, which will ultimately connect with the Union Pacific road at Cheyenne, and that a subsidy for thirty-five or forty miles would be sufficient for that purpose. If that other road is going through to the Pacific coast independently, as gentlemen suggest, then this branch would have that connection and also a connection with the Union Pacific by the proposed road from Denver to Cheyenne. So they would have two advantages in making a connection with the eastern division in that event, whereas according to this bill they will have only the advantage of making a connection with the Union Pacific. Certainly, then, if we allow subsidy for a distance sufficient to enable this branch to reach the eastern division we cannot materially damage this company.

Mr. President, I am disposed to vote for anything within reason to assist this company to a connection, but I am not willing to vote it a subsidy for one hundred and fifty miles more of road. I believe that it is necessary to guard our national debt, and I do not mean, if we can possibly avoid it, to issue more bonds of the Government. I would prefer to give a guarantee for the interest of such an amount as we think we can afford to allow, and not issue bonds as a gratuity to these companies.

There is a proposition before the Senate to make a connection with the eastern division, and an amendment to that bill has been submitted by one of the Senators from Kansas, [Mr. ROSS.] I am informed that the people of Kansas desire such a connection. If that is the case I do not know why it would not be cheaper for us to give a subsidy for thirty-five or forty miles than it would for one hundred and fifty miles. It seems to me that in the present condition of our Treasury it would be wiser to do what I have suggested, but as gentlemen have not met me in the same spirit in which I offered my amendment guaranteeing the interest on the bonds of the company for one hundred and fifty miles, and as since I have heard the able arguments of the Senator from New York and the Senator from Kentucky I am satisfied that we are not legally or morally bound to extend the amount of aid asked for this road, I propose to withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That nothing contained in the act of Congress approved July 3, 1866, relating to the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, shall deprive the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, assignee of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, of its right to continue its road and telegraph line westerly from the termination of the one hundred miles mentioned in the act of Congress incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company, approved July 1, 1862, to a connection with the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, as one of the branches thereof; but said Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company shall continue its road from the termination of the one hundred miles aforesaid, or from a point between said termination and where said road crosses the Big Blue river, to a connection with the Union Pacific railroad at or near Fort Riley, in the State of Kansas, upon the same terms and conditions, in all respects, as are now provided by law for the construction of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division: Provided, That no subsidy in United States bonds shall be allowed to said central branch company for any greater length of road than forty miles from the termination of the one hundred miles on which bonds are already authorized to be issued on said line of railroad.

Mr. MORTON. I will say just a word. I have listened here for two days to the discussion of this question. I have heard much about the place where this road was to connect with the eastern division, whether fifty or one hundred miles from the starting point, and much about the direction in which it should run. I think I have heard very much that tends to confuse the understanding of the Senate on that subject which does not at all touch the main proposition. The simple fact is that this road was started to connect with one of two branches of the main stem; that is, to connect with the branch starting from Kansas City to run northwest, or to connect with the branch from Omaha, both of which were to unite not further west than the one hundredth meridian. It started upon that understanding, and originated by the same law that authorized the branch from Kansas City to connect with the Omaha branch at that point. After that the branch starting from Kansas City, thus to connect with the Omaha branch, was diverted to the southwest, and it will never make that connection; and this central branch is thus left out in the Indian country without any connections at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator why he says that the eastern division will never make that connection? Does not the law require it?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; it will never make that connection, because Congress has authorized it to go in another direction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where does Congress by law now require the eastern division to terminate?

Mr. MORTON. I do not know that it requires it to terminate anywhere; but it has authorized it certainly to run in another direction, and it cannot from the point to which it has now been built make that connection, and is not expected to make it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does not the statute require it to connect with the regular Pacific railroad not more than fifty or one hundred miles west of Denver?

Mr. MORTON. I would say to the Senator that I know enough about the purposes of that company to know that it does not expect to make that connection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am speaking of the law.

Mr. MORTON. I know of no law that requires them to do it. If there be such a law, I have not heard it read in this debate.

Mr. POMEROY. There is a law to that effect. Their purpose, however, is to go by way of Santa Fé to Mexico.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The great question, then, is whether the purpose of a company or the law shall prevail.

Mr. MORTON. The whole question may be stated very briefly. If a road were started to be built from here to the city of Philadelphia, there would be just as much propriety after it had been completed one hundred miles to require it to be built to Pittsburgh. The Senator from New York says the central branch can form a connection with the eastern division at such a distance; but they did not commence building with a view to going in that direction. They do not want to go to New Mexico; that was not the original purpose; but they started to go to another point, and they have been prevented from doing so.

Mr. POMEROY. With regard to this amendment I wish to say in a single word that forty-two miles from their present terminus in an exact right angle, going directly the way they do not propose to go or want to go, will make the connection, but that connection would be ruinous to the road.

Mr. CONKLING. Do they not want to go to the Union Pacific road?

Mr. POMEROY. They do not want to go to a connection at Fort Riley, where forty-two miles would leave them. The Senator says that is one hundred and sixty miles nearer to Denver, but Denver is not on the Union Pacific railroad at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Do they not want to go to Denver?

Mr. POMEROY. No, sir; they want a connection with the Union Pacific railroad. Denver has not got that connection. Denver is not on that line. If there be a company authorized by act of Congress to go to Cheyenne Wells they can make a connection with it in forty-two miles by a right angle exactly.

Mr. HOWARD. Going exactly south.

Mr. POMEROY. Certainly; but that is a proposition suicidal. No one proposes that. This company would not take a subsidy that would enable them to build a road they do not want, and that would not be of value to them when built.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Indiana tells us, evading the law a little, that he knows enough about the purposes of the eastern division company to know that they do not mean to connect with the Union Pacific. Now, I should be glad to have the Senator inform us whether he expects to have legislation conducted upon the statutes of the United States or upon the mere purposes of a company in violation of the law. The act of 1866, which is claimed to be the equitable foundation for this bill, and which it is attempted to make the Senate understand to be an authority to the eastern division to continue to go southwest and to terminate nowhere, as the Senator from Indiana says, declares this:

"That said company"—

Referring to the eastern division—

"shall connect their line of railroad and telegraph with the Union Pacific railroad, but not at a point more than fifty miles westwardly from the meridian of Denver, in Colorado."

The law therefore has spoken under which this eastern division company is now receiving its bonds as far as the law has given them to it, that it shall connect with the Union Pacific railroad at a point not more than fifty miles west of the meridian of Denver. Now, are we to legislate upon the presumption that that company is greater than we are; that it can set at defiance the laws of the United States, under which it receives its grants of money and land, and to build up a kind of imaginary equity in favor of this claim upon the theory that we cannot by law enforce obedience to our own statutes? I should be glad to hear from the Senator from Indiana upon that point. The law declares, in language which is not open to misconstruction, that this eastern division is still a branch of the great Union Pacific railroad, and it declares that instead of diverging in one direction, on account of typographical difficulties, to the northward to reach that connection, it may bend to the southward to reach it, and names the point within which it must reach it or forfeit all the franchises, the lands, and grants, we have given to it, which, I take it, the Senator from Indiana will agree, will be the legal consequence if that road fails in obedience to the act of Congress to make that connection.

What then, sir? Then we have merely the fact that these two roads are still branches of that great line, one having a right to connect with the other, and that instead of the eastern division line being a line indefinitely to the southwest, going nowhere and connecting with nothing, we have had merely a temporary and local divergence, on account of obstacles, to reach a common point after all.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the position taken by the Senator from Vermont occurs to me as an afterthought in this discussion. The discussion of the last session, and the early part of this discussion was not conducted upon the expectation that the branch starting from Kansas would unite with the Omaha branch at any point. I have seen the maps of the eastern division. I have seen their projected route, and I know it leads down through New Mexico, and does not contemplate a union with the Omaha branch at all. I am aware of the statute referred to; but I am speaking of the purpose of that company, and if I mistake not they have their bill prepared; and the divergence that has already been made has been made with a view of getting a southern route; and it is urged upon the ground that the northern route cannot be successful, that it will ever be impeded by snow, and that the great route must be the southern route. Sir, this discussion was conducted at the last session upon this supposition, and now, for the first time, I understand that a new diversion has been made.

Mr. RAMSEY. I want to ask the Senator from Indiana whether he has not mistaken the northern for the central route? He means that the central route is interrupted by snow.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; I spoke of the eastern division running down through New Mexico. I understand the northern route is to start from St. Paul; but that is as yet on paper.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This brings us to a singular position of affairs. The honorable Senator from Indiana confesses, if I correctly understand him, that the law under which this eastern division company is operating requires it to connect with the Union Pacific railroad substantially at Denver, or not more than fifty miles west of it. Of course we are all aware that Denver is a little way to the south of the line of the Union Pacific, but for practical and general purposes, and "for short," as the saying is, it is sufficient to say at Denver.

Mr. SHERMAN. Denver is not south of the line of this road.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that; I am speaking of the main line of the Union Pacific, with which this by law is to connect. In the neighborhood of Denver, therefore, the eastern division—which is the cause of all these gentlemen's woe—is bound to connect with the Union Pacific, and its right to every dollar of bonds that it has received, its right to every acre of lands that has been granted to it, its right to every franchise that the act of Congress has breathed into it, rests upon the fact that it complies with the requisitions of this charter that is contained in the statute, and when it fails to comply with that charter, its rights are forfeited to the United States. Nobody questions that.

Now, then, the Senator from Indiana says that we are to give this money to this central branch on account of a suspected or contemplated illegal violation of law by the eastern division company, or on account of the fear that he has in advance that the company will persuade Congress to give it some other privilege to go in some other direction. Mr. President, is not that leaping a little before the Senator comes to the stile? It seems to me that it is. We find here in the very act that is complained of, and which is the entire foundation of this argument, such as it is, in favor of giving this company anything, the express and unequivocal requirement that this divergence shall not be a complete divergence; that it shall only be a variation of the line, reaching at last to the same common point that was contemplated in the original act, except that it reaches it by way of what is called the Smoky Hill fork instead of the Republican fork. It is still a branch of the Union Pacific railroad, reaching it by a distance not greater than would have been required if it had gone to the north of the Smoky Hill instead of to the south. And then, according to the statement of the Senator from Indiana—and he has put it fairly—we are to give this money upon the mere apprehension that we shall be wheedled or persuaded or argued into some future legislation which may be of detriment to this company. As the law stands now the eastern division is to go where it was to go in the first place, except that it is to take a little different line of route to reach the point that it was to reach before.

My friend says that this is an afterthought. Suppose it is, sir; a good many afterthoughts are better than forethoughts, I will remind my friend. The question is, is it right upon the law? But permit me to say that it is not an afterthought. This same fact was called to the attention of the Senate in the debate last year, unless my recollection is very much in error about it. Now, I ask the attention of candid Senators to the statute which is the subject of this complaint.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to allow me to remind him of one fact. Not only is he right in saying that the attention of the Senate was drawn last year to the very connection proposed, but the bill which was adopted by the Senate in reference to the eastern division, fixing and extending its route, was advocated in the Senate, and passed in the Senate, because of the argument that it would furnish and insure more perfectly the very connection which this amendment now proposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dare say that the honorable Senator from New York is correct, though I have not looked back at the debates. It is sufficient for me at this present time to say that the very act of which these people complain as authorizing a divergence from them which would not enable them by connecting with the eastern division line to reach the Union Pacific at all, absolutely and unequivocally requires the eastern division to connect with the Union Pacific railroad at a point as near by the route they have gone as it would have connected had it gone up the Republican fork.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, it is possible—I shall not question the statement of the Senator from New York on that point—that this law was alluded to in the discussion of last session; but it did not constitute the force of the point of his argument then, and I am correct in the statement that it is now brought into this discussion as an afterthought. When the equity in favor of this bill cannot be overcome in any other way, and it is overwhelming upon the facts of the case, that is brought in as an afterthought and as the only answer which can be made, and a technical one at that, to the equity in favor of this bill. Why, Mr. President, the purpose of that eastern division to divert their road and run down through New Mexico and find a southern route to the Pacific is so notorious and so well understood that I am astonished to hear it controverted on this floor. They have presented the merits of their route to me, as I doubt not they have to every Senator upon this floor, and I understand from their own officers, attorneys, and representatives where they intend to build their road; and now I am told at the very close of this discussion that this road, after all, is to connect with the branch running west from Omaha, and this is to make but a slight diversion or angle not at all material to the company. Sir, it is an afterthought.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Indiana is no more astonished, to use his expression, than others are astonished at the position that he takes now, and I ask attention to it for a moment in connection with this amendment. He says the amendment would give the claimants no assurance of a connection with the Union Pacific railroad. Why? Because the eastern division mean to go somewhere else. It is the same eastern division originally bound by law to go to the Union Pacific road. It is bound by the same law in the same terms now which bound it then. How does the Senator find that the insecurity is any greater now of its reaching the Union Pacific road than it would be had the law been left to apply to the route which it at first proposed.

Again, sir, the Senator says he is astonished that anybody should now argue as an afterthought that in fact such a connection can be made. Does that honorable Senator know that a railroad is now graded all the way from Denver to Cheyenne, and half the ties down, which is certain to be completed? Does he know that by the legislation of the Senate the route of the eastern division road has been extended to Cheyenne Wells, which leaves a gap no greater than there is between the western termination of the claimants' road and the Republican valley? If he does, we may well be astounded at him for saying, whether an afterthought or not, that this is not a fair and tangible proposition.

One other suggestion, sir. The honorable Senator from Kansas says it would be suicidal to turn a right angle and go down to Fort Riley. Why? Is the local trade there, where there are nothing but buffalo and antelope, valuable? Are they going to lose local travel by going here rather than there to traverse forty miles? Everybody knows better than that. Settlements follow the railroad route. But when they have turned their right angle and gone forty-two miles they are then confessedly one hundred and thirty-four miles nearer their prayed-for destination than they would be by the other route. Their passengers then reach the grand trunk to the Pacific by riding one hundred and thirty-four miles less than they would have done going up the Republican fork. Then what difference, I should like to know, does it make in an unsettled country where settlement is to follow the railroad whether the angle they turn is a right angle or an oblique angle, whether they go a little more or a little less to the south? It makes no difference, I submit, sir; and therefore I offer this amendment in the spirit of the argument made by the honorable Senator from Ohio, and made by myself at the last session as the only argument upon which we voted for the Cheyenne Wells bill; I offer it in accordance with the argument which I had the honor to submit yesterday to the Senate, that this was the true remedy, if remedy was needed; and I hope that Senators will vote upon it irrespective of the allegation that it is an afterthought coming out at the conclusion of the debate. It was a forethought of mine when I first investigated this subject, and a forethought of other Senators, as the debates of the last session will show.

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from New York one question. Do I understand him to say that the Denver route down the Smoky Hill fork from Kansas City is one hundred and thirty-four miles less than would be a road from Kansas City up the Republican fork to the one hundredth meridian?

Mr. CONKLING. Kansas City was never a point on this road, and therefore I say nothing about it. Precisely what I say is this—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Kansas City is the terminus.

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir; I beg the honorable Senator's pardon. Kansas City is not a point on the claimants' road. Now let me repeat, in answer to the honorable Senator from Tennessee, that the papers on file in the Department of the Interior show that commencing at Fort Riley or Junction City and proceeding to Denver, on a connection with the Union road, it is one hundred and thirty-four miles shorter to proceed by way of the Smoky Hill route than by way of the Republican route, and that the Senator will find assigned by the president of the Eastern Division Railway Company as the great reason which led them in February, 1866, to file their map transplanting, if I may so say, their route from the Republican fork to the Smoky Hill fork. The presence of timber and fuel had something to do with it; but the great fact was that it abbreviated the distance by one hundred and thirty-four miles between Fort Riley and the western destination of the road.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the western destination of the road?

Mr. CONKLING. It is for this purpose Denver, or a connection with the Union Pacific road, not more than fifty miles west of the meridian of Denver, the propositions being precisely the same in reference to this distance.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 27, noes 23; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 26, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BARNES.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. LYNCH. I now call up my motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 1364, to provide for the gradual resumption of specie payments, was recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The question was upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask unanimous consent of the House that this subject shall be postponed until after the morning hour of to-day, with the understanding that at the expiration of the morning hour I shall be entitled to the floor to call up again this motion to reconsider. I do this in order not to interfere with the morning hour.

No objection was made; and the motion to postpone was accordingly agreed to.

DIRECT TAXES IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. HEATON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1800) to amend the eighth section of an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay the interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WAGON-ROADS TO INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

On motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, by unanimous consent, were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota in relation to the survey and construction of two wagon-roads to Indian reservations on the north shore of Lake Superior; and the same was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

MEMPHIS AND EL PASO RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. FARNSWORTH, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, by unanimous consent, were discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 1014, to aid the Memphis, El Paso, and Pacific Railroad Company of Texas in the construction of a railroad and line of telegraph from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government of the United States the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; and the same was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the votes last taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IOWA WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to what may be considered a correction of the Journal. An entry was made on the Journal several weeks ago to the effect that on motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] the bill in relation to the war claims of the State of Iowa was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The fact was, as I think every gentleman will admit, that the bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I ask unanimous consent that that change be now made.

No objection was made; and the reference of the bill was made accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and the first business in order is the call of committees for reports, commencing with the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1882) relating to the operations of the pension laws, and for other purposes, with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that hereafter no claim of a widow for a pension or bounty on account of the service and death of her husband shall be allowed, nor shall payment of such pension heretofore allowed be continued in any case when the widow is a non-resident of the United States, and has for five consecutive years immediately preceding his death lived separate and apart from him, and without receiving from him any support.

The second section provides that upon the presentation of satisfactory evidence to the Commissioner of Pensions any female pensioner is living a life of prostitution, or is cohabiting with, or living with, or being supported by any man as his wife or mistress, to whom she is not lawfully married, he shall immediately notify such pensioner or her agent of the charge or charges preferred against her, by furnishing her or her agent a copy of the charge or charges, and the evidence upon which the same is founded; and unless such pensioner shall within — months thereafter produce satisfactory rebutting evidence her name shall be dropped from the pension-roll.

The third section provides that nothing in section five of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June 6, 1866, and section six of an act entitled "An act relating to pensions," approved July 27, 1863, shall be so construed as to entitle an invalid pensioner to a pension from March 3, 1865, to June 6, 1866, who was during said time employed in the service of the Government, as mentioned in section one of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1865.

The fourth section provides that in all cases upon the death of any person to whom a pension has been granted, and in every case when any person shall die while an application for a pension is pending, all arrears due such person at the time of his death shall be paid only to such person or persons as would have been entitled to a pension had such deceased person been killed while in service and in the line of duty, or to such person as the deceased may be indebted to for care and expense during his last sickness, including burial expenses; provided that such arrears, if due a female pensioner, shall be paid only to the children of such deceased, or the person to whom the deceased may be indebted as aforesaid.

The fifth section provides that no pension claim now on file, or hereafter filed, unless prosecuted to a successful issue within three years from the date of such filing, shall be allowed without satisfactory record evidence to establish the same; and when so allowed it shall commence from the date of completing the proof.

The sixth section provides that if any person entitled to a pension shall, by affidavit or otherwise, having guilty knowledge thereof, aid in procuring or attempting to procure any fraudulent claim upon the Government, or knowingly aid in the preparation of any fraudulent paper, or present or cause to be presented such fraudulent paper, to procure the allowance or payment of any such claim, his or her right to such pension shall be forfeited; provided that the forfeiture of the pension shall be only for the lifetime of the original claimant, and shall not affect the right of those who are by law entitled to succeed to the pension to apply therefor from the date of his death; and no person guilty of the offense specified in this section shall be recognized as an attorney in the prosecution of a claim for pension.

The seventh section provides that whenever it shall be discovered that any amount of arrears of pay, bounty, or pension has been overpaid any claimant, either by error or by reason of any concealment or misstatement of matter of fact on the part of such claimant, it shall be lawful for the Second Auditor, Second Comptroller, or Commissioner of Pensions to withhold from such claimant the amount of overpayment from any claim pending before either of said officers, and to turn the same into the Treasury of the United States by certificate of deposit to the credit of the appropriation from which the amount was paid.

The eighth section provides that the joint resolution in reference to the collection and payment of moneys due colored soldiers, sailors, and marines, or their heirs, approved March 30, 1867, shall be amended so as to read as follows:

That all checks, Treasury certificates, and pension warrants hereafter issued in settlement of claims for arrears of pay, bounty, prize money, pension, or other moneys due to the colored soldiers, sailors, or marines, or their legal representatives, residing, or who may have resided, in any State in which slavery existed in the year 1860, shall be made payable to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, who shall be held responsible for the safe custody and faithful disbursement of the funds hereby intrusted to him; and whenever the claimant shall be properly identified, and his account is ready for settlement, the amount shall be paid him in current funds and not in checks; and it shall be the duty of said Commissioner, and the officers and agents of his bureau, to facilitate, as far as possible, the discovery, identification, and payment of claimants, and to pay attorneys such fees as are now prescribed by law; but in no case shall any allowance be made for advances or loans claimed by any attorney.

The ninth section provides that all moneys held or disbursed under this act shall be held and disbursed under the same rules and regulations governing other disbursing officers.

The tenth section provides that hereafter all applications for pay, bounty, pension, prize-money, or other moneys in behalf of colored claimants, with the evidence necessary to the correct settlement of the claim, shall be rendered direct to the office of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau for preliminary examination; that the correctness of the application, and that the party claiming is the proper claimant, shall then be certified to, when the papers shall be forwarded to the bureau to which they pertain for examination and settlement of the claim; and no claim shall be settled upon any application now pending in any bureau filed by attorneys; but the attorneys filing them shall be required to present new applications and submit them to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, to be examined and disposed of by him the same as original applications, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

The eleventh section provides that all officers and agents disbursing money or certifying the correctness of claims under this act shall give bond to the Treasury Department in such sum as the Second Auditor, Second Comptroller, and Commissioner of Pensions may direct for the faithful performance of their trust, and for the reimbursement of money paid upon claims certified by them which may be ascertained to have been paid to any party not entitled thereto; provided that the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the recommendation of the Second Auditor, Second Comptroller, Commissioner of Pensions, and Solicitor of the Treasury may grant relief upon the bonds in such cases as are deemed by them equitable and just.

The twelfth section provides that all uncalled for moneys shall be disposed of as provided in the act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of an irregular fund in the custody of the Freedmen's Bureau;" and that the officers and agents giving bonds, as provided in the preceding section of this act, shall be allowed such additional compensation, to be paid from the uncalled for funds, as the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury may fix and establish.

The thirteenth section provides that sections twelve and thirteen of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 14, 1862," approved July 4, 1864," be, and the same are hereby, amended and reenacted, as follows:

That the fees of agents and attorneys for writing out and causing to be executed the papers necessary to establish an original or a suspended or rejected claim for pension and other allowance before the Pension Office (under the act of July 14, 1862, and all subsequent acts granting pensions supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof) shall not exceed the following rates: for making out and causing to be duly executed a declaration by the applicant, with necessary affidavits, and forwarding the same to the Pension Office, with the requisite correspondence, ten dollars; which sum shall be received by such agent or attorney in full for all services in obtaining such pension, and shall not be demanded or received, in whole or in part, until the certificate for such pension shall be obtained.

It further provides that the sixth and seventh sections of an act entitled "An act to grant pensions," approved July 14, 1862, shall be repealed.

The fourteenth section provides that any agent or attorney who shall directly or indirectly demand or receive any greater compensation for his services than is prescribed in the preceding section, or who shall contract or agree to prosecute an original or a suspended or rejected claim for a pension, bounty, or other allowance, on the condition that he shall receive a per cent. upon the amount of such claim, or who shall wrongfully withhold from a pensioner or other claimant the whole or any part of the pension or claim allowed and due to such pensioner or claimant, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $300, or imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding two years, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offense.

The fifteenth section provides that section two of an act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved June 6, 1866, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the following shall stand in lieu thereof:

That any pledge, mortgage, sale, assignment, or transfer of any right, claim, or interest in any pension not included in the fee prescribed in the preceding sections, which has been or may hereafter be granted, shall be void and of no effect; and any person acting as attorney to receive and receipt for money not included in such fee for and in behalf of any person entitled to a pension shall, before receiving said money, take and subscribe an oath, to be filed with the pension agent, and by him to be transmitted, with the vouchers now required by law, to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, that he has no interest in said money, not included in the fee prescribed in the preceding sections, by any pledge, mortgage, sale, assignment, or transfer, and that he does not know or believe that the same has been so disposed of to any person; and any person who shall falsely take the said oath shall be guilty of perjury, and, on conviction, shall be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury.

The sixteenth section provides that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the foregoing provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. PERHAM. The Committee on Invalid Pensions have instructed me to report sundry amendments to this bill, which I ask may now be considered.

The first amendment reported from the committee was in the first section, to insert the word "pay" after the word "pension" where it first occurs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the word "pension," where it occurs the second time in the first section, the words "pay or bounty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to fill the blank in the second section with the word "six."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the word "killed," in the fourth section, the words "or died of wounds received or disease contracted."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause of section five of the bill, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That no pension claim now on file or hereafter filed, whether arising under a special enactment or a general law, shall, unless prosecuted to a successful issue within five years from the date of such filing, be allowed without satisfactory record evidence to establish the same: nor when so allowed after five years shall it commence at a date earlier than that of completing the proofs necessary to establish the same.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the chairman of the committee what is the object of this particular section? It seems to be intended to cut off the applicant from securing his pension unless he prosecutes his claim to a successful issue within a certain time. Now, I do not know why a man really entitled to a pension should be cut off in five years, either by a regulation of the Pension Bureau or by a statutory provision.

Mr. PERHAM. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will observe that by the amendment just offered on behalf of the committee the time is extended from three years to five years. If the application is not completed within that time it is not to be allowed unless record evidence shall be produced. There is scarcely an instance in which an honest claim cannot be supported by record evidence.

Mr. ALLISON. I know a great many instances in which widows and minor children of men who perished in rebel prisons are literally unable to procure the kind of proof that is now required by the Commissioner of Pensions. There can be no record evidence, for instance, of the death of a man in one of those prisons. Therefore I do not think it right to cut off this class of applicants by a limitation of even five years.

Mr. PERHAM. Mr. Speaker, the law now allows five years within which to file the application; and this amendment provides that applicants may have five years more within which to complete their testimony, thus giving altogether ten years for the prosecution of the claim. In the opinion of the committee this is a sufficient time.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to hear again the proposed substitute for section five.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. SHANKS. I would like the chairman of the committee to explain why, in the opinion of the committee, it is necessary to establish this proposed limitation?

Mr. PERHAM. The experience of the Pension Bureau shows, what any one might expect, that a very large number of spurious claims come in when a long lapse of time has intervened since the circumstances upon which the claim is founded. People, perhaps, who would be unwilling to certify to a particular claim when the facts were fresh in their memory, may, after a certain time has elapsed, and after opportunity to do so, make statements that they would not make when the facts were fresher in their memories. I believe the Government has found it necessary to enforce with regard to all claims against it some limitation as to the time within which such claims may be filed and granted.

Mr. ALLISON. I see that the proposed amendment applies to claims already on file. Now, if a claim has been on file four years this will give the claimant only one year in which to complete his application, failing to do which he is absolutely cut off. Such a provision might not be objectionable with reference to applications hereafter to be filed, because every person who may be entitled to a pension for which he has not made application would thus have full notice that we intend to establish a statute of limitations with reference to the filing of such applications; but I think such a provision should not apply with reference to applications now on file in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. SCHENCK. I trust the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] will allow me to make a single remark. I can understand how in a certain class of cases a limitation might possibly be required—though I doubt the propriety of such a requirement—as to the time within which the application may be filed. But we have here an entirely different proposition. It is proposed to require that applications shall be prosecuted to a successful issue within a limited time after they are filed; that is, after they have gone into the hands of the department. Thus the question whether the applicant shall ever succeed in his claim is to depend entirely upon the ability of the department to baffle him until the expiration of the time fixed in this limitation. The moment a man files his claim he ceases to have any control over it himself; and under this provision the department has the power in any case to defeat the claim, because it depends upon the department whether the claim shall be allowed within a given time. The success of the claimant after he has filed his claim does not depend upon himself. When he shall file his claim he may depend upon himself; and if the proposed limitation had reference to the time within which claims shall be filed there might be some reason in it; but it does not depend upon the claimant whether his claim shall be successfully prosecuted. No matter what testimony he produces, the department is to decide in his favor before the prosecution of the claim can be successful, so that the moment he files his claim he puts himself within the statute of limitation and he has no longer any control, the whole thing depending upon those who are standing, with clubs apparently, defending the Treasury against these claims.

Mr. PERHAM. There would be force in that objection if the pension department had the amount of business it had some three or four years ago. The committee is informed that they are now disposing quite promptly of all the cases that come before them, and we are of opinion that we must place some reliance in that department, the same as in all other Departments of the Government. It will be understood that this bill limits the time to five years, making the entire limit ten years from the time the right to a pension accrues. If Congress finds that this is abused by the department it would be very easy to extend the time hereafter. I yield now to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire the House should understand the practice as it is now under the law. We have provided that in all cases where the application is filed within five years the pension, if granted, shall date back to the disability or the death of the party.

Mr. MUGEN. I desire to ask the gentleman if the law is not this: that if the application is not made within eighteen months it does not date from the time of the application?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The law is, as I have stated, five years, and not eighteen months. If the application is filed within five years of the date of the disability or death of the party the pension, if granted, commences at the date of the disability or death. Now, then, as the law stands, if the party files his application four years and a half after the date of the disability it may run along for twenty years or more and he may then come in and complete the proof, which may be gathered in one way or another by hunting throughout the country, and establish the claim, and then the pension commences from the date of the disability, going back twenty-four years. It becomes necessary, therefore, in order to guard against frauds of this character, that some limit should be made, and that we should say to these parties, "You must exercise, at least, reasonable diligence in obtaining the proof sufficient to establish your claim. You may have your lifetime to do it in, if it is record evidence, but if it depends upon parol evidence, which may be gotten there, and anywhere by shrewd and unscrupulous pension agents, you must bring it in within five years." Record evidence cannot well be forged, but in regard to parol evidence the pension department have made representation to the committee that fully satisfies us that there should be some limit within which it should be filed in order to establish a claim.

Now, I admit that there is some force in the argument of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] in the case of claims that are now pending, and I would have no objection myself to striking out that class of claims now pending. There may be some claims standing four and a half years in which the party might not get the evidence within the next year. The amendment may be amended by striking out that class. But in regard to claims that come in hereafter I do ask the House to fix some limit. If not, you never can have any decrease of the amount of business at the Pension Office. It is in fact increasing all the time. Pension claim agents are perambulating the country in every direction and hunting up many specious and fraudulent claims, and the Government is not represented at all in the gathering of the testimony. It is an ex parte affair. The Committee on Pensions have no means of ascertaining as to the credibility of the witnesses, nor has the pension department. Hence it becomes necessary that some limit should be fixed. We have fixed it in the bill at five years, which, as the chairman of the committee has stated, makes the furthest limit of completing the proof ten years after the date of the death or disability, from which time the pension is to accrue.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to ask a question with reference to the second section. As I understand it, it is an insult to the widows, or female pensioners, as they are termed.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I believe that is not under consideration now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am directing my remarks to the chairman of the committee, with his consent.

Mr. PERHAM. As this is another subject, I will answer the gentleman's question at the proper time. I wish to dispose of this question now.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will you allow me, when the proper time comes, to address you on it?

Mr. PERHAM. I will. I yield now to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. PAINE. I send to the Clerk's desk a substitute for the fifth section, as an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which I ask to have read, and then I wish to say a few words upon it.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no proofs in any pension claim hereafter filed shall be presented after the expiration of five years from the date of the filing of this claim.

Mr. PAINE. I recognize the propriety of the position that is taken by gentlemen on the Committee on Pensions, that all possible diligence should be required of claimants for pensions; but I also recognize the force of what was said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that we ought not to permit the Pension Office, by its own neglect, by its own failure to expedite the business which has been intrusted to it, to prevent any claimant from obtaining his pension. It seems to me that the plan which I propose will avoid both of these difficulties. It will render it impossible for the Pension Office, if the claimant is at all vigilant, to prevent his recovering his claim, because we give the claimant five years from the filing of his claim to present his proofs, and on the other hand it cuts off the possibility of any abuse on his part of this right, because we require him to present all the proofs he may have within five years. It may be said that this may operate as a hardship upon the claimant because he may not know what proofs will be required in his particular case. He may suppose that the proofs which he presents at the first application, or subsequently, if he presents supplementary proofs, are sufficient, and yet the department may not be satisfied with them. But nevertheless we must fix some limit, and if we require him to exercise a sound discretion as to the entire proof which he shall present at his peril, as we do by this amendment, it seems to me that we shall inflict no unnecessary hardship upon any one, and at the same time shall allow the claimant the fullest liberty he can expect to enjoy in the preparation and presentation of his proofs.

Mr. PERHAM. I now demand the previous question on the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PAINE. I would like to understand if my amendment is pending?

The SPEAKER. It is.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to lay the bill and amendments upon the table. I think the bill ought not to pass.

The question was put; and the House refused to lay the bill on the table—ayes twenty-seven, noes not counted.

The question recurred on the amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. PAINE; and being put, the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment, as amended, was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the committee was to insert in line two of section six, after the word "pension," the words "or bounty;" after the words "guilty of" in line twelve of the same section to insert the words "doing" or committing;" after the word "attorney" in line fourteen to insert "or agent," and to strike out in line fourteen the words "a claim for pension" and insert in lieu thereof the words "any claim against the Government;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any person entitled to a pension or bounty shall, by affidavit or otherwise, having guilty knowledge thereof, aid in procuring or attempting to procure any fraudulent claim upon the Government; or knowingly aid in the preparation of any fraudulent paper, or present or cause to be presented such fraudulent paper, to procure the allowance or payment of any such claim, his or her right to such pension shall be forfeited: Provided, That the forfeiture of the pension shall be only for the lifetime of the original claimant, and shall not affect the right of those who are by law entitled to succeed to the pension to apply therefor from the date of his death: and no person guilty of doing or committing the offense specified in this section shall be recognized as an attorney or agent in the prosecution of any claim against the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out in line four of section eight the word "thirty" and to insert in lieu thereof "twenty-nine;" so as to correct the date of the approval of an act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the committee was in section thirteen, to insert after the words "Pension Office," where they first occur, the words "for procuring a pension by special act of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out of section thirteen the following words inclosed in parentheses:

Under the act of July 14, 1862, and all subsequent acts granting pensions supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill the following section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That section four of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 14, 1862," approved July 4, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to empower the clerks detailed by the Commissioner of Pensions, in accordance with said section, to investigate any violation of the pension laws by any of the agents or employees of the Government, or attorneys, claim agents, examining surgeons, or claimants; and for such purpose to examine persons, books, papers, accounts, and premises, to administer oaths, to summon any person to produce books and papers, or to appear and testify under oath, and to compel a compliance with such summons in the same manner as United States commissioners may do.

The amendment was agreed to.

The last amendment reported from the committee was to add to the bill the following section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That section nine of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 14, 1862," approved July 4, 1864, be amended and re-enacted so as to read as follows: that those persons not enlisted soldiers in the Army, who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States, or where persons otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians since the 4th day of March, 1861, shall, if they have been disabled in consequence of wounds, or from disease contracted in such service, be entitled to the same benefits of the pension laws as those who have been regularly mustered into the United States service; and the widows or other dependents of any such persons as may have been killed or died from disease contracted in such temporary service aforesaid shall be entitled to pensions in the same manner as they would have been had such persons been regularly mustered: Provided, That no claim under this section shall be valid unless presented and prosecuted to a successful issue before July 4, 1872. All such claims shall be adjudicated under such special rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe most effectually to guard against fraud.

The question was upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. NIBLACK. Is it now in order to move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

The SPEAKER. It is not, unless the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PERHAM,] who is entitled to the floor, shall yield for that purpose.

Mr. NIBLACK. I appeal to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] to consent that I may enter a motion to recommit this bill with instructions to the committee to make the second section apply to male pensioners as well as to female pensioners.

Mr. PERHAM. When that section shall be reached it will be subject to discussion and amendment. At the proper time I will be willing to yield to any gentleman to ask any question in relation to any section of this bill. The Committee on Invalid Pensions believe that every section of this bill is proper and necessary.

I desire to say further, however, that I am acting under the instruction of the committee. Believing as they do that this bill should pass at an early day, I cannot yield to allow material amendments to be offered to it. If members are anxious to offer other amendments, the only way for them to do so is to vote down the call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The only matter now before the House is the additional section proposed by the committee.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PERHAM. I will yield for a question. Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I desire to know the purpose of reporting this second section.

The SPEAKER. The second section is not now before the House. The debate must be confined to the last section offered as an amendment from the committee.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I intend to move an amendment to the last section whenever I can get an opportunity to do so.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, whatever may have been the understanding of the Chair, it was distinctly understood here, being so announced by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PERHAM,] that his first object was to get through with the amendments reported from the committee. We did not suppose that there would then be a refusal to allow the offering of other amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] that he entirely misconceives the position of this bill. The last amendment reported by the committee being a new section is still pending.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to offer an amendment to that section.

The SPEAKER. The amendments reported by the committee have not yet been disposed of. The bill will not be open to general amendment until all the amendments reported by the committee have been acted on.

Mr. SCHENCK. That I did not understand.

Mr. PERHAM. I demand the previous question upon the pending amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understood the gentleman to indicate that he would yield to me to ask a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. PERHAM. I do not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to move an amendment to this last section, to extend the limitation from 1872 to 1875. Will the gentleman from Maine yield for that purpose?

Mr. PERHAM. No, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Then I hope the House will vote down the demand for the previous question.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 41, noes 41; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. PERHAM and Mr. INGERSOLL.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 65.

So the previous question was not seconded. Mr. INGERSOLL obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the pending bill goes over until the next morning hour.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE OHIO.

Mr. WILSON, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals, for the purpose of acquiring information on the subject of bridge building over the Ohio river, are hereby authorized to send for persons and papers.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LYNCH. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1864) to provide for the gradual resumption of specie payments was recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to go to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] rises to a privileged motion, and moves to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. LYNCH. I rise to a question of order. On obtaining the floor this morning I asked unanimous consent that the business of the morning hour might proceed, and that I should have the floor upon this bill immediately after the morning hour, without interruption by any privileged motion. The House gave unanimous consent to that arrangement; and after the House has given its unanimous consent that I should go on without being interrupted by any privileged motion, I ask the Chair whether it is in order to make a privileged motion such as that made by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON?]

The SPEAKER. If the House had granted unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] should resume the floor at the expiration of the morning hour, and that he should not be interrupted by any privileged motion, the gentleman could not be taken from the floor by any such motion.

Mr. LYNCH. That was my proposition.

The SPEAKER. That may have been, and doubtless was, the proposition which the gentleman intended to submit to the House; but he will find when he examines the Globe that it was not the proposition as he actually stated it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Chair is correct. I listened carefully to the proposition which the gentleman made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not of course challenge the recollection of any gentleman upon the floor in reference to a matter of this kind; but upon a question affecting the business of the House he must follow his own recollection unless the matter can be settled by a reference to the record. In this case the Chair will ask the Clerk to read the notes of the official reporters. The Chair has not referred to those notes, and does not know how they read, but has no doubt they will sustain his recollection, for he listened very carefully to the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Maine.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The question was upon the motion to reconsider. Mr. LYNCH. I ask unanimous consent of the House that this subject shall be postponed until after the morning hour of to-day, with the understanding that at the expiration of the morning hour I shall be entitled to the floor to call up this motion to reconsider. I do this in order not to interfere with the morning hour."

"No objection was made; and the motion to postpone was accordingly agreed to."

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not doubt the intention of the gentleman from Maine to state what he did; but as a confirmation of the recollection of the Chair, he resorted to the record of the official organ of the House. The motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is privileged. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It is an invariable practice, too, to permit a member upon the expiration of the morning hour to take the floor, even though another may be occupying it, to make the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table."

The SPEAKER. That motion takes a member from the floor for the time being, and pending it a motion can be made to adjourn.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suggest that good faith to the gentleman from Maine, who consented to postpone his motion in order that the committees might be called for reports, should allow him to take the floor now.

Mr. PIKE. Let the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table be made after my colleague makes his speech.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table is voted down will not the gentleman from Maine then be entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. He will.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then let us vote it down.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I will make a motion.

The SPEAKER. A privileged motion?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a question of order. The House should know that the gentleman from Illinois, who wishes to make a privileged motion, has been trying for four or five minutes to state what he intends to do, and has not been permitted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to debate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to make my motion, and to say—

The SPEAKER. The motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table is not debatable.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my motion to say a word in justification of myself.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] withdraw his objection?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I was not present when the arrangement was made in regard to giving the gentleman from Maine the floor, and had no knowledge whatever on the subject when I made my motion. I do not desire to interfere with the gentleman. I give him notice, however, that I want his bill postponed after he has made his remarks, unless he convinces me that it ought to pass immediately.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. One word. If the gentleman will make his speech, and then move to postpone the further consideration of his bill so that the House may go into Committee of the Whole, I will make no objection.

Mr. LYNCH. I make no arrangement whatever.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move to go to business on the Speaker's table, and pending that motion I make another motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that nine gentlemen desire to speak on this bill. How many more there are he does not know. What is the second motion of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill; and with the consent of the House I desire to say a word.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LYNCH and Mr. BARNES objected.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Can a member be taken from the floor for the purpose of moving that the rules be suspended?

The SPEAKER. He can, if it is preceded by a motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table, after the morning hour. The Congressional Globe is full of precedents of that kind. And pending that motion the House can either adjourn or go into Committee of the Whole.

The question being put on the motion to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the special order, there were—ayes 20, noes 111.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused—ayes 16, noes 111.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused—ayes nineteen; not one fifth of the last vote.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to proceed to business on the Speaker's table; and it was disagreed to—ayes 18, noes 108.

SURVEY OF INDIAN RESERVATIONS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, submitting estimates of appropriations required for surveying Indian reservations; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BATTLE OF WASHITA RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of General W. B. Hazen, as to the hostile character of the band of Indians lately attacked and defeated by General Custer on the Washita river; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EXCHANGE OF PACIFIC RAILROAD BONDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 18th instant, various statements relative to the exchange of Pacific railroad bonds.

Mr. GARFIELD: I hope that communication will be printed. We all want to see it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF UNITED STATES STATUTES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the report of the commissioners to revise the statutes of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Private Secretary, informed the House that he had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1598) to relieve from disabilities A. W. Best and Samuel F. Phillips, of North Carolina;

An act (H. R. No. 1261) amendatory of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases;" and

An act (H. R. No. 1558) to amend an act entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of obtaining evidence in cases of contested elections," approved February 19, 1851.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had adopted a concurrent resolution providing for the appointment at the beginning of the next session of Congress of a joint committee on the reorganization of the civil service.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendment, disagreed to by the House; to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 403) providing for the disposition of certain papers relating to military claims accruing in the department of the West, agreed to the conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had ordered that Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. MCCREERY be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the motion of Mr. LYNCH, to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1364) to provide for the gradual resumption of specie payments was recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and upon which Mr. LYNCH was entitled to the floor.

Mr. LYNCH. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine that his hour has now commenced, and that if the bill is read the time taken up by the reading will come out of his hour.

Mr. LYNCH. Well, I desire to offer some amendments to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is all that is now pending. The bill is not before the House. The gentleman can give notice of his amendments.

Mr. LYNCH. Then I give notice that at the proper time I will offer the amendments which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the proposed amendments, as follows:

Insert after "date," in line twelve, as follows: "And all notes of national banks so received at the Treasury and not paid out to those willing to receive them shall, under such regulations as the Secretary shall prescribe, be redeemed by the banks issuing the same in United States legal-tender notes, and the last-named notes when received at the Treasury shall be destroyed, and in their stead notes authorized by this act shall be issued as hereinbefore provided."

Strike out the words "or in other lawful money," lines sixteen and seventeen, and "payable in coin." Strike out the words "if in other lawful money not exceeding seven and three tenths per cent. per annum," in lines eighteen and nineteen.

The following is the bill:

A bill to provide for the gradual resumption of specie payments.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on and after the 1st day of July, 1869, the United States notes now outstanding shall, when received in the course of ordinary transactions at the Treasury of the United States, be destroyed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in lieu thereof the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue new United States notes of the same denominations as those in lieu of which they are issued, payable in coin on demand, at the Treasury of the United States, at and after one year from date; and all notes of national banks so received at the Treasury and not paid out to parties willing to receive the same, shall, under such regulations as the Secretary shall prescribe, be redeemed by the banks issuing the same in United States legal-tender notes, and the last-named notes when received at the Treasury shall be destroyed, and in their stead notes authorized by this act shall be issued as hereinbefore provided. The whole amount of the new notes authorized by this section shall not exceed the amount of United States notes now outstanding, exclusive of fractional currency.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That notes authorized by this act shall be legal tender for the redemption of national bank notes, and for all other purposes, by and to all parties, except by the United States, in payment of other such notes as have already matured, or in payment of the interest on the public debt where such interest is now, or hereafter may be, payable according to law in coin; and also except before maturity in payment to the United States for duties on imports. And in case of the receipt at the Treasury before or after maturity, or the redemption at and after maturity, of any of the notes authorized by this act, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to re-issue the notes so received or redeemed, or to issue an equal amount and no more of other like notes, payable as hereinbefore provided, on demand, at and after one year from date, except as provided for in section three of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, after the payment in specie herein provided for shall have actually commenced, at his discretion, to issue the notes hereby authorized for periods of less than one year, but not less than three months. He shall also issue new notes of like denominations, in lieu of any notes herein authorized which shall have been redeemed; and he is also authorized to purchase at any time coin requisite to enable him to redeem such notes; and in payment therefor he may, at his discretion, issue to an amount not exceeding fifty million dollars bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, of denominations not less than fifty dollars, payable at any period not more than forty years from date of issue, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government at or after five years from such date, and the interest on such bonds shall be payable semi-annually in coin, at the rate, if payable in coin, of not exceeding six per cent. per annum; and the rate and character of interest shall be expressed on all such bonds: Provided, That no such bonds shall be issued at less than par in lawful money of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That an accurate account shall be kept by the Treasurer of the United States of the amount and denominations of all the United States notes received into the Treasury of the United States and destroyed; and he shall also keep an accurate account of the amount and denominations of notes issued under authority of this act. The United States notes authorized by this act shall be in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, and shall bear the written or engraved signatures of the Treasurer of the United States and the Register of the Treasury, and also, as evidence of lawful issue, the imprint copy of the seal of the Treasury Department, which imprint shall be made under the direction of the Secretary, after said notes shall be received from the engravers and before they are issued.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no gold or silver belonging to the United States shall be sold or paid out from the Treasury, except in payment of lawfully authorized gold certificates, or in payment of interest on the public debt, where the same is, according to law, payable in coin, or as authorized in this act, or otherwise, expressly by law. But the exchange of bullion for coin with the United States mints is not hereby made unlawful.

Mr. LYNCH. If the privileged motions and privileged members have all been settled, I will go on with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SPEAKER, among all the conflicting theories in regard to our financial affairs, and the means to be adopted for their improvement, there is a very general agreement upon one point, namely, that it is desirable at the earliest day practicable to place our currency upon a specie basis. I know there is a class of financiers that contend that a specie standard is wholly unnecessary, and that a paper currency, based upon the faith of the Government, is a better currency than gold and silver, or paper convertible into gold and silver. But this class is not numerous, and I will not stop to discuss the abstract question which they raise. Whether they are right or wrong is of little practical moment in dealing with the question to-day. It is enough to know that the specie standard is the standard of every civilized nation, and as one of the families of nations our interest is to conform to that standard. I shall therefore assume in discussing this question that we are ultimately to return to specie payments; to base our currency on that which the world recognizes, and has adopted, as the true standard of value, gold and silver.

I think there is a very general agreement upon another point, which is that the currency of a country is the foundation upon which it must build its financial structure, and that upon this foundation we must reconstruct our financial policy.

With this general agreement in regard to the ends to be attained, there is an endless diversity of opinion as to the means which should be adopted in order to reach that end. Some contend that we should do nothing directly toward hastening a resumption, but that by a proper adjustment of the tariff and a rigid economy in the administration of the Government the balance of trade will be turned in our favor, and the desired result be thus brought about in due season, and without any disturbance in business. I agree with this view only so far as it assumes the impracticability of effecting a resumption of specie payments by any mere arbitrary enactment that it shall take place at any fixed day in the future.

If we had no commerce with other nations, and if all transactions among ourselves were settled when made; if there were no time contracts for the future payment of money, we might adopt this course and patiently bide the result. But such are not the conditions; money is the subject of contracts for future payment, as well as a medium of exchange, and contracts for the future cannot be made with confidence so long as our currency is of fluctuating and uncertain value. Again, we have an immense debt upon which, owing to the unfavorable circumstances under which it was contracted, we are paying a high rate of interest. Of this debt we have the option to pay—

At any time.....	$514,780,590
After October 31, 1869.....	129,444,100
After June 30, 1870.....	332,928,950
After October 31, 1870.....	197,794,250
After June 30, 1872.....	365,248,250
After June 30, 1873.....	17,648,950

Making a total of.....$1,557,814,900 which we have the option of paying at the present time and during the next three years.

In order to avail ourselves of this option we must negotiate a new loan at a lower rate of interest; and to do this we must improve our credit, the depreciation of which is measured by the depreciation of our currency. Our bonds have appreciated and depreciated with our currency, and will continue to do so. Having made our paper currency the national standard of value, the world will measure our credit by that standard, and there is no escape from it. When we make our currency redeemable in coin it will be at par with coin, and our bonds will then be measured by a specie instead of by a paper standard.

Appreciate our currency to a par with gold, and we can begin to pay that portion of the five twenty bonds now outstanding which has become redeemable at our option, and to issue new bonds at a low rate of interest. The current rate of interest in England and France is at the present time three per cent.; which is considerably higher than it has averaged for the past eighteen months. With our currency on a specie basis we could undoubtedly negotiate a loan at four per cent., which would enable us immediately to reduce our annual interest more than ten million dollars, continuing to retire the five-twenty bonds as they become redeemable, and thus effect, within three years, an annual reduction of our interest of more than thirty million dollars. It is therefore obviously desirable that some steps be taken, some measures enacted, calculated to facilitate a resumption of specie payments.

Before proceeding to a consideration of these various plans proposed and urged upon Congress for its adoption for the purpose of bringing about this result, let us examine carefully the task we have to perform and the resources at our command with which to accomplish the work.

The books of the Treasury January 1, 1869, showed our demand liabilities to be as follows:

Outstanding United States notes.....	$356,021,073
Fractional currency.....	84,215,715

National bank notes.....	890,236,788
	290,806,565
	690,043,353

In addition to which we have to provide for on demand, matured debt not presented for payment..... $7,463,503
Three percent. certificates payable on demand..... 55,865,000

Making a total of.....	$753,371,850
------------------------	---------------

to be directly or indirectly provided for on resumption of specie payments by the Government and the banks.

Our present means of meeting these demands are as follows:

According to the debt statement of January 1, 1869, we had coin in the Treasury.....	$98,763,368
Less amount deposited on gold certificates 13,063,092

Net amount of coin in the Treasury..... $85,700,276 being something less than twelve per cent. of our demand liabilities. Our paper currency measured by the gold standard, is now at a discount of about twenty-five per cent. The resumption of specie payments means the extinguishment of this margin between specie and our paper by an appreciation of the paper currency to a par with gold. How this is to be accomplished is the problem to be solved.

The plans which have been from time to time urged upon the attention of Congress for the accomplishment of this object are:

1. A contraction of the currency, to be continued until all the legal-tender notes shall be retired, leaving the entire circulating medium of the country to the national banks.

2. A repeal of the legal-tender acts and an immediate resumption of specie payments by the Government and banks.

3. Providing for the purchase of the United States legal-tender notes by the Secretary of the Treasury at a fixed rate of discount in gold, reducing the discount one per cent. each month until the purchase is made at par. The notes thus purchased to be reissued and continued in circulation.

4. An enactment by Congress that specie payments shall be resumed by the Government at some fixed day in the future, to be followed at a later day by a like resumption on the part of the national banks, and by a repeal of the legal-tender act, resumption to be provided for by retaining in the Treasury all the surplus of coin after paying the interest on the public debt, and by compelling the banks to retain the specie received as interest on their bonds, with which to maintain their circulation upon a specie basis.

The plan of resuming specie payments by a contraction of the currency passed from a theory into an experiment with the commencement of the financial administration of the present Secretary of the Treasury, who adopted it as the leading measure of his financial policy, and urged it upon Congress in his first annual report. The objects sought to be accomplished by this policy were twofold:

First. The regulation of the business of the country, the reduction of the price of labor and of merchandise, and the prevention of speculating by the business community by creating a scarcity of currency.

Second. The appreciation of the paper currency by reduction of its volume until it reached par with gold; thus effecting a return to specie payments.

This policy of the Secretary was supported by Congress and the press of the country almost unanimously, only a few feeble dissenting voices being heard in the general chorus of approval. But notwithstanding all the adventitious aids afforded to this policy by laws of Congress, a favorable public sentiment and the support of distinguished financial writers, the laws of trade asserted themselves and refused to yield either to the theories of financiers or congressional legislation.

The effects of its adoption were to disturb business, create distrust, increase fluctuations in gold and merchandise and thereby stimulate speculation, and to depreciate, instead of appreciate, the paper currency. The premium on gold rose from twenty-eight to sixty, and on the repeal of the law authorizing contraction stood at thirty-five per cent. premium. The fact that under the most favorable circumstances for a fair trial this contraction policy proved a complete and disastrous failure ought to be a sufficient answer to any argument urged in favor of its re-adoption. And were it not that the policy is still adhered to and persistently urged upon the attention of Congress, officially, semi-officially, and unofficially, I should not stop here to examine the arguments adduced in its support.

The foundation of the whole argument in its favor is the assumption that we have an excess of currency in circulation over the legitimate demands of the business of the country; which excess is attempted to be established, first, by a comparison of the assumed circulation of 1860 with that of to-day, and second, by assuming that the percentage of premium on gold is the measure of that excess.

A letter favoring a contraction of the currency has recently been addressed by a distinguished financier of Massachusetts, Hon. George Walker, to the Special Commissioner of the Revenue, and appended by him to his official report.

I find in it the following estimate of the amount of currency in circulation in 1860:

Gold and silver in the country.....	$200,000,000
Less in banks and Treasury.....	91,000,000
Leaving in circulation.....	109,000,000
Bank notes.....	207,000,000

Total.....	$316,000,000
------------	---------------

Or a circulation of $11 09 per capita. This is upon a gold basis and upon the lowest estimate of gold in the United States in 1860. Taking the amount of gold at the same date as estimated by Hon. J. S. MORRILL, whose figures in this case I consider much more reliable, as they were not made for the purpose of sustaining a pet theory, and the circulation was in 1860 as follows:

Gold and silver in the United States.....	$275,000,000
Less in banks and Treasury.....	91,000,000
	184,000,000
Bank notes.....	207,000,000

Total.....	$391,000,000
------------	---------------

A circulation of $14 48 per capita.
The present circulation estimated upon the same basis as that of 1860 by Mr. Walker is as follows:

National bank notes.....	$299,806,565
United States notes.....	358,921,073
Fractional currency.....	33,875,268
	638,702,906

Less in banks as reserve October 1, 1868.....	$171,133,197
Currency in Treasury.....	18,253,916
	189,422,143
Total circulation.....	$500,280,763

If we discount the depreciation of the paper currency to place it on the same basis as the circulation of 1860 we should have the following result:

Present circulation.....	$500,280,763
Less twenty-five per cent.....	125,070,191
	$375,210,572

As our present population is in round numbers about thirty-seven millions this statement gives us a circulation of about $10 15 per capita, being $1 34 less than the lowest and $1 33 less than the highest amount according to these two estimates in 1860.

I think it must be apparent from this statement, which leaves entirely out of the account the increased wealth and business of the country as well as the large increase of currency required for the increased receipts and disbursements of the Government, which are now about five times what they were in 1860, that we have relatively, if not actually, less currency in circulation now than we had in 1860.

In making a comparison of the amount of currency in circulation at the present time with the amount prior to the war we should not lose sight of a very important distinction which exists between the currency introduced by the Government (the legal-tender notes) and the bank circulation. The bank circulation represents loans to the business community, for which the banks hold a corresponding amount of individual and corporate promises to pay. An increase of this circulation, therefore, represents an increase of credits. An inflation of this currency means an inflation of credits, and when such inflation exists there is danger of a financial collapse. The currency introduced by the Government, on the other hand, is not based upon individual credits, but represents the indebtedness of the Government to the holder, to the community in which such currency circulates. An increase of this currency does not therefore represent an increase of individual and corporate credits, and not necessarily an increase of Government indebtedness, as it may be only a change of the form of the obligation of indebtedness. A contraction of this currency shows no decrease of Government indebtedness in case the currency retired is funded into bonds. It is only a change in the form of that which represents the indebtedness. Keeping in mind this distinction, it will readily be seen that the fact that the banks of the country prior to the war could only keep in circulation $207,000,000 in paper currency is no evidence that this amount was all that was needed or could be profitably used in production and the exchange of productions. It is only an evidence that the ability of the banks to loan, and of the business community to borrow and pay, was exhausted at this point. The ability of the banks to loan was limited to the amount of loanable capital under their control. The ability of the business community to borrow was limited to the security which they could furnish for payment at maturity of their obligations.

The disbursements of the Government during the war more than doubled the available capital of the people by drawing upon the indefinite future resources of the country. These disbursements were distributed through all parts of the country, and were readily absorbed in the development of its resources. The following comparison of bank loans and deposits at periods before and since the war, show the wonderful increase of individual wealth and comparative decrease of individual indebtedness resulting from the increase of national indebtedness:

	Bank Loans.	Deposits.
1837.....	$525,115,000	$137,397,000
1856.....	634,183,000	212,706,000
1857.....	684,456,000	230,353,000
1858.....	583,185,000	185,937,000
1860.....	601,315,000	253,892,000
1861.....	603,314,000	344,159,000
1867.....	608,211,500	537,199,994

These figures show that previous to the war the banks loaned to the general business community three times the amount which they borrowed from them; while since the war the amounts have nearly balanced each other, and that notwithstanding the great increase of business and of population. During the last ten years the amount of bank loans have decreased more than seventy-six million dollars, and since the commencement of the war more than eighty-three millions. The decrease of individual indebtedness in the transaction of general business is doubtless, could it be ascertained, no less striking. Add to all this the large amount of Government securities held by the people, and we gain some idea of the increase of individual wealth since the commencement of the war.

The value of a sufficient amount of currency in a new country like our own, rich in undeveloped resources, is not generally appreciated. Those favoring contraction have generally regarded currency only in its relations to a fixed amount of business, and drawing analogies from old countries where production has reached its maximum, have limited its uses to an exchange of productions, leaving entirely out of the account its value as a producing power. I cannot better express my own idea of the advantages derived from the currency furnished to the country as one of the results of the war than by quoting the following extracts from a letter from the present Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to Thomas Campbell, esq.:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 28, 1865.

No country can prosper for any considerable time where money commands so high a rate of interest as it does in California, and nothing would tend more directly to reduce that rate of interest than the introduction of a sound paper circulating medium.

Paper money has been found to be a necessity in all commercial countries, and especially in the United States; and what is true elsewhere must be true in California. With her splendid climate, her fertile soil, and her inexhaustible mines, her wealth and population ought to have been more rapidly increased than they have been for some years past. With her great advantages, what has prevented her from receiving a constant flow of emigration from the other States? What has prevented her from being a commercial and manufacturing State? What is now repressing the enterprise of her enterprising people, but the fact that money is dear, and credit, to a great extent, ignored?

California needs a well-regulated credit system; she needs a paper circulation to quicken enterprise and give impetus to business; she needs a lower rate of interest; she needs to be cured of the mania for an exclusive metallic currency; in a word, she needs, in addition to the recognition of the United States notes as a currency, a sound banking system—such as is provided for by the national currency act—and she will linger in the career of greatness and prosperity until these needs are supplied.

I am, very truly, yours,

H. McCULLOCH.

The wonderful effect produced by the introduction and employment of the paper currency issued by the Government in stimulating production and developing and increasing the national wealth has been seen and felt by all, and has been epitomized by the Special Commissioner of Revenue in his last annual report, as follows:

"Speaking generally, however, in the first instance the Commissioner asserts that all the available data tend to establish the following conclusions, namely, that within the last five years more cotton spindles have been put in operation, more iron furnaces erected, more iron smelted, more bars rolled, more steel made, more coal and copper mined, more lumber sawed and hewn, more houses and shops constructed, more manufactories of different kinds started, and more petroleum collected, refined, and exported, than during any equal period in the history of the country; and that this increase has been greater both as regards quality and quantity, and greater than the legitimate increase to be expected from the normal increase of wealth and population."

The Commissioner goes on to give the annual progress of railroad extensions during and subsequent to the war, as shown by the following table:

	Miles.
1860.....	1846
1861.....	621
1862.....	864
1863.....	1650
1864.....	738
1865.....	1277
1866.....	1832
1867.....	2227
1868, estimated.....	2590

"It will be thus seen that since and including the year 1865, the year of the termination of the war, nearly eight thousand miles of railroad have been constructed in the United States, and that the present ratio of increase is more than double the average railroad history prior to 1860, namely, eleven hundred and fifty-six miles."

After presenting this grand array of facts and figures indicative of national development, the Commissioner, apparently wholly unconscious of the agency by which this development was mainly wrought, goes on to descant upon the "effects of the war in checking national development," as follows:

"What would have been the condition of progress during the decade from 1860 to 1870, had not the war intervened, is a question that cannot be definitely answered; but that many branches of production would have experienced a development limited only by the amount of capital and skilled labor cannot be doubted."

Limited only by the amount of capital, &c.

It has been, as I have endeavored to show, this want of available capital prior to the war that prevented the rapid development of the resources of the country. It has been the supply of that want, as one of the results of the war, that has stimulated production to such a wonderful extent that, notwithstanding all the destruction and waste of an exhausting war, the production of the country has been relatively greater during the past than in any previous decade in our history.

How much the growth and material prosperity of the country has been retarded by the policy of the Secretary of the Treasury in contracting and in deprecating the currency can scarcely be estimated. Whatever may be said of the fictitious character of this currency, the national wealth which it developed, the iron, the coal, the copper, the mills and the railroads to which the Commissioner has called our attention are real, tangible, substantial.

I think very little reliance can be placed on any calculation as to the actual amount of currency in circulation prior to the war, and much less upon any estimates of the amount required with which to transact the business of the country at any given period. Our growth and progress are so rapid, and our condition and circumstances so changeable as to render all such calculations fallacious.

I know of no better criterion of the relation which the amount of currency bears to the business of a country than the rate of interest paid for its use. There are times in all countries when even with an excess of money for the transaction of legitimate business, the rate of interest is high. But this results from a demand for purposes of speculation, which demand is as real during its existence as if it were for regular and legitimate business.

In England and France the rate of interest is uniformly low, the exceptions being rare and occasioned by a speculative demand. In this country the rate of interest on money is uniformly high, and fully as high on an average since as before the war. The exceptions are at seasons when a temporary depression of business lessens the demand for money.

The same difference in regard to the supply and demand for money which is observable between Europe and our own country exists between different States of the Union. In the old States where capital has accumulated and is adequate to the business to be transacted the rate of interest is moderate. In the new States there is a lack, while there is a great demand for money to develop the resources of such States, and the rate of interest is consequently high.

Mr. Walker, in the letter to the Commissioner of Revenue to which I have referred, in comparing the people of the United States with the people of France, says:

"The people of this country earn money and save it; and they know how to invest it so as not to lose interest; real estate, the public funds, loans on mortgages, corporate shares, and deposits in savings banks absorb the savings of the people and prevent them from being locked up in money. They do not, perhaps, reason about it, but they instinctively know that money in the pocket-book is idle capital, and in a country where all must work for a living we do not encourage idleness even in money."

I submit whether a people that know so well the value of money and the best means for its profitable employment are not capable of determining for themselves the amount necessary for the transaction of their own business without any immediate supervision of the Government? whether it is necessary to fix by arbitrary law a certain amount as just, sufficient, and safe for the business of the country. Is not the fact that the rate of interest is uniformly high among a people who know so well how profitably to employ money conclusive evidence that the amount in circulation among them is not in excess of what they need for the transaction of their business.

That the premium on gold does not measure the excess of currency in circulation above the needs of business is conclusively shown by the fact that that premium fell from one hundred and eighty to twenty-six per cent., with an increase of the currency of nearly three hundred million dollars, and rose from twenty-six to thirty-five during a period in which the currency was reduced about two hundred million dollars.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken up considerable time in the discussing of the policy of a contraction of the currency because I believe its adoption has inflicted incalculable injury upon the country, and because I believe the continued agitation of the retraction of the policy is also prejudicial to all our material interests. Believing this, I am anxious to see some other policy adopted for reaching specie payments. Some policy calculated to inspire that confidence which appreciates instead of creating that distrust which depreciates our currency.

The plan of forcing an immediate resumption of specie payments by repealing the legal-tender act and enacting by law that specie payments shall take place immediately, or at some day in the immediate future, say July 4, 1869, is, for the United States Government, the great debtor, to solemnly enact that there shall be an immediate settlement of all demands in specie when its own monthly financial statements show that it cannot pay ten cents on the dollar of its demand liabilities in the required coin.

The Government could not comply with the provisions of such a law, and such compliance on its part is a condition-precedent to its enforcement upon the general public. I presume this measure has been introduced for the purpose of evincing the earnest desire of its author for a return to specie payments, rather than with a view to its adoption. The plan for buying in the notes of the Government at a discount might be practicable if the rate at which gold should rule each month could be fixed and determined by law. That neither the laws of Congress nor the Secretary of the Treasury can fix the price of gold has already been demonstrated.

It is difficult to see how the monthly purchase of an unlimited amount of United States notes at a fixed rate of discount each month could effect a continued reduction of the premium on gold to the rate fixed by the Government, any more than sales of gold by the Treasury could effect the object. I think it very certain that the present amount of gold in the Treasury could be drawn out in a very short time by a combination of speculators. A margin of five million dollars would be sufficient for the purpose. The bill introduced for carrying out this plan proposes a reissue of the notes, but as the currency receipts are now in excess of the currency disbursements, for what would the notes be reissued?

But, admitting the entire practicability of the plan, there are two very serious, and to my mind insuperable objections to its adoption. First, the Government having made its paper money legal tender, that is in law the equivalent of gold and silver; it is now proposed by another law to depreciate this money, to strip it of its legal-tender character, and buy it up at a discount with the gold and silver of which it is the legal equivalent. And second, such a law, providing for buying in United States notes at a discount is on the part of the Government a proclamation of national bankruptcy and a proposition to compound with its creditors.

The Government having promised to pay dollars cannot honorably pay less, because necessity does not compel it to ask for a discount. There is no contract either expressed or implied that the United States notes shall be paid on demand; but there is an express contract for the payment of the full amount promised on the face of each note, and an implied contract that this promise shall be redeemed so soon as the promisor has the ability to do so. There could be no justification for a great solvent nation adopting the pitiful make shift of buying in its own notes at a discount. Having issued paper money and made it legal tender, it should now adopt such measures as will make that money in fact what it has made it in law—the equivalent of coin. The fact that the laws of trade have fixed a value on the money of the United States below the legal standard is no reason why the Government itself should adopt and conform to that value; and to do so would be to make merchandise of its own money.

The fourth plan proposed is a carefully considered and comprehensive measure, providing not only for a resumption by the Government, but reaching forward and embracing in its scope a resumption by the national banks also. This plan has been introduced and advocated by one of the ablest statesmen of the country in a speech which shows a clear comprehension of our present financial condition and of the conditions necessary to be induced before specie payments are practicable. The author of the measure admits the impracticability of resuming specie payments until through some means the premium on gold has been extinguished by a gradual appreciation of the paper currency, and to bring about this result has provided that the surplus gold in the Treasury, after payment of its specie obligations, shall be retained and constitute a fund to meet the demand for redemption of the notes at the date fixed by law; and that after the 1st day of July, 1870, the national banks shall reserve and hold in their vaults all the coin they may receive for interest on the bonds held by the Government for security of their circulation.

It is assumed that the knowledge on the part of the public that the Government will resume on a certain day, and that it is accumulating gold for the purpose of maintaining such resumption, will inspire confidence, appreciate the paper currency, and secure success. This measure, like all others providing for the resumption of specie payments, depends for its success upon the measure of confidence which its enactment establishes in the public mind in regard to the redemption of the currency on the day fixed for its redemption.

If the public should have full confidence that the promised resumption would take place as provided the immediate effect would be to appreciate the paper currency steadily until it reached par on the day fixed for resumption. Would such be the effect of the passage of this bill? I think not; for the reason that the provision for locking up so large a percentage of the specie of the country for so long a period would tend to increase instead of diminish its premium, and for the additional reason that the simple enactment that specie payments shall take place on any fixed day in the future is only a good resolution made to-day that may be reconsidered and repealed to-morrow. And the public know that any law providing for a resumption of specie payments on any fixed day in the future will be repealed if, as the day approaches, our financial condition is such that the obligations assumed cannot be performed. There is an implied proviso in any such law which would be expressed by the words "if practicable."

As I have already said, the success of any plan for the resumption of specie payments depends entirely on the confidence of our creditors in our ability to pay our obligations in coin at the time promised. As soon as we can show that all reasonable demands upon the Treasury can be met in specie that confidence is secured. The people have never doubted and never will doubt the good faith of the Government, nor its actual and ultimate solvency. And whenever any plan shall be adopted whereby the actual payment in coin of our obligations can be gradually and safely approached, and our promises made not only secure by our plighted faith and confirmed by an exhibition of our resources but also placed beyond the possibility of temporary or permanent repeal or suspension, we shall have taken the only sure step toward the settlement of our financial difficulties.

And this brings me to the bill before the House. Does it possess the necessary elements of success? Let us examine its provisions. They are, first, to destroy all United States legal-tender notes received into the Treasury in the course of ordinary transactions, and to issue a like amount of United States notes, redeemable in coin on demand at and after one year from the date of issue. Second, to cause all national bank notes received at the Treasury to be redeemed by the bank issuing the same in United States legal-tender notes, which legal-tender notes shall in like manner be destroyed, and coin notes, payable in one year, issued in their stead. In other words, all the paper currency issued after July 1, 1869, from the Treasury of the United States is to be in notes payable in one year from the date of issue in coin. Third, to make these notes legal tender for the redemption of national bank notes, and for all other purposes for which United States notes are now legal tender.

Further, as a matter of subordinate detail, it is provided that the Secretary of the Treasury may, on receiving any of said coin notes into the Treasury before maturity, instead of reissuing them, issue an equal amount of new notes payable a full year from date; and also that the Secretary may at his discretion, after the maturity of the notes first issued, issue the coin notes in exchange for the present United States notes at a less time than one year, but not on a less time than three months. The Secretary is also authorized, in case it may be necessary, in order to maintain the redemption of the coin notes after maturity, to purchase coin to the amount of $50,000,000. To state more in detail, the bill provides for a gradual resumption of specie payments by the conversion of the outstanding United States notes into notes payable in coin in one year from date of issue, the conversion into coin notes being made as the currency disbursements of the Treasury require.

Under its operation, if it become a law, all United States legal-tender notes received into the Treasury of the United States, in the ordinary course of business, after July 1, 1869, will be destroyed; and all national bank notes so received will be changed with the banks issuing the same for United States notes, which notes will also be destroyed, and in lieu thereof a like amount of United States notes issued payable in coin on demand at the Treasury of the United States after one year from date of issue. The new notes will be legal tender for the redemption by the banks of their circulating notes, and for all other purposes except for the payment of duties on imports before maturity, and the interest on the public debt where such interest is payable in coin. That is, they are legal tender in general, but must themselves be paid in coin at maturity by the United States.

Taking the estimated currency disbursements of the Treasury for the next fiscal year, say about one hundred and eighty million dollars, as a basis of calculation, and the conversion from the present irredeemable United States notes into notes redeemable in coin in one year from date would be at the rate of about fifteen million dollars per month, or half a million dollars per day. That is, during the month of July, 1869, there would be paid out from the United States Treasury $15,000,000, in notes payable in one year from date of issue, on demand, in coin, at the Treasury, to be followed by a like amount each month during the year; which would make the total amount thus converted during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, $180,000,000; being about one half the amount of United States notes now outstanding.

The same amount, providing the currency expenditures of the Treasury continue the same, would be converted into coin notes during the next fiscal year. That is, one half the present volume of United States notes would be convertible into notes payable in coin in one year from the date of their issue, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, and the other half would be thus converted during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871. This gradual substitution of coin notes payable on a day certain for legal-tender notes, never actually payable on their face, is the first measure proposed by this bill. It is the means of preparing for and of making, not only practicable and sure but gradual and easy, the resumption of specie payments. This is to be the first step under this bill to be taken toward the return to a specie currency.

The next step relates to the payment of these coin notes. This process is to commence one year after the date of their first issue. On that day the $500,000 in coin notes, issued a year before, will become redeemable, and if presented at the Treasury must be paid. As payment can only be demanded at the same rate as of the original issue, say $500,000 daily, the time in which they can be presented for redemption will be extended through the period of two years, from July 1, 1869, to July 1, 1872.

These notes thus become an intermediate currency between the present irredeemable legal-tender notes and gold, and serve two very important purposes, which seem to me essential to a healthy return to specie payments; first, they postpone the actual day of payment to the several times when the Government can undoubtedly make and maintain it; second, they give in the mean time the highest possible assurance that it will be made. Not merely the declaration of a statute that it shall be made, but the assurance of a contract with and a direct promise to each holder of these notes borne on the face of the note itself, that they will be so paid.

I have thus presented the two main features of this plan, namely, first, the issue for two years of notes payable in coin in one year from the date of their issue; and second, provision for the payment in coin one year later, extending through a like period of two years, or provision for the redemption in specie of the United States notes now outstanding within the three years ending July 1, 1872. The bill makes no other provision for the redemption by the national banks of their notes than is required by the present law; that is, a redemption in legal-tender notes, for the reason that I do not consider it practicable for both the Government and the banks to resume at the same time, and to undertake to provide for both might prevent resumption by either. Appreciate the United States notes to a par with gold, and a way will be opened for the banks to follow and redeem their notes in specie. The measures necessary to secure this result can be adopted after the Government has placed its currency, which underlies the bank currency, upon a specie basis. Once placed the Government currency on this specie basis and establish public confidence in its permanence, and we have practically added so much to the specie of the country, and thus furnished a medium for the redemption of the national bank notes.

With so large an amount of paper in circulation, every dollar of which is profitably employed and none of which can be retired without seriously deranging business, checking production and impairing the revenues of the Government; with this paper at a discount of twenty-five per cent. in specie, it is the part of wisdom to make haste slowly. The main point is to begin to resume, not merely to resolve that we will do so at some future day, but to commence at once, and however slow the progress, each step will not only carry us nearer to the goal, but will impart that strength and that confidence which will enable us to reach it.

Provision is also made for keeping the currency which this bill proposes to create in circulation until further legislation by Congress. There is no contraction of the currency by its operation.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to reissue these coin notes after they have been received into the Treasury before maturity in payment of public dues, or to issue in their stead the same amount of like notes on time. This discretionary power, although not an important feature of the plan, may be found necessary to be used, and no valid objection to its use exists, as notes received in payment of public dues are actually paid or redeemed by the United States. A like discretionary authority to issue notes on a shorter time than one year, but on not less than three months, is to enable the Secretary to hasten the time for resuming, if he finds it practicable to do so, after the maturity of the notes first issued.

Having thus stated the general provisions of the bill, it is proper to consider what will be its general effect:

First, can these coin notes be paid according to their tenor? and second, what will be the effect upon the currency of issuing them?

Let us now see what means the Secretary will have, at the maturity of these notes, with which to redeem them:

The amount of coin in the Treasury January 1, 1869, was..... $98,763,368
Deduct coin certificates..... 13,063,092

Leaving a net balance of..... 85,700,276
To which add estimated receipts in coin over expenditures to end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870..... 59,000,000

Which will give amount in Treasury on maturity of the first coin notes issued... 144,700,276 Allowing the same excess in receipts of coin over expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1871..... 32,000,000

And we have..... $176,700,276

with which to redeem the $180,000,000 falling due during that year, and this without any purchase of coin by the Secretary. There can be no doubt of the ability of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain redemption after commencing, as he would, without any purchase of coin, have during the first year after specie payments actually commenced nearly one hundred per cent. in specie of the whole amount of coin notes redeemable with which to redeem whatever notes might be presented. And maintaining redemption through the first year would undoubtedly bring the whole volume of the currency to a par with gold. Indeed, I believe the first monthly redemption would have this effect; for a demonstration of the ability of the Government to redeem would so establish public confidence as to settle the whole question.

Deeming these resources of the Government amply sufficient to maintain the redemption of these coin notes as they mature and are presented for redemption, I now pass to the second question: What will be the effect of their issue? This is, in substance, to ask whether the community in general will estimate the resources of the Government for the payment of these notes as I have estimated them. Will their issue inspire general confidence in their promise to pay? Upon this point I propose to take, first, the testimony given by an opponent of the bill, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] who, in a speech made in this House last week, expressed himself upon it as follows:

"Will the issuing of Treasury notes payable in twelve months in gold, in lieu of the greenbacks and bank notes taken for taxes and dues to the Government, have any tendency toward the resumption of specie payments? This proposition has been made in all seriousness by a decided opponent of contraction, and is put forth as a measure in aid of that view. To my mind it is the strongest measure of contraction yet proposed, amounting to nearly a half million a day—in fine, to the entire amount of the revenue raised in paper; for this paper is at once retired, and in its stead is issued a currency which calls for gold in twelve months, and which at once is worth more than twenty-five per cent. premium; a currency which would be locked up as soon as issued, and only see daylight when put up for sale by bankers or at the end of twelve months, when presented at the Treasury.

"Who that holds such a note will give it in exchange for a greenback and throw away his twenty-five per cent.? Who will pay it out? Who so infatuated as to yield up such a golden advantage? In one year $180,000,000 of our currency would be safely locked up, and the whole greenback circulation would be effectually retired at the end of two years."

These objections of the gentleman from Indiana—who represents a class of objectors—are full of expressions of the confidence which is to be reposed in the notes which this bill proposes to issue. They are, that these notes will "be locked up as soon as issued"—"safely locked up"—not paid out, but hoarded for the "golden advantage" which they will afford to their possessor, "put up for sale by brokers," "bearing a premium of twenty-five per cent." Whatever may be the actual operation, there is no mistake as to what these objectors assume will be the effect upon the public mind of the issue of the proposed gold notes; they assume and object that the notes will be at par, or nearly at par, with gold; and I ask the attention of the House to this point. The objection is a most forcible statement of the public confidence which will be reposed in these coin notes, for there would be no such appreciation of these notes toward a par with gold unless the public had full confidence that the redemption would take place at the time promised; and the percentage of appreciation would be the exact measure of that confidence.

The gentleman from Indiana, therefore, concedes that the bill would effect the very object for which it is intended, namely: the extinguishment of the premium on gold by an appreciation of the paper currency. Accepting the gentleman's statement of the credit which these notes will win as correct, let us consider the effect of that credit upon the currency. Will it produce that contraction which the gentleman apprehends? I think, if at all, only temporarily. For as all the legal-tender notes are in process of conversion, and all national bank notes are redeemable in legal-tender notes, the one issue cannot be appreciated without drawing up with it the whole paper currency of the country. The confidence which these coin notes would inspire would express itself not so much in the form of a premium on those notes above the value of the present national currency, as in a reduction of the premium on gold. I cannot better express my ideas of the effect which the issuing of these coin notes would have in reducing the premium on gold than by quoting the following extract from a speech made by me in introducing the bill, in March last:

"With the steady conversion of the greenbacks into notes redeemable in specie at a specified time, and with the certainty of the ability of the Government to redeem them as promised, the whole volume of the currency would begin to appreciate. The hoarded specie would come out to realize the premium, which would every day be reduced, and at no distant day be entirely extinguished. The notes, payable in specie as they approached maturity, would probably be temporarily hoarded, but only to liberate the same amount in specie. As fast as they matured and became redeemable in coin they would remain in circulation as specie; being received for payment of duties on imports and convertible into coin at the will of the holder, they would be received in payment for interest on the public debt and for all other purposes for which coin is now required. Whenever any amount of these notes was actually redeemed the same amount of coin would be liberated from the Treasury, where it now lies dormant, and become useful to the community. Once placed this paper currency of the Government upon a specie basis, and establish public confidence in its permanence, and we have practically added $350,000,000 of specie to the amount now in circulation, and thus furnished a medium for the redemption of national bank notes."

All arguments which I have seen urged against the bill start from the same point as those of the gentleman from Indiana, namely, that the notes are immediately to appreciate; and some of them include another objection which the gentleman did not name: that this appreciation would create a difference between this issue and other notes in circulation, and inure to the advantage of the creditors of the Government. As I have already said, I believe the appreciation would be expressed in the reduction of the premium on gold, rather than by any premium on this particular issue. But admitting the force of the argument which conceded the practicability of appreciating the legal-tender notes by making them payable at a day certain, and thus extinguishing the premium on gold, let us see whether these apprehended evils and inconveniences are of so serious a character as to counterbalance the advantages which would result from a resumption of specie payments.

First. Whatever advantages might accrue to the public creditor by receiving payment in the new notes would involve no loss to the Government, as the notes are not to be finally retired at maturity. The Government loses nothing by appreciating its paper; it puts nothing into it except public faith, public confidence, and secures to itself whatever advantages result from the appreciation; not only in the appreciation of its bonds, but in all purchases which it makes. An increased value is thus given to every dollar received into the Treasury as well as to every dollar paid out. The coin notes paid out of the Treasury would pass directly from the hands of those to whom they are first paid, as they have not the ability to hold them—generally requiring all their receipts to pay their current expenses—and enter directly into circulation at whatever appreciation public confidence might fix upon them; and this appreciation would, of course, effect a corresponding reduction of the premium on gold.

Second. The immediate effect of converting the legal-tender notes might be to retire the new issue from circulation; but this would be done mostly by the banks, into which they would naturally run, and which would substitute them for the legal-tender notes, now held as a reserve. This reserve amounts to about one hundred and seventy-two million dollars, and would nearly absorb the amount issued the first year. This retirement of the converted notes would effect no contraction of the currency, as it would liberate a like amount of legal-tender notes now held as a reserve, and send them into circulation to supply the place of the coin notes withdrawn. To a large extent those hoarded in private hands would take the place of specie, which would come out and reduce the premium on gold. The contraction, if any, which would take place would be temporary and voluntary on the part of the business community in whose hands the notes would be held; and such temporary contraction of the currency is one of the conditions necessary to be brought about during the transition from an irredeemable to a redeemable currency. The advantage of this mode of contraction is, that it is voluntary, self-imposed, and self-adjusting, and controlled by the natural laws of trade; and that the amount retired is at all times within the reach of business, and can be called forth whenever its exigencies demand it.

In this regard the coin notes would not be unlike the compound-interest notes, which were held to a considerable extent by the banks as a part of their reserve, and which went, as these coin notes would go, to make up that part of the currency which is laid by in small sums by all classes, and which in the aggregate constitutes no inconsiderable percentage of the circulation. Individuals as well as banks keep a reserve, but keep it to be used when required. The last dollar paid out would undoubtedly be the one which in the estimation of the holder was the most valuable, but that last dollar would come out, and be made available as currency either at par with other paper or at an intermediate premium between that paper and gold, whenever the demands of business required it.

Third. An intermediate currency between the present paper currency and gold would, at most, be but a temporary inconvenience to which business would soon adjust itself. A large part of it would, as I have shown, take the place of other paper now out of active circulation; and such a currency would be a valuable agency by which to span the chasm now existing between paper and specie.

It is objected that a return to specie payments will disturb the relation between debtor and creditor; but this objection applies to any mode of reaching specie payments, whether such resumption be facilitated by legislation or comes of itself without any such help. By the plan I propose there could be but little disturbance, because there is no sudden or permanent contraction of the currency, and it would not decrease the ability of the debtor to pay by appreciating the currency without retiring it; by improving its quality without reducing its quantity. Resumption by this method would, in the end, increase rather than diminish the volume of currency by liberating and utilizing the specie which now lies dormant, being, like merchandise, only moved by the agency of the paper currency. Under the operation of this bill all the advantages of an arbitrary contraction of the currency would be secured without any of the evils attending such contraction. Most of the objections urged against resumption by the mode proposed in this bill lie with equal force against any method of resumption, while many of the objections to all other proposed modes are obviated by this. The alternatives presented, then, are: to remain as we are until time shall effect a cure, or to adopt some measure which like this will take us step by step toward the desired goal.

Mr. Speaker, there is no royal road to the payment of our debt; and those who pretend that we can carry the burdens imposed upon us by the contest for national existence through which we have successfully passed, without inconvenience and labor, do but flatter and delude. It must cost us something to return to specie payments. But I believe that by adopting careful and wise measures the task we have to perform will be so toned and proportioned to our gradually increasing strength that it will be accomplished naturally and easily, and will be in itself a means of national development and financial health and strength. The chasm between our currency and specie must be bridged; it cannot be leaped. We must, first, promise to resume; second, show that we are able to perform our promise; and third, arrange so that the transition from paper to gold, from an irredeemable to a redeemable currency, shall be gentle and gradual, and thus avoid any sudden revulsion and consequent panic. This done, we shall have fixed our currency on a firm and enduring basis, and brought our public debt into normal and healthy relations with the trade and commerce of the country.

Mr. BARNES obtained the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to inquire if some arrangement cannot be made so that the speeches on this bill, instead of being each an hour long, shall be limited to thirty minutes each, so as to accommodate a greater number of gentlemen than will be the case if the present arrangement is adhered to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BECK.) That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Very well. Then I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNES] to yield to allow me to offer a substitute for this bill.

Mr. BARNES. I cannot yield the floor for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the motion to reconsider, which is now pending, an amendment can be entertained only by unanimous consent.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I give notice that as soon as I can obtain the floor for the purpose I will move a substitute for this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order having been called for, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNES] will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, the interests of the country demand the earliest possible return to the specie standard of the world. The declaration to that effect by the bill now before the House, reported by my distinguished colleague upon the Committee of Banking and Currency, will meet with universal assent. I voted to send this bill to the House, as I should any bill calculated to elicit intelligent debate upon this vitally important subject. But the first question which you and which the country at large will ask is, is it through the provisions of this bill that this much desired result will be produced? All civilized nations acknowledge gold and silver as the standard of their interchanges. Ours is not an exception unless we have the power to exclude ourselves from intercourse and trade with other nations of the world. Recently we have been unable to sustain ourselves in the great national clearing-house. All have suffered from the national dishonor, and we are paying forty per cent. penalty in the enhanced price of the articles we consume. We all realize the necessity of reestablishing our financial relations, so that the measure of our property may have a uniform standard day by day. We cannot pay for twenty ounces to the pound forever. We cannot forever pay a hundred and forty cents for that which we consume and receive, but a hundred cents for that which we sell. The varying price of gold upsets everything.

The importer now pays $100,000 for a cargo of tea which he must sell for currency; then reconvert his currency into gold to purchase more tea. The measure of his success or failure is the fluctuation in the value of the money which he is compelled to take for his merchandise, and not the price which he obtains for it. The holder of a Government bond receives his six dollars gold interest upon the coupon, and when he sells the gold at twenty or fifty per cent. premium he realizes the sensible difference of thirty per cent. in his income. The farmer upon the Mississippi, the ship builder in Maine, and the cotton planter in the South starts his products for Europe, and finds his prices shrink thirty or forty per cent. through depreciation of our home currency.

The laborer who produces the wealth of the country mortgages the toil of his hands and receives a currency with which he cannot purchase an article of use without paying this tax, thus largely reducing the price of his labor. Thus business becomes gambling, capital and talent are absorbed in makeshifts, speculation, and rascality. The nation pays its debts temporarily by exporting bonds in place of flour. New tariffs must be added to collect the gold to meet interest. The price of imported commodities rises in proportion, thereby creating new taxes to be paid by the people. Here necessarily arises a growing conflict between classes of individuals and between sections of the country, involving perhaps the integrity of our national obligations. A capitalist whose fortune is in bonds is interested in maintaining a high premium upon gold. Those who have no bonds, and pay this premium in the taxes imposed upon what they consume, have a reverse interest. In time of great depression and distress this antagonism will be carried to the ballot-box, the result of which, with unrestricted franchise, where the poor so far outnumber the rich, can easily be foretold. A return to specie payment, then, not only becomes a commercial but a political necessity. A preponderating majority of our people desire to return without unnecessary delay. Will desire and resolution accomplish this result? It was the desire of banks, individuals, and the nation not to abandon the specie standard, and they resolved and legislated to this end; yet they did abandon specie, in obedience to natural laws and in defiance of their resolutions and their legislation, just as we have continued under a suspension of specie since the cause was removed, and just as we are likely to continue for a long time to come.

This bill, however, again attempts to resolve us into a condition of things much to be desired, but wholly against natural laws. The man who has been landed in the top of a tree by an accident with a balloon must climb or be helped down; he cannot jump to the ground with a whole neck. This bill in substance declares that—

"The United States shall change its present demand notes into new demand notes payable in gold, and that national banks shall possess themselves of these new issues in the place of those now held by them."

Upon these issues the Government and the banks must pay coin upon demand, and the demand would certainly be made for every dollar if there was a profit of a fraction of one per cent. in the exchange. The method by which the bill reaches this end is more circuitous than I have recited, but quite the same in result. I would submit to my friend that it would be a much easier and less expensive operation to restamp the bills now out, "payable in coin after certain dates." The results would be precisely the same as by the course here proposed. Nothing practical can be gained by these successive new issues. If merely reprinting our notes a few times in different phraseology will bring about specie payment I am distinctly in favor of the measure. I have entertained the idea that it was quite a different task.

Honorable gentlemen upon this floor, and many intelligent men throughout the country, seem to think there is something potential in the word government; that a government can manage its finances upon principles different from those which apply to individuals. There can be no greater error. A landed proprietor has become involved, and fails to pay the bills contracted for the improvement of his estate. At first his creditors accept his notes without discount. His second year's crops, however, prove deficient; his expenditures have increased, and he has to provide for accumulated interest. He adds interest to the principal, and is compelled to negotiate a new loan at a large shave. The third year shows the result of his improvident management to be the same as the first, and his credits are gone. Waking up to a sense of his condition he adopts a policy. He says to his creditors, "I have paid out my due bills for three years; on the 1st of next January I resolve to pay money." Is it the resolution made or the condition and circumstances of the maker at which the creditors look?

Of what use is it for this Government to resolve and reresolve that on some particular day it will pay gold? when no measures are adopted to secure the gold with which to pay. Why, then, the Government and the banks owe $1,264,098,976 of demand obligations with but $348,634,883 to pay with, or $915,464,093 demand obligations after their assets are exhausted. The landed proprietor may resolve that he will plant more acres; that he will garner the crops without loss, and will cut off useless expenditures, and thereby increase his resources, restore confidence, and enhance his credit. When a portion of his deferred obligations have been redeemed his future solvency will be immediately assumed. But his mere resolution to pay on a certain day will amount to nothing. Creditors are as good judges of what it takes to pay as is the debtor, whether it be an individual or a Government. Our Government may show by wise legislation that its national domain is to be cultivated by willing hands; that its expenditures will be lessened; that its revenue will be collected; that its currency will remain stable at its present volume; that its circulating demand notes will be the first class of obligations which it will pay; invite gold into circulation by removing the ban upon gold contracts, hold the surplus gold which it may receive until gold and legal tenders approximate in value, and then the holders of its obligations will realize themselves secure, the Government credit will appreciate, and the premium upon gold will rapidly decline.

Then all will desire to sell and none to buy.

Exportation of produce would take the place of bonds and evidences of indebtedness, and the sixty-odd millions of gold shipped the last year would pass into bank reserve, making it a matter of arithmetic how long it would take to accumulate the means with which to liquidate our demand debts. Now, there are no indices pointing to such a day, or legislation tending in this direction. Gold is driven from circulation by being outlawed as money, and very little is in the hands of the people; while what little surplus the Government obtains is sold, so that it has several millions less to-day than it had three years ago. Does this look like a return to specie payment? We are further off in legislative principle, in commercial usage, and in the amount of standard reserve than we were at the end of the war.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not within the power of the printing press to fund our demand obligations into coin notes, and then keep faith on the bond. This brings us to the whole length and breadth of this important matter. My own opinions, previously expressed upon this floor, are strengthened and confirmed by the development of time. Three years ago our honorable Secretary told us that we could resume payments in specie by contracting our currency, seemingly forgetting that we have to raise $126,000,000 in gold from imports wherewith to pay the interest upon our bonds, and that imports and gold revenue would cease by telegraphic orders the very day that we again seriously commence to destroy our currency. Congress, too, was going to make greenbacks equal to gold by merely declaring that they should be. But the Secretary abandoned his destruction policy after two months' trial, warned by the wrecks of individual enterprise and the credit of the Government, which a few days more would have heaped together in irretrievable ruin and hopeless bankruptcy.

The resolutions of Congress advanced the premium upon gold from thirty to fifty per cent., and here we are stuck fast on an ascending grade with machinery impaired and the water getting lower and lower in the boiler. Yet we are periodically instructed that to reach the summit of the hill our finance engineer must put out a part of the fires, and that Congress shall again resolve that at a specific time the train and cargo shall be at the desired resting place. Is this sense, or is it nonsense?

But gentlemen ask, are we ever to return to specie payment without legislation of some kind? I say, no; but by legislation of a different character from any heretofore proposed in this House. We want but little legislation, and that of a nature to prevent us from doing more harm. We must first chock the engine where it is, then enlarge its wheels, increase its fire chambers and steam capacity, and soon we shall see it moving of its own accord—increasing in speed as its momentum overcomes inertia.

It is wrong for me to say that we have made no progress in the right direction. The arguments of the distinguished Senator from Indiana, recently made in the other House of Congress, would not have been listened to thirty months ago, except to secure him the title of defamer of the public credit. Think of it, Mr. Speaker. The war ended in April, 1865, but in January, 1869, four years thereafter, the Senator informs us that in two years and a half more, by July, 1871, we may be able to pay specie on a single class of our obligations. Financiers who in 1865 informed us that we could not resume specie for five years were the subjects of political ostracism and defamation. England, France, Prussia, Russia, and Austria have all traveled the same road which we are traveling, and the history of their struggle is the history which we are again writing afresh. Some of those countries reached the desired end in a quarter of a century; others reached it by utter repudiation, while others, as in the case of Austria, have never reached it to this day. The Corps Legislatif of France first enacted that the French assignats were as good as gold. It was next made a felony on the part of a citizen to receive them at less than their face, and finally a capital offense; yet the end of assignats was the paper-mill, and specie payment was only attained by repudiating the whole thing and starting anew.

The Senator must not congratulate himself that he has solved the problem or found the panacea. He goes too far in one direction and not far enough in another; in what particular I will endeavor to show further on. No person can correctly discuss the difficulties of our financial position who does not pay particular attention to the national banks. The country may be assured upon one point; the Government never can and does not seriously intend to return to specie payment while these banks sustain their present positions. The Government cannot afford the results of forced measures; the banks will not allow it. These banks are now a part of the financial superstructure of the nation, and must be so considered whether we will or not. The wealth of the United States is about twenty-one billion dollars. It is represented by less than seven hundred million dollars of currency, of which the national banks furnish three sevenths, or $300,000,000. Annihilate this circulation without substitution is death. Whatever change is made must be made by the assent of the banks, and they certainly are not necessitated to accept a disadvantageous arrangement. Their interest being adverse to the Government interest must always be taken into our reckoning.

These banks have issued $300,000,000 of currency, the security for which is Government bonds worth in gold at the market price but $244,200,000, showing a deficit of $55,800,000. Now, this deficit, and a respectable twenty per cent. margin beside, must be made good in some way before we can consider the banks as at all separate from the Government, or before there is any use of thinking of specie payment. Here, then, we come to the initial starting point on our road of investigation. I must not be understood as saying that there is but this one difficulty. There are several, and they must be considered together. I must argue this question tersely and concisely to be correctly understood by the country, and must answer those general opinions which form the staple of the public arguments.

First, then, in reply to the opinion that the currency is too large and must be contracted:

On the first of October last our currency stood:

United States legal-tender notes.....	$356,021,073 00
Fractional currency.....	82,933,614 17
National bank notes.....	300,000,000 00
Estimate fifteen dollars gold per capita for one million people in California and Texas.....	15,000,000 00
	703,954,687 17
Deduct legal reserve.....	172,257,000 00
	$531,497,687 17

which, for thirty-eight million people, is $13 97 per capita.

This, I admit, is a greater circulation than was required before the war, and may be greater than under some circumstances would be beneficial. But circumstances affecting currency do not now exist as they then did. A new order of things in this, as well as in other respects, has been created. We have passed through one of those real changes sometimes occurring which produce permanent effects and which can never be obliterated. The discovery of gold in California in 1848, and in Australia a little later, added a permanent increase to the circulating medium of the world; affecting the relative price of every article of property, from a paper of pins to a cotton plantation. Property changed hands at the new prices, and debts were created at those prices, and unless that indebtedness could be wiped out values never could and never will return to those current prior to those periods.

Here was a real, positive, perpetual change to be recognized hereafter in the values of commodities throughout all time. So now we have again made a done file, absolute change in our condition which can never be obliterated while time lasts. The values of all species of property expanded with the expansion of our currency through four years of memorable and intense speculation, until new debts, many of them owing abroad, have been created, a mounting to the terrific sum of $6,000,000,000—at least one quarter the total assets of the nation. This ponderous load cannot be floated or carried upon the same financial superstructure that a quarter of this indebtedness could have been. It certainly never can be paid in gold. It rests upon confidence. It requires nimble circulation, immense resources, and expanding population to keep this confidence secure. Bring the property of the country, as I shall hereafter show, down to the standard of the gold which we have or may forever be able to obtain, leaving this load of indebtedness at its face, and all the convulsions which have ever overtaken the human race since the dawn of civilization would dwarf in proportion and pale in insignificance compared to the shock which would paralyze the institutions of man by such a course. We have already tried contraction twice and have reached that point where the currency underlies indebtedness, and we cannot pursue it further without shattering the financial elements which surround us. We must wait the rising tide of accumulating forces to overtake us in our stranded position and float us off into safe waters. This need not take an interminable time. Our country is rich, fertile, and versatile in its resources. It increases in population at the rate of three per cent. per annum and in wealth at double this ratio, and it can, within five to ten years, overcome all the obstacles which now surround us, serious as they are.

Before the war (1860) our currency stood:

Gold (estimated).....	$200,000,000
Bank notes.....	207,000,000
	407,000,000
Less in Treasury.....	91,000,000
	$316,000,000

which, for thirty-one million people, was $10 20 per capita.

Aside from the effects of the debts we have created, the financial habits of the people have been greatly changed. At that date commercial transactions were mostly upon long time; now they are principally for cash or upon short time. Then currency could not be used without loss beyond the State in which it was issued, and all debts at a distance were paid by bills of exchange; now both Treasury and national bank notes form a constant source of remittance through express companies and otherwise. Then in large sections of the country the people carried but little currency about them; now the amount in the hands of the masses is very considerable. Then our country was confined to States bordering the Mississippi; now an immense scattered population carry our currency into the teeming valleys and mountain passes of new Territories. Then four millions of slave population required no currency; now they are the depositors and dispensers of their own earnings, and a large additional currency is required for these people. Then our population was thirty-one millions; now it is thirty-eight millions, making it necessary to furnish currency for some seven millions more people. Then all articles exchanged by the people which come through the custom-house required but about one half the currency which will forever hereafter be required. Then the volume of the general business of the country was not one quarter it now is. The New York clearing-house shows the average business per day in that city to have been—

In 1856.....	$22,000,000
In 1857.....	27,000,000
In 1858.....	15,000,000
In 1859.....	21,000,000
In 1860.....	23,000,000
In 1865.....	34,000,000
In 1866.....	33,000,000
In 1867.....	33,000,000
In 1868.....	34,000,000

These facts are ample to prove that we require a much larger per capita circulation than we did ten years ago.

Let us see how this compares with other countries. In 1864, upon the same basis, France had—

Gold.....	$700,000,000
Bank notes.....	252,000,000
	952,000,000
Less Treasury reserve.....	250,000,000
	$697,000,000 which is, for thirty-eight million people, $18 34 per capita.

—England had—

Gold.....	$400,000,000
Bank notes.....	196,000,000
	596,000,000
Less Treasury reserve.....	151,000,000
	$465,000,000 which is, for thirty million people, $15 50 per capita.

To recapitulate—

England's circulation per capita is.....	$15 50
France's circulation per capita is.....	18 34
United States.....	13 97

Will any one deny that the people of the United States require less proportionate currency than do the people of England and France? I understand that civilization tends to the utilization of credit and to a reduction in the pro rata of circulation. I realize that population is not an exact basis for comparison; yet I contend that our frontier population, our freedmen, &c., offset the poorer classes of England and France, while the liberality and extravagance of the American middle classes render a larger amount of ready money necessary than of any other nation. I therefore arrive at the positive conclusion that our circulation is not too large. The great consideration is how to change the character, not the amount, of our circulating medium from an irredeemable paper basis to a redeemable gold basis without inaugurating that period of suffering and depression which involves citizen and Government alike.

But circumstances exist demonstrating that we must accept the present currency as at the proper amount, and that we cannot contract its volume without the most disastrous results. The indebtedness of the General Government, States, municipalities, corporations, and individuals is believed to be about seven thousand million dollars. The total property of the country is assessed at $21,000,000,000. Our currency, including the bank reserve, is about seven hundred millions. Here we find that we have about one third as much indebtedness as we have property, and less than three per cent. of circulation to represent it all. The contraction of the currency will disturb the value of property, but it will not lessen our debts. A man to-day has $20,000 worth of property and owes $10,000. The currency is arbitrarily reduced, property depreciates, his debt becomes due, money is not obtainable, his property is sold to pay it, and the whole is absorbed to pay a debt of half the amount.

If all debts were equally distributed and were owing among ourselves it would not work unmitigated evil to reduce the value of our property by destroying the currency upon which it rests. But this is always impossible. Now, if we permanently retire $100,000,000, one seventh of our currency, we reduce the value of our property $3,000,000,000; but the debts are still $8,000,000,000. If we cut our currency down one half, or $350,000,000, it reduces our property to about ten thousand million dollars. Still our debts are $8,000,000,000, or we might safely say that our debts exceed our assets, and neither the Government, States, corporations, or individuals could collect or pay anything. All would become bankrupt together. With confidence gone it is just as hard for currency to represent half the present values as it is to sustain them where they are. There is absolutely no limit to the decline in values which panic and want of confidence will produce. One hundred dollars would shrink to two dollars, $1,000 to twenty, to reach the point where currency would represent property dollar for dollar. The total value of our property at assessment prices is two to three per cent. money and ninety-seven to ninety-eight per cent. confidence.

The foregoing are the reasons why currency cannot again be contracted. Values and indebtedness have accommodated themselves to the existing amount, and the margin for contingencies capable of being retired has already been withdrawn. The debtor side of the account is now fixed and unchangeable except as we can pay off our indebtedness. Until we can discover some way to do this we must find some other method to remedy our mistakes than by destroying our circulating medium. What amount would you have destroyed? One hundred millions, two, or four? Why a part, and not the whole? Supposing the amount we now use was gold instead of paper. Would we feel that we had too much of it? Why, sir, the slight contraction of loans by the national banks four times a year, to make a respectable showing in their quarterly returns, stagnates business, creates great depression in values, and doubles the rates of interest in all the commercial centers.

The mere temporary locking up of only twelve millions of currency in New York for twenty days in November last sent a paralytic chill throughout the length and breadth of the land. It caused a decline of four per cent. on Government bonds in two days; it stopped vessels from loading produce on the line of the lakes, reduced the price of wheat twenty-five cents a bushel, of cotton three cents per pound; it failed forty-five firms in a single western city, almost annihilated credit, raised the rate of interest to one quarter and a half per cent. a day, ninety to one hundred and eighty per cent. per annum in the city of New York, and would have broken several national banks had not other institutions been able to help them. This, Mr. Speaker, is an example of what a forced reduction of the currency will produce. Yet this locking up was known to be but a stock jobbing affair, and was devoid of fear or panic. It shows us how near the edge of a precipice we are treading.

If I have now shown that by reason of a largely increased indebtedness, created for property at the high prices which an inflated currency produced, we can never return to the per capita of circulating medium which we required in 1860, or to that required in 1848, and that now our circulation is not too large, I am safe in assuring the commercial community that a return to specie payment will never again be attempted by the Government by a contraction of the currency; notwithstanding the Secretary says, "this is the only way in which it can be done," and notwithstanding the Comptroller of the Currency says, "Congress can, whenever it pleases, restore the credit of the nation by directing the payment of $338,000,000, promises to pay," meaning the retiring of the $338,000,000 legal tenders.

I say that the Government will not, in the light of past experience, again attempt any such suicide. Retiring currency now means pinching the merchants and destruction of trade. Imports stopped, cessation of gold revenue follows, and then, gentlemen, what becomes of the interest on the national debt? Do you mean to repudiate these pledges of the nation's honor? If so, try this experiment: exhaust your $60,000,000 now in the Treasury and you will convert a present fear into a future certainty. You increased your indebtedness $3,000,000 a month for the past twelve months, or $35,625,102 for the year; your customs revenue fell off $12,000,000 in gold, and your internal revenue $75,000,000 in currency. Do not now show to the world your inability to provide interest upon the bonds which you have been selling in Europe in place of wheat and cotton. I believe all this can be avoided in a simple, concise, and easy manner, although the honorable Secretary's apprehensions are excited when he says:

"A nation that owes largely must have its own people for creditors. If it does not the debt will be a dead weight upon its industry, and will be quite likely to force it into bankruptcy."

As to the time when this nation can resume specie payment no man can say. With short crops in Europe and exceedingly favorable circumstances at home, it may be within four years. Under other circumstances not extremely adverse, it is more likely to be ten years; under circumstances and legislation such as at present exist, never. England struggled for twenty-six years in her efforts to resume specie payment, and passed on the average a bill each two years endeavoring to effect the object.

After a generation of men had passed away Parliament recognized the fact that the Government could not exist if it destroyed the people; and it was on the fourteenth legislative enactment, after intense financial suffering, depression of industry, and a general impoverishment of the people, that we find England in 1823 again paying gold, although she had actually increased her paper circulation from $53,650,000 in 1796, the year before suspension, to $91,960,000 when she resumed, showing the remarkable fact in contradiction of all we now hear said, that she resumed paying specie on $38,310,000 more paper currency than she had the year before she suspended; an actual increase of seventy per cent. of circulation, while her population increased but fifty per cent., being a per capita increase of twenty-five per cent. in circulation!

Obstinately the laws of nature will have their own way. Whenever England undertook to deprive the people of circulation the people could not pay taxes, though England's condition at that time was more favorable than is ours now, for she owed her debt at home, and the interest which she disbursed was allowed to remain among her people.

We are certainly not making progress at present. Aside from the mere funding of a portion of our floating debt we are not in as good condition as we were thirty months ago. Our demand indebtedness is contracted to be paid in gold some time, and yet the surplus gold received by the Government is sold like so much old iron and the proceeds taken to pay our current expenses. Within the last four quarters the Secretary sold $32,409,550, and in so doing reduced the balance on hand $6,147,147. Had no gold been sold we should have accumulated $26,262,402 66, a little nucleus around which confidence would have commenced to cluster.

The Government owes of demand obligations.....	$409,151,898
Less cash in Treasury.....	113,873,019
	295,278,879

The banks liabilities are.....	$854,947,078
Less gold.....	$11,749,444
Less legal reserve
Included in Government demand obligations.....	223,012,420
	234,761,864
	610,185,214

Total demand obligations..... $915,464,093

If the financial condition of the country was in a usual normal state about three hundred million dollars of gold would float this amount of demand indebtedness. But while there is a fraction of one per cent. difference between the price of currency and gold, it will require dollar for dollar to do it. It will not answer to pay a portion of these obligations and then fail on the remainder. With gold exhausted and this confession of weakness existing the premium would again run up to a fearful point. The country requires that prices should be steady as well as moderate. The effort must be fundamentally right, sustained by practical principles calculated to give confidence to capitalists. It will not answer to depreciate the price of gold to ten per cent. upon any fallacious basis, and then invite $100,000,000 of our European bonds back upon us at 90 in gold which originally cost the holders 50. A mistake on our part will surely produce this result. We cannot, therefore, at this time name any day when we can commence to pay specie.

If our bonds were worth 100 in gold, thereby insuring the solvency of the national bank circulation, we could view this subject differently; but with the circulating medium of the country full of panic and the most sensitive of its assets we must advance cautiously. With our twenty year bonds, upon which half our circulating medium is based, selling at 72, or eighteen per cent. less than enough to redeem one of these bills, we must make all the conditions sure before fixing a period when we will resume specie payments.

It is within the power of the banks to remove the greatest difficulty which besets the nation, and they can well afford to exercise this power. They have been paying the investors as no class of institutions ever did pay capital. Although fifty-five of these banks have refused to answer a resolution of this House, giving the amount of their earnings, yet we find they have been dividing an average of full fifteen per cent., and have on hand an extra five and a half per cent. for each year of their existence in the shape of an undivided sinking fund. In four years they have accumulated the enormous sinking fund of $114,091,594. A portion of this amount, $36,995,761, is called undivided earnings. These banks have an inadequate security of $55,200,000 to make good their circulation. If they will consent to an arrangement with the Government by which this sinking fund can be pledged as additional security for their circulation they need not imperil its final control by themselves, and will create a confidence which no other act can do. But they will not do this. Their interest is adverse to the interest of the Government. They now convert the gold received for interest upon their bonds at a profit of from seven to eight million dollars annually, which they would not receive if gold was par. Several beneficial changes can and ought to be made in the banking system; but I look upon it as not likely to be done, and I pass this point to state what the Government can and ought to do.

1. Legalize gold contracts.
 2. Prohibit the sale of gold.
 3. Compel the banks to retain the gold received as interest upon bonds to use as legal reserve in place of legal tenders, the Government destroying the amount of legal tenders which the gold will cancel at the current premium.
 4. Compel the national banks to deposit additional security for their circulation.
 5. Devote the surplus of its gold beyond $30,000,000 to retiring legal tenders as above indicated.
 6. Fix the volume of currency as it now exists, that it shall not be increased or decreased except by gold substitution, dollar for dollar.
 7. Declare that its legal-tender notes shall be the first class of obligations which it will pay.
 8. Fund a portion of our five-twenty bonds now held in Europe into a five per cent. gold bond, principal and interest payable in London. The effect of this legislation would be—
- First.* Gold would be invited from its hiding places—would flow from abroad into our banks and clearing-houses as money, and not into storehouses as merchandise.
- Second.* The Government must retain gold to be enabled to pay gold.
- Third.* The national banks would then assist rather than retard a return to specie payment.
- Fourth.* The currency of the country would be made perfectly secure and would be divested of all panic feature, the principal disturbing element and fear of business men at the present time.
- Fifth.* Demand obligations, Treasury notes being destroyed as rapidly as the same is replaced by gold at the current premium of gold at the date—it not only lessens their amount and enhances the value of the remainder, but it gradually puts gold in circulation and does not change the amount of our circulating medium in any way.
- Sixth.* The country would then know definitely the policy of the Government as to the volume of its circulation, thereby stimulating proper investment and regulating interest, which is now impossible.

Seventh. Declaring that these demand notes shall be the first class of obligations to be paid by the Government their value would be increased and the premium upon gold proportionately reduced.

Eighth. Some eight hundred million dollars of our bonds are supposed to be owned abroad. In panic time they can be so used as to draw the entire gold from the country. A bond, principal and interest payable abroad, would tend to prevent this result.

All of the above tend to one general result, as the tilling of the soil, the sowing of seed, and garnering the crops tend to enriching the husbandman. This is all the legislation which is now admissible respecting specie payments. A mere declaration upon the subject amounts to nothing. The evidences of our ability to collect in and pay out gold is the declaration which tends to confidence. Let these changes be made—holders of gold see demonstrated to a certainty that the premium must decline, the profit in holding gold ceases, and all become sellers.

Our legal-tender currency should be dispensed with as rapidly as we can replace it with something better, but no faster. The public evidently estimate that it will require from six to eight years to redeem these notes, the thirty-five per cent. discount at which they now stand being represented by interest at five per cent. for seven years. Three years ago the time was supposed to be nearer. The discount, as shown in the price of gold, was correspondingly less. Let it be demonstrated that they can be paid sooner than this and the premium upon gold will decline in proportion. It is impossible to suppose that if a note payable at a fixed date and drawing six per cent. interest is selling at 72, that an irredeemable note drawing no interest will sell for more, barring the advantage the latter has in being circulating medium.

By the course here indicated and sustained by fair legislation, by encouragement of production in the southern States, the collection of the revenue and an economical administration of affairs, we shall place ourselves in a position to fund our long obligations at lower interest, to pay our demand obligations within reasonable time, and to so reduce the premium upon gold as to start our ships upon the stocks, put the wheels of commerce in motion, give impetus to all kinds of enterprise, and again sail out upon the sea of future prosperity without that shock, shrinkage, bankruptcy, and distress which any violent measures will surely produce.

The Government can accumulate about twenty-five million dollars of gold per annum under its present tariff. With the premium of gold largely reduced we shall ship enough produce to Europe to enable the people to retain from twenty five to fifty million dollars more, which is now shipped abroad. This will give us a sinking fund of, say, $50,000,000 per annum, which in four years will have annihilated $200,000,000 of these demands. The $200,000,000 is still retained with demands reduced from $900,000,000 to $700,000,000. In six years our demands will be but $600,000,000, nearly all mercantile credit, and $300,000,000 of coin to float it. More than enough. This is something like the manner and something like the time in which this problem is to be worked out.

As to exact accumulations, they will vary as to time from many seen and unseen causes. The general principles of this plan cannot fail. They offer to the creditor all the security in available form which the nation can collect together, not only security as to the correct appropriation of what it has, but the additional security that it will not impoverish the people and cut off revenue by taking from them their circulating medium and leaving their debts like ghostly skeletons leaning against their doors.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, in the recent terrible conflict, in which the life of the nation was threatened and assailed by treason and rebellion, the contest was carried on and the victory won at a fearful cost. No toil was counted too great, no hardship too severe, no sorrow too keen—all were nobly endured. The richest blood and the costliest treasure were freely offered in untold and uncounted measure that freedom might triumph—that the Republic might live. And the sacrifice, though costly and rare, was not in vain; for the unity and integrity of the Republic were triumphantly maintained and secured.

The experiences of the war, sad and bitter as they often were, and the magnitude and rapidity of the operations of the Government in providing for and conducting the gigantic contest, aroused and stimulated the capacities and energies of the people to a wonderful degree. The necessities and emergencies of the military service not only discovered and developed the latent and dormant capabilities and resources of the country, crowding and stimulating every branch of productive industry, bringing every laborer and every artisan into contributive activity, but they stimulated inventive genius, developed enterprise, enlarged trade, created new industries, opened new markets, and infused new life and unwonted vigor into every department of business and every branch of industry.

The welcome but somewhat abrupt close of the war found this enlarged capacity and quickened energy of the people ready and eager to undertake new enterprises, to open new territory and develop new industries, seeking and asking only the protecting and fostering care of the Government, and that it should furnish them with a currency or circulating medium stable and uniform, in which to transact their business and conduct their enterprises. The questions of how a paper currency should be supplied that should be adequate in volume to the business requirements of the country—uniform in its value, and convertible into gold—the accepted standard of money value—and how and when and at what rate of interest the public debt should be funded or paid, were then, as they are now, urgent questions affecting intimately and vitally the growth and development of the country and the material interests and prosperity of the whole people. But the strange infatuation which induced the leaders of public sentiment in the rebellious States, under the instigation and encouragement of a recreant Executive, to reject the offered terms of restoration to the Union and to the rights and privileges of representation, and the unfortunate antagonism which thereupon arose between the legislative, and executive branches of the Government, brought the question of reconstruction into such prominence as, with its attendant incidents, to absorb the attention of Congress and to a considerable degree the thoughts of the people.

Following close upon reconstruction and related measures and proceedings, and intimately connected with them, came the recent presidential election, with its earnest and thorough discussions and exciting issues. From these causes principally the solution and adjustment of the great questions of debt and currency have thus far been deferred. But happily reconstruction is substantially accomplished. Most of the lately rebellious States have organized State governments in conformity with the Federal Constitution, are restored to the rights and responsibilities of representation, and are now contributing in no small degree to the revenues of the General Government. Happily, too, the recent presidential election has removed one obstacle and embarrassment to a present consideration and an honest and honorable adjustment of these questions. It was thought and urged by some and feared by others that the people, especially the laboring classes, in view of the magnitude of the national debt and the burden of taxation necessary to be borne to meet the interest upon it and provide for its ultimate and complete payment, might be persuaded, or possibly deceived, under cover of some legal quibble or cunning evasion, into declaring in favor of the partial or entire repudiation of their own debt—a debt incurred by themselves in the defense of the high and sacred cause of human liberty and for the preservation and perpetuation of free government.

To the lasting praise of the American nation, and in full vindication and proof of the right and the ability of the people to govern themselves, the loyal and true-hearted masses, rejecting the temptation and scorning the subterfuge, pronounced most emphatically in favor of paying to the uttermost every national obligation with no violation or evasion of the spirit of the laws under which the debt was incurred. In this connection permit me briefly to quote from a letter recently received from a brave and gallant soldier of my own State, one who periled his life and his all for the unity and honor of the nation, as illustrative of the views and sentiments of the grand army of those who dared and suffered that the nation might live. He writes: "Permit me to urge you to use your utmost endeavors to prevent the least taint of repudiation of any kind, direct or indirect, greenback or any other form, from attaching to our national credit. Those of us who served in the Army served for the reputation as well as the life of the nation; for the latter is worth nothing without the former." That is the sentiment that actuated and governed the true soldiers of the Republic, and it is the sentiment that now moves and controls the loyal masses of the people. The whole debt must be fully and honestly paid according to the full spirit in which it was contracted.

With the problem of reconstruction practically solved; with order and tranquility assured through all our borders by the election of a President pledged to peace, and in the light of a fresh and emphatic verdict of the people in favor of the full payment of every national obligation, we are brought to a new consideration of those great questions pressing for solution. As no sound or permanent adjustment of the national debt as to its time, mode, and rate, of payment can be reached until we determine in what and by what it is to be measured or valued, the question of currency, its proper volume and real value, precedes and underlies that of debt, and will therefore be principally considered.

It is an admitted fact that the highest and best form for a circulating medium or material for exchange of values which the study and experience of the world has yet produced is bills of credit or paper money resting upon such a basis and reserve fund of gold or real money as inspires and commands confidence in its value and convertibility.

But it must be conceded that while we have a large and, perhaps for the present, adequate volume of paper money, and while in many of its qualities and functions it is the best and most desirable currency the country has ever had, yet by reason of the large admixture of legal-tender notes forced into and held in circulation by the Government at an arbitrary and unreal standard of value, the whole volume is, in its vital and essential quality of value, as measured by the only real and accepted standard of gold or coin money, greatly depreciated and debased. Indeed, but for the hope and expectation that by the power which first undervalued the currency and still holds it depreciated the cause of its depreciation would be removed, and a real coin value and convertibility imparted to it, it would continue to decrease in value and soon become utterly worthless; and the longer the hope is deferred and the expectation disappointed the greater will the depreciation be. It is even more than probable that if the Government do not at an early day adopt some sound and comprehensive plan which shall relieve or take off the depression which it has forced upon the currency further and material depreciation will take place, or, in common parlance, the premium on gold will be higher. With a further decline in the value of the currency must come great fluctuations in merchandise, depression in trade, stagnation in all branches of manufacturing industry, reduced time or no employment for labor, and ending possibly in financial disaster and general bankruptcy.

We have spoken of the Government as having occasioned the existing depreciation in the currency, as responsible for its continuance, and as the only power that can furnish relief and bring it to a real and coin value. Let us consider briefly how this is. The first outbreak of civil war necessitated vast expenditures of money in organizing, arming, and equipping a large army. With no considerable balance in the Treasury the Government appealed to the banks for assistance, and the associated banks of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia promptly and generously met the emergency and loaned it $150,000,000.

But the rising proportions and threatening aspect of the conflict soon forced the conviction that no arrangement with the banks could safely be so extended and enlarged as to meet the necessities of the public service, which had already reached more than a million dollars a day, and both the Government and all the banks were driven to a suspension of specie payments as early as December, 1861.

To carry on the immense operations of the war resort was then had to loans. But as the supply of gold and silver was entirely inadequate to the payment of the loans authorized, and inasmuch as the notes of the existing banks were too insecure and too unequal in value, especially since relieved from all obligation of payment in specie, the necessity arose of making the large and immediate issue of $150,000,000 of United States notes and of forcing upon them the quality of legal tender. These legal-tender notes so issued were then regarded only as a temporary loan, and a forced circulation was given them to meet a great emergency of national danger. Nothing else occasioned them, and nothing else justified them. And in proof that they were not intended to form a permanent currency, but were acknowledged as a debt which the United States were obligated and proposed some time to pay, it was provided that they should be convertible at the option of the holder into an equal amount of bonds of the United States bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum in coin, payable semi-annually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after five years, and payable twenty years from the date thereof.

In less than six months from the date of the first issue of legal-tender notes a second of like amount was found necessary. These, too, were acknowledged as a debt, and carried the privilege of conversion at the option of the holder into the same six per cent. coin interest bonds, known as the five-twenties, with the pleasant and encouraging proviso that the Secretary of the Treasury might, in his discretion, pay them in coin instead of exchanging them for the bonds named. But the expenditures for the military and naval service still increased rapidly and formidably, and in about eight months more another and pressing demand for money was made, and a third issue of legal tenders was authorized; but owing to the uncertain duration and issue of the conflict, and the possible requirement of a yet further issue of notes, the privilege of exchange was withheld. It was even thought necessary to substantially repeal the provision for conversion accorded to the first two issues, by limiting the right of exchange within a short and impracticable period.

A fearful and prolonged assault upon the nation's life, and the desperate straits to which the Government was reduced to provide the power and means to resist and overthrow it, were alone the occasion and justification of not only imposing a great debt upon the country, but of so undervaluing and depreciating a very considerable portion of it as that thereby the whole debt was depreciated and the whole currency made unstable and irredeemable in real money. It is because of these forced loans so necessitated, because of the new and debased paper standard by which they are measured, because they are long overdue and bear no interest, and because the Government neglects and therefore practically refuses to provide for their conversion or payment, that we encounter the existing difficulties and embarrassments in relation to funding the national debt and lowering the rate of interest upon it, and also that the country is suffering the great and uncertain losses to trade and industry incident to an unreliable and irredeemable paper currency.

In this view of our condition the vital questions concerning the important subjects of finance and currency seem to be these: how and when shall the Government pay or withdraw their long overdue notes, which have been forced into circulation to the great injury and detriment of the whole currency and consequent weakening and depreciation of all the Government securities? and how, during and by this retirement of legal-tender notes—by payment or funding shall the country, without shock or material disturbance to its business, its enterprise, or its industrial pursuits, be supplied with a currency adequate in volume to its wants and necessities, properly located and distributed to meet the requirements of business in all portions of the Union, even and uniform in value, and therefore current in all parts of the land, and based upon coin, the only true and accepted standard for the issue of paper money? If these questions can be answered, these problems solved, and a measure adopted which shall accomplish or look surely to the accomplishment of these ends, it will, I think, meet most, if not all, the difficulties pertaining to debt and currency that governmental action can now remove. All else must be left to the labor and the skill, the activity and the enterprise of the people, guarded and stimulated by that protection of rights and fostering of interests which it is the object, as it is the first duty, of a free Government to secure to its citizens.

I shall venture, then, to suggest and briefly to discuss a plan which seems to me better calculated to accomplish the ends proposed—more simple in form, more feasible in its provisions, and with promise of earlier fulfillment than some, at least, of the plans already submitted. Before proceeding, however, to do this, I wish to make brief allusion and consider some objections to the bill of the honorable gentleman from Maine, [Mr. LYNCH], entitled "A bill to provide for the gradual resumption of specie payments," now before the House as a special order, and also to the bill recently introduced in the Senate by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] entitled "A bill to provide for the redemption in coin of the United States notes and fractional currency and requiring the national banks to redeem their notes in coin." Both these bills assume the necessity of the withdrawal of the legal-tender notes as a prerequisite and essential condition to restoring and establishing the credit of the Government. They insist upon the payment, near or remote, of its overdue and protested notes, in order thereby to restore the currency and the obligations of the Government to the true constitutional and real standard of coin value. In so far as they recognize this prime and urgent necessity they command assent.

But in the proposed measure and mode of accomplishing this end they are objectionable if not inadmissible. For though they both provide, in differing modes and at different times, for beginning the payment of the legal-tender notes in coin, they neither of them provide, nor can they assure from the probable coin resources of the Government, full coin payment for the entire amount of the notes at the dates named for their redemption. The coin resources of the Government consist in duties upon imports. These are not and cannot wisely be made sufficient, in excess of existing coin obligations, to meet the contingency of a presentation upon the days named of nearly the entire amount of legal-tender notes.

It is true that in the arguments of both the honorable gentlemen referred to they assume and reason that upon declaration of purpose to pay, strengthened by preparation for actual partial payment, the confidence of the holders of a part of the notes will become so strong and abiding in the purpose and ability of the Government to pay all the notes that this undefined and unascertainable portion of note holders will not present them for payment. Now, granting for the moment that so improbable a circumstance should occur as that doubt and a desire to realize should actuate an uncertain but smaller portion to demand payment, and that "public confidence" should inspire the other and larger portion to defer the presentation of their notes for redemption, it must yet be remembered that the unpaid portion will still be constantly threatening the Treasury, and liable, upon any sudden revolution in trade or artificial stringency in the money market, to demand redemption at an unexpected and perhaps unguarded moment, and thereby force a protest upon the Treasury and dishonor and terrible disaster upon the country.

It must not be forgotten that the American Government has come through great tribulation and sorrow, through fearful suffering and cost, to its present rank as a first-class Power among the nations of the earth. Neither should it be forgotten that during our great struggle for national unity and integrity powerful leaders in powerful Governments, jealous of the rising power of the young Republic, and fearful of the reflex influence of successful and strengthened free government upon decaying monarchical and imperial Governments, not only desired and predicted our failure, but conspired at our downfall and conspired for our dissolution. They winked at and permitted the fitting out of piratical cruisers to cripple and scatter our commerce and destroy our blockades of rebellious ports; and they forced a monarchy upon a neighboring but feeble republic, that they might both furnish supplies to rebels and overawe us by its pretentious pomp and power.

But the Republic still lives, stronger and grander in its power and prestige than ever before. Its power is acknowledged, and it fears no armed force from within or from without. Its faith and its credit must now be strengthened and established. They are dear to the people and must not be put in jeopardy. Our weak and assailable point is the national credit, and its weakness consists not in the aggregate of the national indebtedness, large as it is—for in comparison with our resources, with our domain continental in area and rich in its capacity and destiny of growth and development, and with all our wealth of industry and skill and enterprise the debt is trifling and insignificant—but our present weakness and danger lies in the largeness of our overdue and demand debt, which, whenever the Government promises and returns to real payment, is wholly due and presentable. And it may well be feared that if when the day arrives in which we shall have promised to redeem we have not made full and adequate provision for complete payment we may find that foreign and designing hatred and jealousy, strengthened with foreign capital and aided possibly by unpatriotic and selfish speculators and stock-gamblers in our own country, may not only drain our Treasury of the insufficient coin we have stored, but thereby force us to national protest; that thus they may at least glory in and fatten upon our financial disaster.

It must be remembered, too, that we have a large time debt outstanding represented by Government bonds, which respond quickly and sensitively to everything that touches or affects the ability, the faith, or the credit of the Government. Now, it would be an easy and not untempting thing for either foreign or home capital, moved only by a sordid desire for gain, to combine at any favorable moment for the purchasing and presenting of "greenbacks" when the coin supplies in the Treasury might be insufficient to redeem them, and with the cry of "greenbacks protested," "resumption of specie payments a failure," run down the market value of Government bonds at a rapid and fearful rate, that they might, by buying them in at a greatly reduced price, reap a rich harvest from our folly and disgrace. We, all of us, I think, witnessed too many instances during the war of the power and willingness of unpatriotic and shameless men to "operate," as it is mildly termed, in public securities, to the great embarrassment and loss of the Government to risk any such contingency. We cannot safely trust them. But the honorable gentlemen referred to, notwithstanding their apparent confidence in the argument of "public confidence," and justly apprehensive that if one portion of the holders of legal-tenders or coin notes might wish to realize gold the other portion might be of the same mind, and thus the Treasury be unable to meet the united demand, have each aimed to guard the Treasury against such a probable emergency.

The one, [Mr. LYNCH,] provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may—

"Purchase at any time coin requisite to enable him to redeem such [coin] notes, and in payment therefor he may at his discretion issue, to an amount not exceeding $50,000,000, bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, payable in not more than forty years and redeemable after five years, with interest payable semi-annually in coin at a rate not more than six per cent. per annum, or if payable in currency at a rate not exceeding seven and three tenths per cent. per annum."

The other, [Senator MORTON,] requires first, in the second section of his bill—

"That on and after the 1st day of July, 1871, the Treasurer of the United States shall pay in coin at the Treasury of the United States, at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and at such other points as may be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, all United States notes and fractional currency that may be presented for redemption."

And then provides—

"That the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to negotiate and sell bonds of the United States, to be due in thirty years and redeemable by the Government at its pleasure after ten years, bearing interest at the rate of [—] per cent., principal and interest payable in gold, to such an amount as may be necessary to carry into operation the provisions of the second section of the act."

Now, objection lies first and mainly, I think, to the manner in which the coin necessary for the purposes named is to be obtained. For, according to the views already submitted, if the United States notes in the one case, or the coin notes, which are to be their substitutes, in the other case, are to be paid in coin under the specific pledge and promise of the Government at any fixed time, near or remote, then, we hold that nothing short of a full and adequate supply for the redemption of all the notes at the times named should be provided for and secured. But we do object most decidedly to the mode in which in both bills this end is sought to be accomplished. We protest most earnestly against conferring upon any Secretary of the Treasury, whoever he may be or however wise and pure he may be, any such wide discretion, such unlimited power. Sir, the day for secrecy and for unbounded powers in the control and management of the financial operations of the Government is passed, and the people want no more of it. The exigencies of a vast and uncertain war may have necessitated and justified such power and discretion, though it is at least questionable if more certainty and publicity in regard to the required or contemplated movements and operations of the Treasury might not have left us in a less difficult and embarrassing condition than we now find ourselves.

Fortunately, however, those trying times are past, and the people are entitled and demand to know definitely what the financial measures and Treasury operations of the Government are to be. If gold is to be purchased they want to know what for, when, and to what amount. If a loan is to be negotiated they have a right to know when, and at what rate, and to what extent, and to the privilege of taking it upon equal terms. Now, the bill of the honorable gentleman from Maine, in forgetfulness of this right and privilege of the people, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase, without limitation of time, place, or rate, the coin requisite in his judgment, of course, to enable him to redeem the proposed coin notes. He is unrestrained as to the amount he may purchase, the rate he may pay for it, and the time when the purchase may be made. The amount may be excessive, the rate exorbitant, the time ill-timed and disastrous, for there is no limitation. He is then authorized to issue, "in his discretion," in payment of the gold so purchased, bonds of the United States to an amount not exceeding $50,000,000, and at a rate of coin interest not exceeding six per cent., or of currency interest not exceeding seven and three tenths per cent. per annum.

Here, too, the amount, within the limit of $50,000,000, is both unknown and unfixed, and the time and mode of the negotiations and the commissions, if any, that may be allowed are all left to the judgment and discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such powers are too great and too unreserved, and are in our view alike objectionable and inadmissible. But the Senator from Indiana, with even less thought for guarding the rights and privileges of the people, confers upon the Secretary of the Treasury an unrestrained and consequently far more objectionable power and discretion; for no restriction is placed upon the amount of the bonds he may, according to his private judgment, negotiate and sell, except the utmost limit of United States notes and fractional currency outstanding—no provision is made to restrain him as to the manner of sale, whether by public bid or secret negotiation; he is not even limited to a par value sale. From aught that appears in the bill he may sell them in any way he likes, in such amounts or parcels as he likes, at any time he likes, at any rate he likes. No "military necessity" now exists, and certainly no financial necessity can justify or require the granting of such full war powers.

Another serious if not fatal objection to the bills referred to is that they both not only involve, if they do not necessitate, an undefined and undeterminable contraction of the currency, but they neither of them provide a remedy for such a disaster. While they both contemplate and aim to provide for the payment of the legal tender notes as a prerequisite to the resumption of specie payments, they both fail or neglect to provide for a substitute paper currency.

The bill before the House provides for calling in the United States notes and issuing in their stead coin notes, payable on demand after one year from date, which may be reissued for periods of less than one year, but not less than three months. When this time of extension has fully expired, and the coin notes are really due, it is contemplated that some portion of them at least will demand payment; and authority is therefore conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury to use any unappropriated coin on hand, and to purchase $50,000,000 more, with which to redeem the notes so expected to be presented.

Now, without stopping to inquire what is to become of the remaining coin notes which the gold on hand and to be purchased will not redeem, or to consider whether the coin notes will acquire such a gold value as to induce their withdrawal from circulation and the hoarding of them for a gold premium, it is manifest that the volume of paper money will be reduced to the extent that the coin on hand and purchased will retire coin notes. How is this loss or reduction in volume of paper currency to be supplied? The Senate bill referred to first provides for the payment in coin at a time fixed of all United States notes that may be presented for payment; next provides by an issue of bonds for procuring coin sufficient to pay the entire amount of such notes; and then, in section six, declares:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury may cause so many of the United States notes that may be redeemed under the provisions of this act to be canceled as may in his judgment be necessary to the proper limitation of the currency."

It is not enough that the Secretary is to be invested with an unlimited power and discretion in the negotiation and sale of more than three hundred millions of gold bonds; but by the section just quoted he is to determine according to his simple will and judgment the great question of what shall be the volume of currency necessary and desirable to carry forward the grand and far-reaching enterprises—the rising and rapidly expanding industries of the American people—and with autocratic sway to govern and control the vast aggregate of the business of the whole country. The enlightened experience and clear judgment of the people have pronounced decidedly against any contraction of the currency, and Congress, in conformity with this decision, has emphatically forbidden any further reduction of the volume of legal tenders. It is acknowledged, too, that nothing is more necessary or vital to the present business wants of the country than steadiness and sufficiency in the volume of the paper currency. Have the people reversed their judgment, and is Congress now prepared to refer the decision of so important a question, the determination of so essential a requirement, to the erring and possibly biased, if not corrupted judgment of any one man? The American people will not consent; this Congress cannot presume to confer such power and authority upon any man.

The remaining objection to the bill now referred to is that no provision is made for a substitute paper currency in place of the amount, partial or entire, of the notes that may demand redemption. With partial redemption under the "public-confidence" theory, the amount of gold thus paid out will be at once absorbed and sink back into an article of merchandise, and the currency thus be reduced in its volume that much. With full redemption of all United States notes and fractional currency we shall have only gold and silver in place of this now large amount of paper currency. And gold and silver, with the modern and approved modes and mediums of effecting exchanges cannot and will not, to any considerable degree, come into use as a circulating medium. And hence, with the perfected operation of this bill, we should have enormous contraction of currency and consequent commercial distress and financial ruin.

Introductory allusion has been made to the time and occasion of issuing the demand-note loans, to the necessity of forcing the notes into circulation at a fictitious and debased standard of value, and to the fact that they were considered by the Government that issued them and the people that received them only as a temporary loan, to be converted at the option of the holders into a time and coin interest-bearing security. Brief advertence has also been given to two measures proposing the retirement or payment of these notes for the purpose only of stating some objections to the mode and measure by which the ends proposed are sought to be accomplished. For in so far as they assume and recognize an unstable and irredeemable currency as the cause of the depreciated condition of the Government securities and of our financial embarrassments, and the payment or retirement of the legal-tender notes as a condition precedent to a uniform and convertible paper currency, and hence to restored and assured Government credit and a sound financial condition to the country, they have my hearty assent.

In view, then, of the recognized necessity of the payment or withdrawal of the legal-tender notes in order to secure the great and important ends named, and in view also of the fact already determined by the people and ratified by Congress, that the business interests and requirements of the country cannot, at present certainly, safely permit any contraction or diminution of the volume of paper money, I venture now to suggest and briefly discuss the following plan:

1. Authorize an issue of United States registered bonds to the amount of $600,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purposes contemplated, to be free from taxation, either national, State, or municipal, payable in fifty years from date, with interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and both principal and interest payable in coin, as a basis for securing the circulating notes of national banks.

2. Authorize an increased issue of notes for circulation to national banks of $200,000,000, and require the Secretary of the Treasury to distribute this increase in such States, Territories, and sections of the country as are now destitute of, or insufficiently supplied with, banking facilities and accommodations.

3. Provide that when banking associations forming under the increase of circulating notes authorized shall have organized under the provisions of the national currency act, and shall have paid into the Treasury of the United States the amount of their capital stock, ninety per cent. of which shall be paid in lawful money, the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon issue to such associations bonds of the issue hereby provided for; and that upon the transfer and delivery of such bonds to the Treasurer of the United States, to be by him held in trust for the purposes named in said currency act, the Comptroller of the Currency shall, upon certification of such transfer and delivery, issue to such associations circulating notes to an amount not exceeding ninety per cent. of the amount of said bonds at par.

4. As fast as circulating notes are issued to new banking associations require the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be canceled and destroyed an amount of legal-tender notes equal to the amount of circulating notes issued.

5. If the existing national banks shall desire to continue their organization and to accept the four per cent. bonds authorized in place of their bonds then on deposit, they shall signify such desire and purpose to the Secretary of the Treasury within sixty days from the passage of the act; and thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue the four per cent. bonds proposed, in equal par value amount to the bonds to be surrendered, and deposit the same with the Treasurer of the United States in trust for said banks in lieu of the bonds surrendered. And if any of the existing national banks shall, by a vote of its shareholders owning two thirds of its stock, decide not to accept the bonds proposed in exchange for their bonds held as security for its circulating notes, such bank shall within two months from the passage of the act so notify the Secretary of the Treasury, and within four months return its circulating notes to the Treasurer of the United States. And thereupon the bonds belonging to such association shall be delivered up to it under the provisions of the national currency act. In the event of the closing up or surrender of any bank, provide that a new one with like capital may be organized, giving preference to an association in the same or near locality with the one closed or surrendered.

6. Require every national banking association to have at all times on hand, in gold or in lawful money of the United States, at least twenty-five per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation.

7. Prohibit all further sales of gold, in order that the Government may strengthen and prepare itself for the payment of the remainder of its demand notes not retired by this mode. And when the coin balance shall be adequate, or if deemed desirable coin sufficient shall be provided from a coin loan authorized for the purpose, let the Government substitute gold for the lawful money reserves of the banks, thus furnishing to them a sound specie basis for the issue and redemption of their circulating notes.

The prominent features of the proposition submitted are: the withdrawal from the currency of a large amount of legal-tender notes and funding them in a long bond at a low rate of interest, thus initiating at least a lower and more reasonable rate of interest upon our Government securities; the substitution therefor of national bank notes—a currency certainly of equal convenience and value—without disturbance to or variation of the volume of the circulating medium; and, what is not of least importance, furnishing for and distributing to large and important sections of the country the banking conveniences and profits, facilities and accommodations which are now possessed and enjoyed by only favored portions.

Many theories, and vagaries even, have been from time to time advanced as to the nature and purpose of the legal-tenders, and as to whether they constituted a debt of the Government which should ever be paid, and if so how and when. Some have held that they were a cheap currency, costing the Government not much beside paper and ink, and should therefore be multiplied and made to pay the national debt, apparently supposing that the substitution of a demand promise for a time obligation to pay discharged the debt, or else perhaps thinking that if the people could be induced to repudiate the interest they might become so debauched as to deny the principal. Others have thought that they formed so desirable a currency that the loan should be further forced and the Government furnish the whole paper circulation, thus erecting the Treasury, the true office of which is the reception and disbursements of the revenues, into a huge Government bank, and thereby in effect constituting the Secretary of the Treasury the money autocrat of the country. Far away be the day when the American people shall establish an institution and confer a power so dangerous to, if not subversive of, a free Government.

But from the brief review already taken of the necessities for and the conditions of the legal-tender issues, it is clear, we think, that they were regarded and treated as forced but temporary loans which the Government were bound some time to pay, and that it was both expected and intended that they should be either paid in coin, true money, or converted into coin interest-bearing bonds. And if they were so issued and taken as temporary loans is not the Government bound in honor and all good faith to redeem its pledge, and either make present payment or renew the promise to pay, and that at a time fixed and with interest, as a consideration for its use? But present payment being manifestly impossible, and from a variety of circumstances even undesirable, is there any better, or in the present condition of the finances of the country any other way than to begin now to convert or fund these legal-tender notes into coin interest and coin principal-paying bonds, as herein proposed, in harmony with the spirit and provisions of the acts under which they were issued? It is true that the bonds into which they were originally exchangeable carried six per cent. interest payable in coin, while those now proposed for conversion carry but four per cent. interest.

But at the time the notes in question were issued the Government was in dire straits by reason of the gigantic operations of the war; the contest for the supremacy of the Government was being fiercely carried on, and its duration and issue were both uncertain and a war-risk rate of interest was being paid for money. Now peace is restored, the perpetuity of the Government is assured, and no one can doubt its ultimate ability to pay and discharge every obligation. The bonds proposed are to be issued upon long time—fifty years; and the permanence and stability of the loan justly enhances its value. They are also to be free from taxation, national, State, or municipal. Would not these considerations, in connection with the largely reduced cost of living and the greatly improved financial condition and prospects of the country render the bonds now proposed as valuable and desirable in the estimation of capital as a twenty years' bond at six per cent. could have been in the dark and terrible days of uncertain civil conflict? But they are not offered to capital as a simple investment alone, but carry with them all the advantages and profits attaching to circulation and general banking. In this view surely they will be regarded by the people and accepted by capital as meeting fully the obligation and spirit of the acts under which the legal-tender notes were issued.

In considering the second feature of the plan suggested, namely, an increase of $200,000,000 of circulating notes to national bank associations, it is not proposed to discuss the propriety or expediency of creating or establishing banks, but rather by reference to some well-known but important facts in relation to the cessation of their establishment, the advantages they possess, and their adaptability to the business wants of an active, enterprising, and growing people, to show the desirableness of a further increase of circulating notes. Whatever may have been the theories or arguments by which the State bank system, so called, was preferred or sustained; whatever may have been the strength and soundness of some, if not many, of the State banks, or however acceptable and satisfactory they may have been to the communities in which they were located, the exigencies of the war soon demonstrated that a currency so insufficient, so heterogeneous, so unequal, and so unsafe as that furnished by the State banks, especially after the suspension of specie payments into which they were driven in the early days of the war, was unreliable and would be ruinous both to the Government and the people.

The attention of the Government and its financial agents was therefore early directed to devising a system of banking which should have uniformity of security, uniformity of general regulations and accountability, and which should furnish a national currency uniform in value and convertibility. Such a measure was matured and recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury as early as December, 1861, but was not finally approved by Congress till February, 1863. The business enterprise and capital of the country quickly saw and appreciated the advantages of such a system of currency, and banking associations were rapidly organized. It was received with such favor that soon a considerable number of the States signified their approval of the law by the passage of enabling acts; then the existing State banks were compelled, by a heavy tax laid upon their circulation, either to adopt the system or stop banking, and in a brief time thereafter the entire amount of circulating notes authorized by law was taken up, and pressing calls were then and are still made for more. The system has since grown so rapidly in favor with the business community and in the confidence of the people, and has now become so interwoven with and incorporated into all their transactions and enterprises, as well as into the financial operations of the Government, that it must be considered as firmly established and permanently fixed. The leading characteristic of the national bank currency, and which perhaps forms its chief advantage over all previous systems of banking, is that it gives uniformity to the circulating medium.

As the circulation is the common servant of all, performing all their exchanges, affecting the values of property, the profits of business, the wages of labor, and the cost of living, it is a matter of great interest and moment to all, rich and poor alike, that it is both sound and uniform. These qualities, safety and uniformity, are combined in the national currency. It is safe because it is fully and amply secured by a pledge of Federal bonds of a value ten per cent. greater than the notes issued by a first and paramount lien through the Government on the remaining assets of the banks; by the personal liability of the stockholders to an amount equal to the capital; and lastly, by the obligation of the Government to redeem the notes on failure of any bank to redeem its issues at its counter. The national bank notes, bearing upon their face the pledge of full security, and stamped with the impress of the national guarantee, are entitled to and assured of uniform value in every part of the land. They are good and safe to the holder, not alone at the bank or store or shop in the place where he may reside, but equally safe and good in any city or town to which he may desire to travel or in which he may choose to sojourn. The country now has $300,000,000 of these national bank notes. Why should not the whole paper currency be of this one type and uniform standard?

But we pass to consider the third feature in the plan suggested, the furnishing for and distributing to large and important sections of the country the banking facilities and accommodations now enjoyed by only favored portions. The banking associations now issuing the national currency are located with great partiality and great injustice. By reference to the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency it will be seen that of the $300,000,000 of circulating notes authorized, the six New England States have $104,549,234, more than one third of the whole amount. New York has $68,853,726, New Jersey $9,397,985, and Pennsylvania $38,772,102, making an aggregate for the nine States named of $221,572,047, thus leaving for all the other States and the Territories the almost insignificant amount of $78,427,953 of circulating notes.

Now, sir, I certainly admire and commend the generous patriotism, the keen business sagacity, and the pecuniary resources and strength which inspired and enabled New England capital and enterprise to rally promptly to aid the Government in initiating a new and uniform banking system for the country. I take a just pride in New England's devotion to freedom; in her steadfastness in every time of national difficulty and danger; in her costly offerings for the unity and integrity of the Republic, and in the foresight with which she secured so generous a share of the national currency with which to protect her industries, to stimulate her enterprises, and to augment her wealth and power. But while New England and the other States named have been fairly supplied and their wants measurably met, why should like advantages and facilities for growth and development be longer so largely withheld from other States—from the rich and prosperous middle States, with their quickened enterprise and teeming industries; or from the growing empire States of the West and Northwest, with their exhaustless store of mineral treasures and their boundless capacity for production; or from the garden States of the South, destined soon, under the stimulus of free labor and supplied capital, to excel all former wealth and greatness?

Has not the opportune time arrived when the Government can safely commence to redeem its stipulated pledge to exchange a necessary, but confessedly temporary demand loan for an interest-bearing time loan—equal by reason of its long but fixed time of payment and its exemption from taxation to the convertible loan at first provided—to substitute for the demand notes thus withdrawn an equal amount of safe and uniform national currency; and in its distribution or allotment to furnish to all sections of the country those money accommodations and banking facilities which shall protect local interests, encourage local enterprise, assist home industry, and stimulate home production, and thereby insure stable growth and development?

The plan suggested, if put in operation, would fund $200,000,000 of the legal-tender notes into fifty-year bonds at four per cent. per annum; it would substitute for the demand notes so withdrawn an equal amount of national bank currency secured by the bonds so issued, leaving, according to the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, about one hundred and fifty-six millions of United States notes outstanding, which would be ample for the lawful money reserves which the banks are required to keep on hand. It would furnish $200,000,000 of circulating notes for new national banks, and locate the banks in sections now inadequately supplied, so that local interests should be protected and promoted.

It would require existing national banks to either exchange the five and six per cent. bonds now belonging to them on deposit to secure their circulation for four per cent. fifty-year bonds, or, if they refuse to exchange, to return their circulating notes and surrender their charter and take their bonds, and thus give new capital from the same or near locality opportunity to organize under the new bonds—a privilege which in most localities would be quickly improved. The remaining amount of legal-tender notes may be redeemed in gold whenever the coin balance in the Treasury, either from accumulation or from proceeds of a loan authorized for the purpose, shall be adequate for full payment, and thus the banks be supplied with a coin in place of lawful money reserve as a safe and sound basis for the redemption of their bills.

Should the business wants of the country then require more paper currency—which is altogether probable—let more national banks be authorized upon a similar security, or, what perhaps would more justly determine the question of volume and more surely adapt the supply to the demand, let a general banking law be passed. The future condition and wants of the country can however best determine these questions. Certain it is that our present business and financial condition will admit of no contraction or diminution of the currency. Contraction, and consequent stagnation and retrogression, will not be tolerated. But growth, progress, enlargement, are now the watchwords and signals of the American people. Notwithstanding the losses and burdens of the war the people are neither discouraged nor disheartened, but, on the contrary, are hopeful, buoyant, and confident. They have come through storm and tempest, through conflict and suffering, to a new plane of national greatness and power. The blight and curse of slavery are removed, and the goddess of liberty no longer sits in garments defiled with the blot and stain of human bondage, but, enrobed in a new and spotless mantle, more beautiful in its shining emblems of unity and freedom than royal purple or kingly attire, she beckons the nation onward to new triumphs and grander achievements.

The swelling tide of emigration still sweeps westward subduing plains, opening mines, planting towns, and building cities almost with the swiftness of thought and the magic of a dream. The vast and far-reaching enterprises that seek to open new territory, to develop new resources, and unfold new wealth are being urged with unwonted skill and carried forward with resistless energy. Rocky barriers will soon be removed, the mountains be overtopped, and great highways will be opened for international transit and traffic. China and the Indies will then speed to us their rich argosies of tropical wealth and luxury, Europe and Asia shall meet and sit down with us, and American enterprise shall control the commerce, and American principles shape the destinies of the world.

At the conclusion of his remarks, Mr. SMITH yielded the remainder of his time to Mr. SCOTFIELD, who said: How much time will there be for me?

The SPEAKER. There are eight minutes left of the hour of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I will yield for that purpose if it be the desire of members.

Mr. LYNCH. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object, CHARLOTTE CRANE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, Leave was granted to Mr. STEWART to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of the claim of Charlotte Crane, not having copies on file to be presented to the Senate.

TREATY-MAKING POWER.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to print in the Globe some remarks he had prepared on the treaty-making power and the Cherokee neutral lands in Kansas. [See Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROOKS. I call for the regular order. The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 29, noes 27.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays.

Upon a division there were—ayes 16, noes 36. So (one fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 45, nays 30, not voting 147; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Beck, Blaine, Blair, Brooks, Broomall, Buckley, Cake, Corley, Covode, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Ferriss, Gove, Griswold, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Alexander H. Jones, Knott, Lufkin, Lush, Lynch, Morrell, McCarthy, McCormick, McKee, Mercer, Merrill, Niblack, Pike, Raum, Schenck, Scofield, Stewart, Taber, Tift, Van Aernam, Van Aiken, Ward, Whittemore, Windom, Woodbridge, and Young—45.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, James M. Ashley, Benton, Boies, Boyden, Churchill, Cobb, Farnsworth, Getz, Hooper, Jenckes, Ketcham, William Lawrence, Mallory, Miller, Mungen, Perham, Pierce, Price, Robertson, Sawyer, Shanks, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stover, Taffe, Twichell, Elihu B. Washburne, and Thomas Williams—30.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Bingham, Blackburn, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Cary, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dewesse, Dickey, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Ferry, Fields, Fox, French, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kerr, Kitchen, Koonitz, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, Moore, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Peters, Pettis, Phelps, Pile, Plants, Poland, Poisley, Pomeroy, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Root, Ross, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stokes, Stone, Sypher, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Bart Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—147.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Mrs. A. Lincoln, for a pension.

By Mr. AMES: The petition of Albert French and others, that Congress protect all engaged in navigation from illegal exactions.

By Mr. BEAMAN: The petition of C. Campbell and 41 others, citizens of Wayne county, Michigan, praying for the passage of the civil service bill, new tax bill, &c.

Also, the petition of Scotten, Smith & Co. and others, protesting against any change in the present internal revenue tax law so far as it regards tobacco.

Also, the petition of William E. Edwards and others, asking for a reduction of the duties on petroleum oil to fifty cents per barrel, or to make the duty ad valorem.

By Mr. CHURCHILL: The memorial of Alvin Osborn and others, shingle manufacturers, of Oswego, New York, asking for increased duty upon shingles of foreign manufacture, in consequence of the Canadian export duty upon shingle timber.

By Mr. COVODE: A petition of certain distillers in Fayette and Westmoreland counties, Pennsylvania, for a modification of the internal revenue laws.

By Mr. CULLOM: A petition signed by numerous citizens of Tazewell county, Illinois, asking the passage of JENCKES's civil service bill, and several other bills therein mentioned.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of F. Crawford and 50 others, citizens of Tuscola county, Michigan, asking the establishment of a new post route in said county.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: The memorial of Augustus W. Ballard, late additional paymaster United States Army, praying to be reimbursed in the sum of $540, being the amount taken from his safe in the city of Washington on the 14th day of March, 1865.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: The petition of George W. White, of Travis county, Texas, for the removal of disabilities.

By Mr. HIGBY: The petition of John Straterson, for relief for loss of mail matter by the overland mail to California.

Also, the petition of White & Bauer, for relief for loss of mail matter by the overland mail to California.

By Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts: The petition of J. D. and M. Williams and others, merchants and dealers in distilled spirits in the city of Boston, for the amendment or modification of the internal revenue law in relation to distilled spirits.

By Mr. JENCKES: A resolution of the Board of Trade of the city of Providence, Rhode Island, recommending measures for the mitigation of the evils of maritime warfare.

By Mr. JUDD: The petition of Mrs. Webster, asking a pension.

By Mr. JULIAN: A petition of 52 citizens of New York, praying Congress to establish the right of women to vote by constitutional amendment.

By Mr. KELLEY: A memorial of the representatives of the religious society of Friends in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, respecting the Indians.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition of Francis Ehrenberg, formerly of the one hundred and third regiment New York volunteer infantry, asking for a pension.

By Mr. TABER: The petition of Captain Joseph Boyles, of Port Jefferson, New York, and 22 others, masters of vessels, for protection against the arbitrary and illegal exactions of State and municipal authorities against masters and owners of vessels.

By Mr. VAN HORN, of New York: The petition of John C. Lemon, late colonel of the tenth New York cavalry, asking reimbursement for expenses incurred, and compensation for services rendered.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 27, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents, in relation to the gold medal presented to Mr. George Peabody, pursuant to the resolution of Congress of March 16, 1867; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting for the consideration of Congress, in conformity with the requirements of the sixth section of the act of the 22d of June, 1860, a copy of certain regulations for the consular courts in China prohibiting steamers sailing under the flag of the United States from using or passing through the Straw Shoe channel on the river Yangtze, decreed by S. Wells Williams, chargé d'affaires, on the 1st of June, and promulgated by George F. Seward, consul general at Shanghai, on the 25th of July, 1868, with the assent of five of the United States consuls in China; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Montana Territory, in favor of an appropriation for a national road from Fort Benton to the navigable waters of the Columbia river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the passage of a law authorizing all persons who have taken less than one hundred and sixty acre homesteads under the provisions of the laws of the United States to extend their privileges so as to permit them to claim, take, prove up, and hold enough more to make their homesteads one hundred and sixty acres; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of John M. Drowrey, praying the removal of the political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying the repeal of the act granting a charter to the Masonic Hall Association in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Massachusetts, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWE. I have been requested to present a petition from John James Flournoy, of Jackson county, Georgia, asking for a variety of relief. The principal seems to be that an able phrenologist be appointed to craniolegally examine all candidates for revenue appointments to see whether reverence, benevolence, conscientiousness, causality, and comparison be the leading protuberances. He thinks it would have a tendency to check the frauds under which the Government is now suffering in that department of the service. [Laughter.] I move its reference to the Committee on Retrenchment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish my friend from Wisconsin, who has made a very proper reference of that petition, would attend the meetings of the committee as a standard of comparison. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE also presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FERRY presented two petitions of citizens of Connecticut, praying the establishment of a mail route from Stamford, Connecticut, to Poundridge, New York; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. POMEROY. I present a petition from citizens of Kansas, praying that in any change or amendment to the Constitution that may be proposed either to extend or regulate suffrage there shall be no distinction between men and women. This petition is headed by Dr. Updegraff, a distinguished citizen of my State, and very numerous signed. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY also presented a petition of citizens of Vermont, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of Alexander H. Faltz, praying to be relieved from political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ABBOTT presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Wilmington, North Carolina, praying an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of Cape Fear river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAWYER presented the petition of L. S. Payne, praying that compensation be granted to the Sisters of Mercy in Charleston, South Carolina, for taking care of sick and wounded soldiers during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WHYTE presented a petition of T. B. Parton, of Virginia, praying the removal of the political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NYE presented the petition of Thomas Dickerson, praying the intervention of Congress to protect all persons engaged in navigation from illegal exactions from the various tonnage tax laws imposed by States, cities, and sea-port towns; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of captains and owners of vessels plying between Providence, Rhode Island, and Alexandria, Virginia, and Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia, praying the intervention of Congress to protect all persons engaged in navigation from illegal exactions from the various tonnage tax laws imposed by States, cities, and sea-port towns; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of citizens of the Territory of Dakota, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Tennessee, presented the petitions of John S. Copenhaver and William C. Sexton, of Marion, Smyth county, Virginia, praying a removal of the political disabilities imposed on them by acts of Congress; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Texas, praying the removal of the political disabilities imposed on certain persons in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THAYER presented the petition of Emily Hayne, widow of Paul H. Hayne, of Augusta, Georgia, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORTON. Yesterday the petition of Phebe and Sylvia Ann Wood was referred to the Committee on Claims. I desire to have its reference changed, and to have it referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have had sent to me, I do not know from what source, what purports to be, and I dare say is, a petition from sundry citizens of Vermont, asking for equal suffrage between men and women. I have not the pleasure to know any of these persons, but presume the petition is genuine, and I therefore present it and move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, presented a petition of citizens of Maine, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARLAN presented the memorial of Washington G. Irwin, praying compensation for services rendered as commander of company E, forty-third regiment Ohio volunteers, from January 1 to April 5, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the memorial of S. L. Glasgow and others, citizens of Wayne county, Iowa, praying that a pension be granted to Mrs. Sarah E. Haines, widow of George H. Haines, late a private in company K, eighteenth regiment Missouri infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ANTHONY presented a petition of citizens of Rhode Island, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 641) in addition to the several acts providing for suppressing insurrections against the Government of the United States, reported it back, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 189) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, reported it back, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following message, letter, and petitions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A message of the President of the United States, recommending certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States;

A letter from the president of the constitutional convention of Texas, communicating the report of the special committee on lawlessness and violence in that State;

Two petitions of members of the bar of Mississippi, praying that the place of holding the United States courts be changed to Vicksburg;

The petition of Simeon Putnam, of Chelsea, Massachusetts, praying that the Constitution be so amended as to make the President and Vice President to be elected by a direct vote of the people; and

A petition of citizens of North Carolina, praying that provision be made for the payment of claims of loyal citizens.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution of Mr. MORTON to pay the Senators from North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Arkansas, and Louisiana compensation from the commencement of the Fortieth Congress, reported it back, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 677) to punish the crime of holding office in violation of the fourteenth article of the Constitution, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 777) to enforce certain provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its indefinite postponement. The subject of this bill is covered by the other bill which the committee have reported with an amendment. I move that this bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to inquire of the Senator whether he has reported from the committee any bill relating to Georgia?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; not specially. We have reported a bill relating to Georgia and all other States where any persons are holding or attempting to hold office contrary to the Constitution of the United States, to make it a punishable offense. It applies to Georgia, but not more to Georgia than to any other State.

Mr. SUMNER. May I ask the Senator whether that is all the committee propose to report applicable to Georgia?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is all that the committee have agreed upon and are ready to report at this time. We have several bills before the committee relating specially to Georgia, upon which the committee have not yet arrived at a definite conclusion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1599) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1870, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 195) requiring the Commissioner of the General Land Office to transfer certain moneys, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 824) relative to the refining of gold and silver bullion at the Mint of the United States and branches, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of the harbor commissioners of Massachusetts, praying an appropriation for the completion of the works in Boston harbor and Cape Cod harbor, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. VICKERS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 258) to change the name of Four-and-a-half street, in the city of Washington, to "Lincoln avenue," reported adversely.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Henry Failing, praying that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to issue to him a bond in lieu of an Oregon war bond destroyed by the burning of the steamer Golden Gate on the 27th of July, 1862, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. CORBETT. I ask leave of the Senate to take up a little bill, No. 679, merely providing for the extension of time for the completion of a military road.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us go on with the morning business.

Mr. CORBETT. It will take no time.

Mr. GRIMES. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it cannot be taken up at this time.

Mr. CORBETT. I am willing to give way for any morning business.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 838) to prevent the collection of illegal imposts under color of State authority; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. NYE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 839) to extend the boundaries of the States of Nevada, Minnesota, and Nebraska, and the Territories of Colorado, Montana, and Wyoming; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 840) to enable the Cherokee, Creek, Seminole, Choctaw, and Chickasaw people to become citizens of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 841) to revive the grant of lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Selma to Gadsden, in the State of Alabama, and to confirm the same to the Selma, Rome, and Dalton Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 842) to repeal the sixteenth section of an act in addition to an act to promote the progress of the useful arts, approved March 2, 1868; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents, (with a petition of John Titus, of Philadelphia, on the subject,) and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 843) to designate the place of confinement for persons convicted of offenses against the laws of the United States and sentenced to imprisonment in certain States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, (with a letter of A. Pillsbury, superintendent of the Albany penitentiary, on the subject,) and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 207) authorizing Lieutenant Commander W. A. Kirkland, United States Navy, to accept a gold medal from the emperor of France; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 208) authorizing Commander Charles H. Baldwin, United States Navy, to accept a gold medal from the king of the Netherlands; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN L. DAVIS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 1158, for the relief of an officer of the Navy.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1158) for the relief of Commander John L. Davis was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to pay to Commander John L. Davis $271 91.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill does not state for what this payment is to be made. I should like to have it explained by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is a report, which the Secretary will be able to find in a moment, which explains the matter. This bill only directs the payment of between two and three hundred dollars compensation that is due to this officer for service in a particular grade. The same compensation has been allowed to others who served with him at the time. There is no question about it; but there is a technicality that prevents his payment at the Department under the act of 1847. I suppose there is no objection to the bill. It is reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ROAD IN OREGON.

Mr. CORBETT. I move to take up Senate bill No. 679 for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 679) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State," was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill contains a preamble reciting that by an act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State, approved July 2, 1864, the time designated for the completion of the road expires on the 2d day of July, 1869, and proposes to extend the time to the 2d day of July, 1872.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon what is the prospect of this road, whether anything has been done upon it? The bill making the original grant, I suppose, came from the Committee on Public Lands, and I do not know whether that committee has considered this bill or not.

Mr. CORBETT. I will state, for the information of the Senate that this bill has been considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and reported favorably upon the following state of facts: this road was commenced as soon as the State designated the company to whom the lands should go for the purpose of making the road. The company have completed the road through the Cascade range of mountains about one hundred miles through the most difficult portion of the country, on which they have expended about one hundred thousand dollars over and above anything they could get from the land, and they are now commencing its construction through another portion of country.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LITTLE ROCK ISLAND.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Senate take up for consideration House bill No. 394, confirming the title to Little Rock Island in the Mississippi river. It is a short bill, and will occupy but a few moments.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 394) confirming title to Little Rock Island in the Mississippi river was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is recited that according to the official plat of the survey of the public land returned to the General Land Office by the surveyor general a certain island in the Mississippi river known as Little Rock Island, situate opposite the city of Clinton, in the State of Iowa, was surveyed and platted as being within the district of lands subject to entry and sale at the Government land office at Dubuque, in the Territory of Iowa; that the island was entered by Jonathan L. Pearce, jr., at the land office at Dubuque, as appears by cash certificate No. 3326, and was subsequently granted by the United States to him by letters-patent dated the 1st day of January, 1846, in which the patent is described as being "Little Rock Island, in the Mississippi river, in township eighty-one north, of range seven east, of the fifth principal meridian, in the district of lands subject to sale at Dubuque, Iowa Territory, containing thirty-nine acres and four hundredths of an acre;" and that the island is situated east of the main channel of the Mississippi river, in the State of Illinois, in the district of lands subject to sale at Springfield, in said Illinois. Hence the bill proceeds to ratify and confirm the title to the island to Jonathan L. Pearce, jr., and his grantees, fully, in like manner and effect, and in all respects to the same intent and purpose as if the laws of the United States respecting the survey, entry, and sale of the public land had been fully and in every respect complied with and observed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I would inquire of the honorable Senator from Iowa whether there is any adverse claim in Illinois?

Mr. HARLAN. I think not. I think there is none whatever. The only point is to correct the recital in the deed. The land is recited in the deed to lie in Iowa, when, in point of fact, it lies in Illinois, the main channel of the Mississippi river being on the west side of the island. That is the whole difficulty in the case, as I understand. The bill has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if this matter has been examined by the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. HARLAN. It is so stated in the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I had the impression that there was an old controversy about the lands on that island, different parties claiming it. I do not know that this bill relates to that at all. If there be such a controversy I should regret very much to see Congress settle it without a full understanding of it. If the only question be as to the regularity of the entry at the one office instead of the other, of course there can be no objection to the bill; but if there be a controversy between different parties about this land this would be a hasty disposition of it, I should think.

Mr. HARLAN. I have never heard of any controversy whatever. If any exists I know not of it. The chief object of having the title settled now consists in the fact that a bridge is located, in part, on this island. I suppose the island is of but very little value in itself; but the bridge across the Mississippi river lies partly on this island, and the owners of the bridge, of course, desire to have a perfect title. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands ought to know if there is any controversy over it. I have heard of none and know of none.

Mr. GRIMES. Personally, I know nothing about this matter. My whole information is derived from the parties who have written to me recently about it. I have never heard that there was any controversy in regard to it. The bill has been on the table, I think, since the last session, and I should suppose it would be known to the adverse party, if there was one, that an effort was being made here to confirm the title. The Senate can see at once what the difficulty is. The Government have already patented this land, but in the patent they have recited the exact description, except that they place it in Iowa instead of putting it in Illinois. The main channel turns out to be on the west of the island, and therefore the island is in Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think that safety would require that we should annex a provision to the bill that it shall not interfere with any rights which have been acquired by any other person from the United States.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It can do no harm, at any rate.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will suggest the appropriate amendment I have no objection whatever to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest that it be amended by adding the following:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to deprive any other person of any right or title to said land acquired from the United States.

The amendment was agreed.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. MORTON. There was a question of order left undisposed of yesterday at the expiration of the morning hour which I am anxious to have settled, and for the purpose of having that question disposed of I move to take up House bill No. 65 for the relief of William McGarrahan.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to that form of motion. The bill cannot be taken up. That is the question that is before the Senate exactly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the question. The Chair was about to state the question. The motion is to take up the bill for the purpose of reference, and the question is whether it is in order—the bill having been postponed indefinitely at the last session, and notice conveyed to the House of Representatives to that effect—to take up the bill now for the purpose of reference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The question is now before the Senate, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is before the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose, sir, upon the question of order under the practice of the Senate it is hardly necessary to add anything to what has already been said. Yesterday morning, however, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] felt authorized, with a view to influence the judgment of Senators upon the proposition who hold that the bill may be taken up, to refer to its history at the last session of Congress, supposing, as I think, on his part, that that reference to the history of the measure would prejudice it somewhat in the judgment of Senators. Now, Mr. President, I will ask the attention of Senators very briefly to the history of the bill at the last session. I understand that in the month of July the Committee on Private Land Claims made an adverse report. Upon that report being made to the Senate, its contents and the merits of this claim did not become known to the Senate. Of course we are not expected to read the elaborate report of a committee upon a private claim until that claim is called up. Practically it is impossible. While that report was pending before the Senate it seems that the attention of the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] was called to the bill, and governed by public considerations as well as by what he considered a proper regard to the rights of Mr. McGarrahan, that Senator addressed a letter to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. That letter is dated on the 15th of July last, and in that letter he appeals to the Commissioner to allow the case to stand until Congress may take further action upon it, and the Senator informs the Commissioner of the General Land Office that Mr. McGarrahan expects to present additional evidence in support of his claim before the Senate. This statement was made to the Commissioner with a view of obtaining from him a postponement of any executive action. The answer of the Commissioner to the Senator from Michigan is as follows:

"I had the honor just now to receive your communication of present date, advising me that upon the assurance of W. McGarrahan, esq., that further proofs would be exhibited tending to establish his claim to the tract of land embraced by the 'Panoche Grande' survey in California, the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims has assented to postponement of further action during the present session.

"Such being the case the local land officers in California will be instructed still further to suspend action on claims falling within the survey in question until the matter shall be finally disposed of by Congress."

That assurance was made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office upon the communication from the Senator from Michigan. That Senator in his letter said:

"I further told him"—

That is, Mr. McGarrahan—

"I thought there would be no further action on the report at this session, and Mr. WILLIAMS, chairman of the committee, assented to this."

Mr. McGarrahan in the middle of July was assured that no further action would be taken on this claim, so far as the chairman who made the report could give that assurance. The Commissioner of the General Land Office decided to postpone any executive action upon it. On Saturday night, the 25th of the month, when the business of the session was about coming to a close, the bill was called up in the Senate, perhaps in the absence of the chairman who made the report, who gave the assurance that there would be no further action. I take it it was in his absence, for he would have stated at once that he had given this assurance if he had been present when the Senator from Nevada called the bill up. On the 25th of the month it was called up by the Senator from Nevada furthest from me, [Mr. NYE.] There a proposition was made to read the report. That Senator said he would like to have the report read; but the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS,] who now very earnestly opposes the action of the Senate which will allow the rest of us to know something about this case, stated that the report was a lengthy one, and another Senator from California said that it would take a long time to read it. Mr. STEWART then said:

"The report recommends that the bill be indefinitely postponed. I therefore move, in accordance with the report of the committee, that the bill be indefinitely postponed."

"The motion was agreed to."

Then, sir, upon the suggestion that it was a lengthy report, it was not read. The debate did not inform even the thin Senate then present what were the merits of the claim. As I understand the fact to have been, the bill was called up in the evening and indefinitely postponed; and this is the history of the case which the Senator from Nevada now thinks ought to prejudice the Senate against a further investigation of it. On the next Monday, the 27th, the two Senators from Nevada and the Senator from California addressed the Commissioner of the General Land Office a letter, asking him to proceed at once to defeat the purpose of Mr. McGarrahan, under the assurance given by the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Michigan that he should have a further hearing if he presented additional evidence to the Senate. These three Senators unite in a letter to the Commissioner, asking him to proceed at once and to secure the title to the parties who claim in opposition and hostility to Mr. McGarrahan.

Mr. President, I am unable to perceive that this history of the transaction should induce any Senator to cast a vote which will make that a final action of the Senate which took place under circumstances that made it impossible for the Senate to know the merits of the case. Shall it now be held that the Senate adjudged upon the merits of the case when the record shows that it was a matter of fact that the Senate did not consider the merits? No Senator, perhaps, except the chairman who made the report and those associated with him upon the committee, and the gentlemen who seem to take a special interest in it, knew anything of the merits of this case, I presume. I believe I had never heard of it, nor do I undertake now to speak upon the merits. I do not know what the merits are. It is enough for me to know that a private citizen asks the ear of the Senate of the United States; and I do not care whether it relates to leagues of land in California in hostility to a rich mining company or whether it relates to but a dollar in money I am in favor of that construction of our rules which shall be liberal toward him and give him an opportunity to be heard. I am not in favor of that strict ruling which shall hold a technical motion to be a disposal of the merits of the case, when, in fact, the Senate did not consider the merits. It had no opportunity to consider the merits. McGarrahan now asks that he shall be heard, and it is claimed by the three distinguished Senators who addressed this letter to the Commissioner of the General Land Office that because the Senate indefinitely postponed at a late hour of the night on the 25th of July last the Senate cannot touch it. A technical rule is brought to bear upon the Senate to close up investigation against a citizen. It is enough for the Senate to see that this man is opposed by a mining company out there. He asks to be heard in the Senate. He has been heard by a committee. That committee has expressed its opinion adversely to him. It may be right. The presumption is that the report of the committee is right; but it is not conclusive upon the Senate. I say that when a citizen asks to be heard the Senate itself should hear him.

And now, sir, is the Senate technically estopped? No, sir. The parliamentary law is that an indefinite postponement simply is a declaration by the body that it will not act upon that bill again during that session; and that is all of it. That session has passed and gone; and we have a rule of this body that a bill that has not been finally disposed of upon its merits shall live over and may be considered now; and it is right, sir, and I think that these Senators cannot maintain their argument in favor of a technical estoppel on the part of the Senate against hearing the plea of the citizen in regard to his land.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Senator from Indiana has now based his claim to overthrow a rule of the Senate as old as the Government on the merits of this case, it becomes material and important to know on what the Senate did act. Now, we have a right to light on the subject, and we are entitled to have the report of the committee read, and furthermore we are entitled to know whether Mr. McGarrahan and his friends have a dispensing power so that they can go to the Departments, as they have for the last two years, and say that men who have acquired rights under the laws of their country shall be denied those rights. We are entitled to know whether, after having been three times driven from the Supreme Court and his claim branded as an infamous fraud, and adverse rights having grown up under the laws of the country, those rights can be trifled with at the request of Mr. McGarrahan.

I say it was the duty of the Senators representing that portion of the country to urge the disposition of this case so that the laws might be enforced; so that those men might have their rights. They were preëmptors under the law. They had acted under the law. The laws had been suspended for over a year at the time that this occurred, and Mr. McGarrahan assumed that they might be further suspended. I was anxious that the case should be brought up at the last session. Mr. McGarrahan wanted it postponed so that these men could be kept out of their property still longer.

In order to show that this case has been investigated, and that the Senate may know something of it, I ask the Clerk to read the report of the committee. Let us get some idea of it and see whether it is proper to forever suspend the laws that have been passed in this body and in the other after mature discussion; for if Mr. McGarrahan has any rights he has them under the law, as I shall go on to show; that was passed for him and all others similarly situated. We provided in the law for the disposition of such cases after many days of discussion. Those were the cases that the Supreme Court had rejected—Spanish land grants. The rights of the parties were all provided for, and they were turned over to those rights. Men have invested their money under those considerations. He was aware of the law, and his claim had been rejected. This Congress has fixed a mode of procedure. Now, he asks, after that mode of procedure has been fixed, that the property of others shall be taken and given to him, that he shall be allowed to buy it at $1 25 an acre, and he asks that others shall be kept out of their rights until he can get a bill through Congress. That they might have a chance to assert their rights, that they might have a chance to enjoy the rights they had under the law, it was the duty of Senators who were familiar with the case to hasten its final determination; and now that the committee have investigated it I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I understand that in this case there was a report made in the House of Representatives from the Judiciary Committee, headed by Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in favor of this claim. There is also a report from the Senate committee, as the Senator states, unfavorable to the claim, which in the former debate was stated to be of some length. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada that it is scarcely worth while for us to occupy time in the reading of these reports at present. The decision of this question of order will determine whether we are to proceed with the investigation of this case upon the merits, and he can see that if we enter upon the merits by considering one report, necessarily we shall be compelled to have the other read.

Mr. STEWART. Nobody would think of upsetting this rule, which has been in operation since the foundation of the Government, except to reach some meritorious case; and it is alleged by the Senator from Indiana that this is such a meritorious case that technical rules should not intervene.

Mr. HENDRICKS. An argument is never strengthened by misunderstanding the position occupied by an opponent. I said that before the Senate the presumption now stood in favor of the adverse report of the committee. I even went that far. Instead of basing my argument upon the merit of the claim itself, I simply based it upon the merit of the claim that the party be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks that the report be read, and that question ought to be settled first.

Mr. MORTON. I rise to a question of order on that.

Mr. STEWART. I have not got through with my reply to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is that when the reading of a paper is called for, and it is objected to, it is to be decided by the Senate without debate.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope it will not be read. It throws no light upon the subject at all.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand the Senator from Nevada calls for the reading of the report as a part of his remarks on this occasion. If he has a right to make a speech on the merits of the question—and the merits of the question seem to be open—he has a right to incorporate in that speech what matter he pleases, and ask the Clerk, as a matter of courtesy or favor, to read that part of his remarks.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNESS. I have got the floor, and cannot be disturbed at present except by the Chair.

Mr. President, when the fog clears away from this action a little more, when it shall be my time to take the floor, I shall wish to say a few words to the Senate, especially upon the remarks submitted by the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] this morning, and some remarks that fell from the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] yesterday. There has been a personal direction given to this question and this debate; and I wish those Senators and all others to understand that I am here, for one, to defend all the action that I have taken in connection with this case against all persons whatsoever. The imputations that are worked into this debate cannot go unnoticed, and when I shall be entitled to the floor I shall address myself to that part of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reading of the paper.

Mr. STEWART. I propose to go on with my remarks, and use that report, if the Clerk will furnish it to me, as a part of my remarks. If there is any objection to his reading it I will read it myself. I want to use it as an argument to show that McGarrahan's case has been considered by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not consider that a discussion of the merits of the case is in order in discussing this question of order. The merits cannot be material. The question is whether it is in order to take up the bill for reference; that is all.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask leave to read the rule. It is the last part of Rule 11:

"And motions to take up or proceed to the consideration of any question shall be determined without debate upon the merits of the question proposed to be considered."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is aware of that rule. The merits of a question are not open on a motion to take up, but that is not exactly the question here now. The question is whether it is in order to take up the bill or to make the motion to take it up.

Mr. STEWART. I am aware of that rule; and it was enforced against me the other day, and I submitted to it when enforced against me. Other Senators continually allude to the fact that Mr. McGarrahan has not had a hearing before the Senate, that his case has not been investigated. Here was a report that was printed and on the tables of Senators and they had the opportunity to see it, and the bill was called up in the usual way. The gentlemen calling it up were under no obligations or no promise, express or implied, to delay the matter, and thus tie up the property of other men and dispense with the execution of the laws of the country. On the contrary, they were under an obligation to their constituents and to the country to see that the laws were enforced. They were not bound to stand by and see men kept out of their rights under the laws until Mr. McGarrahan could see whether he could get a bill through that would give him their property; but the allegation is that it was not sufficiently considered in the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I am obliged to call for the order of the day. It is past one o'clock.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday is now the order of the day, being the bill (S. No. 256) relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I now again submit the motion I did on Monday, that this bill and all prior orders be postponed with a view to take up the bill in regard to the public debt and the currency. It is very manifest, I think, that this railroad bill cannot pass without considerable further debate; and since Monday it has become very manifest that this bill, if it is to pass the Senate, cannot be acted on by the House of Representatives at this session. We are consuming very valuable time. I desire to submit some observations to the Senate on the bill to which I allude, a bill of a public character; and I hope, therefore, the Senate will allow it to be taken up. I do not think it will injure the interests of these parties or do any damage whatever.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved and seconded that the present order and all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MORTON. I think the Senate would do right in allowing the regular order of business to be postponed long enough to settle the question of order which has been discussed. So far, however, as the motion made by the Senator from Ohio is concerned, while I shall vote for the railroad bill, I think it due to the Senator from Ohio, as chairman of the Committee on Finance, that the bill mentioned by him should be taken up, at least long enough to allow him to make his speech. I am anxious to hear what he has to say in favor of the bill, and I know the country is. I think it is due to him as a matter of courtesy that the bill should be taken up at least long enough to let him make his speech, and then I am in favor of resuming the consideration of the railroad bill and continuing it until it is settled. But I will now say to Senators that I shall call up the question of order to-morrow and ask the Senate to give its attention to it long enough for its settlement.

Mr. POMEROY. When we adjourned last night I thought the Senate was about ready to vote on the central branch bill; but the adjournment was carried under an apprehension created by the remarks of the Senator from New York, that there was a nearer route than the one this company propose to make by one hundred and thirty-four miles. I am now prepared to prove from official sources that it is over two hundred miles further, and I challenge contradiction.

Mr. CONKLING. I will say to the Senator that when that bill comes up I shall be prepared to prove that my statement was inside of the distance.

Mr. POMEROY. All I say is that I want an opportunity to make that correction, and then I shall be ready to vote. I do not want any delay.

Mr. CORBETT. I am in favor of the motion made by the Senator from Ohio. He gave notice some ten days ago that he would move on Monday last to take up the finance bill. He gave way for the regular order of business that this railroad bill might be discussed. He has been prepared to address the Senate for the past two days. I think it is due to him, due to the country, due to the important questions involved in his bill, that it should be taken up and disposed of. If we are going to pass a bill of that importance during this session we certainly should take it up and discuss it and dispose of it as soon as possible, or else it cannot be reached in the House of Representatives. I do not believe that even if the railroad bill now pending should be passed by the Senate it could secure favorable action from the other House at this session. I am, then, in favor of taking up the bill indicated by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I need hardly assure the honorable Senator from Ohio that I would most willingly extend to him every courtesy in my power. I am as anxious as he is to take up for consideration the bill to which he has referred to furnish him an opportunity to address the Senate on that subject. But, sir, we have proceeded so far in the discussion of the present bill, and I think we are so near a final vote upon it, that I cannot yield, and I call upon the friends of the bill to stand by it and finish it to-day. Let us finish it; dispose of it one way or the other; either pass it or defeat it, and let the company that is concerned and the public be at rest in regard to our action upon it. I ask the friends of the bill to stand by it at this moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I made the same appeal on Saturday last on behalf of a much more important measure, a measure that I am sure met the assent of a large majority of the Senate; but the appeal was made in vain; the Senate postponed the air-line bill and took up the central branch bill. It has been debated for three days with a reasonable certainty that it cannot pass during the present Congress, and that it must be debated again at the next Congress. I trust, therefore, that without consuming any more time on this motion the Senate will proceed to public business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is due to the public interests and to the Senator from Ohio that the bill to which he calls our attention should be taken up. There is no possibility that we shall finish the bill under discussion to-day. The friends of the bill are talking upon it and will continue to talk upon it, and are preventing its passage and will continue to do so. I think we had better take up the bill of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HOWARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Ohio merely desires to appeal to the courtesy of the Senate to allow him to make a speech I shall not object.

Mr. SHERMAN. I never yet appealed to the courtesy of the Senate to allow me to take up its time in making a speech. I desire to take up this bill because it is a matter of overriding public importance; and as the organ of the Committee on Finance I propose to express my views in regard to it.

Mr. POMEROY. If it is proposed to take up the bill for action now I cannot consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not suppose the Senate will take a vote on the currency bill to-day.

Mr. SUMNER. The measure now pending, as I understand it, is one of positive equity. I heard the Senator from Ohio himself, at the beginning of the debate last session, admit that it was a case of equity. Such is its character. Now it has been under discussion for nearly a year; we are just arriving at a vote; it is about being taken; in the natural course of things it will be taken to-day; and yet the Senator from Ohio, who has admitted it to be a case of equity, interferes with another motion which at a proper time he knows I am ready to sustain, the effect of which is to defeat the pending proposition. If this pending proposition is once put aside at this stage those who are interested lose all the benefit of the year's discussion. It has been explained to the Senate; it is now understood; and all that I ask, as one who has supported it from the beginning, is an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a question of courtesy. It is whether we shall extend to the Senator from Ohio the courtesy we have been in the habit of extending to any gentleman of the Senate who is prepared to address the body on a certain measure which he has given notice of his intention to call up at a certain time. The Senator from Ohio gave notice that he would call up his bill on Monday last; he has already given way for two days; he is prepared to address the Senate; and he asks to have the bill taken up this morning for the purpose of addressing the Senate upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio whether, in case his bill is taken up, he wishes to do anything more with it to-day than submit his remarks, and is then willing to let it go over?

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope its consideration will be continued to-morrow, but I have no objection to testing the sense of the Senate on continuing it. I do not expect any final action to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not, then, pass over informally the pending bill, to enable the Senator from Ohio to submit his remarks on his bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think that is the better way. Any Senator can move to take up the railroad bill after I get through.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a difficulty about that. I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be well to let the pending bill be laid aside informally until he submits his remarks?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather make the usual general motion. The Senate, as a matter of course, can do as they see proper about the order of business after we have progressed somewhat with the bill.

Mr. STEWART. I want it understood that to-morrow I shall insist upon the special order, the constitutional amendment in regard to suffrage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to postpone the pending and all other prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill mentioned by him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I simply desire to say one word in reply to my honorable friend from Oregon. I do not understand this to be an appeal to the courtesy of the Senate. If the Senator from Ohio had desired the special order to lie over informally, or any one had asked that it might lie over informally in order that he might make a speech on another bill, that would be an appeal to courtesy; but when a motion is made to displace the pending bill by another I do not think it is an appeal to courtesy.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Robertson, Sherman, Stewart, Wade, Warner, Whyte, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Welch—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Norton, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Trumbull, and Yates—8.

So the motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC DEBT AND CURRENCY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending and former orders having been postponed, the question now is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to take up the bill (S. No. 793) in relation to the public debt and the currency. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me to make a suggestion? I propose to recommend this bill to the Committee on Finance with positive instructions to bring in a particular bill. I suggest to the honorable Senator that my proposition be read with a view to his having it before him in connection with the bill on which he proposes to speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the proposed motion, which was to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu of the matter so stricken out to report a bill embodying the substance of the following propositions:

1. Gold and silver coin is the measure of par established by the world and adopted by the Constitution of the United States for all property, values, debts, and other pecuniary liabilities; and the Government of the United States having on the sale of the bonds which constitute the bulk of the national debt received greatly less, when measured by the par of gold and silver coin, than their nominal amount, said bonds should be discharged by the payment in coin of their value by that par at the dates they were respectively sold by the Government, and the future interest upon said bonds should be reduced to five per cent. per annum on their value as aforesaid, payable in coin.

2. That all other debts and pecuniary liabilities created or incurred since the issue of legal-tender notes, and which do not express to be payable in gold or silver coin, were contemplated and intended by the parties to be met and paid in currency; and on the general resumption of specie payments, such debts and liabilities should be discharged by the payment in gold and silver coin of their value by that par when they become due and payable.

3. That the annual expenditures of the Government should be reduced within the following general scale: for the civil service, $45,000,000; pensions and Indians, $30,000,000; Department of War, $25,000,000; Navy Department, $20,000,000; contingencies and miscellaneous, $10,000,000; and interest on the public debt, $50,000,000; and the whole surplus of the revenue should be faithfully applied to the extinguishment of the public debt.

4. The taxes which are now so grievous a burden upon the people of the United States should be reduced at least $100,000,000 annually of their aggregate amount, and a day within three years should be named for the general resumption of specie payments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I suppose it is expected of me to state in general terms the reasons that induced the Committee on Finance to report this measure, and also to state why other measures of a financial character referred to the committee have not received its sanction.

And in the first place it is but right to recall the embarrassments of the committee, not only from the intrinsic difficulties of the subjects referred to us, but from the great diversity of opinion that exists in all parts of the country as to the proper measures to be adopted. I appeal to no party to sustain this measure, yet we must all recognize the difficulty of harmonizing the great diversities of opinion that exist on financial measures except by a partial surrender of individual opinion and something like a party support of any measure that may be agreed upon.

In order to consider this measure properly we must have a clear perception of what is sought to be accomplished. The object we have in view is to appreciate our currency to the standard of gold as rapidly as the public interest will allow. Our present currency or "lawful money" consists of notes of the United States, and these are a legal tender in payment of all debts. Based upon them, and of equal value with them, is a subsidiary currency of notes of national banks, and these are redeemable in United States notes, and are receivable in payment of taxes. We have also a form of demand notes, convertible at the will of the holder into lawful money, called three per cent. certificates. We have also a fractional paper currency which is convertible into lawful money on demand. These four species of notes compose the paper currency of the country, and the amount of each is stated as follows:

United States notes.....	$356,021,673
National bank notes.....	299,806,565
Three per cent. certificates.....	55,865,000
Fractional currency.....	34,215,716
In all.....	$745,908,353

All this currency is by law at par. By law it is either made the standard of value or may at pleasure be converted into the standard of value. It is the legal measure of all commodities and of all debts, except for duties on imported goods and interest of the public debt. But in truth and in fact it is not at par in the standard money of the world. One dollar of it has only the same purchasing power as seventy-four cents in gold. Gold, which is real money, not the representative of money, but money itself, of intrinsic value; recognized as such by every man in all civilized countries and in all ages of the world—gold is demonetized by the law, cannot be collected in the courts, and, like cotton or wheat, is treated as a commodity whose value is measured by what we call "lawful money."

Now, it seems to me that the first step in our investigation should be to abandon the attempt to reason from a false standard. We must, to begin with, recognize the immutable law of currency; and that is, there is but one par, and that par is gold. Since the earliest records of humanity gold and silver have been employed as the equivalent for effecting exchanges. From Solon to our day innumerable attempts have been made to substitute something else as money, but in spite of all gold and silver have maintained their exclusive dominion as the money of mankind.

The gold in the shield of Achilles, the shekels that bought the field at Machpelah, the pieces of silver the price of the blood of our Saviour, will be current coin when the completed history of nations now rising into greatness will be folded away among the records of time.

No nation can permanently adopt a standard of value that will not be controlled and regulated by the standard of gold. No degree of isolation, no expedient of legislation, can save any nation which maintains any intercourse with foreign nations from the operation of this supreme law. Like the tides of the ocean or the movements of the planets, it is beyond our jurisdiction. This higher law of the standard of values will sooner or later govern and regulate all prices, even of commodities that do not enter into foreign exchanges. It is utterly idle for a commercial people like the United States, with a foreign commerce of $800,000,000 annually, with citizens trading in every port of the world, and receiving annually four hundred thousand immigrants, to escape from the operation of this primary law of trade. Different nations have tried various expedients to evade it, and have always failed. For centuries gold and silver coins were clipped and alloyed, but it only took more of them to buy a certain commodity. In modern times paper money or credit has been substituted for real money. Laws compelled the people to take them as money. As long as this money did not exceed the amount of real money in the country it operated well. It promoted exchanges and gave great activity to enterprises, and its nominal value was the same as its real value. But when the paper money was increased or the gold exported, the paper money depreciated; it had less purchasable power, prices rose, and either the paper money became demonetized, was rejected and repudiated, or the false standard was advanced in value to the gold standard.

The most successful attempt to substitute paper money for real money took place in Great Britain in 1797. The Bank of England, then having in circulation $55,000,000 of notes, was forbidden by an act of Parliament to pay its notes in coin, and they were, in effect, made a legal tender. By 1810 the amount of them was gradually increased to $110,000,000. It was observed that though gold was demonetized and its export prohibited, yet that its market value had risen near twenty per cent., or from £46 14s. 6d. to £56 for a pound of gold. An eminent writer on political economy called attention to this fact as conclusive evidence of the depreciation of the paper currency. A committee of the House of Commons, of whom were several of the most eminent statesmen and financiers of England, gave the subject a careful examination, and the result was the famous "bullion report." A majority of this committee agreed that in spite of the act of Parliament gold was still the true standard of value, and, measured by this standard, the currency was depreciated by an excess of Bank of England notes. They say—"That no safe, certain, and constantly adequate provision against an excess of paper currency, either occasional or permanent, can be formed, except in the convertibility of all such paper into specie."

Still, driven by the pressure of war, the bank issued more notes, and their depreciation continued until the close of the war. The bank slowly entered upon the hard task of appreciating its notes to the gold standard.

During our brief national history we have made several efforts to substitute paper money for real money. Continental money was a revolutionary effort to coin paper into money. General Spinner has had occasion recently to inform some Rip Van Winkle, who wished con-continental money redeemed in lawful money, that provision had been made to redeem it at the rate of one dollar in coin for one hundred dollars continental money, but even this poor privilege expired in 1793.

During the war of 1812 the United States undertook to treat State bank bills as lawful money. They soon became depreciated, and when the war was over and it became necessary to appreciate them to the gold standard, notes, banks, and debtors were swept into general bankruptcy, and the people commenced again upon the solid basis of gold and silver coin.

So, during our civil war, both the United States and the rebels undertook to make paper not merely the representative of money, but real money. The paper money of the rebels followed the course of continental money and French assignats. Ours, carefully limited in amount, supported by heavy taxes and by great resources, is still called lawful money; but, after all, its value is daily measured by the gold standard. It is only the substitute of money to be paid at a future day, and is not real money.

Even silver, long the standard of value among civilized nations, is now demonetized in some of them from the impossibility of maintaining a double standard. It was found by experience that the market value of these two precious metals varied as the production of one or the other increased in amount, thus creating confusion and compelling alterations in the coinage. The result is that silver in Great Britain and the United States is a legal tender for but small amounts, while gold is the universal standard of value. Even the stamp fixed by a Government in the process of coining does not make it money or change its value. It only certifies to its weight and fineness as a matter of convenience and not as an addition of value. Indeed the mechanical process of coining has frequently reduced the market value of the gold by making it necessary to receive it when exported.

Let us, then, recognize as an axiom that nothing but coin is the real money before we undertake to deal with our currency. And Senators may think I consume too much time in dealing with an apparent truism, but it will be found that the denial of this truism, both in Congress and among the people, is the cause of most of the confusion in the public mind as to our currency. It affects our minds as it affected the Englishman in 1810. When told that the Bank of England note was depreciated he said: "Is not this pound note worth twenty shillings, and you tell me it is only worth sixteen?" Or like the reasoning of the learned priests in the time of Galileo, who saw the sun moving around the four corners of the earth and knew that Galileo was an imposter. So we call our paper money par, and having made a god with our own hands compare all other gods by it. We must, then, abandon the false standard, set up again the true standard, and compare again our money, our productions, our wealth, and our resources by the true standard, or we will allow ourselves to be led by false premises into the most erroneous conclusions.

And yet this does not impugn the wisdom of a paper currency founded upon the credit of a nation, or of it being made in times of great public danger a legal tender in payment of debts. Such paper money has exercised a powerful influence in ancient as well as modern history. It saved Rome in her fierce conflict with Hannibal. It enabled Great Britain to maintain her wars against Napoleon. Without paper money, and, as I believe, without making it a legal tender, we could not have mustered and maintained our immense armies during the recent war. Gold was banished by the war. The quantity was too small for the vast expenditure required by the war. We had then no legal paper representative of value. The State bank notes were wisely excluded from national circulation. We then cautiously issued our legal-tender notes, carefully limiting their amount, and only increasing the amount when we could not borrow them back at a reasonable rate of interest. We called them lawful money, and as a measure of the highest necessity compelled our citizens to receive them as such, but after all they were only a forced substitute for money, the promise to pay money, and not real money. Though they were made the legal standard of value their own value was daily fixed in gold in the open market in New York. We watched their depreciation as the dark days of the war came on, and tried to arrest it. We utterly failed. The effort was patriotic, but it was impossible. England did the same in her wars. She passed laws forbidding the purchase and sale or exportation of gold, but, like ours, her efforts were abortive. I am not ashamed to confess my part in all the efforts made during the war to maintain our paper money as the true standard of value, and I confess it was impossible. Every intelligent business man watched daily the gold barometer, which with unerring certainty fixed the value of our greenbacks, of our public credit and bonds, as it did the value of our cotton and corn.

A distinction between the standard of value and the actual agent of exchange must always be kept in view. One must be gold, and the other ought to be paper money convertible into gold.

Such paper currency, with proper measures to meet panics or extreme drains of specie, is proven by all experience to be the best possible currency that has yet been devised by man. An unmixed coin currency cannot exist in a commercial country, for necessity will compel merchants will devise, and the people will use some representative of money whether it be banker's bills of exchange, certificates of deposit, or bank or Government paper money. And one unbending, unrelaxing rule that compels payment in coin at all times, during panics, distress, or war, as well as in peace, will periodically produce disaster and bankruptcy. The requisites of a good currency are—

1. That it be a paper currency.
2. That it be amply secured either by the credit of a nation or by unquestioned collaterals.
3. That except in extreme cases of panic it be convertible into coin.
4. That provisions be made for a suspension of the right to demand coin during such panics.

And the only legislative question that can arise on these points are whether the paper money should be issued by the nation or by corporators, and what relief shall be provided in case of a necessary suspension of specie payments. As to the first question, both England and the United States have settled upon a bank currency secured by the public credit. As to the second, they have tried various devices, as the raising of the rate of interest, a temporary suspension of payments, making the paper a legal tender; but all these expedients are merely temporary to bridge over a war, a panic, a period of starvation, or an unnatural adverse balance of trade. They are remedies in sickness to be discarded the moment that health comes again. Whatever theorists may suggest, however sugar-coated the remedy may be, there is but one test of a healthy paper currency, and that is its convertibility into gold coin.

If, then, gold only is the true standard of money, why shall we not commence our financial measures by restoring it to its place as a legal standard of money? Why not allow our citizens to base their future contracts on gold? Why not enforce these contracts in the courts as legal and valid? There are difficulties in applying a new standard to existing contracts made upon a different standard; but this difficulty does not apply to future contracts. We wish to restore specie payments, and yet we forbid all men from dealing in specie. Such contracts are put upon the same legal footing as gaming contracts. It would seem that if we are at all sincere in wishing specie payments we should not only promote specie contracts, but should encourage them.

Contracts, to a vast amount, are now from necessity made upon the gold basis. All our foreign commerce, exports and imports, amounting annually to over eight hundred million dollars, are based upon gold. The price of all public securities is fixed by the gold standard of London and Frankfurt. The sale of all imported goods by the importer to the jobber is by the gold standard. The daily transactions in gold in New York often amount to $100,000,000. On the Pacific slope gold is the only standard of value. We cannot alter this if we would. Why not recognize the fact, legalize these contracts, and conform our measures to the gradual adjustment of existing contracts, including paper money, to the standard of gold.

And, sir, let us also recognize the general principle that it is wiser and more in accordance with the spirit of our Government to leave this adjustment to the voluntary contracts of the people rather than undertake it by arbitrary rules of law. If our people are left free they can do this without injury to debtor or creditor, without confiscation of property, and without any change in the intrinsic value of property.

For these reasons the Committee on Finance regard the first section of this bill, which legalizes gold contracts, as an indispensable preliminary to any plan for appreciating our currency to gold. This section has twice received the sanction of the Senate, and its primary importance has generally been admitted in popular discussions.

The objections to this section are stated by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS,] as follows:

"The means he suggests for returning to specie payments are twofold. The first is to legalize specific contracts to be executed in coin. I voted for a bill for that purpose last session without much consideration, and have since become satisfied it was an error. The unwary would be enticed into such contracts by the crafty, and those in straightened circumstances or under heavy pressure would be forced into them. No man can safely make a contract, to be executed in coin, while the currency is depreciated and the financial condition of the country is fluctuating. Such contracts, where not brought about by coercion and fraud, would be in the nature of gold gambling—the one party trusting that gold would be at a large premium when the contract was due, and the other that it would command little or none. It could hardly be distinguished from a contract for the delivery of gold at a future time."

This whole objection is based upon the theory that contracts cannot be safely left to the free assent of the parties thereto; that the parties cannot be trusted to make their own contracts lest the creditor oppress the debtor. Sir, the time is not likely to come in our day when the crafty will not have the advantage of the unwary. If we were legislating to protect the unwary we should not for a day permit the existence of inconvertible paper money. Mr. Webster said that—

"Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind none has been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money."

The chief reason is that such paper money is so fluctuating that none but the intelligent and crafty can estimate its fluctuations, while the unwary assume that it is equivalent to gold. If we, then, legislate to protect the unwary we should require all contracts to be on the gold basis, but experience shows that the true basis of contracts is the assent of the parties. We can leave the interest of parties to regulate equivalents, and we can protect a gold contract against usury and fraud much more easily than a contract payable in currency.

The Senator from Indiana proposes to add to the burden of existing contracts an annual interest equivalent to twelve per cent. by requiring gold payment in two and a half years. If the parties were left to adjust this matter by contract they are not likely to adopt a more severe measure to the debtor than his. If it is unsafe to allow parties to make a contract in coin, how can they be allowed to make contracts in currency to be appreciated in coin in two and a half years? If coin contracts are brought about by coercion and fraud the courts will not enforce them, and if gold is required as a consideration for payment of a currency contract it is usurious and will not be enforced. Practically, any law requiring a resumption of specie payments is a law adding to the amount of a currency debt the full depreciation of the currency, unless you either scale the debt or allow the parties to adjust the matter between themselves. The former proposition is indefensible, and the latter is the only way by which the creditor and debtor may by mutual agreement adjust a currency contract by equivalent coin. All contracts to pay money are contracts for the delivery of gold, and a contract in currency is only a contract to pay an indefinite amount of gold, depending upon the uncertain depreciation of the currency at the time of the payment. Why may not the parties fix for themselves the amount of gold to be paid rather than leave it to be fixed by the bulls and bears? When contracts are authorized in gold all the provisions of the municipal law which protect contracts from fraud, usury, or coercion apply to them as well as to contracts in currency. And the reason why such contracts were ever forbidden was because public policy demanded for a time the suspension of specie payments, while now the very fact that we are providing for specie payments is conclusive in favor of the policy of specie contracts in the future.

Not only ought specie contracts to be allowed, but they ought to be encouraged. Every such contract smooths the way to a general resumption. If they become general gold now hoarded will be let loose. This will produce an expansion of the currency. When during specie payments we estimate the aggregate of currency, we add the amount of specie to the amount of convertible paper money. So when specie payments are suspended if specie can be made to perform some of the functions of currency it adds so much to the volume of the currency, and as specie contracts become general the process of resumption is complete.

Again, while specie is the best standard of currency, it is not the most convenient for transportation, even from hand to hand. To obviate this, commercial paper, bills of exchange, drafts, and certificates of deposit have been devised for distant exchanges, and paper money convertible into coin has been used for exchanges from hand to hand. When you authorize contracts in gold and make demands for gold you at once unlock for daily use the coin now hoarded in private hands. You can then provide the most important agency of modern times—a convertible paper currency, always equal in value to gold, its true representative, easy to guard, conceal, and transport. It is only by restoring gold contracts that you can safely avail yourself of all the multiplied uses of paper money. Then, and not until then, you can issue paper money based upon gold. The gold now lying idle in the Treasury may then be utilized, made to produce an interest by the issue of coin notes based upon it, and thus enter into actual circulation and gradually be made to perform all the uses of money now performed by a depreciated currency. This is the basis of the fourth section of the bill, which utilizes the gold by the issue of gold notes based upon it, and their application to the purchase of bonds and the reduction of interest.

And the right to make contracts in gold may now safely and properly be extended to banks organized under the national banking system. Upon a deposit of bonds existing banks or new banks may be authorized to issue gold notes equal to sixty-five per cent. of the value of United States bonds deposited to secure their circulation. Their payment will be in coin, but in all other respects they may be subject to the general provisions and limitations of the banking act. Many of the banks, especially in commercial cities, will gladly avail themselves of such a provision to withdraw their present circulation and substitute gold notes convertible on demand into coin. With such a provision and on such a basis the system may be free, and thus all the embarrassing questions about the inequality of the distribution of banking circulation will be avoided. A right conferred upon all, without limit as to amount and upon regulations applicable to all, would at once secure to the South and West new banking facilities, and would rapidly tend to substitute coin or its equivalent for legal-tender notes, and without the severe process of contraction. The objection made, that this would create two currencies of unequal values, applies as well to the present state of the currency, for we have now two currencies of unequal value—gold and legal tenders.

If we are sincere in wishing specie payments we must not only multiply the demands for coin; we must encourage coin contracts, issue coin notes, both by the United States and by the banks, and thus without contraction dispense with the use of the inferior and depreciated currency.

The superior value of coin notes, their use in commercial cities, their convenience in the gold-producing States, will soon give them higher credit, and secure them in every part of the country. I am confident that under such a system the national banks will, if allowed, and before specie payments are resumed, substitute coin notes for their present circulation, and that, too, without diminishing the aggregate of circulation. Many of them have now reserves and profits enough to make the requisite deposit of additional bonds; and the gold certificates now issued from the Treasury might be used for their coin reserves without creating new demands for coin.

There is but one other consideration I wish to urge in favor of the sections of this bill relating to gold contracts and gold notes, and that grows out of the doubt that rests upon the validity of the legal-tender act. We must not forget that currency contracts depend not upon the agreement of parties, but entirely upon the validity of that act. This has always been doubted, and is now contested before the Supreme Court. I remember very well the discussions in the Senate when this act passed. Its validity was then denied by Judge Collamer and other able jurists, and it was only maintained by myself and other Senators from the imperative necessity of supporting armies then in the field. This necessity has long since ceased. There can be no pretense that as to future contracts by the United States or by individuals there is any necessity that the public credit should any longer take the place of real money. The legal-tender act is only material as it affects existing contracts. Is it wise to continue a measure only justified by a grave public necessity now when the necessity has passed? It may be that the Supreme Court will deny the validity of the legal-tender act, or limit its operation to existing contracts made since its passage. It may subject currency contracts to enforcement in coin. Is it not wiser to bridge over this uncertainty by authorizing the adjustment of this matter between the creditor and debtor?

Again, sir, the law as it now stands is productive of gross injustice. You require nearly one half of your taxes to be paid in gold, and yet you will not enforce a contract by which the merchant buys the gold for you. Cargoes of tea, coffee, and merchandise can only be bought in gold, and yet if property is delivered upon a promise to pay gold it cannot be enforced. Gross and palpable injustice may be done in a multitude of transactions necessarily based upon gold by appealing to the legal-tender act. I conclude, then, this branch of the subject by the earnest opinion that it was a good policy three years ago, and it is good policy now, to allow all parties to stipulate the time when, the amount, and the medium of payment, subject to the general laws of fraud, usury, and force. Free trade in domestic productions, liberty to contract and be contracted with, has never been restrained before. Let us restore these rights; and having also provided a paper representative of the coin in the Treasury of the United States and a bank currency convertible into gold and founded upon the highest securities, let us now deal with the much more difficult question—the appreciation of the present currency to the standard of gold.

If this question affected alone the Government of the United States we might resume specie payments very soon; sooner even than the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] proposes. By funding a portion of the United States notes, by requiring the banks to maintain their full reserves in legal tenders, by withdrawing the three per cent. certificates, and by the use of the gold in the Treasury, we could resume at once. This process might increase the bonded indebtedness of the United States $100,000,000 and the interest $5,000,000; but our revenues are ample in gold to pay the increased interest, and the actual saving in the current expense of the Government by the reduction of prices to the gold standard would be double and perhaps quadruple the increased interest. The body of our expenditure being the interest of the public debt, is now payable in gold, and its burden is not increased by specie payments, while the saving in expenditure and the probable saving by the funding of the debt at a lower interest would largely exceed any interest we would have to pay on notes withdrawn from circulation.

And if the burden of resumption fell alone upon the national banks the task would be an easy one. Their securities, deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, are now nearly equal in gold to the amount of their circulation. A call under the banking act of ten per cent. additional security could be easily met by the great body of them, and thus enable them to resume whenever the United States is prepared to resume. Their profits in the past have been large. Those not now strong enough to perform the great object of their organization, namely, to furnish a uniform currency convertible into gold, may well give way to other banks ready to take their places.

But redemption by the banks means redemption by all their debtors; by the merchants, manufacturers, and traders of the country. And we are therefore compelled to deal with this question, not as affects the United States and the banks merely, but as it affects all the people of the United States. How will the appreciation of the currency affect their interests? Suppose it accomplished, how will it affect different individuals? A person entirely out of debt but possessed of property of productive value would not be affected by the change. His property would be of less nominal value, but it would be of the same intrinsic value. Its producing capacity is undiminished. It will buy the same food, clothing, and necessities of life. The relative value of commodities to each other is not affected by the currency used, but by supply and demand.

If the currency is depreciated it will take more of it to purchase the article. If it is appreciated it will take less; but the appreciation or depreciation of the currency does not affect the price of other commodities in their relation to each other. This can only be affected by the demand for them, by the supply of them, and ultimately by the cost of producing them.

So a man without property and not in debt, but who depends upon his labor for his support, is not in the end affected merely by an appreciation in the currency. His wages may be less, but what he receives of the appreciated currency has the same purchasing power as the higher wages received before. The change does affect him for a time, for land and labor are the last commodities to feel a change in the currency. The immediate effect of a depreciation in the currency is injurious to him, for his food and clothing rise more quickly than his labor, but appreciation of the currency is immediately beneficial to him for the reason that his labor does not fall in price so quickly as food and clothing. The value of labor, however, may be disastrously affected by the mode of appreciation. If it is brought about by a sudden contraction the result will be a suspension of work, of enterprises, and consequently a reduction in the price of labor.

Persons of fixed salaries and incomes are benefited by an appreciation of the currency to the full extent of the appreciation. Their incomes have increased purchasing power, and they are enabled to extend their purchases, supply new wants, and add to their capital. The opposite effect during the war, when the currency was being depreciated, carried distress and want and poverty into many comfortable homes. It fell with severe effect upon preachers and widows and old men, who saw the purchasing power of their annuities melt away, and a condition of independence changed to poverty and want. They will, by an appreciation of the currency, be restored to their own again.

Merchants, dealers, traders, and bankers will be affected by an appreciation of the currency precisely as their debts and credits bear to each other. If they owe more than they can promptly collect on debts due to them they must lose to the full extent of the appreciation, and they must make this loss good by a sale of a part of their property at reduced prices or by contracting new debts to be paid in an appreciated currency. As a general rule, any appreciation of the currency is injurious to all these classes, for they are generally in debt, and even where enough is due them to pay with yet the delay in payment or the failure of their debtors almost always embarrasses them. Commercial and banking usage compels promptness, so that a merchant or a banker, however prudent he may be, is often compelled to sacrifice his assets to meet a sudden appreciation of the currency.

But the distress caused by an appreciation of the currency falls mainly on the debtor class; others suffer only by reason of his inability to pay. What does specie payments mean to a debtor? It means the payment of $185 where he has agreed to pay $100, or, which is the same thing, the payment of $100 where he has agreed to pay seventy-four dollars. Where he has purchased property and paid one fourth of it, it means the loss of the property; it means the addition of one fourth to all currency debts in the United States. A measure to require a debtor now to pay his debt in gold or currency equivalent to gold requires him to pay one hundred and thirty-five bushels of wheat when he agreed to pay one hundred, and if this appreciation is extended through a period of three years it requires him to pay an interest of twelve per cent. in addition to the rate he has agreed to pay. When we consider the enormous indebtedness of a new country like ours, where capital is scarce, and where credit has been substituted in the place of capital, it presents a difficulty that may well cause us to pause. We may see that the chasm must be crossed, but it will make us wary of our footsteps. Good faith and public policy demand that we appreciate our currency to gold, but in the process we must be careful that bankruptcy, distress, and want do not fall upon our fellow-citizens who have based their obligations upon your broken promises. The debtors of this country include the active, enterprising, energetic men in all the various employments of life. It is a serious proposition to change their contracts so as in effect to require them to pay one third more than they agreed to pay. They have not paused in their business to study questions of political economy. They have based their operations upon this money, which you have declared to be lawful money. You may change its relative value, but in doing so you should give them a reasonable opportunity to change their contracts so as to adapt them to the new standards of value you may prescribe for them.

Before discussing the measure proposed by the committee, which Senators may consider not specific enough or not rapid enough, let us look to history for lights to guide us in a most difficult and dangerous passage.

The appreciation of the currency is a far more distressing operation than Senators may suppose. Our own and other nations have gone through this process before, and always with the sorest distress. Sometimes they have repudiated the depreciated currency, and, from the necessity of the case, fallen back upon barter and gold. Such as I have already stated was the case with the continental money, with the French assignats, and with confederate scrip. All these revolutionary movements were accompanied with the utter destruction of credit and trade. We have also to guide us several examples of the appreciation of a debased currency.

At the revolution of 1688, in England, the silver coin, then a legal tender, had become so depreciated by wear and by clipping as to be worth only seventy-five per cent. of the mint standard, and this was practically the only currency. It became necessary to appreciate this currency to the mint standard. As all prices and obligations of debt had become adjusted to the lowered value of the existing coin, it was proposed to reduce the mint standard to the current standard, or to issue new shillings at one and one fourth shillings. This was opposed by Isaac Newton and John Locke, the two "foremost men of all the world," who contended that if the loss of recoinage was thrown upon the mint it would not affect the individuals at all. This view was strongly opposed by practical merchants, but new shillings were issued and exchanged for the old shillings at par. As between the mint and the holder of the old shillings this was all right; but the effect was immediately disastrous upon all prices. It took one third more commodities to get the new shillings, but the old number of shillings was required to pay a debt. Merchants, traders, and debtors were ruined. The Bank of England, then in its infancy, only escaped failure by issuing its notes payable in installments. A rival bank was utterly wrecked. Small capitalists found themselves ruined, and laborers and artisans deprived of employment. Hence the unpopularity of William the Third, and the prevalence of general discontent during his reign.

A similar condition of currency to our own existed in Great Britain after the general peace of 1815. For eighteen years the notes of the Bank of England were practically a legal tender, and upon them, as upon our greenbacks, was based a currency issued by the country banks. Though the aggregate of all this paper circulation never amounted to $250,000,000, yet it at times depreciated from twenty to thirty per cent. below par. When the war was over measures were slowly adopted for the appreciation of this currency to the gold standard. These measures resulted in a reduction of the paper currency from $231,000,000 in 1815 to $152,000,000 in 1821. Commercial paper, discounted at the Bank of England, fell from $75,000,000 in 1815 to $13,000,000 in 1821. It is only necessary to appeal to the histories of the time to show the disastrous effect. The productive value of capital was increased fifty per cent. A thousand dollars in 1821 would buy more than eighteen hundred dollars in 1815. Small traders, debtors, and laborers were reduced to the sorest distress. The loss to them was far greater than the actual depreciation of the currency, for all confidence and trust were lost. The only compensation to Great Britain was the rapid fall in the rate of interest from the abundance of idle capital, and her ability to reduce the interest of her public debt within a short period to three per cent.

If Senators wish other examples of the severe process of passing from a depreciated currency to a gold currency, or to a paper currency convertible into gold, let them read the story of the times after the Revolution and after the war of 1812 and after the revolutions of 1837, all of which were periods of transition from a depreciated paper currency to a convertible paper currency. Sir, it is not possible to take this voyage without sore distress. To every person except a capitalist out of debt or to the salaried officer or annuitant it is a period of loss, danger, lassitude of trade, fall of wages, suspension of enterprise, bankruptcy, or disaster. To every railroad it is an addition of at least one third to the burden of the debt; and more than that, deduction from the value of its stock.

To every bank it means the necessity of paying $150 for one hundred of its notes and deposits, except so far as the bank may transfer this to its debtors. It means the ruin of all dealers whose debts are twice their capital though one third less than their property. It means the fall of all agricultural productions without any very great reduction of taxes. To attempt this task suddenly, by a surprise upon our people, by at once paralyzing their industry, by arresting them in the midst of lawful business and applying a new standard of value to their property without any reduction of their debt or giving them an opportunity to compound with their creditors or distribute their loss, would be an act of folly without example in evil in modern times.

It is sometimes said that we did this in the passage of the legal-tender act; that we inflicted the same loss on the creditor that we now deprecate for the debtor. This is not true. The effect of the legal-tender act was undoubtedly to depreciate our notes, but the process was very slow and gradual. For more than a year it scarcely operated as a depreciation, and during all the time the capital paid off by depreciated notes was invested in bonds, bank stocks, railroads, and manufacturing pursuits created by the war, which yielded as much in gold as the capital produced before the war. Capital lost nothing by the war even when paid in greenbacks, for the demands for capital during the war made ample amends for the loss by the depreciation in greenbacks. It is estimated that the interest-bearing capital of this country now is, upon the gold basis, more than double the capital in 1860. And if it be true that appreciation now will only work the same injury to the debtor that depreciation did to the creditor we would not be justified in peace in inflicting the same injuries justified by war; and the creditor, who is usually the holder of property, is better able to bear the loss of a portion of the money due him than the debtor is to bear an addition to his burden. Our power over the creditor is unlimited. We may levy taxes upon him to any amount, but we have no power to vary a contract or add to the burden of an existing debt.

The question then remains, what mode of appreciation of the value of greenbacks will operate the least injuriously to all the varied business interests of our constituents? and upon this point your committee, after the most careful consideration, came to the conclusion that the only and best plan was to allow them to be funded at the pleasure of the holder into interest-bearing bonds of the United States.

In designating the bond we have selected that now familiar to the people, the ten-forty bond. The market value of this bond is now but slightly above that of the legal tenders, so that the process of appreciation of the notes will be slow and will only advance with the improving credit of the country. It is a bond bearing as low a rate of interest as we are likely to negotiate, and yet of such intrinsic value that we may hope to see it at par with gold within a short period. It enables us after ten years to take advantage of the money market to still further reduce the interest. Its credit is supported by a permanent appropriation from an ample fund sufficient without further act of Congress to pay off every dollar of the debt in twenty-five years.

Again, sir, this provision of the bill is right when tested by the moral sense. When for sufficient reasons we cannot pay the note in coin we are bound to give to the holder our note with interest. Such from the beginning was the policy of the Government. When the notes were first issued under the act of February 25, 1862, they were convertible at will into bonds. We, with a questionable device, by the act of March 3, 1863, took away that right, and should now restore it. During the war a greenback would purchase an equal amount of bonds of any character offered in the market. It paid at par for the five-twenties, the ten-forties, and the seven-thirties. It is now less valuable than these bonds only because it is dishonored paper, which though due is unpaid, and is only valuable as a forced currency, which you compel your citizens to take in payment of their debts, but refuse to take for your own bonds except at a discount. You give the bond the benefit of the improving credit of the country, but you deny this to the note. The simplest and plainest rule of equity requires you if you cannot pay this note to give in exchange for it a bond bearing interest. And here, sir, a difficulty presents itself that forms the basis of all, or nearly all, the division in the committee as to this measure. What shall be done with the United States notes received into the Treasury in the process of funding? The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] will contend that they shall be retired as they are received. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CATTELL] will insist that they must not be retired, but must be reissued. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] wishes to limit the funding of greenbacks to a specific sum each month, and amendments are pending for these purposes. No doubt similar differences as to details will occur in the Senate. My own conviction is, that the notes and ten-forty bonds should be convertible and reconvertible within certain limits until both rise to the par of gold. Such a provision was reported at the last session and is still approved by the committee, but the opposition to it by those who widely differed from each other as to its effect, some insisting that it would produce contraction and others expansion, caused it to be defeated. The proposition in this bill to substitute coin notes for legal-tender notes as the latter are retired by voluntary conversion into bonds is an attempt of the Committee on Finance, in deference to the vote of the Senate at the last session, to effect the same object, namely, to guard against a too rapid contraction of the currency. I must, however, insist upon my conviction that the true way to guard against both undue expansion and contraction while specie payments are suspended is to allow the public creditor, whether noteholder or bondholder, to freely exchange one for the other without any limitation except that the aggregate of circulation should not exceed the United States notes now outstanding; and this aggregate may be gradually reduced as specie payments are resumed. If the Senate shall agree with this opinion by adopting the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. CATTELL], then some changes will have to be made in the fourth section. If, however, the Senate still opposes this mutuality of conversion, then the substitution of coin notes should precede the cancellation of the greenbacks, or a reserve of legal tenders should be maintained by the Secretary of the Treasury, to be issued at his discretion.

Such, sir, are the general provisions of this bill. It seeks to substitute gradually, by the voluntary action of the people, coin contracts, coin notes, and convertible bank bills for currency contracts and irredeemable and inconvertible paper money. It seeks to secure to the public creditor the prompt payment of his interest in coin, and to the people the like payment in coin of the depreciated notes held by them. If the process is too slow it is because the danger of a more rapid process is too great. Let no man deal with this question with the hasty impulse of first impressions, for he will only illustrate his own folly. Let no man be too confident of his own opinions until he has examined those of others, and he will then find that many have traveled this path before him; but no man yet has found an easy road to the resumption of specie payments.

It now remains for me very briefly to state why other propositions submitted to the committee have not been approved. Your patience will not allow me to examine any of the multitude of suggestions that have been made in the public prints, though many of them are worthy of careful study. I will only allude to some propositions that have been referred to the committee. The suggestion of the President to pay the interest for sixteen years if the creditor would surrender the principal has already been disposed of. The plan of the Secretary of the Treasury to contract the currency until we reach the specie basis has already been incidentally referred to. The proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER], though not formally referred to the committee, yet having the sanction of his great name, was carefully considered, and so much of it as was approved was embodied in the bill reported; but its principal feature, the repeal of the legal-tender act after the 1st of July next, is far too sudden, and will, if I am correct in the views already expressed, be disastrous to the great body of the active business men of the country.

The plan of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON], supported by an able speech, was carefully considered by the committee. It rests upon two leading ideas:

1. The accumulation of gold in the Treasury; and
2. The fixing a specific day for the resumption of specie payments.

Now, in most of his speech I heartily concur. All that he says of the necessity of resuming specie payments, of the effect of contraction, and the unjust discrimination that now exists between the note-holder and the bondholder—all this meets my hearty assent. It is the remedy he suggests we have to deal with. Would not the effect of his measure be that the Government would hoard the gold and the people the greenbacks, and thus make the contraction he fears? What more profitable investment could any man make than to take this dollar, now having a purchasable power of seventy-four cents in gold, locking it in his safe with a certainty that in two years it must be worth one dollar in gold, or an annual advance of seventeen and a half per cent? Would not every bank sharply contract its currency and hoard greenbacks as the best investment it could make? What prudent man would dare build a house or factory, a railroad or a barn, with the certain fact before him that the greenbacks he puts into his improvement will be worth thirty-five per cent. more in two years than his improvement then is worth? Why not hold his money for two years until his building will cost him one third less? When the day comes every man, as the sailors say, will be close-reefed; all enterprise will be suspended; every bank will have contracted its currency to the lowest limit, and the debtor, compelled to meet in coin a debt contracted in currency, will find the coin hoarded in the Treasury, no representative of coin in circulation, his property shrunk not only to the extent of the appreciation of the currency, but still more by the artificial scarcity made by the hoarders of gold.

All the historical precedents show that fixing the day for resumption inevitably led to a contraction of the currency by the banks, so that when the day came the actual scarcity of currency prevented a demand for coin; and this process of contraction both in England and the United States produced the sorest distress; and this distress was only relieved in England by the Parliament requiring the loan of exchequer bills and new issues by the Bank of England. At the beginning of our Government the Continental bonds were a species of currency, and as a part of the funding system of Alexander Hamilton he provided for a new paper currency convertible into coin to be issued by the Bank of the United States, and without which he declared his funding system would be a failure. So, sir, after the war of 1812 the sore distress caused by the failure of the State banks was only relieved by a new paper currency issued by the second Bank of the United States, which Mr. Madison, yielding his constitutional objections, approved. We, therefore, think that the general objects sought for by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] can be better attained by legalizing specie contracts; by utilizing the coin in the Treasury; by the gradual substitution of coin, United States notes, and bank bills for the present currency, rather than accumulating gold and fixing a day for resumption.

And now, sir, a multitude of collateral topics present themselves—questions affecting the construction of contracts, questions affecting the public debt, of funding, of the reduction of the rate of interest, questions of taxation and protection, of banking and the distribution of bank circulation. All these have been considered, and no doubt will be presented to the Senate; but we have not embraced them in this bill, for the manifest reason that by attempting too much we are likely to defeat any measure tending to the resumption of specie payments.

This primary duty accomplished will solve many of these questions and prepare the way for other measures. I submit to Senators who favor this bill whether it is not wiser to leave to time, to the progress of events, and to the next Congress to deal with other matters not vital to this measure. It is only in this way that, with the confused and scattered opinions in the public mind, we can hope to accomplish anything. All these questions will be resolved wisely if we are content to follow the example set by Mr. Lincoln and by Congress during the war to make haste slowly.

Sir, you and I and many of our associates have been here during all the great events of our civil war. We have seen Senators from their places openly proclaim in safety their intended infamy and perjury. We have seen our only Army broken and demolished filling the streets of this city, and the rebel flag floating within sight of the Dome of the Capitol. We have seen a vast section of our country filled with armed men, bold, defiant, and confident, engaged in fierce war for the overthrow of our Government. We were deserted by nearly all the Governments of Christian Europe. We have seen four hundred thousand of our countrymen slain in battle or falling by disease. We have met defection and doubt at home, and suffered disaster again and again. But all this has passed away. The long-vacant seats are nearly all filled, and new States then in wilderness are now represented here. Our flag floats in undisputed authority over every part of our territory. All the questions of debate that have risen from time to time in this Senate Chamber have been so decided that authority has been vindicated and liberty been made universal. We are soon to see the great hero of the war clothed with the executive authority of the nation, and bearing with him into his high office the hearty good-will of nearly all the people of the United States. But one thing more is to be accomplished, and that is to place our public credit on a firm, enduring foundation, so that the world may say that this Republic is not wanting either in valor or honor. We may then give way to those who are rapidly treading in our footsteps with a consciousness of having performed our full duty to our country.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, it is my purpose to direct the attention of this body to the consideration of our financial affairs. It might be more agreeable to the Senate to postpone my remarks until a later period in the session; but facts and figures, projects and counter-projects, estimates and speculations will accumulate until it would confound the wisdom of Solomon to tell what we are owing, and exhaust a dozen such treasuries as his to discharge the debt.

Finance is the engrossing topic of the day. It addresses itself to the anxieties, the hopes, and the fears of all classes and conditions of men. Bondholders and bankers, lawyers and doctors, farmers and mechanics, are deeply and vitally interested in its solution. Nor is that all. Many millions of our bonds and other securities have crossed the waters, and England is merry at the prospect of a rich tribute to be drawn yearly from the sweat and toil of American citizens. How long it will take her to acquire the lion's share cannot be determined with mathematical certainty, but from the start she has taken the period will be short, probably not longer than Washington and his army were engaged in achieving our independence. [Laughter.]

Considering the amount involved and the different nationalities concerned, you could hardly overestimate the importance of the question. It should be coolly, calmly, and thoroughly considered. Great toleration and forbearance should be observed in the discussion. High authority has declared that the subject is "mysterious" in some of its relations. There are gentlemen in this Chamber who do not understand "mysteries," and those who do should deal tenderly with their ignorance in that regard. There are very few men who can see very far into the future. The great mass of mankind cannot even tell what a day or an hour will bring forth. A leading lawyer of Kentucky said that he admitted the foreknowledge of God as a general proposition, and with only one exception, that he did not believe that God Himself could tell in advance how a county court would decide a case. [Laughter.] Skepticism shall never induce me to place a limitation upon the attributes of the Almighty; but I will state that no power short of Omniscience can disclose what the Radical party will do between this and the 1st day of July, 1871, nor what will be the financial condition of the country at that period. [Renewed laughter.] Various opinions are entertained by thoughtful and intelligent men, and proscription, fierce and vindictive as it may be, will fail to harmonize action or sentiment upon the subject.

The President of the United States in his last annual message, remembering his early struggles, sympathizing with those who are now encountering even greater difficulties, and desiring that a time should come when poverty should lift up its head and rejoice, and when labor should be emancipated from the thralldom of capital, ventured to give utterance to an idea which had been floating unexpressed in his brain for more than a year. Even if it were heresy, the generous impulse which prompted it should have been a shield to protect it from assault. But hardly had the words fallen from the lips of the reader when Senators sprang to their feet and proceeded in angry phrase to denounce and condemn it. But the theme was changed. A wail for the dead fell in sad and mournful accents upon the ear; eulogies of Stevens followed the censures of Johnson, and twenty funeral orations, pouring forth a long tribute to the genius of the departed, silenced for a season the thunders that had been playing around the head of the living statesman.

I do hope that no gentleman will take exception to what I am about to say. We have had discord and dissension enough. If there be one among us whose warlike spirit prompts him to deeds of chivalry, let him go to Turkey or to Greece and fight it out on that line, bearing with him the glad tidings that "all is quiet on the Potomac." [Laughter.] Approving and indorsing the sentiment put forth by the veteran who is ere long to preside over our destinies, and animated by the same pacific disposition, I say now, henceforth and forever, "Let us have peace." [Great laughter.] The country, without respect to race or color, would be more prosperous and happy if we could only have peace. As it would be an endless undertaking to attempt a reference to all that has been said or written upon the financial question, I shall confine my remarks to a very brief review of some of the positions taken by the distinguished Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS,] and shall rely for my facts entirely upon the reports of the Treasurer and the Secretary of the Treasury.

These gentlemen, however widely they may differ in other respects, concur in the utter detestation, scorn, and contempt which they entertain toward repudiation. Language would fail to express the horror which would seize upon their souls at the bare thought that the Government would ever dishonor the very smallest of its engagements or repudiate any of its obligations. A spotless virgin would not more instinctively fly from the vile presence of a seducer than they would shrink from the contaminating influence of a man so lost to shame as to breathe a suspicion against the national honor. [Laughter.] Such a crime would sink him so low in their estimation that repentance and remorse could never raise him from the depths of his degradation.

It is a fact that good morals and good character depend upon the observance of good faith in all transactions, public and private. It is equally true that profession and practice are not always traveling companions in this world. Repudiation, hideous as it may appear, is not such a stranger in this land as to startle us by its novelty. Instances occur very early and very late in our history. The patriots of the Revolution, without an effort at redemption, abandoned the paper currency which had been paid to the farmers who fed and the soldiers who fought. The last act of repudiation is of recent date, and consisted in appropriating a large amount of private property to public use without any compensation to the owners. The Constitution provides that—

"No person shall be deprived of property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

In pursuance of this provision Congress passed a law allowing loyal owners $300 each for the slaves enlisted in the war. Commissioners were appointed to hear and determine the claims, but before a dollar was paid the law was suspended and the debt virtually repudiated. The law itself was a very feeble attempt to meet the requirements of the Constitution, as just compensation implies the full value of the property. Men were stripped of their earnings, widows of their dowry, orphans of their inheritance, and the soldier who had followed the flag from the beginning to the end of the war had to submit quietly to the repudiation of his claim.

The constitutional provision to which I have adverted was in full force at the time when the act was done. The Constitution was the supreme law of the land, or, as Mr. Webster has forcibly expressed it, it was the bond, and the sole bond, of our Union. No civil officer could enter upon the discharge of his duties until he had taken a solemn oath to support it. In view of these facts I would ask any honest man to lay his hand upon his heart and say if the people of Kentucky have been rightfully deprived of the property which they held under the double guarantee of Constitution and of law? I do not ask him to decide it by the Declaration of Independence, nor by the star-spangled banner, nor by the higher law, [laughter,] but by the sacred compact which our fathers formed for our government, by the charter which secures our liberties, by the Constitution which was intended to protect our property.

Lest a returning sense of justice should induce some legislative body to make some reparation for the wrong inflicted upon a loyal community, the fourth section of the fourteenth amendment provides that neither the United States nor any State shall ever pay for the loss or emancipation of any slave, but that such obligation shall be held illegal and void. This clause is retroactive and nullifies the force of existing obligations, and how far it would receive the sanction of our highest judicial tribunal is a matter which is yet to be tested. However, if danger should be apprehended from that quarter, following the precedent set in the McCord case, the jurisdiction could be repealed by an act of Congress declaring that the Supreme Court should take cognizance of no case involving a constitutional question. [Laughter.]

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, alludes incidentally to the inequality of the burden of taxation, and doubtless realizes its utterly exhaustive influence upon those sections where no bonds are held and where none of the interest is distributed. But he forgot to notice the hardship, the oppression, and the wrong involved in the act of depriving whole communities of one half of their estates without process of law and without compensation, and then taxing the remainder to pay the interest on claims which rest upon no more solid foundation than their own. Has the Government kept faith with its own citizens? A dominant party may defy the Constitution, trample upon the rights of the weak, and sport with their misfortunes; but the fires of fanaticism cannot always burn, the passions of men will grow cool, and the day will come when justice and public faith, beneficent as the Constitution and broad as the Union, will prevail.

If gentlemen really desire to constitute themselves the peculiar friends and guardians of the public faith, if they wish to preserve it pure and unspotted, they should pursue a course of impartial justice toward all the creditors of the United States. In discharging their high trust let no preferences, partialities, or prejudices warp their judgment or control their action; and above all, let them do nothing in violation of the Constitution. The public indebtedness, large as it is, is going for the most part to our own citizens, and in view of their equal rights, pay all or pay none; or if they can only pay a part let them refer the matter to a master commissioner for a pro rata distribution of the assets among all the creditors in exact proportion to their several demands. Whatever may be the hardship of such a measure it will fall upon all alike, and those who have been drawing the gold will have less reason to complain than those who never received a cent. A discrimination among American citizens is in flagrant violation of the fundamental principles of our free institutions and a fraud upon the equal rights of the people. Our Government was established to secure the rights and to perpetuate the liberties of the people, and not as an engine of oppression and torture to degrade and enslave them.

The condition of the country in a financial point of view is alarming; and most of the remedies prescribed appear to be temporary in their character. Many of them propose, in certain contingencies, to issue more bonds, as if the bonds already in existence were not absorbing the means and consuming the substance of the people. That relief which comes from increasing the burden will not meet my approbation. The desperate situation of our affairs is rendered perfectly manifest by the conflicting and contradictory measures advocated by statesmen of great capacity and of enlarged experience. Scarcely any two agree, and yet each one has the utmost confidence in the wisdom and policy of his own scheme.

The speech of the distinguished Senator from Indiana in support of his proposition was an effort of great vigor, and as an intellectual display would compare favorably with anything that has been lately delivered in this Chamber. He began his voyage amid the convulsions of revolution, circumnavigated the globe, visiting England, Germany, France, and Spain, and, more fortunate than Captain Cook, he entered the ports of redemption and reconstruction with flying streamers, under cloudless skies, and impelled by pleasant breezes. [Great laughter.] He came overland from California, developing a sufficiency of gold in that State and the Territories to pay our debts and put us on the high road to prosperity, and after all he returns to us with courage on his brow and a constitution invigorated by the toils and dangers through which he has passed. [Renewed laughter.] If his discoveries should prove of little value to the currency or the country we can at least rejoice at the restoration of his health. Whatever may be thought of the speech in other respects, it will be the unanimous verdict of candid men that it is the most cheering and hopeful presentation of our financial affairs that will be made during the present generation.

The Secretary of the Treasury, with the amplest means of information, seems to be puzzled and bewildered by the difficulties of the situation. He shows very clearly that Webster and himself were alike inimical to a depreciated currency, and by extending his researches he might have discovered that other men entertained similar opinions on that subject. [Laughter.] He recommends that Congress shall pass a law legalizing gold contracts, and I can see no very particular objection to that proposition. If persons desire to pay and to receive good money I would make it lawful for them to do so. In his opinion it is of the highest importance that the tax-paying voters should be encouraged by the fact that the debt is in the progress of rapid extinguishment. I would like to oblige the Secretary very much, but I cannot encourage tax-payers by any such assurance. I do not believe that the public debt of the United States ever can be paid, and the facts upon which this judgment is based are drawn chiefly from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Treasurer, who is a gentleman of the olden time, and who speaks about what he thinks, has indulged in some tolerably plain talk upon this financial question. The lower grades of the fractional currency authorized by Congress are most offensive and disgusting to his sight, taste, and smell. [Laughter.] He calls it "an almost worthless, irredeemable, poisonous, and stinking copper and nickel-token currency." He waxed warm as the argument proceeds, until he challenges the world to show as mean a Government as ours, [laughter,] and declares that an individual guilty of such practices would be branded as a twopenny thief and consigned to a house of correction. The Government is accused of fraud and open repudiation; but of all his charges there are none so damaging and disparaging, so unwarrantable and unjust, as the comparison to a twopenny thief. [Laughter.] This effort to degrade the Government by intimating that its operations are confined to a retail business is a surprising misconception; but as it was prompted by sudden excitement, and is evidently not the result of deliberate malice, we may hope that time and reflection will induce the author to modify or retract the aspersion. [Laughter.]

Depreciated paper is the object of assault on all sides, and those who forced it upon the country are now its deadliest foes. A speedy resumption of specie payments, with or without the means, is advocated as a sure defense against all the dangers that surround us. That redundancy of currency of which we hear so much may exist in the region where the bondholders live, but in the agricultural districts there is no such complaint. In my section the people are neither given to idleness nor to luxury. They have never had the wealth to indulge the one nor to support the other; and a man who enjoyed both would not be a very respectable member of society. Intelligent labor is industriously applied to a fruitful soil, but still money is so scarce that any contraction of the currency would operate most injuriously upon the agricultural and mechanical interests.

Let it not be said that I am or have been the friend of paper money, or of any of the overgrown monopolies that have fed and fattened upon public plunder until they defy the constituted authorities of Government. The resumption of specie payments, if we were ready to resume, it is admitted on all hands would be attended by a great enhancement of the value of paper money. A dollar in gold, instead of being worth a dollar and thirty-five cents, would be exchanged at par, or the premium of thirty-five per cent. of gold over greenbacks would no longer exist. So that a man holding $100,000 in greenbacks would have it suddenly raised to the value of $135,000 in that currency. But the people of the United States are not all bankers and bondholders. The great majority of them derive no profit from the one or the other, and the interests of this class, numbering twenty to one, are entitled to some consideration at the hands of Congress in its efforts to solve the financial question. The debtor is entitled to fully as much sympathy as the money-lender. The laborer between the plow-handles and the mechanic in his shop are, under our system of government, the equals of any other citizens of the Republic. It is their energy and their productive industry which upholds and sustains the fabric of American civilization. Knock out this support, and the Government with its bonds and its currency would be involved in a common ruin. The claims of labor and the welfare of the laborer are matters which must engage the attention of statesmen if the sunlight of prosperity is ever to shine upon us again. Politicians may plot and plan, bankers may discount and accommodate, demagogues may delude and deceive, but the truth will come at last that the hard hands and strong arms of labor must work the deliverance.

Has any person seen a farmer or mechanic who complains of a redundancy of money? The complaints that have reached my ear are precisely the reverse. If they are in debt do they desire the privilege of paying one third more than they contracted, and are they particularly clamorous for a reduction of their wages? Are they feverish in their anxiety to see $400,000,000 of Government bonds sold in England for gold to redeem the greenback currency, and then to see the tax-gatherers collecting in the same gold to ship across the waters in payment of the interest on the bonds? According to my theory the burden rests upon their shoulders, and their tongues must make the call before I will ever vote for a bond for any purpose whatever.

The southern States embrace a population of eight or ten millions, and unless their very existence is to be ignored some consideration should be bestowed upon the measure, as it is likely to affect their interests. Are they ready for specie payments, and do they desire that all values shall be reduced to the standard of gold and silver? Almost every newspaper that comes from that quarter informs us that some finely improved estate has been disposed of at sheriff's sale for two dollars per acre, and as the unfortunate owners have been bereft of all else they would hardly favor a project which would sacrifice their lands at $1 25.

Of the situation of the southern people I know little from actual observation. Since the war I have been no further south than Gordonsville, in Virginia. Manassas, which has risen from the ashes, reminds us of the opening scene in the civil strife. I passed Cedar mountain, or Slaughter's mountain, as the people of the country call it, in whose shades Stonewall Jackson marshaled his forces, and from whose summit swept the charge that never failed of victory. I crossed the Rapidan, where Grant and Lee, the great masters of military science, for seven long months confronted each other from opposing banks. Ditches and earthworks may be seen on all sides, but where are the farms, the orchards, and the gardens, the corn, the fruit, and the flowers? These rich valleys, like western prairies, spread out before you. No fence obstructs the view, and no sound breaks the solemn silence that reigns around. There remain, however, some evidences of a banished civilization. Now and then a single chimney, like a monumental column, points you to the past. It bears no lettered scroll; but still it speaks of happiness and home. Its warmth has been a comfort to age, and sparkling eyes and ruddy faces have reflected its light. But the scene was changed. The thunder cloud of war drew near and more near until its angry flashes gave fearful warning of approaching doom. The mother kneels at the family altar, invokes the blessing of Elijah's God, and goes forth with her children a fugitive in the land. Everything that will burn is given to the flames, and the chimney stands as a landmark, a starting point for the surveyor in his work of reestablishing metes and boundary lines.

Other portions of Virginia may have suffered less, but I honestly believe that the people of that State are not prepared for specie payments, and that any great contraction of the currency would involve them in ruin. They could endure a gentle inflation, but they will scarcely survive a further contraction. I know not how others may feel, but as for my single self I confess to a weakness for the old Commonwealth of Virginia. If she has sinned in the sight of heaven, heaven and earth have witnessed the terrible retribution. When we speak of Virginia the long past rises before us, and we are associated with the heroes, the statesmen, and the philosophers of other days. The sword of her Washington hangs in the Patent Office, and there, too, is his camp and his camp furniture, even down to his pewter plates, held as the sacred memorials of a patriotism which endured all things for his country's sake. Jefferson and the Declaration, and Madison and the Constitution, the eloquence of Henry, the learning of Marshall, all protest against the divorce which severs the bonds of union and degrades Virginia from her position of equality in the family of States. Dismembered and divided, spurned and insulted, suffering and bleeding, the frail and tottering remnant of her former self, if we cannot alleviate let us do nothing to increase the calamities which overwhelm her already. Neither the vicissitudes through which she has passed nor the furnace of affliction in which she walks at present have ever been able to extort from her one word of complaint or reproach. If it is believed that she can be driven or persuaded to a profession of the Radical creed, it is a mistake; she will live and die in the faith which has been handed down from the fathers.

It is assumed that gold will come to this country when it is needed. In my opinion it will be needed a long time before it will come. When our exports and sales in foreign countries shall exceed our imports that excess will be paid to us in gold.

Another assumption is that greenbacks will enhance in value as soon as an act of Congress shall fix a day for the resumption of specie payments. The ability of a debtor to meet his obligations is of more consequence in the eyes of creditors than any promises or pledges he may make upon that subject. If he is in doubtful or failing circumstances it is certainly prudent to name a distant day, and this precaution has been observed in the measure which has been proposed to the Senate.

But the great question is, can the Government meet its liabilities? The report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that for the last three years and seven months the average annual expenditure in payment of interest and other demands has been $508,646,661 68, and that during that time the public debt, instead of being diminished, has been increased by the addition of $160,174,475 48. In three years and seven months almost two thousand million dollars have been expended, and the debt is larger than it was at the close of the war. The Secretary says that if it had not been for the Pacific railroad, the purchase of Alaska, and other estimates which he believes to be substantially correct, the debt would have been smaller. But such contingencies are as likely to happen in the future as in the past, and the fact stands as stated. While the debt has been thus rapidly increasing the resources of the Government for its liquidation have been more rapidly declining, as the tables will show:

The receipts from internal revenue for the year 1866 were.....	$309,226,813 42
The receipts from internal revenue for 1867 were.....	260,027,537 43
The receipts from internal revenue for 1868 were.....	191,087,589 41
The estimated receipts for 1869 are.....	146,209,014 00

The receipts from customs for the last three years have been as follows:

For the year 1866.....	$179,046,651 58
For the year 1867.....	176,417,810 88
For the year 1868.....	164,464,599 56

This statement, which is taken from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, points rather to deficiency bills than to the payment of the public debt. But the most alarming feature connected with our multiplied embarrassments is that our precious metals and our gold-bearing bonds are leaving us and going to Europe. California and the Territories in the last twenty years have produced in gold and silver upwards of $1,800,000,000, and of this amount $1,100,000,000 have departed from our shores.

Nor is that all; more than six hundred million dollars of our gold-bearing bonds are now in the hands of European capitalists, and besides this they hold in State stocks and other securities more than two hundred million dollars; and the Secretary says that we are even now increasing our debt to Europe at the rate of sixty or seventy million dollars per annum in the form of gold-bearing bonds. When Europe shall hold all our bonds the gold product of California and all the Territories will be insufficient to pay the interest. Our purchases abroad are made mostly in gold-bearing bonds, and if this shall cease the receipts from customs must cease with it, and the tax gatherer must hunt for currency where it is scarce, and for gold where there is none, to support the Government and to pay the debt. Borrowing from one man to pay another is the contrivance of a bankrupt, and the adoption of such measures on our part would only develop the utter hopelessness of our situation. In addition to the burdens already enumerated our commercial marine has been sold to foreigners, and the cost of our transportation goes into their pockets.

The Secretary ascribes the great reduction in the amount derived from internal revenue to inefficient collection and to a reduction of taxes. This may be partially true at the present time, but it will not be long before still a further reduction will be attributed to the exhaustion of the people. Their capacities are truly wonderful, but wonderful as they are, human energy and human endurance have a limit. Five hundred millions of dollars is a large sum to be drawn yearly from the labor of the country in the shape of taxation. Is there any system of labor upon earth that could stand such a drain? Our largest river would cease to flow and his bed would become dry and parched if the clouds did not bear back the volume of water he discharges into the Gulf. But here is a financial gulf into which pours a golden stream, but from its metallic surface arises no moisture, no vapor, no rain to cheer and to bless the sources of its supply. How long can it continue to flow? How long will thirty million people be content to pour the golden fruits of their unrequited toil into the bosom of this gulf which, like the Dead sea, has no outlet? Ireland has groaned under a similar infliction until the "greenest isle of the ocean" has lost its verdure, and until penury and want are the only inheritance of her children. The great law of self-preservation forces them to leave her borders in search of the means of subsistence, and whither will they fly when American, like Irish labor, is made tributary to the capital and the power of other countries? When Europe shall hold our bonds the effort to discharge them must end in exhausting the means of payment. It would be useless to attempt to stop the current that is sweeping our gold and gold securities to Europe. Many of our citizens have become suddenly and vastly enriched by speculation, speculation, and speculation. The simplicity of American manners and of republican institutions palls upon their pampered tastes; titles, crowns, and courts flit before their imaginations, and they will exchange their bonds or their gold for an opportunity of beholding with their own eyes the pomp and pride and pageantry of a genuine aristocracy.

In speaking of restoring the tax on manufactures, abolished in March last, the Secretary says:

"The objections to the restoration of this tax are that it would indicate vacillation on the part of Congress."

I hope that I have been reasonably consistent in life; but I am willing to vacillate a little in that direction. [Laughter.] He proceeds:

"It is also apparent that if restored it would fail to be permanent, by reason of the persistent and united hostility of a class of citizens influential and powerful, and whose influence and power are rapidly increasing."

This is one of the most fearful declarations that ever proceeded from any of the Departments of our Government. And is it true that the President and his Cabinet have become the agents and the servants of a privileged class, and that Congress, forgetful of its solemn duties to the sovereign people, protects the rich in order that the scourge may be applied with more fatal effect to the productive industry of the country? From the decision of the Secretary I appeal to the grand inquest of the nation upon the distinct issue that wealth and influence are not good grounds for the exemption of any portion of our citizens from their just and equal proportion in all the responsibilities of government. Neither policy nor wisdom nor justice demands an exemption in favor of those who are most able to pay.

In the plan of resumption proposed by the able Senator from Indiana his own misgivings as to the result are shadowed forth. Why does he allow six months' additional time to the national banks? The moment that a bona fide resumption takes place on the part of the Government the banks will be able to resume. There is nothing in their business nor in their situation that commends them in an especial manner to the fostering care of Congress. They are sixteen hundred or more in number, with a capital of $400,000,000, upon which they draw from Government a yearly interest of $24,000,000. This sum is paid to them with the privilege of fleecing the people out of $50,000,000 more. They are probably as well to do as any institutions in the country. But the provision was not intended entirely for their benefit. They are required to hold an amount of greenbacks equal to their circulation; and by postponing the day of their resumption they are relied on as safety-valves to withhold the greenbacks from presentation for payment. These banks are generally conducted by men of sagacity and foresight in financial affairs. Knowing that gold under any circumstances would be as good as greenbacks, it is fair to presume that each bank would have a trusty agent in Washington on the 1st day of July, 1871, and all of them would be instructed to be convenient to the Treasury Department when the hour of resumption should arrive; and when it did come, without the sound of a drum or the note of a bugle, they would move to the onset,

"Firm-paced and slow, a scurried front they form, Still as the breeze, but dreadful as the storm."

[Great laughter.]

If the Secretary should desire to render impartial justice to his customers it will require a force of sixteen hundred money counters to meet the demand. Let him appoint that number and the sun of that day will set upon an empty Treasury. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. I voted to displace the railroad bill before the Senate this morning for the purpose of giving the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the Senator from Kentucky an opportunity of making their speeches. I now move to postpone the present bill with a view to again bring the railroad bill before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope, now that this bill is before us, that we shall go on with its consideration. It is a question of general moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, to postpone the further consideration of the bill for the purpose of taking up the Central Branch railroad bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust we shall go on with the bill now before us. Let me say, we all know, as matter of history, that there is no prospect of this railroad bill becoming a law if it should pass the Senate. It will lead to a long debate. Already a new mine of discussion has been opened between the Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] and the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If we pass the bill we make no progress with it, because we are already officially advised of the action of the House upon a bill which we have recently sent to them. What is the use, therefore, in prolonging the discussion upon the railroad bill and delaying the Senate with it? I hope that the bill now before us may be proceeded with. Let us go as far as we can with it to-day, and I trust we can get a vote before long.

Mr. HOWARD. The bill of the Senator from Ohio has been taken up, and he has had an opportunity to express himself freely upon it. I understood heretofore that that was the main object which the Senator had in view at the present time. And now, sir, I hope we shall resume the consideration of the railroad bill. I think we can come to a vote upon it to-day before we adjourn; I trust so; and I ask the friends of the bill to stand by it.

Mr. SUMNER. There is no reason why we should not have a vote right off.

Mr. NYE. I do not know upon what authority the honorable Senator from Ohio speaks when he tells us that there is no prospect of this bill becoming a law if it passes the Senate. I do not know what information he has on that subject that other Senators have not.

Mr. SHERMAN. The House of Representatives have passed a resolution declaring that they will grant no more subsidies. They have even defeated or referred a bill which we had passed extending slightly the subsidy to the eastern division.

Mr. NYE. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Ohio that that is no reason why this body should not do its duty. If these people are in the right they should have the relief they ask, and if the House of Representatives refuse it to them it does not relieve us from our responsibility. I hope, therefore, that that argument will not prevail.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Buckalew, Chandler, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Vickers, Welch, and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Henderson, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Tennessee, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Sherman, Trumbull, Wade, Warner, Whyte, Wiley, and Williams—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Conness, Kellogg, Osborn, Robertson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Tipton, and Yates—12.

So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

CENTRAL BRANCH PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on taking up the railroad bill, so called.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 256) relating to the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CONKLING.

Mr. POMEROY. I said this morning that I should occupy the time of the Senate on this bill just long enough to make what I thought necessary, a correction in regard to distances. So far as I am concerned I shall be as brief as possible, because I hope the vote will be taken on the bill to-day. I make my statement from the Railroad Guide so far as it relates to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and from the Railroad Guide so far as it relates to the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, so far as their roads are built; and from the actual survey from the quartermaster's department for the rest of the route. In the quartermaster's department the measurement was made by Lieutenant R. M. Brown, of the United States corps of engineers.

It was understood when we adjourned yesterday, from a remark made by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] that this road could make a connection with the Union Pacific nearer at Cheyenne by about one hundred and thirty miles than by the other route. The Senator said, however, that it was one hundred and thirty miles or more nearer to Denver, and that this company could prosecute its work by a subsidy of forty miles and be on a nearer connection. That is the only point I desire to speak upon, and I shall occupy but a moment.

The distance from the end of this road to Fort Kearny by the bill is one hundred and fifty miles; and by the survey more than that. By the Railroad Guide, from Fort Kearny to Cheyenne is three hundred and twenty-five miles, making four hundred and seventy-five miles to Cheyenne, the point on the Union Pacific railroad to which reference has been had. From the present terminus of this road to Fort Riley is forty-two miles in a straight line; fifty miles we will say will be the route if the road is built that way to join the eastern division by making a direct right angle. It is then just eighty-five miles and a fraction to Fort Harker, and four hundred and twenty miles from Fort Harker to Denver, and one hundred and six miles from Denver to Cheyenne—one hundred and nine the Senator from New York said, but by referring to their survey I see it is one hundred and six—making six hundred and seventy-six miles by the Smoky Hill, eastern division, route, and four hundred and seventy-five by the other route. The difference in favor of the route by the Union Pacific is two hundred and twelve miles. My statement is made from the Railroad Guide, so far as it relates to the Union Pacific Railroad Company and so far as it relates to the Union Pacific railroad, eastern division, excepting from Fort Harker to Denver, which was surveyed under the direction of the War Department by Lieutenant R. M. Brown, of the United States corps of engineers. So that instead of the eastern division route being shorter, it is in the neighborhood of at least two hundred miles longer; it will not vary much from that. That is the only statement I wanted to make.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, there are a number of remarkable features about this bill. One is, that its friends take it up semi-occasionally with an announcement that it is not necessary to debate it and that they wish to have a vote taken upon it, and forthwith all its fathers proceed to cover it with new recommendations to the Senate.

Now, sir, I beg to say that I had not the slightest idea of uttering one word upon this measure at this session of Congress, although I expected a vote to be taken upon it. I had removed beyond my immediate reach the papers that I had last year in reference to it, and had dismissed it substantially from my mind; and when it was taken up, if a vote had been permitted upon it, as we were told the desire was to obtain a vote, I certainly should never have broken the silence of the Senate. It was only by calling back to mind discarded data and half-forgotten things that I was able to submit any observations on the subject. I should not now rise to say one word about it but for the fact, first, that a statement which I made is apparently contradicted by the Senator, and second, that the Senator is about to leave the Senate vote to under a total misapprehension, as I think I shall be able to show, of the point which professedly he controverts.

What was my statement yesterday? Did any Senator suppose I meant that you might not start from Fort Riley and by a new route cross directly to some point on the Union Pacific railroad without going as far as any of the old proposed routes? Nobody understood me to say that; and yet the Senator comes in here now with a contradiction, which is, that if you start from Fort Riley, for example, or from Irving, and go across to Fort Kearny, or some other point between Cheyenne and Omaha, you can reach that by a less number of miles than you would have to traverse to go to Denver or Cheyenne. Is there any such issue as that here? Has any man been bold enough to defy all geography and the points of the compass by affirming anything to the contrary of that? I have not.

What was my allegation? The equity, which can never be repeated too often, attaching to this bill, is that the central branch were deprived of a certain connection. My statement was, that that lost connection was one hundred and thirty-four miles longer than the same connection transplanted to the valley of the Smoky Hill. That is putting it a little stronger than I put it, because I read from the statement which fixed Denver as the point; but I am willing now to assume that I put it as strong as that in terms, as that was the result of my statement.

Was that true or not? Having now before me, as I had not yesterday, the surveys and the maps, I reiterate my statement, and I affirm that the perfected surveys show that one hundred and forty-seven miles, not one hundred and thirty-four, is at least the ascertained difference between the old proposed route, which they complain of having lost, and that connection which will be given under the amendment lying on the table. We all know that when this legislation took place the Union Pacific railroad was not built at all. Nobody knew precisely where it was to go; but, as all the legislation proves, everybody understood that that road was to go to Denver. The eastern division was to go to Denver. Does anybody doubt that? Here are both of their surveys surveying the Republican route and the Smoky Hill route. To reach what point? Fort Kearny? Some place back towards Omaha, based upon information that nobody could have, because it did not exist, of where the Union Pacific railroad was to go? No, sir; but everybody understanding that Denver or the immediate vicinity of Denver was the point of destination.

Afterward, it was understood that the Union road was to go up the Platte valley. Well, when the Platte valley has passed the point which has been named by the Senator it forks, and one fork goes to Denver—and Denver is in that valley, as the Senator knows—and another fork bears further to the north; and when the Union road came to progress that far, years afterward, it took the right hand in place of the left hand fork of the Platte river. And now the proposition must be gravely urged by the Senator that the equity is to be extended to furnishing to these claimants a connection which they never dreamed of, and which nobody ever supposed there would be an object in making.

Therefore, we come back to what was the distance which they expected to traverse. What was the distance they would have traversed had the Republican route been adhered to, and what is the difference between that and the distance to be traversed now by the Smoky Hill route? Is not that the question? Manifestly that is the question, the only question that could be addressed to a chancellor, to take the illustration of the Senator from Michigan. Now, how is that? Here is the report, and here are two of its statements:

"The entire length of the line by the Smoky Hill from Fort Riley to Denver is four hundred and sixty-six and six-tenths miles."

"The distance from Fort Riley to Denver by way of the Republican and Platte rivers is six hundred miles."

The difference between those two statements is one hundred and thirty-four miles, and that is the statement that I made. The perfected survey afterward shows that the difference is greater than that, and that it is, in truth, one hundred and forty-seven miles—one hundred and forty-seven miles according to the survey upon which the Government insists in reference to subsidies; several miles more according to the survey upon which these parties in interest insist. But I take now the survey approved by the Government and strongest against my proposition, and that shows a net difference of one hundred and forty-seven miles between the lost connection and the connection which can now be had via the Smoky Hill.

Upon facts like these I cannot consent, even at the hazard of prolonging this debate, to sit down allowing the Senator from Kansas to assume premises which I never have stated; to assume a state of case on my part which I never thought of, and which never would have been relevant or material here, and then propose an apparent contradiction, the effect of which, if it has any at all, must be to mislead the Senate.

Since offering the amendment last night, at the suggestion of other Senators I have modified it by striking out all restriction as to the point where the junction with the Smoky Hill route may be made. That is to avoid a right angle, as suggested by the Senator from Indiana. Let them go where they please. According to this amendment, giving them a subsidy of forty miles, adding that to the interval of fifty miles which, confessedly, they would have been compelled to build at all events, they can deflect very gently and slightly and touch the Smoky Hill route so as to make a very slight curvature in their own course. That will carry them on to Denver and from there to Cheyenne. And I go further now, and say to the Senator that this survey shows that going to Cheyenne all the way, passing through Denver, the route would not be longer than it would if they built an independent road themselves by any known route to Cheyenne.

But, sir, do not let us be misled on this point by supposing that the question is whether some new and heretofore uncontrived route can be devised to strike the Union railroad where nobody ever intended to strike it or knew it would lie. Do not let us be misled by supposing that the question is whether that can be done in a shorter number of miles than the miles of which we are speaking. It is enough for me to know that by a slight gift—a gift of $640,000 in place of $2,400,000—we can make these parties completely whole, and more than that. Let us understand the facts aright, and then adopting the view which leads Senators to see an equity, let us find out whether in order to put these parties in statu quo, Senators will vote $2,400,000 in place of $640,000. That is the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York as modified.

Mr. CONKLING. Let it be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment as modified; which was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert:

That nothing contained in the act of Congress approved July 3, 1866, relating to the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, shall deprive the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, assignee of the Hannibal and St. Joseph Railroad Company, of its right to continue its road and telegraph line westerly from the termination of the one hundred miles mentioned in the act of Congress incorporating the Union Pacific Railroad Company, approved July 1, 1862, to a connection with the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, as one of the branches thereof; but said Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company shall continue its road from the termination of the one hundred miles aforesaid, or from a point between said termination and where said road crosses the Big Blue river, to a connection with the Union Pacific railway, eastern division, upon the same terms and conditions, in all respects, as are now provided by law for the construction of the Union Pacific railway, eastern division: Provided, That no subsidy in United States bonds shall be allowed to said central branch company for any greater length of road than forty miles from the termination of the one hundred miles on which bonds are already authorized to be issued on said line of railroad.

Mr. CONKLING. The yeas and nays were ordered yesterday on that amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Conkling, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Robertson, Sherman, Stewart, Vickers, Wade, Warner, Whyte, Willey, and Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Buckalew, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Welch, and Wilson—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Grimes, Kellogg, Osborn, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and Yates—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I move to amend the bill by adding the following:

Nor shall such subsidy exceed in its aggregate amount the sum of $1,200,000.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Robertson, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Vickers, Wade, Warner, Whyte, and Williams—25.

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Welch, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Grimes, Henderson, Kellogg, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Willey, and Yates—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The proposition to reduce the subsidy one half having failed, it is obviously useless to offer an amendment that no subsidy shall be granted; and thereupon I shall abandon my purpose in that regard. But as I believe it is the policy of Congress hereafter to issue no more bonds bearing six per cent. interest, I propose to move that the bonds issued for this subsidy shall bear no higher rate of interest than five per cent. I therefore move to insert after the proviso at the end of the bill the following words:

Nor shall the bonds issued for such subsidy bear any higher rate of interest than five per cent. per annum.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose the Senator means five per cent. in coin. That is better than the present bonds, on which the interest is six per cent. in currency.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. They would be subject to the present law, as to the manner of granting the subsidy, unless this road should evade it, as I believe the other roads do, by paying interest in coin.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is it not best to provide against such an evasion by saying "in currency?"

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have no objection. I will modify the amendment by inserting "in lawful money."

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that amendment will not prevail. If the Government should resume specie payments would the honorable Senator require this company to receive its interest in currency?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have said "lawful money," and when we resume specie payments coin will be lawful money. I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Robertson, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Vickers, Warner, Whyte, Willey, and Williams—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Corbett, Doolittle, Fowler, Hendricks, Howard, McDonald, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sawyer, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Welch, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Grimes, Kellogg, Norton, Rice, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, Wade, and Yates—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Before the vote is taken on the bill I should like to ask the members of the committee if one hundred and fifty miles will bring this road to a junction with the main branch? I will ask the Senator from Ohio, who is on the committee, or the chairman, how that is?

Mr. HOWARD. It will, very nearly. That, however, is not material at all. They can have a subsidy only for one hundred and fifty miles.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman state how nearly?

Mr. HOWARD. I presume if the company should go directly northward—

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. But what is the distance to the one hundredth meridian, where they must go?

Mr. HOWARD. They are not required to form a junction on the one hundredth meridian by this bill. They can form a junction this side of it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sumner, Thayer, Van Winkle, Welch, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Henderson, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pool, Robertson, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Vickers, Wade, Warner, Whyte, Willey, and Williams—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Corbett, Grimes, Kellogg, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and Yates—12.

So the bill was rejected.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORTON. I move now to take up the currency bill, which was displaced by the railroad bill.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will not be done, because we have a special order for to-morrow, and I do not wish it to be supplanted. I move, therefore, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORTON. I hope we shall take up the currency bill.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 25, noes 27.

Mr. STEWART. On my motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to have any debate on the question of taking up the bill, but let us vote on it, and let the Senate determine what they will take up.

Mr. STEWART. My motion determines it just as well. If we adjourn now the constitutional amendment will be the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. This is not a debatable question.

Mr. STEWART. If we adjourn now the constitutional amendment will be the special order for to-morrow. If we do not adjourn now, but take up the financial bill, that will be the unfinished business, and it will have precedence of the special order to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will see that he gains nothing by this course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to adjourn is not a debatable question. On this motion the yeas and nays are called for.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will withdraw his motion I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORTON. Is that in order pending my motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the motion to adjourn withdrawn?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir; for the purpose indicated by the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays not having been ordered, the Senator from Nevada may withdraw his motion.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we adjourn now or go into executive session the Senate will have to determine to-morrow whether they will take up the currency bill or the constitutional amendment. I think we had better settle that to-night, and not waste time on it to-morrow.

Mr. CAMERON. I renew the motion to adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 24, noes 24.

Mr. CAMERON. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will withdraw his motion I will move an executive session.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not want to go into executive session.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Conness, Cragin, Dixon,

Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howard, McCreery, Norton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sawyer, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Welch, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Corbett, Davis, Fessenden, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sherman, Vickers, Warner, Whyte, Willey, and Williams—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Ferry, Grimes, Kellogg, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and Yates—12.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. MORTON. Now, I insist on my motion to take up the currency bill. I desire to have that question settled.

Mr. STEWART. I have submitted a motion, which is pending, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORTON. I submit that that motion is not in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The rules expressly say that it is in order at any time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suggest to the Senator from Nevada to let the vote be taken. We have had a square vote on adjourning which seems to test it; and if the Senate is disposed to take up the other bill we save time by doing it now.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think it is a fair way to put aside the special order, because nothing is going to be done with the other bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can test the question in a full Senate to-morrow at one o'clock, by a motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We have had one test vote, and after we have had that we may as well have a square vote now on taking up the currency bill.

Mr. STEWART. By taking it up now you cut off the special order for to-morrow.

Mr. CAMERON. I believe there was some misunderstanding when the vote was taken on the last motion to adjourn. I therefore now again move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to—ayes twenty-nine, noes not counted; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 27, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the unfinished business pending at the adjournment yesterday, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1364) to provide for the gradual resumption of specie payments was recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] is entitled to the floor.

CONTRACT FOR POSTAGE STAMPS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the matter referred to them touching the contract of the Post Office Department for stamps; and that the subject be referred to the Committee on Printing, with authority to investigate it, and to send for persons and papers, provided this shall involve no expense to the Government.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like to inquire whether we have authority to send for persons to be examined as witnesses without paying them?

The SPEAKER. The House has authority to instruct its committees as it sees fit. If a committee finds itself unable to act it can report that fact to the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not object to this investigation; but there is another question involved.

Mr. CHANLER. I am obliged to object to all this. We on this side of the House cannot hear what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] asks consent that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of some question, and that the subject be referred to the Committee on Printing, with authority to investigate and to send for persons and papers, provided this shall involve no expense.

Mr. CHANLER. I object; because we do not know what is the subject proposed to be investigated.

TRADE WITH CANADA, ETC.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to communicate to the House a statement of the effects of the repeal of the treaty of reciprocity upon the trade of the United States with the Dominion of Canada and the other provinces of British North America, and any information at his command as to the present condition of such provinces, and the relations between them, and the state of the American and British fisheries on or near the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Mr. McCARTHY. I object.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. McKEE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the unfinished business pending at the adjournment yesterday, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1364) to provide for the gradual resumption of specie payments was recommended to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] is entitled to the floor for eight minutes.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I ask the House to add seventeen minutes to my time, that I may have twenty-five minutes in all.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be allowed twenty-five minutes in which to make his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, what shall we have for money in this country? I do not mean just now while we are in a pinch, but in the future when we become masters of the financial situation. Shall it be exclusively metallic? I suppose not. There were at one time a few advocates of hard money in the country, but I know of none now. If not metallic it must be paper. Then what kind of paper? Shall we revive State banking? I hope not. Its complexity, panics, failures, frauds, and counterfeits condemn it, and the Constitution, properly construed, forbids it. We are left, then, to a choice between United States notes, something like our greenbacks, and bank notes something like our national currency. Before we choose between them each system should be amended, or considered as amended, so as to be what we would want it to be in case of its exclusive adoption.

First. Banking should be free to all. Each bank should undertake to redeem its notes in coin upon demand, and give security for the undertaking. This would probably be a sufficient limitation as to the amount of currency.

Second. A plan should be contrived by which the Government would save as much or nearly as much, less the expense, as if the notes were issued by the Treasury, instead of the banks. It is said that this is the case now. Perhaps it is; but it should be put in the form of reduced interest upon the bonds instead of taxes, so that we can all see exactly what is saved. Otherwise wants of trade may be overlooked in the straits of the Treasury. With these, and perhaps other modifications of the national banking system, let us see which of the two kinds of paper is most desirable. The Treasury could have no choice, because the Government would save or make as much on the one kind of paper as the other. The billholder could have no choice, because his security in each case would be exactly the same, except that in the one case the responsibility of the corporation would be added to that of the Government—an addition, perhaps, too trifling for consideration. Which, then, is best for trade? Trade needs stability in prices. To make prices stable the amount of currency and the amount of trade should always bear the same relation to each other. If the amount of trade varies during the year, or from year to year, the amount of currency should vary also. Otherwise prices would go up and down from mere excess or lack of currency. This want of trade has never been perfectly met by any system. It probably never will be. But the currency furnished by a free-banking system will supply it more nearly than any other. It is capable of expanding as trade expands and contracting as trade contracts. Not so with a Treasury currency; that must expand and contract as laws are made or repealed by Congress. Congress cannot always guess what trade wants, nor be willing to respond to those wants if it could. The necessities of the Treasury, the preparation for an election, or a change of the administration would generally dictate the increase or decrease of currency. Legislation thus controlled by political reasons must necessarily be arbitrary and unreasonable. No business man would feel safe while Congress was in session. A line or two of law might wipe out half his securities or double his liabilities. Free banking, on the other hand, is self-regulating, or rather it is regulated by the demands of business. Its notes will be plenty when trade is brisk and scarce when trade is dull, and thus prices will be kept stable.

It has been supposed that this flexibility could be imparted to the Treasury currency by allowing the notes to be converted into bonds and the bonds into notes at the pleasure of the holder. The effect of this scheme would be very different, I apprehend, from its purpose. The notes and bonds, being convertible into each other, would always be of exactly the same value. Except in the convenience of handling one would be as good a medium of exchange as the other. The result would be that nearly all the notes would be converted into bonds for the sake of the interest, and the bonds used in all large transactions in place of the notes. Substantially, the bonds would all become currency. It would make a great inflation of currency, and the Government would be paying interest on nearly the whole of it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has given us the details of a plan based upon this principle. It provides that the holder of any portion of the bonds bearing six per cent. interest in coin may exchange the same for currency at the rate of ninety per cent. of its par value, and while the bonds are so deposited and exchanged receive yearly interest thereon at the rate of two and thirty-five hundredths per cent. A man having $1,000 could purchase with it a bond of the same amount, and at once deposit it and get back $900 of his money. He would thus be out of pocket only $100, but he would annually draw from the Treasury as interest on his bond, at the rate of two and thirty-five hundredths per cent., $23.50.

The gentleman says there are $1,750,000,000 of these convertible bonds. This large interest would cause them all to be converted, and we would thus have $1,575,000,000 of currency beside the $350,000,000 which the gentleman proposes to issue in advance in the place of the greenbacks. If the whole $1,750,000,000 were deposited, and ninety per cent. of their par value returned in currency, the bondholders would be out of pocket $175,000,000, and would receive from the Government as interest $41,125,000. The interest upon their money actually invested would be twenty-three and fifty hundredths per cent. The bondholder would make a good deal of money by the operation, and the Government would save some interest, but the country would be afflicted with $1,925,000,000 of irredeemable paper. If you thus make it an object to convert the bonds, all will be converted, and we will have a destructive flood of paper. If holding the bonds pays best the notes will be converted and the bonds used as currency. The inflation will be nearly as disastrous as in the other case, while the Government must carry a heavier load of interest than ever before.

To avoid this objection it has been proposed to make only a limited amount of bonds and notes convertible. Within this limit the effect would be the same, with this additional disadvantage: all who desired to reduce the amount of currency, either for speculation or to approximate specie payments, would convert the notes and hold the bonds. They could afford to do this, because they would receive a fair interest upon the money, while they were at the same time securing what they would consider a more important end, to wit, a contraction of currency and fall of prices.

When, then, we shall settle down to a specie-paying paper currency, I am inclined to give the preference to a system of national banking free to all, and paying into the Treasury as much money as the Government could save by issuing its own notes. No other system could make the bill-holder more secure, earn more for the Treasury, nor so well supply the wants of trade.

This system cannot be adopted until after we resume specie payments; and this leads me to inquire how and when resumption shall begin. To answer this question I will ask another: how much paper will our share of the world's gold and silver keep afloat? Before the war, under the old system of State banking, we were able to carry about two hundred million dollars. We can carry much more now, both because the world has more specie now than it had then, and because we would require less specie, owing to our improved system of banking and securities, to float the same amount of paper. It is hard to say how much paper we could keep out, but I will suppose $500,000,000. This is a rough guess, designed as an illustration rather than as a statement of fact. On this supposition the $700,000,000 of paper now out would diminish after resumption to $500,000,000, or to such other sum as would be shown by experience to be our maximum. Specie payments, then, involves a contraction of the currency.

Whether this contraction should take place in advance, in preparation for, or follow as the effect of resumption, I do not care just here to consider. I am only asserting that we will have considerably less paper when we have specie payments than we have now. The effect of this contraction must be a fall in prices. Whenever we are prepared to submit to this and take the consequences we can find ways enough to bring it about. Many plans have been proposed, all feasible, though perhaps not all equally good. One is to resume at once, in the belief that gold will come into the Treasury as fast as it will be drawn out. The New York Tribune advocates this way. Possibly this plan would succeed. Possibly the Treasury would receive as much gold as it would be required to pay out; but if we did continue to pay specie, I am quite sure we would soon reduce the amount of currency, prices would fall, and the debtor class suffer.

Another plan is to fix a time of resumption; and save up enough gold to make it certain that we will be able to meet all demands. This, I think, is Senator MORTON's plan. This would be pretty sure to enable us to continue specie payments once begun; but it would not, as is supposed, enable us to float our present amount of paper. If we thus secured more gold than would ordinarily stay in this country, it would flow back to its accustomed pools as soon as it was put upon tap, and we would soon be left with as much paper currency as our proper share of the world's gold would float, and no more. Low prices would follow as before. Another plan is to reduce the paper currency to an amount which we might suppose could be kept afloat, and then resume. This is Secretary McCulloch's plan. The plan is good enough, but the effect would be precisely the same, a contracted currency and low prices. Another plan is to buy in or redeem the currency, beginning at about its present value in gold and rising monthly in price until we shall finally redeem it at its face. In the meanwhile we would pay out the notes as at present. This plan was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and is as good as any. It avoids the danger of compulsory suspension involved in the Tribune's plan, the expense of hoarding involved in Senator MORRIS's plan, and the uncertainty as to the amount to be retired involved in the Secretary's plan. It is as gradual as any, and has this advantage over them all, that it foretells to the people exactly how fast prices will fall.

But while this plan is as unobjectionable as any, it does not avoid the great fault (if fault it should be called) of them all, to wit, an ultimate contraction of the currency. It is because all these plans involve this result that all are rejected. We are seeking for a plan that will keep afloat our $700,000,000 of paper, and still redeem it in gold upon demand. We will seek in vain. It is not in the power of legislation. All the plans proposed, and all that can be proposed, are only different roads to the same goal. Some may be shorter than others, some more agreeable than others; but travel which we will come to contraction and low prices at last. If low prices is the effect of resumption, when can we encounter them with the least injury? Most certainly when the people are least in debt. If nobody was in debt, nobody would be hurt by the change. To prepare for resumption, then, the people should endeavor to pay their debts while prices are still high. If Congress should take no steps toward resumption the Supreme Court may. The argument over the constitutionality of "legal tenders" has ceased, and the court is deliberating. Nobody, I presume, not even the court itself, knows what the decision will be. The uncertainty of a jury verdict has passed into a proverb, but I would as leave bet on the jury as the judge. Who can guess to what conclusion a mind educated in belligerent logic and professional subtlety, tempted at least—perhaps swayed—by personal ambition, may come? It is quite probable, however, the court may search out some theory by which to sustain the action of Congress, prompted by the terrible necessities of the war; but it is not so certain that it will attempt to clothe Congress in all future time with plenary power over all contracts, past, present, and future, and regardless of their terms and stipulations, to satisfy them with anything valuable or invaluable, paper, wood, leather, or anything else that this body in its ingenuity can invent and call money. While this uncertainty hangs over the question it behoves the people everywhere to take advantage of the high prices and liquidate their debts. Out of debt out of danger.

You see, Mr. Speaker, I am neither advocating nor opposing these multitudinous plans of resumption. My object in rising at this time was to prove to the House that there can be no permanent resumption without contraction, and that all feasible plans of resumption lead directly or indirectly to that result.

I think we had better not act upon any plan this short session. Standing still is a step toward resumption—a very short step, I will admit; but still it is something. Every year adds to the world's stock of gold and silver. Every year, by the increase of our population, makes our share of it larger. We can therefore float more paper on a specie basis next year than this. This furnishes a small excuse for waiting, but I have a better one—my constituents desire it.

Mr. INGERSOLL obtained the floor.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 206) relating to the mileage of Charles Westmoreland; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CONSULAR COURTS IN CHINA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent laid before the House a message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit for the consideration of Congress, in conformity with the requirements of the sixth section of the act of the 22d of June, 1860, a copy of certain regulations for the consular courts in China, prohibiting steamers sailing under the flag of the United States from using or passing through the Straw Shoe channel in the river Yangtse, decreed by S. Wells Williams, chargé d'affaires, on the 1st of June, and promulgated by George F. Seward, consul general at Shanghai, on the 25th of July, 1863, with the assent of five of the United States consuls in China, G. H. Colton Sulter dissenting. His objections to the regulations are set forth in the accompanying copy of a communication of the 10th of October last, inclosed in Consul General Seward's dispatch of the 14th of the same month to the Secretary of State, a copy of which is also transmitted.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 26, 1869.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that this message, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PEABODY MEDAL.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents, in relation to the gold medal presented to Mr. George Peabody, pursuant to the resolution of Congress of March 16, 1867.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 26, 1869.

BUILDINGS LEASED BY NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in answer to House resolution of the 28d instant, relative to buildings occupied by that Department under lease, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY BUILDINGS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 23d instant, a report by the general superintendent of the Treasury buildings of buildings held and occupied by that Department under lease, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MINT AT CARSON CITY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in reply to a resolution of the House of the 13th instant, reports relative to costs of the mint at Carson City, Nevada, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Charles C. Neill and N. D. McKenzie, leaving copies on file.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have a proposition to make to the House for the purpose of facilitating business and at the same time giving gentlemen an opportunity to be heard on the subject of finance and currency, now under discussion. The series of speeches upon this subject may be as well delivered in the evening. It is a very interesting subject, we all admit, but if it can be disposed of in that way we can proceed with the regular current business that is pressing upon the House. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that there be evening sessions hereafter, for debate only, until further order of the House, beginning with this evening at half past seven o'clock, with the understanding that no business shall be transacted.

No objection being made, it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now ask that the subject immediately before the House may be disposed of with the understanding that gentlemen who are to speak upon it can deliver their speeches in the evening.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield for that purpose?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do so in consideration of the pressure of public business.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the bill before the House be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. That will not prevent this same discussion going on.

Mr. LYNCH. I object to that reference. The bill has been recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and if the House refuses to sustain the motion now pending, to reconsider the recommitment, it will be left with that committee which has already considered the subject, and where it properly belongs.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have the floor on the pending subject and I object to any action being taken now on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, but his motion may be entered and remain undisposed of during the evening session.

The SPEAKER. It will require unanimous consent, as the pending motion is to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would inquire whether a motion to postpone the motion to reconsider may not be made this evening?

The SPEAKER. It can.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I suggest that the gentleman make that motion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to get the bill now before the House out of the way. I do not wish to make any disposition of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is not yet disposed of. The House has ordered an evening session to-night for general debate.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask my colleague to yield for a suggestion.

Mr. INGERSOLL. What is it?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is that you yield for a motion to postpone the further consideration of this motion till the evening session.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am willing this question shall pass over till the evening session with the motion of the gentleman from Maine pending. Would that be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. INGERSOLL. No vote would be taken, of course, till a further order of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will for a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say a word in regard to the business of the House, for the House has got to come to some understanding with itself in relation to the public business. It is a matter quite indifferent to me. The indications were yesterday that the House is not disposed to go to the public business at all. I desire to say that there are but thirty-one working days of this Congress left, and if we take out the day for counting the votes for President and Vice President there are but thirty working days which we have for the transaction of the public business. There are six of the most important of the appropriation bills which have not yet been acted upon by the House. The Committee on Appropriations have endeavored to do their duty faithfully. They remained here during the recess and gave their attention to the preparation of the appropriation bills. And now I say the House has got to come to some understanding with itself whether or not it will do the public business, whether it will make the appropriations necessary to carry on the Government, or whether it will refuse to do so. It is for this side of the House to determine whether we shall devote ourselves to the discussion and passage of all sorts of schemes and refuse to do the public business and compel an extra session of Congress, to run up to July next, and break down our incoming administration and sink it deeper than ever plummet sounded.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations this question: whether he considers a bill relating to the currency and finances of the country reported by one of the standing committees of this House, the appropriate committee, "public business" or not? He has told us about the interruption of public business; I ask him whether he does not consider a finance measure reported by the proper committee of this House "public business?"

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. By public business I meant the appropriation bills necessary to carry on the Government.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] must proceed or surrender the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask my colleague to yield for a motion to postpone the consideration of this subject until this evening.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection, provided this subject can receive the attention which its importance merits and demands, that we shall discuss these financial propositions in the evenings and devote the day sessions to what my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] calls "public business."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. My colleague will have the floor, I understand, this evening.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am ready to do that; but I ask the Chair if it would be in order that the discussion of this bill shall go over until evening on the motion to reconsider, and let the matter stand so until the further order of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the condition of the business now pending before the House and that which is pressing, apart from the appropriation bills. The House understands their condition, as it has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. This bill is before the House as the unfinished business and on the motion to reconsider, both of which are privileged, and it will remain before the House until the motion to reconsider is in some manner disposed of. If the motion should be postponed until the evening session it could be debated during the evening session, but no action could be taken upon it, and if the House should adjourn with it pending at the close of the evening session it would come up again to-morrow morning as soon as the Journal was read.

As soon as this bill shall have been disposed of by postponement, if that shall be the course adopted, the constitutional amendment and the bill in regard to suffrage would come up on a motion to reconsider by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] and, unless otherwise disposed of, will be debated until the close of the afternoon session of to-day. If this finance bill shall come up to-night upon the pending motion to reconsider, and the House shall adjourn upon it, then it will come up again to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, in preference to the constitutional amendment.

When those two questions, the one in regard to suffrage, the other in regard to specie payments, shall have been disposed of, then there will be a contested-election case from the State of Georgia, which the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the Committee of Elections, has notified the Chair he will call up on the first favorable opportunity. The Reconstruction Committee have also notified the Chair that they have important business to bring before the House for its consideration. There are also several motions to reconsider pending, liable to be called up at any time when there is no other business before the House. There is also a territorial bill, reported from the Committee on the Territories by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] which has been postponed until to-morrow after the morning hour.

The House will therefore see that a great variety of business is pressing upon them for consideration and action. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has also given notice of two bills reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, which are now pending in the Committee of the Whole, and which the gentleman from Ohio desires to reach at an early day.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to make a statement.

Mr. SCHENCK. My desire was to have evening sessions for general debate upon important subjects. It is probable that measures of currency and finance would attract most of the attention of members.

Gentlemen will see by the explanation of the Chair that for the purpose I have indicated it is important that this bill should be got out of the way for the present, either by laying on the table the motion to reconsider the recommendation or in some other manner. As the Speaker has explained, if we postpone this bill until this evening for discussion it will be the subject under consideration at the time of adjournment, for the order of the House is that no business shall be transacted during the evening session. In that case to-morrow morning we would have "Monsieur Tonson come again," and this subject would come up again immediately after the reading of the Journal; and so each morning in succession this bill will come up as unfinished business before the morning hour and immediately after the reading of the Journal.

I therefore ask the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. LYNCH,] who introduced this bill, whether he will not consent, now that he has made his speech upon it and there has been some discussion upon it, to let the bill remain with the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which it has been recommended, or allow it to be otherwise disposed of until some future time?

Mr. LYNCH. In answer I wish to disabuse the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] of an idea which he seems to entertain, that this bill was reported for the purpose of allowing me an opportunity to make a speech upon it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no doubt the gentleman wants action on his bill.

Mr. LYNCH. I have no desire to have this discussion continue for any great length of time. After one or two speeches shall have been made upon this bill I intend to move the previous question, perhaps speaking myself for five minutes to close the debate. I have no disposition to consume the time of this House by unnecessary debate upon questions of this kind, but I am anxious that the consideration of public business may be facilitated. The objection to the bill now under consideration is not that it is unimportant, but that it has not been reported by some privileged member on this floor, or from some privileged committee. But I will call the previous question after a little further discussion.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am willing to move that the motion to reconsider now pending be laid upon the table if the House will do so with the understanding that the evening sessions shall be for general debate, upon any question without the transaction of any business.

The SPEAKER. That has already been ordered by general consent.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the motion to reconsider the recommendation of this bill be laid upon the table. And I hope that will be regarded as a test question.

The SPEAKER. The effect of laying upon the table the motion to reconsider will be to leave the bill with the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] that under the circumstances he will be recognized as entitled to the floor this evening.

The question was upon the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In order that this may be made a test question I call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes nine.

Before the noes were counted, Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and accordingly the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for tellers on laying on the table the motion to reconsider.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

SUFFRAGE.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1667) to secure equal privileges and immunities to citizens of the United States and enforce the provisions of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, were recommended to the Committee on the Judiciary. On this question the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate as much as any other gentleman the importance of the public business before the House; and if any arrangement can be adopted by which this subject can also be postponed it will suit me perfectly well. I shall not make any motion with that view; but I yield to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. BOUTWELL] that he may indicate his wish in regard to the matter.

Mr. BOUTWELL. As the understanding of the House on last Monday was that when this question should again come up I would move or give way for a motion that its consideration be postponed till after the morning hour, I feel bound to submit that motion.

Mr. BINGHAM. Before the question is put on that motion I desire to ask that an amendment which I design to offer as a substitute for the proposed constitutional amendment be ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed. It is as follows:

Insert in lieu of section one of the article proposed to be added to the Constitution the following:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge or deny to any male citizen of the United States, of sound mind, and over twenty-one years of age, the equal exercise of the elective franchise at all elections in the State wherein he shall have actually resided for a period of one year next preceding such election, except such of said citizens as shall hereafter engage in rebellion or insurrection, or who may have been or shall be duly convicted of treason or other crime of the grade of felony at common law.

Mr. WARD. I ask that an amendment which I propose to offer be also printed.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed. It is as follows:

In lieu of section one of the article proposed to be added to the Constitution insert the following:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall deny to any male citizen of the United States over twenty-one years of age, who has been such citizen for three months, the free exercise of the elective franchise in the State of his residence, except as punishment for treason or other crime of the grade of felony at common law, whereof the person shall have been duly convicted. But this article shall not affect persons now disfranchised for participation in rebellion, nor prevent the execution of such proper registration and naturalization laws as may be needed to protect the people in a just exercise of the elective franchise, nor to affect such qualifications of electors as to time of residence as may be imposed by law for a period of one year or less.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I ask to have printed an amendment which I desire to offer.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed. It is as follows:

Insert in lieu of section one of the proposed new article of the Constitution the following:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall deny or abridge to any male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years or over, and who is of sound mind, an equal vote at all elections in the State in which he shall have such actual residence as shall be prescribed by law, except to such as have engaged, or may hereafter engage in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and to such as shall be duly convicted of treason, felony, or other infamous crime.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that after the morning hour the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] will permit his motion to reconsider to be postponed, that we may go into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill. That bill ought to be passed as early as possible and sent to the Senate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If my present motion to postpone till after the morning hour should prevail, we can meanwhile consult as to what disposition shall be made of the subject after the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. MAYNARD. I give notice that whenever I may have the opportunity I shall offer as a substitute for the bill reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] a bill of the same general purport introduced by me some time since, and which was then printed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the further consideration of the motion to reconsider be postponed till after the morning hour, with the understanding that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] shall then be entitled to the floor if the House should resume the consideration of this subject.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION LAWS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and the first business in order is the consideration of the bill pending at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 1682) relating to the operations of the pension laws, and for other purposes. The last amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions is still pending. The House refused to second the demand for the previous question; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] had risen to move an amendment to the pending amendment, and is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. PERHAM. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield a moment for an explanation. I desire to say that the amendment under consideration at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday was presented by mistake. I hold in my hand the amendment which was intended to be offered. I ask that by unanimous consent this be considered as pending in lieu of that offered yesterday.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The amendment which has just been substituted for that offered yesterday, and which is now pending, will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That section nine of an act entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July 14, 1862," approved July 4, 1864, be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows: that those persons, not enlisted soldiers in the Army, who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States, or where persons otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians since the 4th day of March, 1861, shall, if they have been disabled in consequence of wounds received in battle in such temporary service, or who were captured or disabled from disease contracted in rebel prisons, be entitled to the same benefits of the pension laws as those who have been regularly mustered into the United States service; and the widows or other dependents of any such persons as may have been killed in the temporary service aforesaid, or died in rebel prisons, shall be entitled to pensions in the same manner as they would have been had such persons been regularly mustered: Provided, That no claim under this section shall be valid unless presented and prosecuted to a successful issue within three years from and after the passage of this act. All such claims shall be adjudicated under such special rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions may prescribe most effectually to guard against fraud.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to amend the amendment by moving the following as an additional proviso:

Provided further, That no pension shall hereafter be paid to any person, or to the widow, heirs, or legal representatives of any person who shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof, unless such person shall thereafter perform meritorious service in the Army, Navy, or Marine corps of the United States.

Mr. PERHAM. That is a subject to which the attention of the committee has not been called. I do not know that there is any objection to it. I see none.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the gentleman how he proposes to ascertain the fact of the performance of meritorious service? It will not appear on the rolls at the Department nor upon any record that is accessible to the Pension Bureau. It seems to me it would be very difficult to carry the proposed amendment into practice, and it would be liable to very grave objection on account of its opening the door to fraud.

Mr. PAINE. I propose to leave it to the claimant, who, having served in the rebel army, shall apply for a pension from the United States, to prove that he has performed meritorious service in the Army, Navy, or Marine corps. Of course, he will have to make that proof under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Pension Bureau or Department of the Interior.

The objection the gentleman makes goes not to the amendment in its general scope and purport, but to the mere question of proof. Of course, in this bill we cannot prescribe detailed rules which shall be followed in preparing the evidence. But if we allow in any case a pension to a man who has been engaged in the rebellion we ought to require him to prove affirmatively, in order to clear himself from the disability imposed upon him by this amendment, that he has rendered meritorious service in our Army, Navy, or Marine corps. He may do it in various ways. If he has no record proof of any kind to show the fact, then the Department may allow him to give parole proof under proper regulations. But it seems to me to be perfectly intolerable that those who have engaged in the rebellion or who have given aid and comfort to the rebel cause should be allowed to receive pensions which may have been granted to them heretofore for the war of 1812 or other wars under laws that have been heretofore in force. I think they should be cut off unless they have atoned for the offense in the manner indicated in my amendment.

Now, it is true that a large number of those who engaged in the rebellion afterward joined our Army. I would have the disability removed as to them. But I would not permit a man who has engaged in rebellion, and who was drawing a pension from the United States before the rebellion, to come up here and present his demand, as they are doing every day, and get his pension.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire the gentleman to answer this question: why would he make any distinction in the law in regard to this particular class of pensions that does not apply to all pensions? The law provides that all individuals applying for a pension must take the oath prescribed in the law, that they have not taken up arms against the Government or given aid and comfort to its enemies. Even the widows who apply have to make that affidavit. Now, then, this is a peculiar class of pensioners that we are providing for by this amendment—those who volunteered to serve in particular cases. Now, the question is why should we make special rules for them in this regard that do not apply to all?

Mr. PAINE. This amendment of mine does not propose to make any special provision for them. Although I have been obliged, on account of the condition of the bill, to introduce this amendment as a proviso to the amendment of the chairman of the committee, yet the language is not limited; it does not apply to this class of cases in particular, but it applies to all claimants for pensions, whether for the war of 1812, the war of the rebellion, or any other war. My special object in this case is to cut off those who have heretofore been receiving pensions from the Government under laws that were enacted before the rebellion, whose pensions have been suspended during the rebellion on account of their participation therein, but who will hereafter, unless we enact this law, come to our Treasury and receive their pensions.

Mr. PERHAM resumed the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word in regard to this particular subject?

Mr. PERHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Wisconsin has a good purpose in his mind, I have no doubt; but I desire to state to him and to the House that there is one class of persons that his amendment will hit that I am quite sure he does not mean to hit. Several regiments—perhaps enough to make a dozen regiments—of our soldiers who were in Libby and Andersonville and other prisons made an engagement with themselves that they would enlist into the rebel army for the sake of getting out of prison and saving their lives, and that they would desert and come back to our Army on the first occasion. I say, then, enough to fill many regiments have done it, and have come straight to our lines and gone again into the ranks where they belonged before. We have several applications before the Committee on Military Affairs to wipe out disabilities that have been incurred in that manner. Now, if this law were passed, according to the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin it would debar every one of those persons; and he ought not to do that.

Mr. PERHAM. I think, from what has already been said, it is evident that a proposition like this requires very careful consideration, or we may legislate to do what we do not desire to do. I think the better way would be for the gentleman from Wisconsin to allow the amendment to be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The committee will examine it and mature a proposition, and if necessary we can send it to the Senate to be inserted in the bill.

Mr. PAINE. Allow me to make a single remark?

Mr. PERHAM. I will hear the gentleman explain if he will be brief.

Mr. PAINE. I want to say that precisely the case suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is provided for in my amendment; for the provision is that if they shall have rendered meritorious services in our Army they shall be exempt from the operation of the amendment.

Now, I admit that this might more properly have been introduced into this bill as a separate section; that it is not properly an amendment to this section, and if I could get it in the bill as a separate section I would be willing to withdraw it here and offer it on another occasion. But I utterly refuse to have it referred to the committee. Why, the gentleman from Maine himself expressed to me his approbation of the amendment, and nobody can have any objection to its principle. If it needs any modification in detail let it be modified, but I must insist upon having a vote in the House on the principle involved, either at this point or at some other stage of the bill.

Mr. PERHAM. I think the course I have suggested is the better one. Let the amendment be withdrawn now, and let it be more carefully considered, and if necessary it can be adopted hereafter.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PERHAM. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask the gentleman if the amendment he has proposed applies to persons who were summoned by provost marshals to assist in the arrest of deserters, for instance, and were wounded or killed in that service?

Mr. PERHAM. There is another provision of law which applies to cases of that kind; this does not.

Mr. LOGAN. There is no provision applicable to those cases, for I have had a case pending for a year past where a man's arms were shot off while engaged in the service to which I have referred, and yet he has been refused a pension.

Mr. PERHAM. This provision does not refer to that subject at all; but the cases referred to by the gentleman are provided for by another portion of this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I am pretty certain that they are not covered by this bill or by any law.

Mr. PERHAM. I now call the previous question on the amendment of the committee and the pending amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] if the provision now before the House applying to prisoners at Andersonville extends to all prisoners at all the other prisons of the confederacy? And does it also include all persons confined there for want of fidelity to the southern confederacy, or is it limited to enlisted men?

Mr. PERHAM. Perhaps I had better explain the object of this section. The law as it now is provides that any person not an enlisted man who volunteered and served in any regularly organized body of men in the service of the United States, and who was killed in the service or received wounds in the service, shall be embraced within the provisions of the pension laws. The amendment of the committee proposes to extend that provision to such persons who, while acting in such temporary service, may have been captured and sent to rebel prisons, and there died, or contracted disease of which they afterward died.

Mr. HARDING. What kind of organization and what kind of volunteering? By what means is it to be ascertained that they did volunteer?

Mr. PERHAM. They must have volunteered and served in some regularly organized force of the United States.

Mr. HARDING. Would not all camp-followers who volunteered in any battle come under this provision?

Mr. PERHAM. It is desired by some members that the time named within which these applicants shall complete their testimony shall be extended from three to five years. I have no objection to that, and will modify the amendment accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The amendment having been reported from a committee it cannot now be modified except by unanimous consent.

Mr. PERHAM. I ask unanimous consent for the purpose.

No objection was made; and the amendment of the committee was modified accordingly.

Mr. PERHAM. I now call the previous question on the amendment and amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HARDING. I hope the gentleman will not call the previous question, for I want to be heard upon this subject.

Mr. MYERS. Will the gentleman yield to me to offer an amendment?

Mr. PERHAM. I will hear it read.

The SPEAKER. There are now pending an amendment and an amendment to the amendment. No other amendment can now be entertained except by unanimous consent.

The question recurred upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. HARDING. Is it in order now to move that the pending amendment and the amendment to the amendment be laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion will be in order.

Mr. HARDING. Then I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The effect of the motion, if it shall be agreed to, will be to carry the bill on the table also. Does the gentleman insist upon his motion?

Mr. HARDING. I should like to be heard.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HARDING. Then I insist upon my motion.

Mr. PERHAM. I desire to say—

Mr. CHANLER. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. HARDING; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 27, noes 84.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon seconding the call for the previous question upon the amendment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the amendment pending thereto.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. PAINE to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PAINE. I modify my amendment to read as follows:

Provided further, That no pension shall hereafter be paid in any case to any person, or to the widow, heirs, or legal representatives of any person, who shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the United States or given aid and comfort to the enemies thereof, unless such person shall have thereafter served in the Army, Navy, or Marine corps of the United States.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to make a suggestion. If that amendment should be adopted it ought to be inserted just before the last clause of the amendment of the committee.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman misunderstands the scope of my amendment—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] desires unanimous consent to make a statement. Is there objection?

Mr. HARDING. I object.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. PAINE to the amendment reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 64, noes 55.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. PERHAM. I wish to say that I desire to yield for the offering of all proper amendments; but I hope gentlemen will remember that we have but little time for the consideration of this bill. The committee has an immense amount of business yet to present.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is it in order now, Mr. Speaker, for me to debate the amendment I proposed yesterday to strike out the second section?

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PERHAM], the chairman of the committee, does not claim the floor the Chair will award it to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understand that the chairman of the committee is willing to yield to me.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has the floor by the sanction of the Chair, if the gentleman from Maine does not claim it; and unless the gentleman from Maine yields to him or goes on himself I must object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] would be recognized if the chairman of the committee did not claim the floor. The bill being now before the House for the first time as amended the chairman of the committee is by the usage entitled to the floor if he claims it.

Mr. CHANLER. I do not object to his having the floor; but I do object to his yielding it unless he yields to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the Speaker permit me to make an inquiry? The gentleman from Maine, the chairman of the committee, not claiming the floor, I expected to get it for the purpose of moving an amendment; and I thought I was recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that he would award the floor to the gentleman from Ohio if the chairman of the committee did not claim it. The Chair could not tell whether the chairman claimed it or not, as he has been standing during the greater part of the time since the morning hour commenced. The Chair now understands that he claims the floor, and he is therefore entitled to it.

Mr. PERHAM. I intended to claim it, and I thought I did.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to move to amend by adding to the section last adopted the following:

Provided, That this section shall apply to all persons who may have been disabled in the performance of duty under the authority of the Government of the United States in aiding in the arrest of deserters from the Army of the United States.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I rise to a point of order. I submit that as the section has already been adopted it is not now open to amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. When a provision has been incorporated in a bill by a vote of the House it cannot be struck out except by striking out additional matter; but new matter may be added. The gentleman will find, by referring to page 9 of the Digest, the statement that an amendment which has been inserted may be added to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Is a section which has been adopted in lieu of another section open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It can be added to, according to a specific rule in the Digest.

Mr. PERHAM. I have no objection to allowing a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. LOGAN. I demand the previous question upon the amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

On agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 48, noes 34; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. LOGAN and BEATTY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 53.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative to make a quorum, and the amendment is—

Mr. BENTON. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in time. The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. BENTON. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PERHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, who desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to strike out the second and third sections of the bill. I have also another amendment which I would like to offer.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to perfect the second section before the motion is made to strike out.

The SPEAKER. That would be in order, but the gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WASHBURN], to offer an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move to strike out the third section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And be it further enacted, That no invalid pensioner who may have been employed in the service of the Government subsequent to March 3, 1865, and prior to June 6, 1866, shall be deprived of a pension during any part of that time by reason of such service.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Ohio. Before the vote is taken on striking out the second section, I ask the gentleman if he will yield to me to inquire of the chairman of the committee why it is that the committee makes this discrimination between male and female pensioners in the second section of the bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. That has nothing to do with the pending proposition to strike out these two sections. It may be made hereafter.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I want to move an amendment to perfect the second section.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. SCHENCK. I do.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to submit a few remarks upon my amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to the remarks.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would it not be in order for me to advocate the adoption of the amendment now?

The SPEAKER. It would if the Chair could award the floor to the gentleman; but he cannot do that without the consent of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. I know how anxious the committee is to get this through, and therefore I propose to condense as much as possible the little I have to say on this motion. I ask gentlemen to look at this second section. It provides—

That upon the presentation of satisfactory evidence to the Commissioner of Pensions that any female pensioner is living a life of prostitution, or is cohabiting with or living with or being supported by any man as his wife or mistress to whom she is not lawfully married, he shall immediately notify such pensioner or her agent of the charge or charges preferred against her by furnishing her or her agent a copy of the charge or charges and the evidence upon which the same is founded; and unless such pensioner shall within six months thereafter produce satisfactory rebutting evidence, her name shall be dropped from the pension-roll.

That is, the Commissioner of Pensions, in his office in this city, upon anybody's charge, made maliciously or otherwise, supported by proof which may be true or otherwise, shall determine the question of the virtue of a female pensioner. A question which is, of course, judicial in its character and which might require months to be settled in a court of law, is to be decided in this summary way, and that, too, by reversing the rule of evidence and calling upon every soldier's widow to prove her innocence and good character. It is the most monstrous, disgraceful proposition that I have ever seen incorporated in any bill presented to this House. I think, I am sure, that the honorable gentlemen constituting the committee must have been sleeping over the subject when they adopted this provision, and that if they had looked at the whole scope of it they would not have reported anything of that kind. But if they differ from me on that question I ask the judgment of the House upon my motion to strike out that section which gives to the Commissioner of Pensions that extraordinary supervisory power, for all time to come, over the morals of all the widows of soldiers who have been crippled or killed while in service. I do not think this needs any further comment.

Now, a word in regard to the third section; and if gentlemen wish a separate vote they can call for a division. I have moved to strike out all that part of the bill embodied in these two sections of the bill. The third section is for the purpose of withholding pensions for a short period of time from a certain class of pensioners who have been employed in the service of the Government who would otherwise get them. I think the history of that matter is that we withheld pensions from those employed by the Government until we got ashamed of that policy and repealed the law. But it is still proposed to apply the old system of withholding pensions to a certain class of pensioners in public employment. Sir, I am against the whole policy of withholding a man's pension because we have employed him as a clerk or otherwise. What does this propose? Here are two men clerks at $1,200 or $1,800 a year; the one has never been crippled in the service of the Government, draws no pension, and gets his $1,200 or $1,800; the other performs the same services and gets his $1,200 or $1,800; but in addition to that he has a pension. For what? For something outside of what the other does. He gets paid for what he does, and, in addition to payment for what he does, he asks also to have continued to him the payment which the bounty of the Government has provided for his sufferings in the cause of the country, for his crippled condition, for the additional expense that he is put to to live on account of his crippled condition. And we say by this bill, "No; we will put you on precisely the same footing as any other man who never was in the military service or suffered in it."

Now, I say that was all wrong in policy. I am glad the Government has changed its policy in that regard, and I do not see why these men should be made an exception to the better policy which we have established, and that is to pay each man employed by the Government like every other man, whether he be crippled or not, and then if the man be crippled, to pay him for that in addition, because it is for something which he has suffered and undergone and is entitled to be paid for in addition to what he receives for his services.

Mr. INGERSOLL. With a view of expressing my unqualified disapproval of the second section of this bill before the motion to strike out the section is put to the House, I move to insert after the word "any," in line three, the words "male or;" so that it will read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That upon the presentation of satisfactory evidence to the Commissioner of Pensions that any male or female pensioner is living a life of prostitution, or is cohabiting with, or living with, or being supported by any man as his wife or mistress, to whom she is not lawfully married, he shall immediately notify such pensioner or her agent of the charge or charges preferred against her, by furnishing her or her agent a copy of the charge or charges, and the evidence upon which the same is founded; and unless such pensioner shall within — months thereafter produce satisfactory rebutting evidence, her name shall be dropped from the pension-roll.

That will make it include both sexes. I prefer, however, that the section shall be stricken out, and I shall vote to strike it out. As I said yesterday, I believe it would be a disgrace to the statute-book and to the people of this country if Congress should enact it. I remember reading of a law which was in force several thousand years ago which provided that a woman convicted of adultery should be stoned to death, while the male wretch who was the author of her distress went scot-free; that was a barbarous law, and this is no less barbarous except that the punishment is less in this case than it was in that. The principle is the same.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that a male prostitute should be regarded with any higher favor than a female prostitute. Include them both or neither. But I prefer that the Committee on Pensions shall not be made an investigating committee to investigate the moral conduct of any of our citizens, much less the widows of our soldiers. This is unbecoming the age in which we live. It is an outrage upon the widows of brave men who now lie in graves marked with head-boards "Unknown," men who died that the country might live.

Sir, I must confess that I am amazed at this evidence of modern barbarism. Is it proposed as a measure of economy? Does this committee propose to reduce the expenditures of the Government by the degrading process provided by this section? It could never have emanated from any portion of the country other than the cold and frigid regions of Maine. [Laughter.] I shall vote to strike it out.

Mr. PERHAM. Allow me to make a statement. The morning hour will soon expire. I am desirous that amendments may be offered, but without debate at this time. If gentlemen will just forego their speeches and offer their amendments without discussion, and allow me to call the previous question before the expiration of the morning hour, I will then yield a portion of my time. I am willing to yield now for amendments without speeches.

Mr. CHANLER. I object to that arrangement; I want this matter discussed.

Mr. ARNELL. Is it now in order to move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

The SPEAKER. Not while the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] claims the floor.

Mr. PERHAM. I do not yield for any such motion.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine what he means by the fourth section of this bill. Does he mean to change the course of the descent of property? As I understand the section it provides that the arrears of pensions due any person at the time of his death shall not be paid to his legal representatives.

Mr. PERHAM. I will explain the object of that section after the previous question shall have been seconded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to move to strike out the fourth section of this bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. PERHAM. I would be willing to allow other amendments to be offered to this bill if there was no objection to it. But objection being made it is out of my power to allow other amendments to be offered. I now call the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. ARNELL. I move that the bill and pending amendments be laid on the table.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 61, noes 62.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ARNELL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ARNELL and Mr. PERHAM were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 47, noes 67.

Before the result of the vote by tellers was announced,

Mr. ARNELL called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the bill and pending amendments on the table.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were sixteen in the affirmative, (not one fifth of the last vote.)

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ARNELL called for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were seventeen in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of a quorum) tellers upon the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Accordingly the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay the bill and pending amendments on the table was accordingly not agreed to.

The question recurred upon seconding the previous question upon the bill and pending amendments; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 58, noes 56.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ALLISON called for tellers.

The question was taken upon ordering tellers; and there were twenty-five in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being one fifth of a quorum) tellers were ordered; and Mr. ALLISON and Mr. BURR were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 55, noes 63.

So the previous question was not seconded.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over to the next morning hour of public bill day.

SUFFRAGE.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1667) to secure equal privileges and immunities to citizens of the United States, and to enforce the provisions of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, were recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. The subject was postponed until after the morning hour of to-day, and upon it the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CULLOM,] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE,] who is a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, desires to address the House to-day upon this subject, as there will be important business before that committee to-morrow. I have consented to yield him now the hour to which I am entitled if I can be allowed to take the floor again immediately after he shall have concluded his remarks.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to make a suggestion to the House. I desire to ask unanimous consent that after the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] the further consideration of this subject shall be postponed until to-morrow evening, which I understand will be satisfactory to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CULLOM.] To-morrow evening let the debate be confined to this subject, and then, if I understand the rules of the House, if the adjournment shall take place while this subject shall be under consideration, it will come up on Friday morning immediately after the reading of the Journal. That will give the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] an opportunity to press the consideration of the appropriation bills to-day and to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. If this subject shall be postponed until to-morrow evening, and then comes up on Friday morning as unfinished business, it will not be till after the expiration of the morning hour, as that will be private bill day, unless the House shall by vote set aside the morning hour of that day.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to interfere with the business of the House, but I wish to state that there are four election cases undisposed of which it is not only proper but important to have brought up before the House at a very early day, and I do not feel it my duty to permit unanimous consent to any arrangement of our business unless the House will also, by unanimous consent, assign some time for the consideration of these cases.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that immediately after the reading of the Journal on any morning, when there is not unfinished business coming over from the preceding day, privileged reports or motions to reconsider may be called up before the morning hour begins.

Mr. DAWES. I am aware of that; but I have watched very faithfully for such an opportunity, and it has not arisen very lately.

The SPEAKER. That is owing to the fact that on several days recently there has been unfinished business coming over from the day preceding. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] the further consideration of the motion to reconsider be postponed till to-morrow evening, when debate only shall be in order, the question going over till Friday morning.

On the motion there were—ayes 65, noes 24; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. BOUTWELL and Mr. BROOKS.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes eighty-one, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill (H. R. No. 1158) for the relief of Commander John L. Davis.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill (H. R. No. 894) confirming title to Little Rock Island, in the Mississippi river.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 679) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Eugene City to the eastern boundary of said State."

PAY OF A CONTESTANT.

Mr. STOVER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Elections the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to William F. Switzer the compensation of a Representative in Congress for one year, in full, for time spent and expenses incurred in contesting the right of GEORGE W. ANDERSON to a seat in this House from the ninth congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. STOVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. STOKES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1801) for the relief of the political disabilities of Hiram Crabtree and others, of the county of Jackson, State of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

MAIL ROUTE IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. STOKES also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1802) establishing a mail route from Altamont to Tracy City, in the State of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

SUFFRAGE—AGAIN.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, the decree may have been pronounced, the fiat may have gone forth commanding another invasion of the jurisdiction and rights of the States by the Federal authorities. Partisan statesmen, with wisdom superior to the framers of the Constitution, may probably have discovered another opportunity to increase and prolong their party power by another usurpation, by another encroachment of the Federal Government upon the proper rights of the States. If so, I have not the vanity to suppose that anything I can say will cause them to hesitate or consider. Party ends must be accomplished, party purposes must be carried out even though it should revolutionize the Government, overthrow the Constitution, and destroy the Republic.

The time was when the suggestion of grave doubts of constitutional warrant would cause the advocates of a pending measure to hesitate, to reflect; when want of constitutional power would insure defeat; when even unquestioned powers which had been long unused were approached with reserve and exercised only after much deliberation and careful debate. Innovation and reform, however specious and desirable, were rejected at once and finally unless clearly sanctioned by constitutional authority. That no error might be committed, that the provisions of the Constitution might be comprehended in all the fullness of their import, resort was freely had to the opinions of its framers, the debates upon its consideration and adoption, and the contemporaneous history of the country and the times. It was no disparagement to the statesman or his argument that it was based upon the Constitution. It was the highest authority, both in its powers and limitations. It was truly considered not only the bond of our Union and the grant of all the powers that could be rightfully exercised by the Federal Government, but it was the palladium of American liberty.

I will not stop now to point out the changes that have taken place in this respect, or to give the different views of modern Solons upon it. My friends on this side of the House will not soon forget the manifestations of scorn and contempt with which their arguments, based upon the Constitution, have been met by the majority. We shall remember long the charges of disloyalty to our country, of treason to our Government, and of sympathy with its enemies, based only upon the fact that we would not join them in violating and disregarding its provisions.

But, sir, I shall not be driven from the line of my duty; I shall not shrink from the like argument upon this or any other measure because of any such attacks from those who condemn and despise our Constitution of Government.

I shall not attempt to analyze this bill or to examine its provisions in detail. The main feature and purpose of the bill are to take from the States the right to determine the qualification of voters. It provides—

That no State shall abridge or deny the right of any citizen of the United States to vote for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, or for Representatives in Congress, or for members of the Legislature of the State in which he may reside, by reason of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; and any provisions in the laws or constitution of any State inconsistent with this section are hereby declared null and void.

Thus it is proposed by this bill to invade the jurisdiction of State authority and subject all the States of the Union to Federal control. This long-conceded right of the States to determine for themselves who of their citizens shall exercise the right of suffrage within their respective jurisdictions is now for the first time to be taken away by act of Congress from all the States of this Union. It would seem that the exercise of this power by the States, almost unquestioned ever since and before the adoption of the Constitution, for more than eighty years, would cause gentlemen to hesitate before taking such a step. Is not the argument that the Federal Government, the people, and all the States have acquiesced so long in the exercise of this power by the several States almost conclusive? No two of the States have adopted provisions by which the same and all the same class or classes of their citizens vote. Some even have not confined the right to citizens at all. Aliens having declared their intentions only are in several of the States permitted to exercise the right of suffrage. There can scarcely be said to be any uniformity. The laws on the subject are as variant and diversified as the climate and the productions of the States themselves. And yet the right and power of the several States to determine this question of the qualification of voters can hardly be said to have been doubted. I do not ignore the fact that some one or more honorable gentlemen on this floor and in the other branch of Congress, together with some pseudo-commentators upon the Constitution, blinded, as I think, by the heated passions of fanaticism and war, have professed to believe and have declared that Congress has the constitutional power necessary to pass this bill. But the conclusions of these gentlemen are, I apprehend, more from the desire that a Congress composed of their friends should intervene and control the suffrage of the States in the interest of the party to which they are attached than from any settled conviction of constitutional warrant. Their views and opinions are confused, and they seem uncertain upon what provision of the Constitution to rest them. They base them more upon what they consider the necessity of the times, the wants of the nation, and the will of the people, as expressed through the party to which they adhere, than upon any express or implied grant of power to the Federal Government in and by the Constitution itself. The Constitution declares that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."—Constitution, art. 1, sec. 2, clause 1.

This, as I believe, is the only provision of the Constitution in any manner dictating or prescribing the qualifications of electors. "And the electors of each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." Can any candid, fair-minded man pretend that this provision is a grant of power to Congress to intervene and prescribe the qualification of electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature? Is it not all that Congress can do to insist or require that the same body or class or classes of persons who are allowed to vote or qualified as electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature shall be the electors of members of the House of Representatives? And are they not to be the same persons who are by the State laws declared qualified electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature of the State? It seems to me nothing can be clearer. No language can make it more explicit. All is left to the State except only that the persons the State designates as its electors of the most numerous branch of its Legislature shall be the constitutional electors of the House of Representatives. The Constitution provides that the State may determine the persons who shall be electors of members of the House of Representatives by its act of determining who shall be the electors of its most numerous legislative branch. This right of the State to determine the qualification of the electors of the members of its Legislature is older than the Constitution. The State derived the power from the people of the State before the Constitution was adopted. The power, therefore, remains in the State until it is taken away. There is nothing in the Constitution, nothing in the provision quoted certainly, granting the power to the Federal Government or prohibiting it to the State.

In No. 52 of the Federalist, the authorship of which is claimed by both Hamilton and Madison, the following language is used with reference to this subject and the provision of the Constitution referred to:

"To have reduced the different qualifications in the different States to one uniform rule would probably have been as dissatisfactory to some of the States as it would have been difficult to the Convention. The provision made by the Convention appears, therefore, to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established or which may be established by the State itself. It will be safe to the United States, because being fixed by the State constitutions it is not alterable by the State governments; and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitutions in such manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution."

It appears thus clearly by the opinion of these most distinguished statesmen, written in advocacy of the Constitution at a time when no passion or partisan prejudice influenced their judgment or clouded their understandings, that it was the intention of the framers to leave the qualification of electors as established or to be established by the State itself. And this provision they declare "was the best within the option of the Convention."

Judge Curtis, in his History of the Constitution, shows that what was then feared most was universal suffrage in its most unrestricted sense, or that foreigners might be admitted. And he uses the following language:

"The adoption of this principle avoided the necessity of disfranchising any portion of the people of a State by a system of qualifications unknown to their laws. As the States were the best judges of the circumstances and temper of their own people it was certainly best to conciliate them to the support of the new Constitution by this concession."—Curtis's History of the Constitution, vol. 2, p. 200.

Further along, in the same connection, Mr. Curtis says:

"Accordingly, although very strenuous efforts were made to introduce into the Constitution of the United States particular theories with regard to popular suffrage, some of the members being in favor of one restriction and some of another, the rule which referred the right in each State to its domestic law was sustained by a large majority of the Convention."—Page 202.

In this view all the commentators that I have been able to consult agree. It was a reference of the whole question to the domestic law—to the law of the State. The House of Representatives was to be composed of members chosen every two years by the people of the several States, the requisite qualifications of the electors of whom were expressly referred to the law established by the State itself. And this provision was sustained by a large majority of the Convention. The advocates of this bill must therefore look to some other provision of the Constitution for the power to pass it. There is no grant here to the Federal Government. It only authorizes the same electors to elect members of the House of Representatives who by the laws of the State are qualified electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. This is what was intended, and all that can be claimed for it.

Can authority for this bill be found under article one, section four, clause one of the Constitution?

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The times, places, and manner of holding the elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof. The times, places, and manner; "but the Congress may at any time make or alter such regulations." What regulations may Congress make or alter? Clearly, the times, places, and manner, and nothing else: the times when and the places where the elections shall take place. This is clear and unmistakable. And is there any more room for doubt as to the import of the term "manner?" It seems to me not. It cannot relate to the qualification of the electors. This is left where it was at the adoption of the Constitution—with the States themselves. Manner must relate to the manner of conducting the election, whether by ballot or viva voce, to the mode or manner in which the elector shall signify his choice, shall express his will. This was the opinion of Mr. Justice Story, in his able and most exhaustive commentary on the Constitution, where we should almost suppose he had these bills under consideration. He says:

"What would be said of a clause introduced into the national Constitution to regulate the State elections of the members of the State Legislatures? It would be deemed a most unwarrantable transfer of power, indicating a premeditated design to destroy the State governments. It would be deemed so flagrant a violation of principle as to require no comment."—Story on the Constitution, sec. 819.

This bill proposes to regulate the State elections of members of the State Legislature; precisely what Story says would indicate an unmistakable design to destroy the State governments. Again Justice Story says:

"Nor can it be said with correctness that Congress can in any way alter the rights or qualifications of voters."—Ibid., section 820.

Mr. Story seems to have adopted very nearly the language of Hamilton on the same subject in No. 59 of the Federalist, where he most emphatically condemns the idea even of introducing such an article into the Constitution. He says:

"Suppose an article had been introduced into the Constitution empowering the United States to regulate the elections for the particular States, would any man have hesitated to condemn it, both as an unwarrantable transposition of power and as a premeditated engine for the destruction of the State governments?"

In those days no man would have hesitated to condemn it. The Constitution could never have been adopted if it had contained the grant of power to Congress to determine the qualification of voters for officers of the States. Such a work is left for these days of revolution and usurpation—to the mad fanatics who for partisan ends would destroy our Republic of States. These authorities not only show that the power to regulate the qualification of electors is not granted to the Federal Government, but that it ought not to be possessed by it.

Mr. Story says:

"It would be a most unwarrantable transfer of power, indicating a premeditated design to destroy the State government."

Mr. Hamilton calls it—

"An unwarrantable transposition of power," * a premeditated engine for the destruction of the State governments."

Sir, for myself I most heartily indorse and believe this. This measure originated in hostility to the States, and most certainly menaces their existence. Every step in the direction of this bill and joint resolution is a step toward centralization and consolidation. It evinces a premeditated design upon the life of the States—a design to concentrate all the powers of government in the Federal head. And with this scheme consummated, and the others contemplated by the party in power, there will be very little left of the States; the rights, powers, and all the vast interest confided to them by the people will be crushed and destroyed under the advancing foot of empire. The States cannot long stand against the grasping and growing power of the Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, after the most careful examination and inquiry, I venture the assertion that no friend or advocate of the Constitution at the time of its adoption by the Convention and ratification by the States can be found to have claimed even that the power to prescribe the qualification of voters in the States was conferred upon the Federal Government. It is true that the opponents of the Constitution argued against it on the ground that it might be so construed; that Congress—some future Congress—might undertake to exercise the power of determining what persons should exercise the right of suffrage. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWEN] admits, as I understood him, that this was the charge made against the Constitution by its opponents. Patrick Henry was one of them. He made every argument which his great genius could suggest to stir up hostility to it. But who but the gentleman from Massachusetts would argue a constitutional grant of power against the plain letter of the instrument on the suggestions of those opposed to it and seeking to defeat its adoption merely because those suggestions were undenied by its friends? The gentleman, however, is mistaken when he says that the friends of the Constitution did not deny that this power was conferred upon the United States Government, or that the friends did not deny this construction of those who were opposed to it. It was not only denied in the discussions in the Convention, but it was deliberately denied by Hamilton and Madison in the passage already quoted from the Federalist. What denial can be more explicit than this?

"The provision made by the Convention appears therefore to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established or which may be established by the State itself."

And again, (No. 60 of the Federalist,) Mr. Hamilton makes the most emphatic denial, and refers to another previous occasion when he had done so. He says:

"The truth is, that there is no method of securing to the rich the preference apprehended, but by prescribing qualifications of property either for those who may elect or be elected. But this forms no part of the power to be conferred upon the national Government. Its authority would be expressly restricted to the regulation of the times, the places, and the manner of elections. The qualifications of the persons who may choose or be chosen, as has been remarked upon another occasion, are defined and fixed in the Constitution, and are unalterable by the Legislature [of the Union]."

By reference to the fifth volume of Eliot's Debates it will be seen that the denials and statements in the debates were no less clear and definite. First by—

"Mr. WILSON. This part of the report was well considered by the committee, and he did not think it could be changed for the better. It was difficult to form any uniform rule of qualifications for all the States. Unnecessary innovations, he thought, too, should be avoided."

"Mr. ELLSWORTH thought the qualifications of the electors stood on the proper footing. The right of suffrage was a tender point, and strongly guarded by most of the State constitutions. The people will not readily subscribe to the national Constitution if it should subject them to be disfranchised. The States are the best judges of the circumstances and temper of their own people."

"Mr. MADISON. The right of suffrage is certainly one of the fundamental articles of republican government, and ought not to be left to be regulated by the Legislature [of the Union]."

Mr. George Nicholas, in his opening speech in the Virginia convention, (vol. 3 Eliot's Debates, p. 42,) made these remarks, showing his construction of it:

"As the qualifications of electors are different in the different States, no particular qualifications, uniform through the States, would have been politic, as it would have caused a great inequality in the electors, resulting from the situation and circumstances of the respective States. Uniformity of qualifications would greatly affect the yeomanry in the States, as it would either exclude from this inherent right some who are entitled to it by the laws of some States at present, or be extended so universally as to defeat the admirable end of the institution of representation."

In view of these emphatic and distinct avowals of the members of the Convention, how is it possible for the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts to claim that the construction put upon the Constitution by Patrick Henry and others who opposed it was not denied? And will gentlemen still contend that the power exists in the Federal Government to regulate the qualification of electors in the States by the silence and acquiescence of the friends of the Constitution? The passage quoted from the debates and attributed to Mr. Madison can have very little weight when compared with his more deliberate and solemn written declarations. In my judgment, the evidence that the power to regulate the qualification of voters was left with the States, and that the Convention so intended from its language, from the declaration of the members, from the concurrent history, from all respectable commentators, is conclusive and overwhelming. Any other conclusion will do violence to the plain letter of the Constitution, and be a falsification of the history and debates upon it.

The argument that if this power is with the States, and not subject to the ultimate control and regulation of the national Government, the States have it in their power to refuse to act upon the question, and thereby fail or neglect to send Representatives to Congress and thus destroy the Government, has very little force. Congress having the power to regulate the time, place, and manner of holding the elections, has all the power that was thought necessary, all that is necessary. This being done, the persons qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature can and will meet and elect Representatives. It can make no difference that the electors are determined by the State. Electors qualified to elect and having the right to vote for members of the State Legislature exist, and must always exist so long as the State itself, as such, exists; and Congress can require them to meet at the time and place and cast their ballots in the manner it may see fit to designate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. As the gentleman has appealed to me, he will permit me to say a word. He has declared that I was in error in affirming that the debates show no denial by the friends of the Constitution of the position taken by Patrick Henry. I desire to say that I was familiar with the quotations which the gentleman has cited, and which, taken by themselves, do certainly imply that the authors of those remarks did not understand the power for which I contend as being vested in the General Government; but I believe it will be found that in all those cases they were discussing the question of primary jurisdiction, not that of ultimate jurisdiction, for which I have contended.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I cannot yield further; the gentleman has already occupied a couple of hours on this question.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts, my colleague on the committee, made one other argument which I cannot fail to notice. He claimed, as I understood him, that the power of Congress to make or alter such regulations as the State might prescribe, was coextensive with the power granted to the State, and that if the Congress could not regulate the qualifications of electors the States did not possess the power to prescribe them. This is a fundamental error—I had almost said blunder. It is basing the argument upon the most fatal heresy of these times—the heresy out of which the evils have grown that threaten the very life of the Republic of States. It reverses the entire order and system of our Government. The gentleman must have forgotten that the Federal Government is a Government of delegated powers—

"That the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."—Tenth Amendment of Constitution.

The power to determine the qualifications of electors was, in the States, conferred, as we have before stated, by the people of the States, in most if not all of them imbedded in their constitutions when the Federal Constitution was formed and adopted. And that power has never been delegated to the General Government, and has not been prohibited to the States. It rests, therefore, where the people of the States placed it; in the States themselves. Sir, the powers and rights and liberties of the States and people do not come down from Congress or the Federal Government. There are some powers with which Congress has not been entrusted. Congress cannot determine just how much of liberty the people shall enjoy, just how they shall speak and move and breathe. All the powers of the Federal Government come up from the States and people, and it never had and never can have the rightful authority to exercise any power not granted in and by the Constitution. The exercise of any other is rank usurpation.

I do not suppose it is seriously believed, or will be seriously contended, that the passage of this bill is warranted under the clause of the Constitution, "The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." For Congress to intervene under the pretense that the States to which the bill is to apply have not now a republican form of government is to decide that there are no States now in the Union that have a republican form; for the bill applies alike to all the States. It is to decide that there never have been any States of this Union that have had a republican form. If there be any State that has a republican form, that State ought to be excepted from its operation. I am not aware of any one who has the hardihood to claim that the original States were not republican in form, and if they were, that settles the question of the power of Congress to interfere with them under this provision.

The United States is not to guaranty any particular form of republican government. The States certainly have the right to select or choose for themselves the form, only so that it is republican. All are not by the Constitution required to be Massachusetts. Ohio's form may at least suit her people better, and the United States has no power to dictate or guaranty the one or the other as a choice of particular republican forms.

If it were claimed that no State is republican in form that does not allow all its citizens to vote, then we should have no republican States, because no one of the States does allow all its citizens to exercise this privilege. It will not be claimed, I suppose, that the State has not a republican form of government for the reason only that it denies to its negro citizens what it also denies to our citizens' wives and daughters. And if citizenship alone confers the right to vote, and a State is not republican that denies the right to an uneducated, half-civilized colored man, how much more is the State not republican in form that denies the educated, cultivated, and refined woman the right. But, sir, citizenship does not necessarily carry with it the right to vote or hold office under our system. Nor can the denial to a citizen of the right to vote by a State destroy the republican form of its government. It was not so understood at the adoption of the Constitution, and has never been so claimed by any sane man. That the question of who shall exercise the right of suffrage is a delicate and most important question I admit. That the power of determining it ought to be dispassionately and wisely exercised is equally true. On its being so used depends greatly the welfare and happiness of the body-politic and the permanence and endurance of our republican Government and institutions. But that this power rests in the States, and ought to rest there, I have no doubt. That the rights and liberties of the people are safer with this power in the control of the States than in the control of the Federal Government I certainly believe.

And, sir, without meaning any disrespect to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] I must say that it seems to me that his bill and resolution for the amendment of the Constitution, and his "cumulative remedies," as he styled them, for the evils which exist in his judgment with reference to the persons who ought to exercise the right of suffrage, is a felo de se. If the power exists in the Federal Government to pass this bill, whether under any one or all the provisions referred to, then I admit that Congress has the right to control the whole question of suffrage and the qualification of electors for all officers, State and national. There can be no reason for its entering the State and determining the qualification of those who are to elect the officers named in the bill that will not apply to every officer of the State so far as the question of power is concerned. The electors of President and Vice President are not named in section four of the first article. The power claimed, therefore, under the word "manner" in this section can no more apply to them than to the Governor of the State or any other State officer. So that if it covers electors it may as well cover, and does as necessarily cover, all that is contemplated by the amendment proposed by the joint resolution. The amendment is, then, worse than useless. If it be necessary for the purpose it contemplates it must be a most pregnant admission that the bill is unconstitutional.

I submit, however, without stopping to consider it at any length, that so far as the election of electors of President and Vice President is concerned, the bill is in direct violation of clause two, section one, article two of the Constitution, which provides:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors," &c.

If "manner" be the broad term contended for by the gentleman the whole subject belongs to the State, under this provision:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct," &c.

And yet by this bill the whole power with reference to the electors is to be substantially taken away from the State Legislature. If "manner," in the clause previously referred to, allows the United States to prescribe the qualification of electors, I submit the same construction should be given to it in this, and that therefore Congress has no power by this bill to take it away or prescribe qualifications different from those the State may determine.

Sir, I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts gave a proper consideration to the fourteenth amendment, as it is called. I will not consider the question of whether this amendment is a part of the Constitution; for myself I do not believe it is. The gentleman treated it as though he thought otherwise. I will remark, however, that if it was properly ratified and adopted I know of no palliation of the guilt of those gentlemen who have denied the representation of those States without whose action it never could have become and never can be considered as a part of the Constitution. The gentleman denied that there is in this amendment any recognition of the right of the States to determine the question of suffrage or who should exercise it. It seems to me nothing could be plainer. Section two provides—"Representation shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, &c. But when the right to vote at any election * * * is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, &c., the basis of representation therein shall be reduced," &c.

"But when the right to vote at any election is denied or abridged in such State;" can there be any doubt or mistake that this language recognizes and expressly admits the power to be in the State to abridge or deny the right to some of its inhabitants to vote, subject only to have the basis of its representation reduced thereby? What other meaning can be attached to or construction put upon it? Was the gentleman candid when he denied it? It is too plain to admit of demonstration. It was understood to concede this power in the States at the time it was considered in this House, as every gentleman then on this floor must bear me witness. The gentleman says it was only a punitive provision, in case the States should violate its duty and be otherwise beyond the reach of Congress. This is an absurdity. I assert it was intended as a fundamental provision of this Government, and devised for the very purpose of compelling the States, wherein the power to determine the qualification of voters was conceded to rest, to grant suffrage to negroes. It was understood to be optional with the State to grant this right of suffrage to its negroes or have its representation in Congress proportionately diminished. Hon. Thaddeus Stevens, the late leader of the Republican party in this House, urged this view of the matter with peculiar emphasis. He thought the love of power and the desire for representation in the House of Representatives would be sufficient guarantee that the right of suffrage would not be long withheld from the colored men of the States. The power of the States to regulate and determine the qualification of voters was not questioned, except perhaps by one member on this floor, and no gentleman can truthfully deny the fact.

And, sir, I assert that no man who voted for that amendment can consistently contend that the power to determine the qualifications of voters in the States does not exist in the State itself. And no lawyer can doubt that the amendment does distinctly recognize the power to be in the States. The gentleman argues that the State might refuse to obey a law of Congress regulating or prescribing the qualification of voters, and that this section was intended to punish the State for such refusal. How is this possible, I asked the gentleman, and he failed to answer. If Congress has the constitutional power to enact a law, and does so, declaring who shall vote in a State, any act of the State Legislature in conflict with it would be no law; it would be absolutely null and void. The act of Congress in pursuance of the Constitution is the supreme law, and must necessarily annul the act of the State. The question, therefore, recurs, how can the State incur the penalty? And the answer must be, it is impossible. The law of Congress executes itself by destroying and blotting out the act of the State and leaving the citizen free to exercise the right conferred upon him by the law of Congress. This is too plain for argument; and I will not pursue it.

But right or wrong, constitutional or unconstitutional, whether for the best interest of the Republic or jeopardizing in an untried and doubtful experiment the happiness and prosperity of the whole people, the measure must be passed into a law. And the gentleman makes his final appeal upon party grounds—an appeal—I say it without intending disrespect toward him—unworthy of himself, unworthy the discussion of grave constitutional questions, and unworthy to be heeded by the honorable gentlemen of this House. It is an appeal not without influence upon the selfish and unprincipled partisan, upon the political gamester who postpones his country to his party. He tells us that the passage of this bill will add one hundred and fifty thousand voters to his party—seventeen hundred in Connecticut, ten thousand in New York, five thousand in New Jersey, fourteen thousand in Pennsylvania, seven thousand in Ohio, twenty-four thousand in Missouri, forty-five thousand in Kentucky, four thousand in Delaware, and thirty-five thousand in Maryland, and he wishes to know if the service of these men who are ready to do battle with his party at the ballot-box are to be declined. Was ever before such an appeal made by statesman to a great political party just coming victoriously out from a great political contest? Is it a confession that the course of the party is to be such in its administration that this vast accession of recruits will be necessary to preserve its power? Is it a confession in advance that it is to be discarded by those who fought and helped it to win its last great victory, and that its future success and power must depend upon the negro vote? The gentleman felt the reproach of his appeal in support of his bill, and boasted that he was a plain-spoken, as he showed he was a bold man in braving criticism upon this part of his speech. I confess I thought him bold, not so much in daring the criticism of this side of the House, as in presuming so unworthy an appeal to gentlemen on that.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts started out by telling us this is "the last of the series of great measures growing out of the rebellion and necessary for the reorganization and pacification of the country" with which the Republican party has been charged. I think I express the universal sentiment of the people of the country when I say that I thank God and the Republican party that this is the last. But I would like to have gentlemen inform this House and the country how the party became charged with this measure and by what authority they undertake to "reorganize the country;" how the rebellion has invested the Republican party in Congress with the authority to go into the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio and the other northern States with its bills of reorganization? I expected it to do so; I did not suppose it would be satisfied with reorganizing the southern States. I am not disappointed, but where did the party obtain its power, its commission, its charge to reorganize the States that did not rebel? It was not by the election of General Grant, for he was elected upon no such platform. One of the planks of the platform laid down by the convention that nominated him laid down the same doctrine that I have endeavored to maintain—

"That the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

The Republican party was charged, if charged at all, by this resolution to let the loyal States alone—to let the people of those States regulate the question of suffrage for themselves. The convention unanimously declared that "the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States," and thereby virtually that Congress had nothing to do with it. What has caused the party to change front? If the question properly belonged to those States during the elections of last fall, what have the States done since to deprive themselves of the right? If the question did not properly belong to Congress then how has it become invested with the propriety now of disposing of it in those States?

Mr. Speaker, if it be possible that the Republican party can commit itself to anything, it is in its support of the so-called fourteenth amendment, and in and by its action in national convention, committed solemnly to the doctrine that the people of the several States have properly the right to control the question of suffrage in their respective States. And, in my judgment, the Republican members of this House cannot force this measure upon the country at this time without covering their party with another dishonor, without a shameful violation of party pledges and party faith. Was this declaration of principle the honest sentiment of the party at the time it was incorporated in the platform, or was the placing it there an intended premeditated fraud to induce support of the candidates and to be ignored and disregarded when the victory should be achieved? How many States would the party have carried upon the measure now being urged? With the provisions of this bill in the platform where would have been Pennsylvania and Ohio and Indiana? It alone would have defeated your candidates for President and Vice President with all their great personal popularity.

The gentleman from Massachusetts affected some sympathy with foreigners, and intimated that this measure was in the interest of the white man as well as the black, and that it would be a protection of the Irishman, the German, and the Scandinavian. These crocodile tears for the white foreigner will be duly appreciated by us all, and especially by the foreigner, when the gentleman shall have made his speech and cast his vote on the bill being prepared by his party friends to prevent, obstruct, or embarrass naturalization.

The gentleman seemed to deplore his inability to present the principles involved in these great measures except in what he called "a party aspect." It is some satisfaction to know that gentlemen are not utterly insensible of the low plain upon which these schemes are urged and advocated. Party aspect, indeed! These measures have their origin and support in the most intense partyism. Party, party! It is the infernal spirit of party that has controlled, sunk, and degraded so much of the legislation of Congress during and since the war. It was the fell spirit of party against which the almost dying words of Washington warned his countrymen. Party! What crimes have not since that day been committed in its name and by its relentless demand! Party has kept the dissevered fragments of the Union asunder ever since the war ended. Insatiate party has destroyed the republican character of ten States of the Republic and established over them despotisms that would put to shame the most frightful and grinding despotisms of any age or any country. Party has persistently for the last four years sought to subvert or change the form of our government, both State and Federal. It is at the demand of party that Congress has assaulted the executive and judiciary, and endeavored to usurp the powers belonging to these coordinate Departments or force the President and the judges to bow down and do its bidding. It is at the demand of party and in its interest alone that power is sought to be taken from the intelligent and cultivated white man and given to the ignorant, uneducated, and servile negro. It is the inexorable demand of party that is bringing the white and black races in this country in fatal antagonism and conflict, which must end in the utter extermination of the weaker race or in the degradation of the other. It is party that is keeping alive the animosities, the malignant and bitter passions engendered by the war, and preventing that forgiveness, reconciliation, and harmony dictated and enjoined by the spirit of Christian charity.

Mr. Speaker, I am consoled at my want of preparation and failure to discuss this measure fully and in all its bearings by the fact that there are able gentlemen on this side of the House who will present the objections to it more fully and ably than I could have hoped to. I wish this measure coming from the Judiciary Committee might have been presented and advocated by my distinguished colleague on the committee upon high legal and constitutional grounds only. I wish that party and party considerations might have been ignored in its discussion. The subject is of too much importance, the changes proposed in our system of government vastly too great and far-reaching in their effects, to be carried upon party grounds or for party ends. Parties, at the longest, do not live long. They are changing and evanescent; they pass away and others take their places; they serve their purpose and are gone. It is doubtful if they do not more evil than good. Our Constitution we hope may live forever. Its blessings have been manifold and showered upon us without stint or measure. Let no partisan parricide lift his hand against it. "Conscience" should "make cowards" of you all. The ghost of the slain Constitution "will not down at your bidding."

Peace, reconciliation, unreserved submission and obedience to the written Constitution, liberty, prosperity, happiness, "on one side;" strife, malignity, party license regulated by no law, anarchy, despotism, "on the other."

Mr. MUNGEN asked and obtained leave to have printed, as a part of the debates, a speech upon the pending question. [See Appendix.]

INDIANS ON UPPER MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with accompanying papers, relative to the suffering and starving condition of the Indians on the Upper Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOMESTEAD LAW.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas relative to the homestead law; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1158) for the relief of Commander John L. Davis.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 1672, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

The CHAIRMAN. When the House was last in Committee of the Whole an amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] was withdrawn by consent, and the committee then rose.

Mr. JULIAN. I renew the amendment to insert in line one hundred and seven "clerk to Committee on the Public Lands, $2,160."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I distinctly understood that the gentleman withdrew his amendment as the House was dividing.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the amendment is pending without the necessity of offering it again.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose the committee ought to pass on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Had the gentleman from Indiana spoken on his amendment?

Mr. JULIAN. I have; I withdraw it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object, because the committee was dividing when it rose.

Mr. JULIAN. I have a right at any time to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. No decision had been made by the Chair. The language of the rule is that an amendment may be withdrawn at any time before a decision is made.

Mr. JULIAN. I now renew the amendment. If the House will listen to me a moment I think I can satisfy every member present that the amendment which I have offered ought to be made. The clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands for the past seven years has been one of the four permanent clerks of standing committees of this House. He was made such by a resolution passed in the year 1862, which is as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be authorized to employ a clerk for said committee, who shall in addition to his usual duties be charged with the care, preservation and continuation of the series of land maps ordered for the use of the said committee by the resolution of the House of Representatives of May 4, 1848, at the same compensation heretofore allowed the draughtsman upon the said maps."

It thus appears that by a resolution of this House, which is unrescinded, that this clerk is made a permanent one, with a fixed salary, and he stands precisely on the same footing as the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, of Ways and Means, and of Claims, all of whom hold their positions by like resolutions of the House. Yet the gentleman from Illinois has prevailed on his committee to report the bill omitting any appropriation for the compensation of this clerk, as contemplated and provided for by the resolution I have read. Now, I submit to the House and to the gentleman from Illinois that no reason can be assigned why this appropriation should be withheld as to this clerk while the other three clerks I have named are untouched. The gentleman from Illinois the other day stated that the clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands did not do an amount of business that would warrant his being paid as permanent clerk. I submit very respectfully to him that I know, as chairman of that committee, much more about the business of this clerk than he can know, not being a member of the committee. I should consider it a palpable assumption on my part to say that the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations does not render any service worthy of compensation; and it is equally an assumption on his part to say that the clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands should not have compensation for a like reason. The gentleman knows nothing about the labors of the clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands, and can make no pretense that he does.

That, then, is the situation. If the gentleman wishes to economize I agree with him in the general necessity for it; if the difference between the pay of a permanent clerk and his per diem during the sessions of Congress is a matter of sufficient importance to kindle his zeal for economy and retrenchment I submit that he might with great propriety have omitted any appropriation for the clerk of his own committee. We might then have believed him sincere; for the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations has no better right to be paid as a permanent clerk than that of the Committee on the Public Lands. The gentleman from Illinois knows this.

The gentleman said the other day that the clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands does not remain here the whole of the year. But neither does the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, or of Claims. If, therefore, the gentleman desires to economize, and wishes to be thought either honest or consistent, he will move an amendment to strike out the appropriation for the pay of clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, and thereby show that he is governed by a spirit of fair play and fair dealing. Let him do even-handed justice between these committees; but I protest against this invidious attack, this perfectly gratuitous fling that is made upon the clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands, whose business for several years past has been steadily increasing, and whose guardianship over the public domain should commend him to the respectful and decent treatment of the gentleman from Illinois.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. One word in reply to the gentleman from Indiana in regard to this clerkship. I will repeat what I said when this bill was last up, that there is no law which requires us to make an appropriation for this clerk. He simply holds his position by virtue of a resolution of this House.

Mr. JULIAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he does not hold his position exactly as the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Exactly as the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, exactly as the clerk of the Committee on Claims, and exactly as the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means; and if the House determines to strike out any of those clerks I have nothing to say. What I stated was that there was no reason why this clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands should be made a permanent clerk more than a dozen other clerks. And I will ask the attention of the House and the country in regard to some facts, and to what we have built up in this House in regard to clerkships and messengers. If our constituents could know of this extravagance

I believe they would come down here and run us into the Potomac. [Laughter.] How much does it cost to run this House? How many clerks are there under the Clerk of the House of Representatives? How many do you suppose, without including the two which we added with a perfect howl the last time the Committee of the Whole was in session? Fifty clerks, sir. How much do we pay them a year? Eighty thousand dollars. Eighty thousand dollars for clerks! How much do we pay for Capitol police? There was a howl got up here that Andrew Johnson was to take possession of the Capitol.

Mr. MAYNARD. I rise to a point of order. I make the point that it is not in order to charge the House or any member of it in his place with howling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is consistent with the fact, although it is not in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I say that a howl was got up—I do not say in this House—that we were going to be attacked by Andrew Johnson, and we at once raised a little brigade of police. How much do you think they cost? Sixty-five thousand dollars a year, or about two hundred dollars a day. Then, for the Sergeant-at-Arms, $6,000; for the House post office, $20,000; laborers, $16,000; folding-room, $60,000; and for the Doorkeeper, $44,000.

Mr. JULIAN. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose to give you figures for all that I say. [Laughter.]

Mr. JULIAN. The gentleman is not debating the amendment under consideration.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am confining myself a little too closely to the question under debate for my friend from Indiana. We are, in all, taking $335,000 out of the pockets of the people for the purposes I have specified. We are taxing the people $335,000 a year to run this House of Representatives. I say, sir, that there is no justification for it. My excellent friend there drew $1,440 a year under a House resolution, and under another House resolution it has been increased to $2,160. He is never here acting as a clerk more than ten months in a year. He discharges his duties well while the House is in session, but when the House is not in session he has nothing to do but draw his pay all the same. We have also provided for another office in the Library of the House in addition to those I have indicated. And, Mr. Chairman, we have done all this in the face of our protestation as a party; in the face of the resolutions of the Chicago convention; in the face of all our declarations on the stump that we were going to put a stop to all unnecessary appropriations and place the administration of the Government upon an economical foundation. I ask gentlemen if this is the way we are going to accomplish this object? Is this the way that we propose to go on adding clerk upon clerk and office upon office and thereby increasing the expenditures of the Government, now that we have got into power? We have gone on as the good feelings and wishes of members desired until we have increased the expenditures for this House alone, as I have already stated, up to the sum of $335,000 a year. I desire the reporter of the Associated Press to take notice of these figures and to put them in print, so that the people may see them. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JULIAN. I wish to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order unless the gentleman moves an amendment to the amendment. The Chair cannot entertain any but a substantial amendment.

Mr. JULIAN. I move to strike out the words "and sixty."

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. JULIAN. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. Some time ago, under the organization of the House, there was connected with the Clerk's office what was called a land-map department, and under the Clerk there were employed a number of gentlemen who were called land-map clerks. My impression is that that department was abolished some years ago, and that the duty of preparing these land maps was devolved upon the clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands. My recollection is rather indistinct on that point, and I should like to have some information from the gentleman from Indiana as to how the matter really stands at this time.

Mr. JULIAN. I will answer the gentleman from Tennessee. The gentleman is correctly informed on the subject. This clerk, in addition to his ordinary duties as a clerk, has charge of the land maps, and by resolution of the House has to carry forward on them all surveys and sales of the public lands as they progress, and is allowed a room in which the maps are to be kept and the work done; but as no room could be found in this Capitol for that purpose this part of his business has necessarily been suspended for the present. I wish now to say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that while he discusses generally the question of our national extravagance and indulges in a great deal of cheap general declamation, as usual, he entirely evades any answer to what I have stated. I said that there was no reason for striking out the appropriation for this committee clerk that would not apply with equal force to the appropriation for the three other committee clerks which is included in this bill. He has conceded that they all stand upon the same basis, and that there is no reason for making any one of them a permanent clerk that does not apply to the clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands. I have already stated, of my own knowledge, that the business referred to this committee is daily increasing and is of such a character as to require a permanent clerk. I place this statement against that of the gentleman from Illinois, who knows nothing about it. If, as the gentleman argues, he is not to be so employed, why does he not move to strike out the appropriation in this bill for the three other permanent clerks? Does he not show his regard for the Treasury to be counterfeit? Why should he ask an appropriation for his own clerk, the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, and refuse an appropriation for the clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands? If he really so loves economy he should not include in this appropriation bill his own clerk and omit all provision for the clerk of the Committee on the Public Lands, for I am quite sure that the Committee on Appropriations does no more work than the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. Chairman, I only ask this House for fair play and even-handed justice. If they strike out any appropriations for these clerks they should strike them all out, and not make a gratuitous discrimination against one whose labors are as important and faithful as those of any other.

Mr. WELKER. Suppose your amendment is not adopted, how much will your clerk get, under the rule?

Mr. JULIAN. He will get during the session whatever this House sees fit to pay him by the day.

Mr. WELKER. So your amendment actually increases his compensation?

Mr. JULIAN. My amendment puts him where he has been for seven years at a fixed salary.

Mr. WELKER. Does it increase his compensation?

Mr. JULIAN. No, sir; it leaves it exactly at what it has been ever since he became a permanent clerk. It neither increases nor reduces his pay.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wish to make a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to include in the motion to strike out these three other clerks, so as to put all the committees of the House on a par.

Mr. JULIAN. I desire to have a vote first on my amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the House for any length of time on this subject. The reason why the other three clerks have been put in this bill is because they have been permanent clerks from time immemorial. I refer to the clerk of the Committee of Claims and the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, who has been a permanent clerk ever since that committee was established. But, sir, I have no interest in any one of these clerks. If the gentleman from Indiana does not want any of them to remain as permanent clerks let him move to strike them all out. I certainly shall interpose no objection. But I do declare, as I have declared already, that this permanent clerk for the Committee on the Public Lands is not necessary, and that this House will not be justified in making any such appropriation.

Mr. JULIAN. I say, as chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, that this permanent clerk is necessary, and the gentleman from Illinois only displays his customary audacity of mere assertion when he denies it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on the amendment to the amendment has expired.

Mr. JULIAN. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The question then recurred on Mr. JULIAN's amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 46; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. JULIAN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 60.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I give notice that we shall have the yeas and nays in the House on it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in at the close of the section, and I hope no member will raise a point of order on it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That after the 30th day of June, A. D. 1870, the employees of Congress shall no longer be entitled to receive an additional compensation of twenty per cent. on their salaries or other pay respectively, but said percentage shall thenceforth cease and be determined, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point of order that that is independent legislation, and is therefore not in order to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. This being provided by law, it is not competent to repeal it in an appropriation bill, and the amendment is therefore not in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I offer the following amendment, to which I am sure there will be no objection:

Add at the end of line one hundred and twenty-six the following:

Provided, That of the twelve assistant clerks, the two designated as reading clerks of the House of Representatives shall receive an annual salary, beginning with the present Congress, of $2,592.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I make the point that that is not in order, as it changes the existing law.

Mr. RANDALL. No more than the appropriation does in the first part of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read from the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several Departments of the Government. [It has been decided that under this rule it is not in order to propose an amendment to a general appropriation bill which changes an existing law. But it was also decided that the latter branch of the rule not only permitted amendments increasing salaries, but was framed for that very purpose.]"

The CHAIRMAN. Under the last provision of the rule just read the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say in reference to this amendment that the capacity and intelligence required to fulfill the duties of this position entitle the gentlemen to the amount of pay asked for.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose that it is not possible for me to prevent these salaries being raised, but I wish to call the attention of the House and the country to the fact that this proposition to raise salaries comes from a Democratic member.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not inconsistent with Democracy to pay a man what he is worth.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is utterly idle for any gentleman to attempt to keep down the salaries of any one of these officers, or to prevent new offices being created. I give notice if the amendment is adopted that we will have the yeas and nays on it in the House, so that the country may see who voted for it, and who voted against it.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to reply to the gentleman from Illinois on the subject of extravagance.

The CHAIRMAN. Further discussion is not in order.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 44; no quorum voting.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would inquire how much these efficient and laborious officers get now?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Twenty-one hundred and sixty dollars each.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. RANDALL.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 57.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I give notice that we shall have the yeas and nays on it in the House.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to strike out the words "two stenographers, $4,380 each." Mr. Chairman, I understand this is an appropriation for the next year, the appropriation having already been made for this year; and it seems to me that we should give the next House of Representatives an opportunity to provide for their own stenographers, and not in this way to provide for them in advance. And, sir, I should like to have some information on the subject, as to how this practice grew up of appointing stenographers from the committees as officers of the House. I should like to know who they are, and whether they are competent for the discharge of their duties.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Chairman, I think I can give the gentleman from Illinois at least a part of the information which he desires. Prior to about three years ago—I speak from recollection—stenographers were appointed for the committees when needed, and were paid the compensation usually allowed for such services, and the result was that enormous bills were run up to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House under the direction of the Committee on Accounts. This was looked upon as a great grievance. It was complained of, not in the House, but among the committees authorizing the work to be done, as well as by the Committee on Accounts. A proposition was then made by one of these stenographers for the committees to do all business of that kind for a given sum, and a resolution was accordingly passed requiring that to be done. By a subsequent resolution an assistant stenographer was allowed and the compensation was doubled.

Now, sir, I do not look upon this plan as the best one which could be devised, but it is cheaper than the one which had existed previously. These stenographers frequently have six or eight other stenographers employed whom they have to pay out of their own salaries. Sometimes they have none employed. It is for them an uncertain compensation. Some sessions they get but little more than what they have to pay out. If a better plan can be devised

I will say, as a member of the Committee on Accounts, that I should like to see it adopted, but until some other better plan is devised I cannot consent to striking out this appropriation, for the present plan is a great deal better than the former one.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether one of these stenographers is not also employed by the Associated Press?

Mr. BROOMALL. That I believe is the case during the sessions of the House when these stenographers have usually nothing to do. The sessions of the committees are generally held before the House meets, and I believe that during the session of the House one of them is employed as a reporter for the Associated Press. I do not know that it has ever interfered with the discharge of his duties as one of the stenographers for the committees. I have myself been on several investigating committees and have been in the habit of observing how these men performed their duties, and I have never seen any cause of complaint. As I have already said, these men do not receive this compensation for their own services, but out of it are compelled to pay other stenographers, employing sometimes as many as eight or ten to assist them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will move to amend the amendment so as to provide for only one stenographer. Now, Mr. Chairman, by this bill we are providing in advance for the payment of nearly nine thousand dollars during the next year to these stenographers for the committees of the House on the contingency that their services may be required by committees which may be ordered by the next Congress. It seems to me that is poor economy. If it be true that the services of these stenographers are valuable, and it has come out that they are not employed all the year and that one of them while drawing his salary is also drawing a salary from the Associated Press, it seems to me that if their services are valuable and the committees of the House cannot get along without them it will be time enough to make this provision when they are needed, and when, perhaps, they can be employed at a much less rate.

Mr. BROOMALL. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, that the Committee on Accounts had this matter before them, and at one time, about the commencement of the Fortieth Congress, intended reporting a resolution reducing the number of stenographers for committees from two to one, but after full examination they found that it would be utterly impossible for any one stenographer for this compensation to do the work and to pay the stenographers he was compelled to employ to assist him in reporting the committees then in operation. The resolution for that reason was abandoned, but I do not know that I have any particular objection to the experiment being again tried. I think, however, that we shall fail in making any reduction of this appropriation; and I believe that the House had better leave it alone as it is. I have a decided objection to returning to the old system. My judgment is that neither the amendment to the amendment nor the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois ought to be adopted.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania leaves the floor I would ask him to be kind enough to tell me what duties are discharged by the two superintending stenographers who are paid this large sum of money? Do they themselves perform the physical labor before the committees of the House?

Mr. BROOMALL. They perform the duties themselves as far as it is possible for them to do it, but when five or six committees are in session at the same time, some in New Orleans and some in New York, they, of course, cannot do all the work themselves, but are compelled to employ others, whom they pay out of their own pockets. As I have already said, they have frequently as high as six or eight stenographers assisting them.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am merely trying to get information on the subject. I wish to know what duties these two stenographers themselves discharged and how much time they actually devote to the committees of the House. It has been stated that one of them is the reporter for the Associated Press. If so, does his duty as reporter for the Associated Press take up his time so as to prevent his discharging his duties as one of the reporters for the committees? I should like to know about that.

Mr. BROOMALL. All I know is, and I have reason to know it, that the duties which he performs for the Associated Press do not interfere with his duties as one of the stenographers for the committees of the House. His duties as a reporter for the Associated Press are during the sessions of the House, while his duties as stenographer for the committees are generally when the House is not in session.

Mr. SPALDING. I should like to know from the gentleman from Pennsylvania how we are protected against the claims of the subordinates whom these gentlemen employ?

Mr. BROOMALL. The resolution appointing these stenographers specially stipulated that this work should be done by these stenographers for the amount here appropriated.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I renew the amendment; and I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of bearing testimony to the truth of what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated. On the old system, at the rate charged by the stenographers who were employed to do the work that had to be done, it cost us an enormous amount of money, and the present system was resorted to for the purpose of saving expense, and the expense saved by paying these men salaries has been very great. I have no feeling about the matter. I do not care whether the committee keep the appropriation in or strike it out, but I will say that if they strike it out and employ reporters as they employed them before it will cost twice as much as we now pay these two stenographers. For this appropriation they have to report for all of the committees. If they cannot do it themselves they have to hire assistants and pay for them out of their salaries. I have been told by the principal stenographer, Mr. Smith, that the amount they have already paid out will leave but little compensation for themselves.

As to the reporter of the Associated Press, I believe that he discharges his duties fully as one of the stenographers of the committees of the House and writes out his notes after the adjournment of the House. When the House is in session he reports for the Associated Press, and when the House is not in session he writes out his notes of the proceedings before the committees. There is some advantage in having the stenographers for the committees the official officers of this House. There is then some responsibility attached to them. My own judgment is that the present is the correct system. It has already saved us a great deal of money, and it will continue to save us a good deal in the future.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to add but one word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise to oppose the amendment?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do. I am in favor of the original amendment, and opposed to the amendment to the amendment.

Now, it is evident to me, Mr. Chairman, as it must be to every member of the House, that some one is cheated according to the argument of my colleague. Either the House is cheated or the stenographers are cheated. According to his argument they labor too much for the pay they get. If they do not get compensation sufficient then they are cheated, and that is not fair. If they do not perform enough for their pay then the House is cheated, and that is not fair. It seems to me that we ought to pay these stenographers for their services as they are needed. If a committee is authorized to take testimony let them employ a stenographer and let him be under the direction of the committee, and if he does not perform his duties according to the wishes of the committee then he may be discharged and another one appointed in his place. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. McKEE. I move to strike out the following words:

For clerk to Committee of Ways and Means, $2,592; clerk to Committee on Appropriations, $2,592; clerk to Committee on Claims, $2,180.

Mr. Chairman, I think that the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois is correct, that none of these clerks should be provided for permanently. They do not remain here after the adjournment of Congress, and I do not see any reason why we should pay them for the time they perform no duties for the House. The question has been already fully discussed, and I trust there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Kentucky ought to include the amendment adopted on motion of the gentleman from Indiana, for which, I believe, he voted.

Mr. McKEE. I will also include that. Mr. JULIAN. That cannot be included, as it was inserted in another place in the bill.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 8, noes 37; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. McKEE.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 22, noes 65; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered a call of the House; and the roll having been called, the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beck, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Buckland, Burr, Roderick, R. Butler, Cake, Callis, Chanler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Clift, Cornell, Dickey, Dixon, Eekley, Edwards, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Glossbrenner, Gove, Gravely, Haight, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Asabel W. Hubbard, Hubard, Hunter, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kollogg, Kerr, Knott, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrissey, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, Nunn, Piko, Plants, Pomeroy, Ross, Sitgreaves, Smith, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernum, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, John T. Wilson, and Young—144.

The committee then rose; and (Mr. PETERS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore) Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 1672, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870; and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called and had directed him to report the names of the absentees to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum having appeared, the committee will resume its session.

The committee accordingly resumed its session, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair.)

Mr. McKEE. I suggest that my amendment be allowed to pass, so that we may have a vote on it in the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. After the gentleman has attempted to break up the committee I am astonished he should ask that.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 15, noes 101.

So Mr. McKEE's amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move in line one hundred and thirty-six, to insert the word "furniture" after the word "repairs;" so that the bill will then read "for fuel and lights, including plumbing, gas-fitting, repairs, and materials, $15,000."

Mr. Chairman, I do that for this reason: it will be seen by looking at the next item that $10,000 is appropriated for furniture and repairs. Then in the one hundred and forty-first line we have $35,000 for miscellaneous items. This is a very loose mode, as I conceive, of appropriating money. In the estimates we have so much for boxes, furniture, and repairs. We have provided for boxes in a previous item. Whether this is to cover up anything I cannot say, but I should like to have some explanation of it. This mode of having two different appropriations for repairs, and then a third one for miscellaneous items, gives a latitude and a scope which I am unwilling to indulge in. I have been endeavoring to get the letter addressed to the Speaker by the Clerk, at the commencement of this session. I learn at the document room that it is not printed. I have his letter at the commencement of the last session, and I find he reports an unexpended balance of $106,139 92. I desired to get his letter addressed to the Speaker at the commencement of this session for the purpose of inquiring into the expenses for repairs in the Speaker's room. I have understood that they are very great; that the Government has been charged enormous sums each for the curtains that are put up there, and extravagant sums for chairs, together with other items.

Now, it will be recollected that in the Thirty-Fifth Congress, when that room was first fitted up, the expense proved so extravagant an item of charge as to excite the general attention and amazement of the whole country. I hoped to have had an opportunity of comparing the expenses for the present refitting with the cost of the original furnishing, but as I have not the means at hand I am not able to do so. I shall limit myself, therefore, to proposing such amendments to this bill as will prevent any disposition of appropriations in that fashion hereafter. I will remark, however, that the "Speaker's room" is not in fact a room for the Speaker. The Speaker's room is in fact a very humble and unpretending apartment in the lower story of the building. The "Speaker's room," so called, is simply a general museum for curious persons, who pass through the rear of this House. I trust the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will see this matter as it strikes my mind, and let the bill be modified accordingly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The word "repairs," in line one hundred and thirty-six, means repairs of the gas-fittings and plumbing work, and the water-works about the Capitol. The item reads: "For fuel and lights, including plumbing, gas-fittings, repairs, and materials, $15,000." That is, repairs necessary for roofs, and in the plumbing and gas-fitting. The next line is for furniture and repairs thereof; so that the two lines treat of two different subjects.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will incorporate that as an amendment so that it will read "repairs thereof," I will accept it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But that is not the line to which the gentleman moves his amendment. This item is for various matters about the building. Occasionally there is a burst of the plumbing works, and it requires a large amount of repairs.

Mr. MAYNARD. Well, let there be one appropriation sufficient to cover the items of repairs, and not two or three separate items.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We could not do that. We might as well apportion our breakfasts, so much for sugar, so much for milk, and so much for coffee.

The question was taken on Mr. MAYNARD's amendment; and it was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the next paragraph, as follows:

For furniture and repairs, $10,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to strike out that item. I have a letter on the subject from the Clerk of the House. He has looked at the amount of funds which he has on hand, and considers that he has sufficient without this appropriation; and I may say that I think the Clerk has in the management of this part of the repairs, managed it very economically and properly, and very honestly.

Mr. WELKER. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations how much was expended for furniture of the House of Representatives during the last year? I have been informed that about sixty thousand dollars have been expended in buying new furniture for the House of Representatives for the last year. I have also been informed that the year before $50,000 were expended for furniture, and that in 1865-66 about forty thousand dollars were expended. Now I want, for the information of the country as well as of the Committee of the Whole, to ascertain either from the chairman of the Committee on Accounts or the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, whether those statements are anywhere near correct in relation to the expenditures for this purpose.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask my friend if he believes those reports?

Mr. WELKER. I have been informed that the figures came from the clerk of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. BROOMALL. That is a mistake.

Mr. WELKER. I want to hear what it is. I do not pretend to indorse these charges as embracing the correct figures. But that is what I have heard stated, what I have seen alluded to; and I want the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, [Mr. BROOMALL,] or the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois,] to give us the correct amounts in these respects, so that the correction may go out to the country.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that the gentleman from Wisconsin, who has had an hour for speaking to-day, will allow us to go on a little longer.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not speak for myself, but for others. There is to be a session to-night.

Mr. SPALDING. Has a session been ordered for this evening?

The CHAIRMAN. A session was ordered by the House this morning.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that the committee will not now rise, but that we may go on until five o'clock. It is not quite half past four yet.

The question was upon the motion that the committee rise; and upon a division there were—ayes 38, noes 53.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum has voted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It does not require a quorum to decide the motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote has disclosed the fact that no quorum has voted, and the rules require the chairman to take notice of that fact and to appoint tellers.

Tellers were accordingly ordered; and Mr. WASHBURNE of Illinois, and Mr. ELDRIDGE were appointed.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. ELDRIDGE that the committee rise.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw that motion. The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, to strike out the clause "for furniture and repairs, $10,000."

Mr. BROOMALL. Before the question is taken upon striking out the clause just read I move to perfect it by striking out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will indicate the word he proposes to strike out, and confine his remarks strictly to the word to be stricken out.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to reduce the appropriation from $10,000 to $8,000, for the purpose of answering the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WELKER,] and giving him the information he seems to be in search of. He is mistaken in stating that the amounts expended for repairs for the last two years has been respectively $60,000 and $50,000. The amount appropriated for that purpose last year was $50,000; of which there remains now on hand unexpended $30,000, so that the entire amount expended last year for this purpose was a little less than twenty thousand dollars. I have not been able in the brief time allowed me since the question was asked to get the exact amount that was expended for this purpose year before last, but I have no doubt it was about the same as the amount expended last year. I admit that there is a difficulty connected with the manner in which the furniture for the House is provided; a difficulty which the Committee on Accounts have now under consideration, and which they hope to have remedied before the close of the session. But the reports to which the gentleman has alluded are very great exaggerations. There is so little truth in them that when they come to be sifted we become almost ashamed of having examined them.

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman give the amounts?

Mr. BROOMALL. I have given the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. WELKER. I do not mean the appropriation.

Mr. BROOMALL. And I have given the amount remaining unexpended of the appropriation, showing that the entire amount expended for this purpose during the last session was a little short of twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] inform us about how much of that appropriation was expended for the object alluded to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD]—the purchase of furniture, &c., for the Speaker's room?

Mr. BROOMALL. I do not remember how much; a very considerable portion of it.

Mr. WELKER. About four thousand dollars?

Mr. BROOMALL. In fact there was very little expenditure of that kind during the last recess, except what was made for the Speaker's room.

Mr. WELKER. About how much?

Mr. BROOMALL. I do not remember; but nearly all that was expended for the purpose.

Mr. WELKER. I have understood that it was about three thousand six hundred dollars.

Mr. BROOMALL. I was mistaken. There was about three thousand five hundred dollars expended for the Speaker's room.

Mr. WELKER. I want to ask the gentleman another question. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has alluded to the character of the curtains in the Speaker's room.

I am afraid his remarks may be misunderstood, and that it will go out to the country that we have been extravagant with respect to that matter. I would therefore be glad if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] would explain what kind of curtains those are.

Mr. BROOMALL. They are expensive curtains.

Mr. WELKER. How much did they cost?

Mr. BROOMALL. The Committee on Accounts had nothing to do with ordering them.

Mr. WELKER. But you have something to do with paying for them.

Mr. BROOMALL. Just as we have to do with paying all other debts of the kind contracted by the proper authorities.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BROOMALL. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move as an amendment to the amendment to insert after the word "repairs" the word "thereof."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurring on the amendment, as amended, it was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous items, $35,000.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the paragraph just read. I make this motion chiefly for the purpose of getting some information. In this bill we have specific appropriations for almost every conceivable purpose; and then, after all these things have been provided for, we have this item, "For miscellaneous items, $35,000." In looking over the appropriation bills passed by preceding Congresses, I find it to be true, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] in a previous discussion, that the items of this character embraced in this bill are much smaller than those heretofore included in bills of this kind. But it appears to me that the making of appropriations of this kind heretofore for miscellaneous expenses has been one of the chief causes why we have been required at every session to pass deficiency bills to cover these sums of money expended under this head of "miscellaneous items." I find that in a deficiency bill passed during the Thirty-Ninth Congress the sum of $40,000 was appropriated under the head of "miscellaneous expenses" for the House of Representatives alone. These things will continue just so long as we go on making appropriations for "miscellaneous items," with no knowledge on the part of any person as to the purposes for which the money is to be expended. For this reason I have moved to strike out this line. I think that when we appropriate money it is due to ourselves and the country that it should be known what the money is to be appropriated for.

Mr. BURR. Inasmuch as we are to have a session to-night, I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I appeal to my colleague [Mr. BURR] to withdraw that motion, and let us run on for fifteen or twenty minutes longer.

Mr. BURR. I cannot consent to withdraw the motion. We have already remained here fifteen or twenty minutes later than the usual hour of adjournment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that the committee will not agree to rise.

On the motion of Mr. BURR there were—ayes 22, noes 68; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The committee has refused to rise. A quorum is not necessary upon such a question as this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is mistaken as to the rule. The Chair is compelled to order tellers if the motion to rise is insisted upon.

Mr. BURR. I have learned from my colleague to be persistent; and I insist upon my motion.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. BURR and Mr. COVODE.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 66.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. McKEE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have only a word to say in reply to the observations of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. McKEE.] These "miscellaneous items" include all the miscellaneous expenses connected with the House—the mileage and per diem of witnesses, the pay of contestants, and various other matters, every item of which is reported and printed among the expenditures of the House, and can be referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky if he desires to make the examination. This appropriation is right; and we ought not to strike it out.

The question was then taken on Mr. McKEE's amendment; and it was disagreed to.

The Clerk then read as follows:

For newspapers and stationery for two hundred and thirty-three members and Delegates, at $125 each per annum, $29,125.

Mr. PHELPS. I move to strike that out. It is the same motion, Mr. Chairman, which I made at the last session, and I believe the session before that. I make it for two reasons.

In the first place, it will save no very considerable sum of money, for the expenditure of which heretofore no very good reason can be shown; and in the second place, it will prove to the country that this House really means economy by beginning to reduce its own expenses. It will give strong proof to the country that we are ourselves in earnest when we have shown the moral courage of being able to apply the knife of retrenchment to our own expenditures, and, in my judgment, if this amendment be adopted it will lead indirectly to the saving of a greater amount of money than is indicated in this item.

It may be said that it has been the inviolable custom to appropriate money for this purpose. To that I reply that we ought relentlessly to refuse all appropriations that are not absolutely necessary. If we intend to resist the constant assaults upon the Treasury we must begin at home, and it is for that reason I move the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This appropriation has been inserted here to carry out the law passed at the last session of Congress, giving each member and Delegate $125 for newspapers and stationery.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether there are not a great many provisions by law which he has disregarded in these appropriation bills? Are there not laws requiring appropriations which he has refused to make?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wish to ask the chairman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must move an amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move to reduce the appropriation one half, and I do it for the purpose of asking a question. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether this sum is not a large increase upon former appropriations for the same purposes?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; but on the contrary it is a very large decrease.

Mr. ROBINSON. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to reduce the appropriation to $20,000. The paragraph reads "for newspapers and stationery for two hundred and thirty-three members and Delegates, at $125 each per annum, $29,125." I see immediately following it, in line one hundred and forty-nine, there is an appropriation of $10,000 for stationery, in reference to which I think the House should have some explanation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is for stationery for the committees.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to ask the gentleman another question. Many of the members, indeed, I may say most of them, drew money in commutation of their stationery, and furnish themselves with stationery, such as they wish, wherever they choose. Now, is it not the duty of the Clerk under this appropriation to make contracts and invest this money in stationery? If half of it only is drawn by members, is not the other half left to be distributed to those who may come along?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is a matter for the Clerk of the House and for those who may come along.

Mr. MAYNARD. What becomes of the stationery which is not issued?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know why the gentleman should ask me this question, as I am not the keeper of the stationery.

Mr. BROOMALL. Every dollar of it is accounted for.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman from Illinois is chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and it is his duty to explain these items as we go along.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no further answer to make.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman does not understand the subject I shall make no further inquiry of him.

Mr. PHELPS. I give notice that if my amendment is adopted I will ask to go back and move to strike out a similar appropriation for the Senate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK stated that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 1872, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. SCHENCK, (at ten minutes to five o'clock p. m.,) the House took a recess until half past seven p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., pursuant to order, Mr. BROOMALL in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House the evening session will be devoted to general debate only. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. Speaker, the first gun of the rebellion was fired on the 12th of April, 1861; the last one of its organized armies in the spring of 1865. The struggle between the Government and its enemies was long, expensive, and sanguinary. The triumph of the nation, defended by the glorious Army of the Union, was complete. The rebellion destroyed State governments, impoverished the people of the States where it existed, and resulted in the destruction of the great evil of the nation, the institution of slavery. This condition of things in the rebel States created the necessity for the work of reconstruction. This work did not consist alone in getting the States back into the enjoyment of representation in Congress; that would have been an easy task. Reconstruction consisted in feeding the starving, clothing the naked, protecting the weak, and finally the establishment of civil governments which should be republican in form, and a guarantee of protection to all the people. The first work in the business of reconstruction was to feed and clothe the dependent within the jurisdiction of the Government. Hence, on the 3d day of March, 1865, Congress passed an act, which was approved by the late President, to establish a bureau for the relief of freedmen and refugees. Its purpose was declared by its title. It was dictated by the spirit of civilization, and has been continued in force by a humane Congress and sustained by a liberal people in defiance of the opposition of an ambitious Executive. It may be called the first act of reconstruction, and was sanctioned by President Lincoln.

After provision was made to prevent starvation and suffering, the next duty of the Government was to protect the people in "their civil rights, and furnish the means of their vindication." Hence, on the 9th of April, 1866, the act known as the civil rights bill became a law notwithstanding the veto of the then acting President. That law remains upon the statute-books, and its enactment was the first grand move since the Declaration of Independence recognizing the just principle of the equality of all men before the law.

It is an evidence of the quickened conscience of the people wrought by the fiery ordeal of war. The country began to feel not only that the rebellious States needed reconstruction, but that the whole country needed it; that justice demanded that constitutions should be amended, that laws should be enacted securing to all the people in the land an equality of civil rights. Under the influence of slavery the people had become indifferent to the existing inequality of civil rights, and it required war to arouse them to a sense of duty. After the civil-rights bill came the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. It contained the substantive principle of the civil rights bill with other provisions. And while it was designed as a measure of reconstruction of the South specially, yet like the law it had its bearing upon the whole country. It was an important amendment to the Constitution, and gives greater character and stability to the Government, in that it declares specifically who shall be American citizens that they shall be entitled to the equal protection of the laws; that the Federal debt shall be inviolate; that the debt incurred in aid of the rebellion shall never be paid either by the United States or any State, and that men who had taken an oath to support the Constitution and then engaged in insurrection and rebellion should never hold office either in the Federal Government or any State unless by the consent of two thirds of the Congress of the United States.

But, Mr. Speaker, it did not answer as a basis of reconstruction. While, as I say, some of its provisions are of great value, a portion of the amendment should never have been adopted, if, as is alleged by some, it recognizes the right of each State to abridge or deny to any portion of its people without cause the exercise of the elective franchise. A State has the right to disfranchise its felons, but it has no right to disfranchise its citizens on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery.

The amendment was the best that could be done, but I would be much better satisfied with it if it were clearer on that point. To-day, sir, we are at work to patch up the work which we failed at that time to do correctly, as we should. These are days of progress, when the people are learning more perfectly that governments are for all the people and not for a favored few; and it may be that we shall fail again in doing our whole duty, and that in a few more years the country will again be engaged in perfecting or giving more breadth and vitality to what we are attempting to do now. Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed; and resting upon this great doctrine in theory we have no right to antagonize it in practice. He who is subject to law, helps to uphold it, and performs all the duties of a citizen, should have the right to a voice in its affairs. It is not republican to deny nor to stand by and allow it to be done. There is no half-way ground; the rich, the poor, the man of science, the uneducated, whether favored by fortune or depending upon honest toil—all classes in the State of sound mind and not felons, without regard to condition, race, or color should be given the ballot. The people of the South rejected the constitutional amendment not because of its real faults, but because under executive encouragement they were induced to believe that they would be restored to the right of representation in the Government as States without giving any evidence of disposition to support the country whatever. Reconstruction up to this time had been of a general character, and while each step taken seemed to be necessary and proper yet the work was scarcely begun.

On the 2d of March, 1867, Congress, by a law passed over the President's veto, declared the State governments of the rebel States only provisional, gave military protection to all the people, and clothed all the male citizens of those States—except felons and those rendered ineligible to hold office under the fourteenth amendment—without regard to race, color, or previous condition, with the right to vote, with the right to proceed in the work of establishing civil government. By this Congress struck the foundation-stone upon which republican governments must be built, if built to stand. By the passage of this act and the acts supplementary thereto the work of reconstruction proper began with directness of purpose, and soon resulted in the restoration of all the States but three to their former practical relations with the Government. Three States have failed to make constitutions satisfactory to themselves, and they remain unrepresented in the councils of the nation. The policy of reconstruction may be considered settled, though the work is not all done; yet no man now is so idle as to dream that any other policy will be adopted. The President's policy has twice been repudiated by the people, and congressional action twice sustained. We may rejoice not only that we believe we are right, but in the fact that the great people at our backs, with a patriotism and intelligence unsurpassed by any people in any other country, have sustained us. Why have we been sustained? Not because everything we have done here has been done exactly right, for I am free to confess that I believe we have made mistakes—and, sir, in the storm of excitement and dizzy whirl of revolution who could avoid it—we have made mistakes, but yet we have been sustained because the people believed, what was true, that the action of Congress was in favor of loyalty as against treason, in favor of justice and against oppression. They and we have been upon the side of humanity, and the policy which we have insisted upon has tended to the elevation of the human race and to promote the ends of justice.

Mr. Speaker, the country has passed through four exciting political campaigns within the last few years. The first, the campaign of 1860, involved the question of the extension or non-extension of slavery, in which the people declared that it should go no further. The second, in 1864, proved that the people of the nation could carry on a war upon its own soil with a million of men in the field and could conduct a presidential campaign, hold an election without disturbance or difficulty, and sustain the cause of the country. The third, that the congressional policy in dealing with the conquered people of the South was more acceptable to the people than the policy of the Executive, and that they are jealous of executive power when thrown in opposition to the will of the representative branch of the Government. The fourth, the election of November last, proved that the loyal people who made the sacrifice to save the country are determined that they will not relinquish their guardianship and allow the nation to pass into the hands either of its open enemies or their sympathizers. The last contest is but recently over. The Democratic party, clinging to its old name, its old leaders, and worse than all its modern principles, challenged battle at the polls. The Union party did not hesitate, but with their great leader, the military hero of the country, the man who had been sustained by the people while he led their army to victory in the field, they were ready for the contest. The Union cause was triumphant, and General Grant was elected by nearly a half million majority of the popular vote of the country.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Boyer,] who last addressed the House when in committee, would have us and the country believe that our success has been due to the personal popularity of our standard-bearer and to the mistakes of the Democratic party. Sir, our standard-bearer had, and to-day has great personal popularity in the country. I shall not allow one word that I may utter to gainsay it. Why had he the confidence of the loyal people? Because, sir, he believed in the principles and policy of the great Republican party of the country, and had put down a rebellion inaugurated by the southern wing of the Democratic party because Union and liberty had triumphed at the polls in 1860. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says "that public confidence turned to Grant as the unexpected representative of a triumphant Union, and the Republican party was saved through him alone. Had he been the candidate of the Opposition, whom could radicalism have elected over him?" Sir, what opposition does the gentleman mean? Does he mean the so-called Democratic party? If so, he has no right to put the case. Sir, there never has been a time since the first gun was fired upon Sumter that General Grant would have consented to be the candidate of the Democratic party for the Presidency or any thing else. There is no party, sir, in this country which has been more thoroughly convinced of this statement than the Democratic party itself. While the great chieftain, after the close of the war, was content to go forward in the discharge of his military duty, continuing as best he could to serve the country which he had saved by the sword, Democratic politicians, from the Chief Executive of the nation down to the smallest schemer in the party and up to the greatest, were planning to devise ways and means to induce him to say something or do something that might be construed into opposition to Republican principles and the Republican party and in favor of the Democratic party and its policy. A journey to the tomb of the dead was improvised, and the chief officers of the Army and the Navy were invited to accompany "their Commander-in-Chief," and Democratic politicians and the press were proclaiming to the country that General Grant favored the policy of the President and was opposed to Congress. But, sir, it all availed nothing. True to principle, true to patriotism and the flag, whenever his official duty required him to speak or act he spoke and acted for the country, and in harmony with the Republican party. In this, sir, is much of his strength to-day; honest, earnest, patriotic, he could not be swerved from his purpose by all the machinations of a party struggling to rise above the waves of public condemnation.

Sir, the gentleman again says that it was the misfortune of his party to expose itself to misrepresentation. I quote substantially his language. How was his party misrepresented or misunderstood? The country believed that while the war progressed a part of the party sympathized with the rebellion, and the balance of it, that portion of the party south of Mason and Dixon's line, the country knew to be in the rebellion. The loyal people who had been for the country during the war saw no special evidence of a change in the disposition of its members either of the northern or southern wing of the party. Their national convention assembled, and its delegates from the North were the same men, and the candidates were the same men, who had led the party during the long struggle. Upon reading the Democratic organ, the New York World, we had a history, a biographical sketch, of the lives and characters and services of the delegates from the South. Mr. Speaker, is it fair to suppose that a party in such times and to such a convention would send such delegates as would honestly represent its sentiments? Who were there from the South? Sir, let the New York World of July 4, 1868, answer:

"The delegates.—Personal description of the members of the convention.—Their record of service to the nation.—The men upon whom the Republic relies for salvation."

This, sir, is the heading, after which follows the "personal description of the members of the convention."

"Hon. John A. Winston, ex-Governor, colonel ninety-first Alabama infantry, confederate States army. James H. Clanton, chairman Democratic State executive committee, general of cavalry confederate States service. R. G. Scott, jr., was in confederate congress. J. T. Holtzlan, always a Democrat, entered confederate States service as captain, fought through every battle in the West, and rose to the rank of brigadier general. W. C. Oatis, always a Democrat, colonel Alabama infantry. M. J. Bulger, captain confederate States. J. B. Vance, in United States Congress in 1861, then a confederate colonel, then Governor of the State. J. L. Clingman, United States Senator in 1861, brigadier general in confederate States service. W. L. Cox, always a Democrat, was brigadier general in confederate States service. John F. Hoke, always a Democrat, State adjutant general North Carolina during the war. Charles P. Ransom, brigadier general confederate States service. D. M. Carter, colonel and military judge corps court of Stonewall Jackson's command. W. J. Green, major confederate States service. J. M. Leach, member of the United States Congress, afterward confederate States congress. William M. Lowe, colonel confederate States. James L. Sheffield, colonel of Alabama troops, confederate States. E. C. Budnot, brigadier general confederate States. General Wade Hampton, one of the most prominent cavalry generals of the confederate service; and (in the language of the World,) fills the place left vacant by Calhoun in the hearts of the white people. M. L. Bonham, ex-member United States Congress, brigadier general confederate States. General J. B. Kishard, major general confederate States. Colonel M. W. Gary, commanded Hampton legion.

So, Mr. Chairman, I might go on and give you the "personal description" of hundreds of the members of that convention. But, sir, I think I have gone far enough to show that the disposition and purposes of such a body of men could not well be misapprehended or misunderstood. The people did understand them; they have understood the animus and purposes of the party ever since the struggle with rebellion began, and the result has been that it has been kept in the minority. But the gentleman says that the iron-clad oath has long ago become but a spike upon which to impale conservatives. Sir, the test-oath which has been prescribed by law, and which is required to be taken before men can enter this Hall and take their seats as members of this House, is a grand check upon the designs of wicked men who failed to destroy the Government in the field or otherwise in aid of the rebellion, and failing come here to renew their efforts in the forum. Sir, if keeping out that class of men makes it the "spike upon which conservatives are impaled," then, sir, it is a valuable spike, and I hope it may be driven stronger, and clenched, if you please, so that it may remain there for years to come. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania has seen fit to refer to the Representatives from the southern States; and he says: "that there are Representatives from southern States with seats on this floor in full fellowship and communion with the Radical majority from whose bodies the Union bullets have never been extracted, and who bear upon their persons the scars and wounds received in their desperate endeavors to capture or destroy this very Capitol, where, as loyal men, they now sit in judgment."

Mr. Speaker, I have not the honor of an intimate acquaintance with many of these gentlemen; but, sir, I believe the Representatives from the reconstructed States are generally now ardent supporters of the Union; and, sir, many of them are not only Union men now, but were Union soldiers during the war, and others were steady supporters of the Union all through the contest. Whether there are Representatives from the South on this floor "from whose bodies the Union bullets have never been extracted," I am not able to say; but, sir, if there are men here with seats on this floor "from whose bodies the Union bullets have never been extracted," it is my sincere hope, sir, that as they bear them they will more and more appreciate the power of a free Government and of that flag of our country under which the Union soldiers fought with them when the bullets were received. If such gentlemen are upon this floor, sir, I am informed that one of them at least is a steady supporter of the gentleman's party. They did not all capture the Capitol with Radical ballots.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must pass on. The crises of the nation is passed. Many have been the dark and gloomy hours within the last eight years. The nation for long years was a grand theater of war. Military power during the war was the controlling power, as the tread of armies almost shook the continent on which we dwell. Sorrow and bitterness have mingled together as the people grappled with each other while the struggle of the Army of the Union and the army of rebellion went on. But, sir, since victory perched upon the banners of the patriot Army and peace has been restored the nation begins to emerge into the light of day. Her people may now all enjoy the fresh and invigorating air of liberty, and her course will henceforth be onward, and I trust there may be no new obstacle in the way as America marches on in her proud and mighty career. The time has come when men may act free of excitement, prejudice, or passion; when they may reason together and unite in building up a mighty nation with liberty and just laws as its chief foundation. I am for peace. I shall unite my voice with the voice of the millions of the Republic as they take up the almost magic words of the President-elect, "let us have peace." But, sir, let us not forget our duty, and that now is the time to strike at every element of wrong and oppression in the land that is in reach of governmental action, and that we can more easily eradicate any evil that may have crept into our system of Government now than we ever could before, or than we can in the future after the waves of revolution have all passed away. In the work of perfecting our system of Government and providing for it the proper legislation I desire to know no section nor party, and to be stripped of all prejudice. I shall remember with a keen sense the suffering and mourning that have filled the land, and shall never forget the cause; but the work of rebuilding a shattered Republic must not be done with malice, but with sorrow for the past; and with profit by its lessons we must seek to establish a just Government and trust to the future for its success.

And, sir, in the work of reconstruction, and in our efforts to establish the Government upon just principles, a constitutional amendment regulating the question of suffrage throughout the land should be passed and sent to the States for their consideration without delay. Nothing but a Constitution guarantying impartial laws and impartial liberty will satisfy the demands of justice or the people and place the Government on a sure foundation. An amendment declaring the immunities of citizens, and guarantying a republican form of government by securing the elective franchise to citizens deprived of it by reason of race or color or previous condition, if sent to the States without unreasonable delay, may be acted upon by the State Legislatures of the Union, which are now or will very soon be, in session, and it will be but a short time before the Government will be substantially just in giving civil and political rights to all its citizens. If in less than a century from the adoption of the Declaration of Independence this nation guaranties by constitutional provision perfect civil and political rights to all its citizens we may justly be proud, and believe that our trials and sufferings may not have been all in vain.

I am for the constitutional amendment reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts from the Reconstruction Committee and now before the House for consideration. I am not sure but it may be improved. The language should be such as to cover the case and not require amending again when in a short time some other injustice grows up among the people not based upon the question of race, color, or previous condition of slavery. I am getting tired of that expression. May there not be need of making the amendment broader? There are to-day many people in the country who have amassed fortunes, who are living in luxury, who look down with scorn upon the poor. They believe the poor man has no right to impose taxes upon them for schools, railroads, or anything else. They do not believe the poor man ought to vote. Some of the States now have property qualifications, and a colored man cannot vote unless he happens to own a certain amount of property. Again, there is a large portion of the educated people of the country who believe that they are the people who are peculiarly fitted to do all the voting, and that the unlettered man ought not to have the right to vote; they are willing to let the man who cannot read do the fighting, but desire his exclusion from the ballot. This is all wrong; and in my judgment this proposed amendment ought to be broader and more comprehensive, so that we may not be called upon soon again to support another.

Men may say there is no danger from these causes. There may not be at present, though I do not admit it; but if there is not we should look to possibilities in the future as we seek to amend the great Magna Charta of the country. As the country gets older and riches accumulate in families from generation to generation it will become less and less interested in the condition of the people, and aristocracy, backed up by wealth, will seek to make the poor subservient to its demands, and then the oppressed will cry out for protection, and ask that it shall be guarantied by the Constitution. Already, sir, the monopolies of the country are becoming the chief rulers of the land. Capital thrown together and fostered and aided by legislation, State and national, in the shape of railroad charters, organizing companies, and allowing consolidations, and aided by enormous land grants and money subsidies, are ruling the country from one end of it to the other, and the galleries and lobbies of every Legislature, State and national, are thronged with men seeking to procure an advantage over the mass of the people by legislation, adding to their already overgrown fortunes. The people have these things to fear. These monopolies are to be used in the future as mighty engines to oppress the people who remain at home pursuing an honest avocation scarcely imagining what oppressions may be in store for them in the future. I hope the committee who reported this amendment will take it back, by consent of the House, and make it broad enough to protect the people in the future against oppressive legislation either on account of race, color, or previous condition, or by capital, or any other element that may seek to oppress any portion of the people of the land.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must go on. In a few more days the Government will pass into the hands of a new administration. It will be a happy change for the country. The President-elect is the man for the work before him. Under his administration, with a Congress in harmony with him in sentiment, a new era will dawn upon the country; the laws will be enforced impartially; confidence in and respect for the laws will be restored. There is no man in the land, North or South, who does not believe to-day that General Grant will deal justly by all the people. The present Executive has not the confidence, I will not say respect, of anybody, North or South. The loyal people do not regard him as in favor of the Union or any policy calculated to save it; the southern people, while they have thus far been able by craftiness to use him, have no faith in his stability of purpose, or that in fact he cares anything about them. He is in the way of peace and harmony. There are to-day few people in the land who are not waiting anxiously for a change of administration. While the Democrats of the North supported their chosen candidate for the Presidency with an earnest zeal, and to-day would prefer his election to that of General Grant, yet there are few of them who do not prefer the latter to the present incumbent of the White House. With a clear head, a heart full of kindness, with a purpose resolute and determined, General Grant will soon enter upon the discharge of his high trust, and during his administration we shall have a Government regenerated. He will demand of the people in all parts of the country fidelity to the flag and obedience to law. He will exact of his subordinates in the civil service of the Government economy and an honest and faithful performance of duty. Integrity and economy will be the crowning characteristics of his administration.

And, sir, is it not well, in view of the recklessness and corruptions that seem to have enveloped the country of late, that we are to have an Executive having close regard for the financial interests of the people and nation? The crying evil of the times is extravagance and corruption among public officers. Officeholders and people have forgotten the rules of economy. We seem not to know how to retrench, yet it must be done. At the close of the rebellion our nation found itself with an accumulated debt of nearly three thousand million dollars, all but about sixty-four million dollars the result of the war. With this mighty load resting upon the people the most rigid economy is demanded in every Department. Every officeholder should be held to the most rigid accountability. We must preach it and practice it right here. It is hard to get down to low-water mark after floating upon the high waves and flush tide during the progress of the war. From an expense of two or three millions per day during the war it seems almost useless to get back to the days of small things and spend but a few thousand; but, sir, if the Government did not owe a dollar it would be our duty to retrench; and with our present debt upon us is not the obligation as strong as an obligation could be made? The debt is to be paid, and paid according to the letter and spirit of the law which authorized it. Notwithstanding there are men who would be gratified to have the debt repudiated and the nation disgraced, yet the great mass of the honest people of the country are for paying the debt according to contract.

There has been some confusion in the minds of a portion of the people upon the subject of the payment of the public debt. Men differ upon the question whether five-twenty bonds are legally payable in greenbacks or gold. The people differ upon the question of time when the Government can resume specie payment. They differ in relation to the proper course to be pursued in regard to the national banks; but when the question is asked: shall the nation pay its indebtedness in good faith? few there are who dare to intimate open repudiation. Repudiation will not soon take place in this country. The honor of the nation is yet held too sacred. The debt will be paid, every dollar of it, and that, too, in money that the world recognizes as such. No man need quibble on that point. Whatever may be the technical right of the Government in relation to the five-twenty bonds they will be paid in the specie of the country. They will not be paid until the Government is able to pay them in specie. They will not be payable until long after the question of greenbacks will have faded out of sight. Greenbacks will soon be as good as gold, and when that time comes the question whether the bonds are payable in gold or greenbacks, forced upon the public without rhyme or reason, except to raise a smoke with which to blind the people upon other more important issues, will be of no consequence whatever. The business of this Congress, in my judgment, ought to be to adopt a course or policy which will appreciate greenbacks and do away with the difference between specie and paper. When that is done the other question will settle itself.

How are we going to do it? Not by introducing and discussing pet financial schemes as numerous and various as the members of this body, or by setting times for the resumption of specie payment. It may do some good to fix a time for specie payment if the time is far enough in the future; but my opinion is that men who are supposed to be financially wise are worrying themselves more upon that subject than is profitable either to them or the country. There seems to be a sort of monomania prevailing among politicians in the country to invent some sort of mysterious financial scheme. Bills for the resumption by the Government of specie payment may be considered the hobby on which men seem to desire to ride; those seeking popular favor had better be careful lest in their excitement they are not thrown hard enough to require some doctoring to get them on their feet again. Financial legislation often proves worthless, and oftener, when directly affecting the business of the people, proves injurious.

Why should there be such an anxiety at this moment for the resumption of specie payment? The West, I am sure, is not anxious about a hasty return. They would be glad if we could get back at once, if we could do so without greater depression in business and prices, but all admit that a sudden resumption would result in a sudden fall of prices, and a sudden fall in prices would financially ruin tens of thousands of the best and most enterprising men in the land. The less we say or do, in my judgment, about resumption at present the better for the country. We do not know what is best to be done, whether to undertake to resume in two years or five. Let us cease talking about resumption and turn our attention to retrenchment and economy. Let us cut down expense and restore confidence among the people. Let us delay action upon the question of resumption until General Grant assumes direction of affairs; and then, sir, when the Government has inaugurated a thorough system of economy and the people regain their confidence in the Government and get to work, as they will, it will be time enough to take up the question of resumption of specie payment. We can then act with some assurance, at least, that our action will not break down the business of the country. It is easy for us to sit here and urge immediate resumption, but it must be remembered that every resolution and bill and speech introduced or delivered in Congress have their effect upon the business of the people, which by such action is kept in a continued unsettled condition. Every day we hear business men say that they do not know whether to quit business or go ahead, whether to continue quiet, keeping their money in their pockets or banks, or to engage in business, because they say they are expecting that Congress will do something with the finances that will entirely change the existing condition of things. They are afraid of Congress on this subject.

Then, sir, I repeat again that our present duty is to economize and retrench, and to insist that the country shall have peace upon the financial questions as well as all others. I do not believe that any man knows whether we have a greater circulating medium in the country than is needed, or if we have how much. We have a broad expanse of country; its needs are increasing; we have near forty million people, and by a proper encouragement of industry will soon have a business far in excess of anything heretofore known. The southern portion of the country is opening up a field for labor and enterprise and wealth which never would have been developed under the influence of slavery. New Territories are rapidly filling up with an enterprising people, and are demanding the attention of the Government; great lines of railroads are stretching from one end of the continent to the other for thousands of miles in length; foreign emigration is filling up the country at the rate of three hundred and fifty thousand persons per annum, and with all we are becoming as by magic a mighty empire of free and industrious people.

Then let us wait until the influence of the next administration is felt upon the country. When that time comes we can tell at least with some certainty, I hope, whether the Government can afford to resume specie payment then, or in one, two, or five years thereafter. We cannot afford to cripple the enterprise and business of the country by improper legislation. Who is anxious for immediate action in favor of specie payment? Importers desire it because they could then make a greater profit on the goods which they buy abroad and bring to this country to sell. Men who have their capital largely in Government bonds desire it because the mooted question as to what they are finally to receive in payment would be set at rest. Men with large capital, who are holding it waiting for a chance to invest it in a manner to insure large profits, desire it because if they desire to invest it in real estate, store-houses, fine lands, or town lots, they are sure upon a sudden resumption of getting whatever they desire at half price. But, sir, there are other people in this country just as worthy as either of these classes, and they number as twenty to one, in my judgment, who would be injuriously affected by hasty action upon this financial question. Then, sir, let us make haste slowly, and in whatever we do bear in mind that there are people in the country who have rights, and are not coming here lobbying either for resumption of specie payment, railroad subsidies, protective tariffs, or anything else. They are pursuing their honest avocations, and expect us to protect them in their rights.

But, Mr. Speaker, I shall not continue my remarks longer. The difficulties and trials through which our nation has passed have been great and numerous since she gained her national independence. Though less than a century in years we are to-day among the foremost nations of the earth. Our watchword is now onward. Our progress in all that makes a nation great will in the future be far greater than in the days that are passed. As legislators, having in keeping the prosperity and honor of the nation, let us be careful to do nothing that will hinder, but labor to do everything that will encourage the development of our country's resources, that will stimulate industry and add to the comfort and enjoyment of the mass of the people, that will encourage science, art, and invention, that will conduce to good order in society, and that will make this a Government of power in the world, based upon enlightened constitutional liberty.

SUFFRAGE.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, this measure has never been surpassed in importance by any enactments in our entire legislative history. In intrinsic interest, in far-reaching consequences, if it become a law, it would be difficult to conceive a proposition more momentous. Besides, in reference to the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, it is an initial measure, and for the first time makes it our imperative duty to consider that amendment, and before we make it the basis of legislation to determine, under the sanction of our oath to support the Constitution, what are its true intent and meaning.

Mr. Speaker, I have come to its consideration with a profound desire to attain such conclusions as shall at once most truly "support" the instrument and preserve her liberties and promote the highest welfare of the people. Yet, on every material point, I find most of my conclusions to be precisely antipodal to those of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] Our several reasons and arguments must answer for our different judgments. I only pray that they shall be fairly and dispassionately considered and weighed by all. I shall then cheerfully abide the result. The most important part of the bill, and that which presents the great questions of power contained in it, reads as follows in its title and first section:

A bill to secure equal privileges and immunities to citizens of the United States, and to enforce the provisions of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution.

That no State shall abridge or deny the right of any citizen of the United States to vote for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, or for Representatives in Congress, or for members of the Legislature of the State in which he may reside, by reason of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; and any provisions in the laws or constitution of any State inconsistent with this section are hereby declared to be null and void.

The title of the bill and the text of this section clearly indicate, and the gentleman's argument declares, that this bill rests for support, in part at least, on the first paragraph of the first section of the fourteenth amendment. I read it:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside."

What does this mean?

It is no grant of power.

It gives no new power to Congress.

It takes no pre-existing power from the States.

It declares who shall be citizens of the United States.

But the fact that certain persons are citizens, and the number of them, and the definition of citizenship or of its constituent elements, were just the same before the ratification of that section that they are now neither is now more certain or better settled than it was before.

The thirteenth amendment had made all persons of color citizens of the United States, if they were not hitherto. Then the body of citizens is no way materially changed by this amendment. "On this point I do not wish to stand without great and worthy authority." I therefore give you the opinion of the great chancellor:

"Citizens, under our Constitution and laws, mean free inhabitants born within the United States or naturalized under the laws of Congress. If a slave born in the United States be manumitted or otherwise lawfully discharged from bondage, or if a black man be born within the United States and born free, he becomes thenceforward a citizen; but under such disabilities as the laws of the States respectively may deem it expedient to prescribe to free persons of color."—2 Kent, 259; Hobbs vs. Fong, 6 Watts, 553; The State vs. Claiborne, Meigs, 331; Opinions of Attorneys General, vol. 1, 382.

If gentlemen prefer a later, a more partisan, but yet most respectable authority, I will also cite the able advice of the late Republican Attorney General Bates to Secretary of the Treasury Chase in 1862. In answer to the question, who are citizens of the United States? he says:

"The phrase 'a citizen of the United States,' without addition or qualification, means neither more nor less than a member of the nation. And all such are politically and legally equal. The child in the cradle and its father in the Senate are equally citizens of the United States. And it needs no argument to prove" * * * "that every citizen of the United States is a citizen of the particular State in which he is domiciled."

It does not deny, annul, or modify the power of the States to make citizens of the States. States may confer State citizenship and suffrage. They have always done it. It has become the settled law of the Union. They have given suffrage to persons not citizens of the United States. They have repeatedly both enlarged and abridged the number of electors. They have done this in Indiana, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and almost all the other States. Their right was never denied, and has been either tacitly or expressly approved by all departments of the Government. On this point, too, I am able to sustain my position by the judgment of the same great chancellor:

"These civil privileges conferred upon aliens by State authority, are dictated by a just and liberal policy, but they must be taken to be strictly local; and until a foreigner is duly naturalized according to the act of Congress he is not entitled in any other State to any other privileges than those which the laws of that State allow to aliens."—2 Kent, 70; 6 California R., 250; 2 Curtis's History of Constitution, 200; Notes on Citizenship.

And further, by the judicial opinions of a majority of the justices of the Supreme Court, to which I ask the attention of the House:

"We must not confound the rights of citizenship which a State may confer within its own limits and the rights of citizenship as a member of the Union. It may have all the rights and privileges of the citizen of a State, and yet not be entitled to the rights and privileges of a citizen of any other State. Nor have the States surrendered the power and privilege of conferring the rights and privileges of citizens by adopting the Constitution of the United States. Each State may still confer them upon an alien or any one it thinks proper, or upon any class or description of persons; yet he would not be a citizen in the sense in which the word is used in the Constitution of the United States, nor entitled to sue as such in one of its courts, nor to the privileges and immunities of a citizen in the other States. A State cannot make a man a member of the community of the United States by making him a member of its own."—Scott vs. Sandford, 19 Howard, 405.

Neither does the paragraph under consideration define citizen, or the constituent elements of citizenship of the United States or of the States. It leaves both where it found them—to rest upon the common law and the laws of the several States. These words are nowhere precisely defined in the Constitution, laws, or judicial decisions of our country; but in the uniform practice of the country, in many learned commentaries, and numberless judicial decisions touching the subject more or less directly, they have been so nearly defined as to remove all doubt as to their substantial meaning.

American citizenship does not depend upon or coexist with the legal capacity to hold office and the right of suffrage. The majority of persons in every community in our country, every one of whom are citizens as really and absolutely as the others, are denied the right either to hold office or vote. The Constitution nowhere declares who may vote or hold office, except as to a few offices.

As voting and holding office are not essential to citizenship, so the deprivation of either by law is not a deprivation of citizenship; no more so in the case of a negro than of a white woman or child. I therefore hold that the first paragraph in question is merely declaratory in a more specific and authoritative form of what was law before. It gives no support, in my judgment, to the extraordinary propositions contained in this bill. It is manifestly intended only to remove all doubt, if any existed, upon the fact that nativity and naturalization confer, in the language of Justice Story, a general citizenship of the United States and give the country jurisdiction over them, and give rise to the correlative obligations of allegiance and protection; and also to declare all such persons citizens alike of the States wherein they reside. The latter citizenship must also be held to be of that same general character. It is not more specific or certain or better defined, and amounts in law to just what it did before this enactment. Ever since the organization of the Union, and just as much before as since this amendment, any citizen of the United States who voluntarily removed to and became a permanent resident of any State that instant, and by virtue of that act and fact, became also a citizen of that State. But such citizenship alone never gave a right to vote or hold office, and it does not now. There must be some added or acquired qualification under the provisions of the State constitution and laws, which can only be acquired after the residence begins, and generally results from its continuance for a prescribed period. Otherwise, and on the theory of the gentleman from Massachusetts, all such persons, the moment their State residence begins, become full-fledged citizens with the right to vote and hold office.

But the more important part of that section declares:

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States."

This is a limitation on the powers of the States. It needs no legislation to enforce it. It is better enforced by itself, and judicially. But what do the important words "privileges or immunities" mean? They are historic, and have often received judicial and legislative definition and construction. They had their origin in the fourth article of the Articles of Confederation, which reads:

"The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in this Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States—paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted—shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States."

The purpose and intent of this provision are clear and free from ambiguity, and afford an infallible key to unlock the more mysterious meaning of section two, article four, of the Constitution, which was intended to perpetuate the provisions in the Articles of Confederation, and reads:

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

In the draft of this section it is to be lamented that certainty and perspicuity of intention were sacrificed for the sake of brevity.

The language of the fourteenth amendment seems to have been intended to give Congress the power to enforce the provisions of this section; but the expression "privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States" appears to be restrictive of the object and intent of the words in the section, "privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

But for the purposes of this argument, as that view is most favorable to the friends of this bill, I will assume that the two forms of expression are exact equivalents.

I then proceed to inquire what do they mean?

In their derivation and legally and judicially accepted signification they give no countenance to the assumptions of the friends of this bill. The word "privilege" is defined by Worcester to mean "an exemption or immunity from some general duty or burden; a right peculiar to some individual or body; a peculiar advantage or benefit." And the descriptive word "peculiar" means "belonging to only one, not common to many." The term "exemption" has an even more limited signification, being by the same great lexicographer defined to be "freedom or exemption from serving in an office or from performing duties required of others." It is most erroneous to suppose that the words rights, privileges, and immunities are synonymous. They are not. The word rights is generic, embracing all that may be lawfully claimed, and it is affirmative, but the others are, in their most exact and legal definitions, both restrictive and negative. The gentleman from Massachusetts justly and logically maintains that whatever rights, privileges, and immunities attach to and inhere in the citizen or citizens of the United States must belong to all alike. They must belong equally to man and woman, to adult and infant, to sane and insane, to black and white. But this just and invulnerable position is most fatal to the claim that the right of suffrage is one of the constituent elements of citizenship, because if it is it also must belong alike to all. But the truth is, and it is within the observation of all men, and is established by the uniform practice of every State in the Union, and is sustained by an unbroken line of judicial decisions, that no person ever did exercise the right of suffrage in virtue of the naked, unassisted fact of citizenship. But in every instance the right depends, and the franchise of suffrage is exercised, upon some additional fact and cumulative qualification prescribed by the laws of the State, which may as perfectly exist without as with citizenship, (Bates on Citizenship.) The word citizenship has not in any of its elements or meanings under the Federal Constitution, nor have the words "privileges and immunities," in any of their just interpretations, anything to do with or any power to set aside or disregard any of the distinctions, requirements, or rights based upon domicile or residence in the respective States. Even the infamous and revolutionary measures of reconstruction in the South recognize and do not attempt to disregard this universal truth. But now and in this bill, and by the gentleman from Massachusetts, for the first time in our history, these fundamental truths are all to be ignored or reversed.

This section does not require that the laws and usages of one State shall be permitted to prescribe qualifications for citizens to be aimed and exercised in other States in contravention to their local policy. (2 Kent, 71; 19 How. R., 405.)

I understand its primary object to be to secure equal privileges and immunities to the citizens of each State while temporarily sojourning in any other State; and its secondary and only other purpose is to prevent any State from discriminating in its laws in favor of or against the citizens of any other State merely because they are the citizens of such other State, or, in other words, for mere sectional reasons. For example, Massachusetts cannot form any tacit or express alliance or friendship with Maine which shall require or justify Massachusetts in giving to the citizens of Maine who shall settle in Massachusetts any privileges and immunities it does not equally give to the same class of citizens from any other State.

Our ancestors had formed a sisterhood of States, equal in dignity, rights, and powers, and they merely intended by this provision to prevent any combinations arising out of mutual interests or animosities between certain States from taking the form of legislative discriminations against the citizens of other States. Texas cannot, because it dislikes Yankees, withhold from the citizens of New England any privileges and immunities it accords to the citizens of the same class from Louisiana. But Texas can deny to the paupers, vagabonds, or fugitives from justice of New England privileges and immunities which it denies, on grounds of local public policy, to the same classes from other States, and which it denies on the same grounds to persons of the same classes within its own limits, although such persons in New England have been invested with greater rights.

This interpretation is reasonable, practical, and free from the dangerous and centralizing tendencies of the one claimed in this bill. It is consistent with the full enjoyment by the States respectively of the sacred and natural right of local self-government and self-protection. It will enable the States to protect the body-politic against the dangers and demoralizations which would inevitably result from the other theory.

In this view I am fully sustained by that distinguished jurist whom I have before quoted. He says:

"The article in the Constitution of the United States declaring that citizens of each State were entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States applies only to natural-born or duly naturalized citizens; and if they remove from one State to another they are entitled to the privileges that persons of the same description are entitled to in the State to which the removal is made, and to none other. The privileges thus conferred are local, and necessarily territorial in their nature."—2 Kent, 71.

To the same effect is the opinion of Justice Story:

"The intention of this clause was to confer on them, if one may so say, a general citizenship, and to communicate all the privileges and immunities which the citizens of the same State would be entitled to under the like circumstances."—Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, sec. 1806.

Now, if my construction of this constitutional provision is incorrect, and the one claimed by the friends of this bill is correct, then it follows that aliens made citizens by the States are entitled to all the privileges of citizens in any other States to which they may remove, because they were citizens in the State they removed from. But the contrary is both the law and the practice throughout the Union. Such a citizen removing to another State is then entitled only to such privileges as are accorded by the laws of that State to persons of the same class.

Directly pertinent to this inquiry also are the citations already made by me from Mr. Kent. Therefore, if negroes remove from Massachusetts, or coolies from California, to Ohio or Indiana they are entitled there to enjoy the same privileges and immunities which are accorded by those States respectively to negroes or coolies from any other State, "but to none other." They cannot import into those States the laws of Massachusetts or California. The right to exclude them or to limit them in political rights and privileges is fundamental and necessary to the existence and safety of the State. It antedates all constitutions. It is original in the State.

Next, hear the views of Justice Washington:

"The inquiry is, what are the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States? We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are in their nature fundamental; which belong of right to the citizens of all free Governments; and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several States which compose this Union, from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are it would perhaps be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: protection by the Government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the Government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole. The right of a citizen of one State to pass through or to reside in any other State for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of the State; to take, hold, and dispose of property, either real or personal; and an exemption from higher taxes or impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the State, may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens, which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental; to which may be added the elective franchise, as regulated and established by the laws or constitution of the State in which it is to be exercised."—Coryell vs. Coryell, 4 Washington's Circuit Court Reports, page 380.

The gentleman from Massachusetts cited at great length and indorsed the decision of the court of appeals of Kentucky in Amy vs. Smith, (Littell's Reports.) I will waste but little time on that authority. In most of its reasoning it is in entire harmony with my views and the authorities I am using. So far as it is not, and especially in its attempt to define citizenship, it is not supported by a single respectable authority in the judicial records of the country. It has therefore no intrinsic value.

But I give the gentleman, as a full offset to that case, the case of Abbott vs. Bayley, 6 Pick. R., p. 92, from the supreme court of his own State; and I read the material part of the decision in that case. The court says:

"The privileges and immunities secured to the people of each State in every other State can be applied only in case of removal from one State into another. By such removal they become citizens of the adopted State without naturalization, and have a right to sue and be sued as citizens; and yet this privilege is qualified and not absolute, for they cannot enjoy the right of suffrage or of eligibility to office without such term of residence as shall be prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State into which they shall remove. They shall have the privileges and immunities of citizens; that is, they shall not be deemed aliens, but may take and hold real estate; and may, according to the laws of such State, eventually enjoy the full rights of citizenship without the necessity of being naturalized."

I now refer at some length to the views of the judges in the passenger cases, 7 Howard, 466, which bear directly upon and illustrate this subject. After referring to the cases of Holmes vs. Jennison, 14 Peters, 540; Groves vs. Slaughter, 15 Peters, 449; and Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 16 Peters, 539, Chief Justice Taney remarks:

"If these cases are to stand, the right of the State is undoubted. And it is equally clear that if it may remove from among its citizens any person or description of persons whom it regards as injurious to their welfare, it follows that it may meet them at the threshold and prevent them from entering; for it will hardly be said that the United States may permit them to enter and compel the State to receive them, and that the State may immediately afterward expel them. There could be no reason of policy or humanity for compelling the States, by the power of Congress, to imbibe the poison, and then leaving them to find a remedy for it by their own exertions and at their own expense. Certainly no such distinction can be found in the Constitution, and such a division of power would be an inconsistency, not to say an absurdity, for which I presume no one will contend. If the State has the power to determine whether the persons objected to shall remain in the State in association with its citizens it must, as an incident inseparably connected with it, have the right also to determine who shall enter. Indeed, in the case of Groves vs. Slaughter, the Mississippi constitution prohibited the entry of the objectionable persons, and the opinions of the court throughout treat the exercise of this power as being the same with that of expelling them after they have entered.

Neither can this be a concurrent power, and whether it belongs to the General or to the State Government the sovereignty which possesses the right must in its exercise be altogether independent of the other. If the United States have the power, then any legislation by the State in conflict with a treaty or act of Congress would be void. And if the States possess it, then any act on the subject by the General Government in conflict with the State law would also be void and this court bound to disrespect it. It must be paramount and absolute in the sovereignty which possesses it. A concurrent and equal power in the United States and the States as to who should and who should not be permitted to reside in a State would be a direct conflict of powers, repugnant to each other, continually thwarting and defeating its exercise by either, and could result in nothing but discord and confusion.

Again, if the State has the right to exclude from its borders any person or persons whom it may regard as dangerous to the safety of its citizens it must necessarily have the right to decide when and toward whom this power is to be exercised. It is in its nature a discretionary power, to be exercised according to the judgment of the party that possesses it. And it must, therefore, rest with the State to determine whether any particular class or description of persons are likely to produce discontent or insurrection in its territory, or to taint the morals of its citizens, or to bring among them contagious diseases or the evils and burdens of numerous pauper population. For if the General Government can in any respect or by any form of legislation control or restrain a State in the exercise of this power, or decide whether it has been exercised with proper discretion and toward proper persons and on proper occasions, then the real and substantial power would be in Congress and not in the States. In the cases decided in this court and hereinbefore referred to the power of determining who is or is not dangerous to the interest and wellbeing of the people of the State has been uniformly admitted to reside in the State.

I think it, therefore, to be very clear, both upon principle and the authority of adjudged cases, that the several States have a right to remove from among their people and to prevent from entering the State any person or class or description of persons whom it may deem dangerous or injurious to the interests and welfare of its citizens; and that the State has the exclusive right to determine, in its sound discretion, whether the danger does or does not exist, free from the control of the General Government."

Mr. Justice Grier, in the same case, (page 47,) said:

"It must be borne in mind (what has sometimes been forgotten) that the controversy in this case is not with regard to the right claimed by the State of Massachusetts in the second section of this act, to repel from her shores lunatics, idiots, criminals, or paupers, which any foreign country, or even one of her sister States, might endeavor to thrust upon her; nor the right of any State, whose domestic security might be endangered by the admission of free negroes, to exclude them from her borders. This right of the States has its foundation in the sacred law of self-defense, which no power granted to Congress can restrain or annul. It is admitted by all that those powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or what may be more properly called internal police, are not surrendered or restrained; and that it is as competent and necessary for a State to provide precautionary measures against the moral pestilence of paupers, vagabonds, and convicts, as it is to guard against the physical pestilence which may arise from unsound and infectious articles imported."

Justice Story, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Priggs vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 16 Peters, page 625, says:

"To guard, however, against any possible misconception of our views, it is proper to state that we are by no means to be understood in any manner whatever to doubt or to interfere with the police power belonging to the States in virtue of their general sovereignty. That police power extends over all subjects within the territorial limits of the States, and has never been conceded to the United States."

Now, let it be remembered that in all these authorities it is assumed that the privileges and immunities referred to as attainable in the States are required to be attained if at all according to the laws or constitutions of the States, and never in defiance of them.

In 1855, in Conner vs. Elliott, 18 Howard, 591, the Supreme Court of the United States further decided, in reference to this clause, that it does not entitle a native-born female citizen of Louisiana, who removed to Mississippi, and there married and lived, to take the interest in her husband's real estate in Louisiana on his death to which the laws of that State entitle a widow who resided there at the time of her husband's death. The State of Louisiana gave to widows who were citizens of one State just the same advantages under its laws which it gave to those of another, and no more could be rightfully demanded.

But it is claimed there is some support for this bill and the claim of congressional power in another provision of the Constitution. The Constitution declares that—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."—Constitution, art. 1, sec. 2, clause 1.

At the time this provision in the Constitution on the subject of the qualifications of electors in the different States was under the consideration of the Constitutional Convention, we all know that there existed in the States a very great diversity of provisions and regulations upon this subject of suffrage. They differed both in extent and principle. In some of the States the suffrage was extended upon principles of great liberality to almost all men of competent age, while in other States it was extended upon principles of less liberality, and in some States it was limited by lingering principles of the feudal system, which still prevailed in the laws of descent and the transmission of property in some of the States.

In was in view of these diversities that the Constitutional Convention approached the consideration of this question. And we are told by Mr. Story, in his excellent Commentaries on that sacred charter of our liberty, that for obvious reasons it would have been improper to leave that subject open for the occasional regulation of Congress, even as to the qualification of electors for Representatives to its own body; and therefore it was settled in the Constitution itself, and placed forever beyond the control of Congress. (Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, sec. 588.)

Now, who determines those qualifications in the respective States? I say that the people of the several States themselves determine those qualifications, and no other power on earth is authorized to interfere. The language of the Constitution is clear and emphatic. It is too plain to require interpretation. It establishes a rule which, in the nature of our Government, cannot be uniform. It is to be fixed by each State for itself. And upon this point I desire to invite attention for a moment to a few authorities, and they are authorities of great weight and distinction in the constitutional history of our country; authorities entitled to the very highest consideration at the hands of their posterity. And first, Alexander Hamilton, one of the earliest and greatest expounders of our Federal Constitution, who may be ranked as equal with our great statesmen of the earlier school. What does he say? In No. 52 of the Federalist he uses this language:

"To have reduced the different qualifications in the different States to one uniform rule would probably have been as dissatisfactory to some of the States as it would have been difficult to the Convention. The provision made by the Convention appears, therefore, to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established or which may be established by the State itself. It will be safe to the United States, because, being fixed by the State constitutions, it is not alterable by the State governments; and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitutions in such manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution."

And in this connection I beg leave to invite the attention of the House to a fact, perhaps forgotten by some, that this number of the Federalist may be quoted with equal propriety as expressing the deliberate opinion and judgment of Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Madison; because, in every list of the numbers of that work ever furnished by Mr. Madison himself he claimed that he, and not Mr. Hamilton, was the author of No. 52; and Mr. Hamilton, in some of his lists, claimed that he was its author, and not Mr. Madison. But the claim that is made by both of those distinguished statesmen for the paternity of this number of the Federalist is enough to establish the fact that each of them approved, indorsed, and adopted as his own the opinions expressed in it. I therefore quote it now as expressing the equally deliberate judgment of Mr. Madison himself upon this subject.*

And in this connection I will briefly invite attention to another authority. I quote now from the History of the Constitution, by Mr. Curtis. I read it for the purpose of showing what were the intentions, as he understands them, of the framers of this particular part of the Constitution. He says:

"The committee of detail, after a review of all these considerations, presented a scheme that was well adapted to meet the difficulties of the case. They proposed that the same persons who, by the laws of the several States, were admitted to vote for members of the most numerous branch of their own Legislatures, should have the right to vote for the Representatives of Congress. The adoption of this principle avoided the necessity of disfranchising any portion of the people of a State by a system of qualifications unknown to their laws. As the States were the best judges of the circumstances and temper of their own people, it was certainly best to conciliate them to the support of the new constitution by this concession. It was possible, indeed, but not very probable, that they might admit foreigners to the right of voting without the previous qualification of citizenship. It was possible, too, that they might establish universal suffrage in its most unrestricted sense. But against all these evils there existed one great security, namely, that the mischiefs of an absolutely free suffrage would be felt most severely by themselves in their own domestic concerns; and against the special danger to be apprehended from the indiscriminate admission of foreigners to the right of voting, another feature of the proposed plan gave the national Legislature power to withhold from persons of foreign birth the privileges of general citizenship, although a State might confer upon them the power of voting without previous naturalization."

I will read no more of that authority, but simply add that in a somewhat lengthy review of this subject Mr. Curtis fully sustains the expressed opinions of Mr. Madison and Mr. Hamilton, and the positions I now maintain.

*No. 52 of the Federalist was first published in the Packet, of New York city, on February 12, 1788.

I think it will be generally conceded by most men in this country that if this great power which is claimed by the gentleman exists at all, it cannot be found to rest upon this provision of the Constitution, but must find its abiding place in another clause of the Constitution, (Art. 1, sec. 4, clause 1,) which I will now read to the House. It is as follows:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Now, I invite attention to the obvious fact that this provision of the Constitution is limited by its own terms to certain objects. What are they? First, to the "times." Times of what? The times of holding the elections. Second, to the "places." The places for what? The places for holding the elections. Third, to the "manner." Here I invite attention to the obvious meaning of that word taken in connection with the context. The manner of what? Is it the manner of determining the qualifications of electors? That would be absurd. If it was intended to confer that power, an absolute and apt term would have been used to grant it. No, sir; it relates solely to the manner of holding elections, not the manner of determining who shall vote or who shall not vote. Such is the construction placed upon this provision by Mr. Justice Story, whose examination of the history of the Constitution was perhaps more thorough and exhaustive than that of any other jurist or statesman in our country. He disposes of the monstrous idea that Congress may regulate elections in the States, or that such purpose was ever cherished by the framers of the Constitution, in the following manner:

"What would be said of a clause introduced into the national Constitution to regulate the State elections of the members of the State Legislatures? It would be deemed a most unwarrantable transfer of power, indicating a premeditated design to destroy the State governments. It would be deemed so flagrant a violation of principle as to require no comment."—Story on the Constitution, sec. 819.

Then, confining the power of Congress, under the provision in question, to the mere regulation of the times, places, and manner of holding elections, he approves it as demanded by possible emergencies that may arise in the history of the Union, and adds:

"There is no pretense to say that the power in the national Government can be used so as to exclude any State from its share in the representation in Congress. Nor can it be said with correctness that Congress can in any way alter the rights or qualifications of voters. The most that can be urged with any show of argument is, that the power might, in a given case, be employed in such a manner as to promote the election of some favorite candidate or favorite class of men in exclusion of others, by confining the places of election to particular districts, and rendering it impracticable for the citizens at large to partake in the choice."—Ibid., sec. 820.

Mr. Hamilton is equally emphatic in his mode of disposing of the theory that would tolerate the interference of Congress in the regulation of elections in the States for State officers. In No. 59 of the Federalist, he says:

"Suppose an article had been introduced into the Constitution, empowering the United States to regulate the elections for the particular States, would any man have hesitated to condemn it, both as an unwarrantable transposition of power and as a premeditated engine for the destruction of the State governments?"

In the next number of the Federalist, speaking more at length on the subject of the propriety of allowing Congress to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress, and of the alleged danger that Congress might so regulate them as to favor certain classes in the States, he further says:

"The truth is, that there is no method of securing to the rich the preference apprehended but by prescribing qualifications of property either for those who may elect or be elected. But this forms no part of the power to be conferred upon the national Government. Its authority would be expressly restricted to the regulation of the times, the places, and the manner of elections. The qualifications of the persons who may choose to be chosen, as has been remarked upon another occasion, are defined and fixed in the Constitution; and are unalterable by the Legislature" [of the Union.]

These views in reference to the history and just interpretation of that provision are substantially concurred in by Mr. Duer, in his Lectures on Constitutional Jurisprudence, and by Mr. Curtis, in the work to which I have already referred, the History of the Constitution.

Now, I desire very briefly to direct the attention of the House to some additional testimony on this subject, derived from the proceedings of the Convention itself, as reported by James Madison. I propose from them to show that the interpretation for which I contend is the only true one, the only one of which the provision is fairly susceptible, and the only one which ever for a single instant entered the minds or controlled the action of the framers of the Constitution.

I invite attention now to what is called the fifth volume of Eliot's Debates. It is really the debates of the Constitutional Convention, prepared by Mr. Madison. While the subject was under discussion, on the 24th day of July, 1787, the following proceedings were had:

"Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS moved to strike out the last member of the section beginning with the words 'qualifications of electors,' in order that some other provision might be substituted which would restrain the right of suffrage to freeholders."

"Mr. FITZSIMMONS seconded the motion."

"Mr. WYLLIAMSON was opposed to it."

He was followed by Mr. Wilson, afterward one of the justices of the Supreme Court, appointed by Washington:

"Mr. WILSON. This part of the report was well considered by the committee, and he did not think it could be changed for the better. It was difficult to form any uniform rule of qualifications for all the States. Unnecessary innovations, he thought, too, should be avoided. It would be very hard and disagreeable for the same persons, at the same time, to vote for representatives in the State Legislature, and to be excluded from a vote for those in the national Legislature."

"Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS. Such a hardship would be neither great nor novel. The people are accustomed to it, and not dissatisfied with it, in several of the States. In some, the qualifications are different for the choice of Governor and of the representatives; in others, for different houses of the Legislature. Another objection to the clause as it stands is, that it makes the qualifications of the national Legislature depend on the will of the States, which he thought not proper."

Then we have Mr. Ellsworth, afterward the second Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States:

"Mr. ELLSWORTH thought the qualifications of the electors stood on the most proper footing. The right of suffrage was a tender point, and strongly guarded by most of the State constitutions. The people will not readily subscribe to the national Constitution, if it should subject them to be disfranchised. The States are the best judges of the circumstances and temper of their own people."

Some remarks were made by Colonel Mason, who was a distinguished member of the Convention from Virginia. After several other distinguished members had expressed their views and all in entire harmony with the views of Story and Hamilton, which I have quoted, James Madison, as reported by himself, used the following language:

"The right of suffrage is certainly one of the fundamental articles of republican government, and ought not to be left to be regulated by the Legislature" [of the Union.]

The illustrious Dr. Franklin, a member of the Convention, in some characteristic remarks, opposed the motion of Mr. Morris, and gave the weight of his great influence to retain the provision as reported by the committee and as explained in the preceding discussion. In the same connection I refer to the remarks of George Nicholas in the convention of Virginia. They are to be found in the third volume of Eliot's Debates, page 41:

"I will consider it first, then, as to the qualifications of the electors. The best writers on government agree that in a republic those laws which fix the right of suffrage are fundamental; if, therefore, by the proposed plan it is left uncertain in whom the right of suffrage is to rest, or if it has placed that right in improper hands, I shall admit that it is a radical defect; but in this plan there is a fixed rule for determining the qualifications of electors, and that rule the most judicious that could possibly have been devised, because it refers to a criterion which cannot be changed. A qualification that gives a right to elect representatives for the State Legislatures gives also by this constitution a right to choose Representatives for the General Government. As the qualifications of electors are different in the different States, no particular qualifications, uniform through the States, would have been politic, as it would have caused a great inequality in the electors, resulting from the situation and circumstances of the respective States. Uniformity of qualifications would greatly affect the yeomanry in the States, as it would either exclude from this inherent rightsome who are entitled to it by the laws of some States at present, or be extended so universally as to defeat the admirable end of the institution of representation."

On a subsequent day, when the same provision was under consideration, Mr. Madison again expressed his views. I should not be disposed to refer to him again, but the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWWELL,] in his remarks the other day, quoted in defense of his own theory the remarks of Mr. Madison on the latter occasion. In order to show the entire consistency of those views with Mr. Madison's more deliberately expressed opinion in the Federalist, I will incorporate a part of them into my argument.

Mr. Madison reports himself as saying:

"The necessity of a General Government supposes that the State Legislatures will sometimes fail or refuse to consult the common interest at the expense of their local convenience or prejudices. The policy of referring the appointment of the House of Representatives to the people, and not to the Legislatures of the States, supposes that the result will be somewhat influenced by the mode. This view of the question seems to decide that the Legislatures of the States ought not to have the uncontrolled right of regulating the times, places, and manner of holding elections. These were words of great latitude. It was impossible to foresee all the abuses that might be made of the discretionary power."

Now, I invite attention at this point to the obvious construction that was put by Mr. Madison upon these words, "the times, the places, and the manner of holding elections." And it is clearly inferable, from what he says, that he understood these things to relate, not to the qualifications of electors, but to various circumstances connected with the holding of elections, not embracing the qualifications of electors at all. He says further:

"Whether the electors should vote by ballot or viva voce, should assemble at this place or that place, should be divided into districts or all meet at one place, should all vote for all the Representatives, or all in a district vote for a member allotted to the district; these and many other points would depend on the Legislatures and might materially affect the appointments. Whenever the State Legislatures had a favorite measure to carry they would take care so to mold their regulations as to favor the candidates they wished to succeed.

Besides, the inequality of representation in the Legislatures of particular States would produce a like inequality in their representation in the national Legislature, and it was presumable that the counties, having the power in the former case, would secure it to themselves in the latter.

"What danger would there be in giving a controlling power to the national Legislature? Of whom was it to consist? First, of a Senate, to be chosen by the State Legislatures. If the latter, therefore, could be trusted their Representatives could not be dangerous. Secondly, of Representatives elected by the same people who elect the State Legislatures. Surely, then, if confidence is due to the latter it must be due to the former. It seems as improper in principle, though it might be less inconvenient in practice, to give to the State Legislatures this great authority over the election of the Representatives of the people in the General Legislature, as it would be to give to the latter a like power over the election of their Representatives in the State Legislature."

It should be borne in mind that the qualifications of electors for members of Congress and State officers were, at the time of the formation of our Constitution, fixed in every State in the constitution of the State, and were not subject to control or modification by the State Legislatures. All the State Legislatures could do could only consist in laws regulating the times, places, and manner of holding the elections. Lest they should in any contingency, or for any purpose or causes, fail to regulate these matters with reference to the election of Congressmen, it was thought necessary to give to Congress the power to regulate them, so that it might prevent an entire failure of representation from any State. It is, therefore, no doubt competent for Congress to prescribe by law when the congressional elections shall be held in all the States, and at what places they shall be held, and in what manner they shall be held; that is, whether the people of a whole State shall all vote for the number of Congressmen to which that State is entitled, or the State be divided into districts, and the people of each district vote for one member only, or whether they shall vote by the secret ballot or viva voce. But Congress has no power to prescribe by law who shall vote or what shall constitute the qualifications of a voter for a member of Congress. Nor has it any power to dictate when or where or how elections shall be held for officers of the State government, or who shall vote at them.

Now, I have cited or referred to every known expression of opinion on this subject by any American statesman, publicist, or jurist of distinction, and shown that they all, with a unanimity almost unparalleled, concur in the same interpretation of the power of Congress under the provision in question. The practice of the Government, without a single example to the contrary, sustains the same construction. Such an extent of power on this subject over the States as is now claimed for Congress, if it had been asserted by any party prior to our late most deplorable rebellion, would have convulsed the nation to its extremest boundaries with excitement and apprehension. It would have been more than sufficient, if avowed in the constitutional Convention, to have defeated forever the adoption of the Constitution by the people of the States. It will be sufficient now, if conceded to exist, to subvert the great principle of local self-government, which is the chief bulwark of our liberties.

Against the array of authorities to which I have referred in vindication of this great principle, against the absorbing power of Congress, what authority is produced? Not one clear, direct, or unequivocal authority in the whole range of American statesmanship or history can be found to the contrary. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] with the aid of his great legal and general learning, can sustain his position by nothing better than the following from 3 Elliot's Debates, page 344, which is attributed to Mr. Madison:

"With respect to the other point it was thought that the regulation of the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent. Some States might regulate the elections on principles of equality and others might regulate them otherwise. This diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some States, particularly in South Carolina, with respect to Charleston, which has a representation of thirty members. Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government. It was found impossible to fix the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives in the Constitution. It was found necessary to leave the regulation of this, in the first place, to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. And considering the State government and General Government as distinct bodies, acting in different and independent capacities for the people, it was thought the particular regulations should be submitted to the former and the general regulations to the latter. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures the congressional control will very probably never be exercised. The power appears to me satisfactory and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution."

This language is said to have been used by Mr. Madison, in the Virginia convention of 1788 for the ratification of the Constitution of the United States, at a time when the provision in question was under consideration in that body.

But let it be remembered that this extract is not the language of Mr. Madison, was not reported by him, and has never had his approval. It is merely an attempt by some one to give the substance of what he said on the occasion referred to. It was not taken down by an official reporter. In the language of Mr. Elliott himself, "it was collected and revised from contemporaneous publications," long years after it was spoken, perhaps from some loose newspaper report made at the time, and was published, I believe, in 1827. It bears intrinsic evidence of inexactness and want of authenticity. It makes Mr. Madison, whose ideas when expressed by himself are always in words most carefully and fitly chosen, say that "it was thought that the regulation of the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent." Every expression in it is consistent with the prevailing idea through all the proceedings of the convention, that Congress should have no power to fix qualifications of voters in the States, either for State officers or for Representatives in Congress. It might regulate the mode of holding the elections for Representatives, so as to prevent a failure of representation. As to this mode of holding elections, as Mr. Madison said, some States might regulate it on principles of equality, and others, by various regulations as to the times and places where the elections should be held, might make them affect unequally the people of certain sections of a State, and be therefore unjust. But Congress, having no motive to so regulate these times and places as to make them bear unequally on different sections in a State, could properly be intrusted with their control as to congressional elections. But with all its manifest looseness and inexactness of form, every sentence in this extract is readily reconcilable with the more deliberate and self-written judgments of Mr. Madison and all the other fathers and sages to whom I have referred. I unhesitatingly affirm, therefore, that it wholly fails to justify in any degree the structure erected upon it by the honorable gentleman. On the contrary, taken in connection with all I have shown, it stamps the whole theory of the honorable gentleman as most dangerous and revolutionary.

* This extract was attributed to James Madison, under date of June 14, 1788, in the Virginia convention.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts, with great emphasis, refers to certain general expressions in the writings of Madison, Hamilton, and others, to the effect, using the words of Hamilton when referring to this very provision, that "its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition: that every Government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation." Upon the authority of this and like expressions he attempts to array the fathers in support of this revolutionary bill. The attempt, in my judgment, involves a most unfair if not intentional perversion of the sentiments of those great men. This wicked perversion is made impressively manifest by placing in juxtaposition the more specific declarations of opinion by the same great statesmen, Mr. Hamilton, on this subject in the same and succeeding numbers of the Federalist. He says:

"Suppose an article had been introduced into the Constitution empowering the United States to regulate the elections for the particular States, would any man have hesitated to condemn it, both as an unwarrantable transposition of power and as a premeditated engine for the destruction of the State governments?"—No. 58.

And in the next number, written on the same subject, in replying to the enemies of the Constitution, who had alleged against it that Congress might so regulate elections as to favor or prefer the rich over the poor, he says:

"The truth is, there is no method of securing to the rich the preference apprehended but by prescribing qualifications of property either for those who may elect or be elected. But this forms no part of the power to be conferred upon the national Government. Its authority would be expressly restricted to the regulation of the times, the places, and the manner of elections. The qualifications of the persons who may choose or be chosen, as has been remarked upon another occasion, are defined and fixed in the Constitution, and are unalterable by the Legislature" [of the Union.]

Could language be more explicit and unambiguous? What becomes of the gentleman's repeated declaration that the friends of the adoption of the Constitution had never denied the construction placed upon the provision referred to by its enemies? The truth is, Mr. Speaker, it was always denied by them. It was strained and exaggerated by the opponents of the Constitution, in order to alarm the people and defeat its ratification, and it is now entitled to no consideration whatever.

Then, what do those expressions mean? They manifestly and only mean that the States might fail to provide for elections at all, or might so organize the States into districts and election precincts as to defeat the will of the majority and give excessive and unfair representation to minorities in this House, precisely what the Radical party have been doing to an unprecedented and most disgraceful extent in all the States of the Union in which they have had political control for the last few years. The friends of the adoption of the Constitution favored and defended this power of regulation of the times, places, and manner of holding elections for members of Congress, on the ground that Congress, in order to secure equal representation of the people in this House, might enact such regulations on these subjects as to prevent the perpetration of just such political frauds, the great fraud of "gerrymandering," and like devices of unscrupulous partisans.

But it is also urged that there are citizens of the United States in Kentucky and Maryland and other States (negroes) who might become President of the United States and yet cannot vote. The only requisites for eligibility to the Presidency are citizenship of the United States, age, and residence. Sex is no disqualification in terms. It is, therefore, equally true that there are in Massachusetts and the other States millions of white women, and in Rhode Island and under the infamous laws of Missouri and in other States thousands of white men, all equally citizens of the United States, who are eligible, upon the theory of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to the Presidency, and yet cannot vote. But these facts give Congress no new power, and do not change the Constitution.

And if the theory of the gentleman is tenable that citizenship of the United States confers the right of suffrage, then every ex-rebel in the South is wrongfully denied that right, and in violation of the Constitution, because they are all citizens under the express and most explicit language of the fourteenth amendment, and any one of them having the required age and period of residence may be elected President, and especially if he is not embraced in the disqualification to hold office contained in the third section of that amendment, and yet he cannot vote. Again, if citizenship alone entitles to suffrage, and Congress has power to secure it to all, then every disfranchised man in Missouri, West Virginia, Tennessee, and the other States of the South, is entitled to it and Congress ought to enable them to enjoy it, for they are all citizens of the United States, and cannot vote. Again, on the same theory the vilest criminal behind prison bars in the country is entitled to vote, because he is a citizen of the United States, and if he have the prescribed age and residence might be elected President, but yet he cannot vote. There is no power on earth that can decitizenize a citizen of the United States except himself, by voluntary expatriation. It cannot be done as a punishment for crime. The vilest criminal is entitled, by reason of his citizenship, to demand the protection of the law to a certain extent.

But, another of the startling propositions announced by the gentleman from Massachusetts and embodied in this bill asserts that there are now in this Union no States whose governments are republican in form, and that it has therefore become now the duty of the United States "to guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," and that in the execution of this guarantee Congress has power to form, dictate to, and force upon the States such local constitutions as in its own discretion, tempered judgment, or partisan will shall meet this guarantee. The mere statement of this proposition makes its revolting and despotic character alarmingly apparent.

This provision supplies no justification whatever for the monstrous policy of these measures. It gives Congress no shadow of right to dictate constitutions to States of this Union. Every contemporaneous interpretation of it is utterly inconsistent with any such idea. Our forefathers never tolerated by any act of theirs any such invasion by Congress of the primary and inalienable right of self-government in the people. In its true intent and spirit this provision is rather designed to prohibit just such changes in the local governments as the pending measures contemplate. Hamilton says, "this guarantee could only operate against changes to be effected by violence," and that it is "as much directed against the usurpation of rulers as against the ferments and outrages of faction and sedition in the community." Mr. Madison says:

"The authority extends no further than to a guarantee of a republican form of government which supposes a preexisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States they are guaranteed by the Federal Government. Whenever the State may choose to substitute other republican forms they have a right to do so, and to claim the Federal guarantee for the latter."

In these views Judge Story fully concurs.

If this power exists then our Government (Federal) is a perfected despotism, and Congress is our dictator and despot. If Congress can declare certain State regulations now existing to be anti-republican, and compel the acceptance by the States of such substitutes as it may dictate on the subject of suffrage, it may to-morrow adjudge the latter or others to be anti-republican, and prescribe new organic laws to the States; and if the judgment of Congress is the only test of republican institutions they are liable to change in all the States as often as from any cause that judgment changes; and they would be subject to most material alterations as often as the ascendancy of political parties in Congress changes. These changes in any case, on this theory, can only be limited by the varying will of Congress. They may, therefore, embrace in their operation all the laws of descent, of contracts, of marriage, of trial and punishment for crime, and for choosing judges or organizing a judiciary, and almost all others in any State. Thus the boasted and cherished right of local self-government in this country becomes a myth, a delusion, and a cruel fraud; a fraud, because no State foreseeing such a result would ever have become a party to such a union or would ever have consented thus to commit State suicide. In the language of Mr. Hamilton, any such proposition would have been regarded by every one "as a premeditated engine for the destruction of the State governments."

The second section of the fourteenth amendment, in the most direct and conclusive terms, recognizes and reaffirms the original and undelimited right of the States to control the suffrage. It would have been a signal and unprecedented act of stultification for any Congress to propose or any people to ratify such a section, if, at the same time, they claimed or believed the supreme power to regulate suffrage to be in Congress. It involves the absurdity of a solemn constitutional declaration that if the States enact a void law on the subject of suffrage the representation of their people in Congress shall be reduced, although Congress can instantly supply a perfect remedy, and totally annul the State law and give suffrage, in fact, to whom it pleases. Such a construction appears to me to be weak, foolish, and offensive to the just dignity of all legislation, and especially to the solemnity of any constitutional enactment. You would deny representation, a right of the utmost intrinsic value, to the very classes whom the States should vainly attempt but wholly fail to deprive of suffrage.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts has discovered that this denial of representation was intended to be "a mere political penalty for doing what the first section declares shall not be done." A penalty against whom? How is it to be enforced? A State withholds suffrage from its citizens of African descent; Congress then at once interposes and confers that suffrage. It is then in fact enjoyed by those citizens. Can Congress then reduce such a State's representation in this House? Certainly not. Must Congress, then, stand by and permit the wrongs, against which it might afford instant remedy, to be done and suffered in order to enable it to inflict the penalty? Did the people intend such absurdities in the enactment of this section? No, Mr. Speaker, they merely recognized an existing right and power in the respective States, and then presented to them increased representation as an inducement to increased liberality in the regulation of suffrage. That is all. That is consistent with the rights of the States and with just and rational interpretation. It is consistent with the solemn declaration of the Republican party in the Chicago convention, that "the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States." It is also consistent with the ten thousand times repeated declarations of that party and of all its leading men and organs to the same effect. This construction is necessary now to protect them against the charge and guilt of insincerity and false professions in the past, and a wicked and premeditated purpose thereby to deceive the people, and upon false pretenses to secure and retain political power in the country. If they were honest in the past, the present movement involves a very miraculous conversion or the most disgraceful infidelity to solemn pledges and declarations of principles. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that the proposed new amendment which accompanies this bill is justly subject to the same charge of bad faith, and therefore, as well as for its inherent viciousness, ought not to be proposed to the States.

Over a year ago a bill almost identical in legal effect and nearly so in terms was introduced in this House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] and discussed by him, and briefly by myself. I then (March 18, 1868) thought it my duty, together with other views, to say:

"Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who last addressed the House on this bill [Mr. KELLEY] assumes that it is not now a partisan question whether suffrage should be extended to all the States of this Union by act of Congress. I believe myself it is not. From what we have heard here to-day I am prepared to agree with him that it is not now a party question on that side of the House whether this bill shall pass or not. But I infer from what he said, and I believe it to be true, that the moment the majority of this House feel that they have the power to enact a bill of this kind they will do it just as certainly as that God lives. It is to-day the settled purpose of the party to introduce and pass a bill of this kind just as soon as possible."

I see no reason now, Mr. Speaker, to change this opinion. On the contrary, it gathers daily confirmation from passing events. It may be that this bill did not have its origin in partisan motives, but I think very few candid observers will attribute it to any other or higher origin. The maintenance of power by the Republican party seems to be the chief aim of this bill.

The fourth section of the bill purports to be designed to enforce the third section of the fourteenth amendment, which disqualifies certain persons to hold office, and it declares that any person who takes office contrary to that section shall be held guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be imprisoned at hard labor for two years. This penal section in the gentleman's bill inspires in my mind emotions of disgust and horror. It carries my mind back to ages of barbarism, and recalls the truculent and merciless persecutions, proscriptions, and punishments inflicted by successful chiefs upon their subjugated enemies. It is unworthy of this age, and would be an eternal shame to our country. Better instantly remove all disabilities from every ex-rebel in the country. Practice mercy, not vengeance. Do justice without this indiscriminate cruelty. If you will not do these things, then at least leave the third section of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution to execute itself by the sufficient aid of the Federal judiciary. It needs no more. Common humanity and decent justice forbid that you shall refuse this much.

PUBLIC REVENUES.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, the public revenues constitute an important branch of the financial system of our Government, and hence, while discussing the finances, and the means deemed necessary to improve their condition, I trust it will not be regarded as inappropriate in me to turn aside for a brief period and consider some of the measures to which we are accustomed to resort to raise revenue.

Being a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, which has that subject especially in charge, I feel it my duty to submit some observations at this time on the tariff, from which a large portion of our revenues are derived, and touching some amendments which have been proposed to the existing tariff laws. I am the more inclined to regard this as my duty, because I am unable to agree with the committee in some of the recommendations which it has made to the House in regard to these proposed amendments, and because of my evident disagreement with a majority of that committee on the general policy which Congress ought to pursue in levying duties on imports into the United States. In what I have to say on this occasion, I shall endeavor briefly to consider the power which Congress possesses over the general subject of taxation, and then to indicate some of the rules which, in my judgment, ought to be observed in the exercise of such powers as may be conceded to Congress in the imposition of these duties.

When, sir, the war of the Revolution had closed and the independence of the American colonies was fully established, one of the first great cares of the eminent statesmen of that day was to provide some more efficient system of revenue for the reduction of the then existing and comparatively very large public debt, and to secure the means necessary to carry on successfully the new Government. Experience had already shown that the Articles of Confederation were insufficient for that purpose, and one of the strongest reasons for abandoning the Confederation under those articles and adopting in their stead the present Constitution of the United States was the urgent, and, indeed, imperative necessity for some new system of revenue. Instead, then, of each State having in its own way to raise its proportionate amount of the revenue demanded by the Congress, as under the Confederation, it was provided in the Constitution which brought the new Government into existence (art. 1, sec. 8) that—

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

Looking, then, sir, to the contemporaneous history of this provision of the Constitution, why was the Congress authorized "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises?" Simply, I affirm, as a means of raising revenue to carry on and uphold the credit of the Government, and for no other purpose. Alexander Hamilton, whose great talents and commanding influence contributed so much to the adoption of the Constitution, in a series of articles which he contributed to the Federalist, in favor of this provision conferring upon Congress such plenary power of taxation, never intimated that anything aside from raising revenue was for a moment contemplated by it. I refer to this circumstance because his great name has since been invoked, and oftentimes successfully, in favor of a different construction of the power thus conferred on Congress. To me, sir, it is perfectly plain that the legitimate and only legitimate purpose of all taxation is the production of revenue. That any other construction should ever have been insisted on under our Constitution and our form of government is to me most remarkable. "Duties," "imposts," and "excises," each but represent a form of taxation, and are embraced within the general definition of taxes. The words "taxes," "duties," "imposts," and "excises" have plain and well-defined meanings in the English language, and those meanings, I am quite assured, clearly vindicate the construction I have given to the taxing power thus conferred upon this Government.

Mr. Hamilton, in arguing this question of revenue under the Constitution, in the columns of the Federalist, insisted that a large portion of the means of the Government would, in the very nature of things, be raised by duties on imports, because taxes collected in this way were indirect and less perceptible than any other, and because it would be to the interest, as it would be clearly in accordance with the genius of this great country, to build up extended commercial relations with the other nations of the world, and to thus bring a great mass and variety of property within the range of impost duties. In speaking of the advantages to the Union on commerce and its tendency to promote the interests of revenue, he says:

"A prosperous commerce is now perceived and acknowledged by all enlightened statesmen to be the most useful as well as the most productive source of national wealth, and has accordingly become a primary object of their political cares. By multiplying the means of gratification; by promoting the introduction and circulation of the precious metals, those darling objects of human avarice and enterprise, it serves to vivify and invigorate all the channels of industry, and to make them flow with greater activity and copiousness. The assiduous merchant, the laborious husbandman, the active mechanic and the industrious manufacturer—all orders of men, look forward with eager expectation and growing alacrity to this pleasing reward of their toils. The often agitated question between agriculture and commerce has, from indubitable experience, received a decision which has silenced the rivalships that once subsisted between them, and has proved, to the entire satisfaction of their friends, that their interests are intimately blended and interwoven. It has been found in various countries that in proportion as commerce has flourished land has risen in value. And how could it have happened otherwise? Could that which procures a freer vent for the products of the earth, which furnishes new incitements to the cultivators of land, which is the most powerful instrument in increasing the quantity of money in a State—could that, in fine, which is the faithful handmaid of labor and industry in every shape fail to augment the value of that article which is the prolific parent of far the greatest part of the objects upon which they are exerted? It is astonishing that so simple a truth should ever have had an adversary; and it is one among a multitude of proofs how apt a spirit of ill-informed jealousy or of too great abstraction and refinement is to lead men astray from the plainest paths of reason and conviction."

Mr. Hamilton, at the time he penned this beautiful tribute to the beneficent influence of commerce on the growth and prosperity of a nation could not certainly have had it in his mind that under the pretext of imposing taxes, ostensibly for revenue, unlimited restrictions and burdens might be imposed on this commerce. Much less that under this pretext all foreign commerce might be practically swept down and destroyed. Further on, however, in arguing to show that the Government ought not to be restricted to duties on imports alone, Mr. Hamilton says:

"Exorbitant duties on imported articles serve to beget a general spirit of smuggling; which is always prejudicial to the fair trader, and eventually to the revenue itself; they tend to render other classes of the community tributary, in an improper degree, to the manufacturing classes, to whom they give a premature monopoly of the markets. They sometimes force industry out of its most natural channels into others in which it flows with less advantages."—Federalist, No. 35.

It would be hard to give a better description of the evils of excessive duties on imports in the same number of words; and on this occasion, as on all others known to me, when arguing from a financial stand-point in favor of accepting the Constitution in lieu of the Articles of Confederation, he seemed to speak in the interests of revenue alone.

I concede, Mr. Speaker, that after the Constitution was adopted and the new Government fully inaugurated under it Mr. Hamilton became the advocate of a protective system of duties on imports—a system by which duties are imposed on certain commodities, not with a view to the revenue which may be derived from them, but expressly for the purpose of raising the price of these commodities, that the American manufacturer of them may have his profits thereby increased. In this he was governed, doubtless solely, by a conviction that such a system was demanded by the undeveloped condition of the manufacturing interests of the country, and that the highest considerations of expediency justified such a policy. Once convinced of its expediency under a most liberal and indeed latitudinarian construction of the Constitution, which he was among the first, if not the very first, to adopt, he seemed to have had no difficulty in bringing himself and his numerous friends and special admirers everywhere to the conclusion that Congress might assess taxes, not for revenue merely, but for the sole purpose of fostering, protecting, and building up home manufactures.

Mr. Hamilton is regarded, and justly so I concede, as the father of this protective system of tariff duties which has either held sway or high carnival so long in American politics; and having been the first Secretary of the Treasury under the Government, and having left the impress of his genius so strongly marked on our financial affairs in very many other respects, all serve as my apology for referring to him so frequently as I do to-day. After having given, however, the most careful attention to what he has said and written on the power and duties of the Government in regard to taxation, I have come to the conclusion—ay, indeed, arrived at the conviction—that this idea of assessing taxes for protection and not for revenue was an after-thought, and formed no part of the purposes for which our Constitution was really constructed. Neither in letter or in spirit could I ever regard such a practice as in harmony with that instrument.

Protection by the agency of a tariff means simply when practically considered, as I have already intimated, the imposition of duties beyond the demands of the revenues by which the price of similar articles in the hands of the home manufacturer is increased at the expense of the consumer without any corresponding benefit to him, by which money is voted out of the pockets of one man into the coffers of another without any adequate consideration. It is a bonus to the manufacturer simply the better to enable him to carry on his business and to increase his profits; a bonus granted to him at the expense of every consumer of his commodities; a bonus for the enrichment of the few at the expense of the many. The Government has the right to take from me, under a fair system of taxation, whatever proportion of my means it needs for the purposes of revenue, but has no right, either in justice or in morals, to take from me a portion of my property or my hard earnings and to transfer it to the pockets of my neighbor merely to enrich him or to assist and promote him in his business pursuits.

In treating upon this subject, in connection with the regulation of commerce, Mr. Herbert Spencer, in his Social Statics, says:

"Of bounties must here be said especially what was said in the last chapter of factitious advantages generally; namely, that a Government cannot give them without indirectly reversing its function. Not being requisite for the due maintenance of the citizen's rights, the taking away of his property for the purpose of encouraging certain branches of production would be wrong, even were collateral benefit given in exchange; and as, instead of affording him collateral benefits, the commercial derangements consequent upon it put additional limits to the exercise of his faculties, such a measure is doubly wrong."

Sir, disguise, palliate, or apologize for it as we may, this system of protection when carried to its ulterior results is but a form of legalized robbery. It is one of those chronic errors transplanted if not inherited from the now tottering systems of European politics which must sooner or later yield to the enlightening influences of more liberal and less selfish views of public affairs. In this country it is emphatically a plant of foreign origin, cultivated and kept alive by the hot-house of legislation and other artificial contrivances. It is a relic of that class legislation which has been so long the curse and scourge of mankind. I concede very frankly that many of the greatest and most patriotic of our public men in this country have at some time in their lives, and to a greater or lesser extent, advocated protection to home industry, as it is usually termed, by means of tariff duties. Mr. Clay spoke often and eloquently in favor of what was in his day termed the American system, which favored a moderate scale of protective duties on foreign goods, but he did not advocate this system as the permanent policy of the Government, but only as a temporary measure to operate during the infancy of our manufactures.

But, sir, the time has past when the arguments so nicely drawn and so plausibly stated, as they were by Mr. Clay even, have any applicability. The plea of infancy can no longer avail the capital interested in manufacturing in this country. The manufacturing interest—I mean more particularly that portion of it which is represented by accumulated capital—is now a full-grown interest. It is now a master and controlling interest in all our public affairs. In some localities, at least, it can dictate terms to and overshadow all other interests. It can make and unmake public men. It is able to keep its committees and paid agents here at the capital to urge its claim to perpetual consideration, often in numbers and sufficient force to obstruct in no small degree the ingress and egress of Senators and Representatives to and from their respective Halls of legislation. Under a stable and well-adjusted system of finances and a just and equal measure of taxation it is able to compete with similar enterprises everywhere within its own markets.

If it ever did exist, Mr. Speaker, when the manufacturing interests of this country could properly solicit the special protection and peculiar favor of Congress, that time has now gone by and ought never to be recalled. These interests ought now to be content with equal and just laws. If with these they cannot prosper, then let the capital employed in them seek other investments. Opportunities for such other investments are everywhere offered and promise the most liberal returns. I take great pleasure in stating that a large proportion of the enterprising men of this country who are interested in American manufactures ask no special favors from the Government. They only desire equal and just laws fairly administered. To this much they are entitled in common with all other American citizens, in whatever pursuit they are engaged. If with this our manufactures can increase and multiply no one will be more delighted than I will be. If with this they fail it is no fault of Congress or of the Government. It will be from some inherent difficulty in the business itself or from a want of skillful management of its affairs.

It is the right of every free man to buy his goods in the cheapest market and to sell his commodities for the best price he can obtain. This right, however, he holds in subordination to the right of his Government to regulate the interchange of commodities between his and other nations. Whatever regulations are made by his Government, nevertheless in derogation of his right, ought to be for the benefit of all its citizens collectively, and not for a class of them only. He holds this right, too, in subordination to the power of his Government to lay "taxes, duties, imports, and excises" for the purposes of revenue on such commodities as may be produced within or imported into it. Subject, however, to these demands of his Government, the free citizen is entitled to a free interchange of his commodities everywhere within the shadow of the flag that protects him. This free interchange of commodities, subject only to the real necessities of the Government, constitutes legitimate free trade. In this sense I am a free trader now and always. In this sense I believe that a large majority of the American people now are and henceforth will be in favor of free trade. Richard Cobden says:

"Free trade is the international common law of the Almighty."

I accept his definition and denounce all unequal and unnecessary shackles on commerce as a violation of this great "common law."

Adam Smith, in his "Wealth of Nations," lays down four maxims by which nations ought to be governed in the assessment and collection of taxes. His first maxim is comprised in the following words:

"The subjects of every State ought to contribute to the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue which they respectively enjoy under the protection of the State. In the observation or neglect of this maxim consists what is called the equality or inequality of taxation."—Book 5, chap. 2.

In his fourth maxim he says:

"Every tax ought to be so contrived as both to take out and to keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what it brings into the public treasury of the State."

These views have been generally concurred in by subsequent writers, and may be said to have become classical. In terse phrases they, in my judgment, shadow forth the true theory of taxation, and are just as applicable to duties on imports as any other form of raising revenue.

I do not pretend, Mr. Speaker, that a uniform or pro rata tax on every commodity or upon every species of property is either practicable or desirable in any system of taxation. Some kinds of property will bear taxation more readily than other kinds will. Some kinds of property, in the very nature of things, are more productive than other property. Taxes, too, as a general rule, ought to bear more lightly on the necessary articles for living than on the luxuries of life. What I do contend for is that taxation in every form should be so adjusted as to demand from each citizen, as nearly as practicable, an equality of sacrifice in submitting to its burdens and inconveniences. To accomplish this is often a delicate and sometimes perhaps an impossible task, but as a rule of taxation I know of nothing better or of anything more reasonable.

The idea that some sort of equality ought to be observed in levying taxes seems to have been in the minds of the eminent men who framed our Constitution. The provision in regard to taxation, which I have quoted, has annexed to it the very important limitation or restriction, "but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." This obligation of uniformity of burdens suggests at once impartiality in imposing them, and in this connection equality of sacrifice is the highest type of impartiality.

And now, Mr. Speaker, let us for a few moments consider the present exigencies of the Government with regard to its revenues. Never did any successful or legitimate Government have greater cause for anxiety on that subject than we have at the present time. Our public debt on the 1st January, 1869, is computed at $2,540,707,201 25, being an increase of our indebtedness of $32,581,551 15 during the last year. In addition to this we have a very considerable floating and unadjusted debt impending over us, the extent of which we cannot now well compute, but a portion of which will in some form or other, I have no doubt, be eventually recognized by the Government. Mr. DELANO, then chairman of the Committee of Claims during the last Congress, estimated this floating debt at many hundred millions of dollars. It is then, sir, absolutely staggering and bewildering when we are brought to realize the weight and magnitude of this immense debt. In my judgment there is no other public question which really does afford, or at least ought to afford, so much cause of solicitude. It is true, sir, that many of the States of the Union are devastated and paralyzed and are sadly in need of reinvigorated governments and of wholesome laws. It is true, sir, also, that the iron heel of military power rests on the necks of the people of some of the States, displacing practically all civil government and defying, as it seems to me, the plainest principles of constitutional liberty. It is equally true, sir, that we have not now that Union of the States in harmony with the Constitution which was bequeathed to us by the heroic men who constructed our Government. But the indomitable energy of our people, assisted by wise legislation and the healing influences of time can, and I trust will, at no distant day remove these obstacles and repair these wrongs. Our public debt, however, cannot be so easily disposed of. Like an incubus upon the breast, like a mountain in the pathway, like a pall over the canopy of the heavens, it will remain to depress, to obstruct, and to darken our progress for many long and weary years. The amount of money involved in it is not the only object of solicitude to me. To meet it as those who contracted it say it must be met, we have greatly to advance upon our original and simple form of administering our Government. Immense annual sums of money must be assessed and collected. A corps of revenue officers, equal in number to a respectable army in time of peace, must be constantly employed and supported by the Government. Spies and informers will swarm over the land like the locusts of Egypt, assisting to eat out the substance of the people. To collect the amount of taxes absolutely demanded harsh and unusual laws must be enacted. To evade high taxes and these harsh laws for their collection has become, and I fear will continue to be, the daily vocation of men in whose integrity society has been accustomed to confide. To make these evasions safe and profitable at least an occasional public officer must be corrupted and his connivance and assistance secured. Evaders of heavy and burdensome taxes can afford often to pay high premiums for such connivance and assistance. Through this ordeal of temptation all will not go unscathed. I would like to believe otherwise, but it is useless to attempt to deceive ourselves in so grave a matter as this. On this subject we have had already some mortifying experiences. When the officer and citizen thus conspire to defraud the Government the work for the time at least goes merrily on. To repress these evasions new and more stringent laws will from time to time be enacted, and in the conflict the rights of the honest citizen is lost sight of and his highest interests very often disregarded. Our form of government is illy adapted, I fear, to the exercise of so much concentrated and arbitrary power as is necessary for the enforcement of such a system as I have attempted to describe. To make it efficient new ideas have to be inculcated in the minds of our people, and with these new ideas may come a change in the nature of the Government itself. The Secretary of the Treasury in his late report to Congress has well said that—

"The ability of the United States to maintain their integrity against insurrection as well as against a foreign enemy can no longer be doubted. The question of their ability, under democratic institutions, to sustain a large national debt is still to be decided."

I have faith to believe that we will triumph in this new ordeal to which the Secretary alludes; but, sir, it is not the part of wisdom to rest too securely in such a crisis. I confess I cannot contemplate the situation without some apprehensions and many anxieties.

If, then, our public debt is justly a cause of so much solicitude what ought to be our policy in regard to it? I answer unhesitatingly, Mr. Speaker, let us reduce it and get rid of it as speedily as possible. This we did with the debt of the revolutionary war, and all of it recognized by the Government has long since been paid.

Our policy has never been to fund our indebtedness and to make it perpetual. This has been a favorite policy with other nations, but not with us. It is not in accordance with the genius of our people. A perpetual public debt is but an indefinite mortgage on the wealth, muscle, and productive energies of the nation that owes it, and that savors too much of servitude to meet with much favor in the American mind. To meet our present indebtedness, then, we need large revenues and an overflowing Treasury. In any system of taxation, therefore, to which we may resort revenue ought to be the first and paramount consideration. How often have we been reminded within the last few years that everything must yield to the exigencies of the Government? That obligation never rested more heavily upon us than it now does in regard to our financial affairs. The special interests of classes and individuals merely ought to yield at once and unconditionally to the general good of the whole. May we not without severity be permitted to doubt the patriotism, if not the loyalty, of any man who, in the present emergency, insists on special protection and lucrative immunities to his business at the expense of the public revenues of the country? Whatever may be his intentions, Mr. Speaker, his conduct is indefensible in the interests of patriotism.

In view, then, sir, of the considerations which I have presented, it does seem to me that there ought to be no practical difficulty, at all events, in determining the present duty of Congress while laying duties on imports. All taxes on foreign articles which are at the same time manufactured in this country, whether so intended or not, operate to a greater or less extent as a measure of protection to the home manufacturers of those articles. Duties, then, imposed primarily in the interests of revenue on this class of articles afford what is known as incidental protection to the American manufacturer. The high rates of duty which the demands of the Treasury now make necessary will afford incidentally an amount of protection with which any reasonable manufacturer ought to be satisfied.

In this connection I beg leave to quote further from the late report of the Secretary of the Treasury. In speaking of the tariff he says:

"There will be in the future, as there have been in the past, widely different opinions upon this long-vested and very important subject; but the indications are decided that the more enlightened sentiment of the country demands that the tariff shall hereafter be a tariff for revenue and not for protection, and that the revenues to be derived from it shall be no larger than, in connection with those received from other sources, will be required for the economical administration of the Government, the maintenance of the public faith, and the gradual extinguishment of the public debt. While the country is not at present, and may not be for many years to come, prepared for the abrogation of all restrictions upon foreign commerce, it is unquestionably prepared for a revenue tariff. The public debt is an incumbrance upon the property of the nation, and the taxes, the necessity for which it creates, by whatever mode and from whatever sources collected, are at last a charge upon the consumers. Taxes should not, therefore, be increased, nor will the taxpayers permit them to be permanently increased, for the benefit of any interest or section. Fortunately, or unfortunately, as the question may be regarded from different stand-points, the necessities of the Government will be such for many years, that large revenues must be derived from customs, so that a strictly revenue tariff must incidentally benefit our home manufactures."

This is a very concise statement of the question as now presented to us, and I very cordially concur with the views thus expressed by the Secretary. According to the estimates of the Secretary $300,000,000 annually will be required for at least many years to come to carry on the Government, to maintain the national credit, and for the gradual extinguishment of the public debt.

In the name of heaven, Mr. Speaker, will not that afford taxation enough? Or must we go beyond that and levy additional burdens for the benefit of a comparatively small class of men only and the advancement of certain local and sectional interests? The bare suggestion of such a policy carries with it an exposure of its enormity.

In referring to the present tariff system the Secretary further says:

"It is obvious that a revision of it is required not only to relieve it of incongruities and obscurity and to harmonize it with excise taxes and with our agricultural and commercial interests, but also to adapt it to the very decided change which must take place in the business of the country upon the restoration of the specie standard. Large revenues are now derived from customs, because a redundant currency produces extravagance, which stimulates importations. If the currency were convertible and business were regular and healthy, the tariff would be severely protective, if not in many instances prohibitory. Indeed, of some valuable articles it is prohibitory already."

Mr. David A. Wells, Special Commissioner of Revenue, in referring to some of the peculiarities of the present tariff rates in his recent very able and interesting report to the Secretary of the Treasury, says:

"Another characteristic feature of the existing tariff is that it attempts indiscriminate or universal protection, an idea which, if fully carried out, would render all protection a nullity; and to the extent to which it is carried out does more for foreign, as compared with domestic industry, than almost any other agency."

Again, he says:

"The rate of duty imposed by the existing tariff on the invoice value in gold of the dutiable goods imported into the United States has averaged for the last three fiscal years about forty-eight per cent. If to these rates freights, insurance, and commissions, which in themselves constitute a natural and unavoidable tariff, be added, the average of duties will be still further increased to the extent of from ten to fifteen per cent."

Again, in speaking of some of the prohibitory features of existing rates, he says:

"Some forms of bar-iron, and of liquors, cigars, oats, butter, potatoes, cattle on the hoof, and fine wools, are examples of articles on which duties are imposed under the present tariff, sufficient wholly or in a great degree to check importations."

Again, he says the present is—

"A tariff based upon small issues rather than upon any great national principle; a tariff which is unjust and unequal, which needlessly enhances prices, which takes far more indirectly from the people than is received into the Treasury, which renders an exchange of domestic for foreign commodities nearly impossible, which necessitates the continual exportation of obligations of national indebtedness and of the precious metals, and which, while professing to protect American industry, really in many cases discriminates against it."

He adduces many facts to sustain these conclusions, but I have only time to refer to a very few of them. Take, for instance, the article of salt. In 1841 it came in free of duty; in 1842 a duty of eight cents per pound in bulk was imposed; in 1846 this was changed to twenty per cent. ad valorem, or about two cents per bushel; in 1857 it was reduced to fifteen per cent., or about one cent and a half per bushel; in March, 1861, it was increased to four cents per bushel; in August, 1861, to twelve cents, and in July, 1862, to eighteen cents per one hundred pounds. As salt ranges from fifty-six to eighty-five pounds to the bushel, this is equivalent to from one hundred to one hundred and seventy per cent. ad valorem, an average higher than any duty imposed on any other article so indispensable and of such general consumption. The duty on salt, then, is on an average more than the prime cost of the article, and consequently more than doubles the price of it in the hands of the consumer. It is therefore not only highly protective, but exorbitant. Its effect is, of course, to enable the home manufacturer of that commodity to sell it for much more than he could if competition were free.

This protection, I am assured, however, does not operate to the advantage of all the home manufacturers alike, but, owing to location and other adventitious circumstances, perhaps not foreseen or appreciated by Congress, results mainly to the benefit of the Onondaga Salt Company of the State of New York.

Then, again, take as another instance the article of pig-iron. The existing duty on it is now nine dollars per ton in gold, equivalent to twelve dollars in currency. The average expenditure necessary to produce a ton of pig-iron at the present time is estimated to range from twenty-four to twenty-six dollars. The selling price for the past year has ranged from thirty-seven to forty-two dollars. Scarcely any well-established business in the country affords such a margin for profits.

This results in a great degree from the protection this article receives from the imposition of this high duty upon it. Every rolling-mill and every other manufacturer of iron commodities is made tributary to this pig-iron interest. Every consumer of iron, from the mill-wheel to the plowshare, from the rail to the tenpinny nail, and from the boiler-plate to the grubbing-hoe, contributes to the profits the manufacturer of pig iron is thus enabled to realize.

Then, again, Mr. Speaker, take as another illustration the article of quinine. It now pays a duty of forty-five per cent. in gold, equal to about sixty per cent. in currency. This high rate of duty was imposed, as was alleged, because of a duty of twenty per cent. on cinchona bark, from which it is manufactured, and because of the then high tax on whisky, which is used in its manufacture. Quinine, however, is an article of almost universal consumption as a medicine. The poor and the unfortunate are perhaps much the largest consumers of it. This duty upon it, then, in my judgment, is an exorbitant and unreasonable one also, and ought to be greatly reduced, if not entirely repealed.

I will take as another illustration the article of steel. It is a commodity in daily and almost universal use by artisans, laborers, and mechanics of nearly every name and degree. Steel in ingots, bars, coils, sheets, and steel wire, when not valued at not over seven cents per pound, pay two and a quarter cents per pound; when valued at above seven cents, and not above eleven cents, three cents per pound; when valued at above eleven cents, three and a half cents per pound, and in addition thereto ten per cent. ad valorem, all payable in gold, as all duties on imports have to be paid. Penknives, jackknives, and pocket-knives pay a duty of fifty per cent. ad valorem. Other tools manufactured from steel pay a similarly high duty. All manufactures of steel, or of which steel shall be a component part, not otherwise provided for, are chargeable with a duty of forty-five per cent. ad valorem, equal to about sixty per cent. in currency. These duties on steel and steel commodities when analyzed and computed in currency, as they all have eventually to be when thrown upon the market, will be found, with possibly rare exceptions, to range extravagantly high and to operate as a peculiar burden on the laboring men of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we might well suppose that the manufacturers of salt, pig iron, quinine, and steel would be quite satisfied with the duties imposed on these articles and with the protection thus afforded; but I regret to have to say that such is not their condition. We have a bill now before us, and its consideration urged upon us, in which we are asked to increase the duty on salt to twenty-four cents on each one hundred pounds when in bulk and on all rock salt, and to thirty cents per one hundred pounds on salt in bags or sacks. We are not asked in this bill to levy additional duties directly on pig-iron, but we are requested by it to increase the tariff on other forms of iron by which that interest will be greatly promoted and its profits still increased. Neither is it proposed to directly increase the duty on quinine in the bill now before us, but the manufacture of that article has been already cheapened by a reduction of the tax on distilled spirits, which is, I believe, an indispensable agent in the process, and it is proposed in this bill to admit cinchona bark, from which it is extracted, free of duty, and thus to still further cheapen the manufacture of it. This reduction, then, of the cost of quinine in the hands of the manufacturer affords to him really additional protection in the manufacture of it, and benefits him as much as if correspondingly increased duties should be placed upon it.

We are also asked in this same bill to assess an additional duty of one cent and a half per pound on all kinds of steel, and on all machinery composed in whole or in part of steel fifty-five per cent. ad valorem, equal to about seventy-four per cent. in currency. Sir, I regard these demands as a bold experiment on the patience and credulity of the American people, and I trust their rejection will be so decided and emphatic as to preclude all idea of a renewal of them, in our day at least. I might present many other objections to the proposed amendments to the existing tariff laws; but, sir, my time is too short to allow me to do so to-day.

As another evidence of the severity of the present rates of duty on many leading articles of general consumption I shall ask the attention of the House to two or three other items, and I shall then dismiss that branch of the subject. Every pound of tea is taxed at twenty-five cents in gold; every pound of sugar at from three to five cents per pound, according to its quality; every pound of coffee at five cents—both also in gold. By adding about thirty-four per cent. we get the amounts in currency. These three articles yield an aggregate revenue to the Government of near fifty million dollars in gold. This is certainly a pretty severe tax upon mere articles of food, and which are now, next to bread, perhaps, ranked among the commonest necessities of life. We, then, who are not wedded to high tariffs and to high taxes of all kinds would feel inclined to think that in readjusting the present tariff rates some relief to the consumers of these most important commodities of tea, sugar, and coffee, which are consumed by the poor as well as the rich, would have been, at least, proposed; but such is not the case. When any material change is suggested it is rather to increase the rates, except in a few instances in which cheap raw material is needed by the manufacturer.

This demand for an increase of duty on certain manufactured articles comes with a peculiarly bad grace from the home manufacturers of those articles just at this time. Some years since, during the greatest exigencies of the late civil war, when internal taxes were resorted to by Congress, these manufacturers, with others perhaps, vehemently insisted that their proportion of these internal taxes would destroy their business unless increased duties were levied on foreign articles with which they had to compete, by which additional protection might be afforded them. These increased duties were promptly levied by Congress and this additional protection freely conceded. During the last session of this Congress these manufacturers appealed to us to be relieved of these internal taxes, alleging as a reason that as the exigencies of the Government were no longer so great the industrial interests of this class ought to be the first to be exempted. Congress again heeded their appeal, and less than a year since relieved the great mass of these manufacturers from internal taxation on their products.

Now, it does seem to me that as these increased duties on imports were to a very great extent levied in consequence of the imposition of these internal taxes, the plainest principles of justice and fairness would suggest a corresponding reduction of these duties when the internal taxation is removed, in consequence of which they were levied. As matters now stand this repeal of internal taxes operates simply as a bonus of five per cent. to these manufacturers. They ought, therefore, not only to consent to, but to propose a corresponding reduction of the tariff. But, sir, in the face of all this, they not only oppose any substantial reduction, but now most solemnly insist on another and still greater increase of these duties. Sir, the persistency and audacity of this proceeding is almost without a parallel in American legislation.

I agree, Mr. Speaker, that there ought to be some legislation on this subject; indeed, that there ought to be a thorough revision of our tariff laws; but I insist that this revision ought to be in the interests of agriculture and commerce as well as of manufactures. In this matter it is peculiarly appropriate that there shall be "equal and exact justice to all men; exclusive privileges to none." But above all, sir, this revision ought to be primarily in the interests of the public revenue for which alone taxes can be justly imposed. When the advocate of a protective tariff fails at every other point in his argument he usually takes refuge in the plea that it is labor he is really seeking to protect, and not the capitalist especially.

If I could be convinced, Mr. Speaker, that high duties, levied for the purpose of protection, inured chiefly, or indeed to any great extent, to the benefit of the laboring masses of the country, I would yield at once much of my opposition to that class of legislation. No gentleman on this floor, or elsewhere I trust, is more really desirous of promoting the true interests of labor at all times and everywhere than I am. It is a subject which has long commanded my most earnest attention. It is a subject on which I desire, above all others of a public nature, to be right. In the very nature of things those who labor with their hands—the hardy sons of toil—must always constitute much the largest portion of the human race. Whatever, then, affects the great mass of the people of any nation peculiarly concerns them. In attempting to do the greatest good to the greatest number, as every just legislator ought to desire to do, their interests demand our first and highest consideration. The very force of numbers, if nothing else, entitles them to that precedence.

But that is not all. Still higher considerations appeal to us. All wealth is the result of labor; without labor there is no development, no progress in the material world. There is no property in anything on which labor has not been expended. If the earth were to yield spontaneously her increase the labor of man would still be required to gather in her ripened fruits and to secure the harvest. The birds of the air, the beasts of the forest, the waters of the ocean, the vast area of land, the air of heaven, and the light of the sun are not wealth in the sense in which we speak of the wealth of a nation. They are the raw material out of which wealth may be produced. They are the common inheritance of all mankind and have been bestowed on all alike. It is what labor produces from these and appropriates to individual and national uses which we call wealth. It is labor that imparts to every commodity its value in the markets of the world. There can, then, be no wealth without it. Great, therefore, is the dignity and power of labor. Wise and just legislation will always exalt it. If, then, the proposed protective legislation will result favorably to the interests of labor, it is certainly a very strong argument in favor of such legislation.

Then, Mr. Speaker, do high tariffs and protective duties inure peculiarly to the benefit of the laboring men and women of this country? Clearly not, as I most earnestly believe. It is to their interest to have cheap food, cheap capital, cheap lands, and cheap homes; to have the necessities as well as a share of the luxuries of life within their reach. These they cannot have so long as high taxes constitute a large portion of the cost of the article and prices are thus inflated by them. Protective duties tend to concentrate wealth and population, whereas the true interests of the laboring man require that these shall be diffused and fairly distributed. Protective duties are always arranged with reference to the amount of money they will put into the pocket of the employer and the capitalist, and not with reference to the wages of the laborer.

Sir, when the friend of protection has occasion to refer to the interests of labor he seems unconscious of the fact that only a very small proportion of the laboring people in this country are engaged in manufacturing. He practically ignores the stalwart millions who are engaged in agriculture and commerce, who build railroads and dig canals, and who are mining the precious metals. These, constituting as they do the vast majority of our laboring population, desire no shackles on commerce and no unequal laws for their benefit. They want a just and humane Government, honestly and economically administered, with the ocean for a highway and the world for a market, and they will be content to take their chances in the great race of life. They demand no subsidies from other branches of industry for their aggrandisement, and they have a right to insist that none shall be levied of them except for the common good of all alike.

Mr. Speaker, there are many other serious, and, as I think, overwhelming, objections to the existing tariff laws as well as to other amendments to these laws proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means, but the brief time allotted to me will not permit me to refer to them to-day.

On motion of Mr. ELDRIDGE, (at ten o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Lewis T. Mann, of Alleghany county, Virginia, for removal of his political disabilities.

By Mr. CHURCHILL: The petition of D. W. Sims, for increased invalid pension, to date from June 6, 1866.

Also, the petition of B. F. Clarke and others, citizens of Cazenovia, New York, asking that the petition of D. W. Sims be granted.

By Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts: A memorial of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, in favor of the importation of ornamental trees, plants, shrubs, and seeds free of duty.

By Mr. JUDD: The petition of John Dittman and others, asking protection for dealers in lager beer.

By Mr. MOORE: The petition of S. K. Marshall, a citizen of Yorktown, Virginia, praying the protection of Congress from the illegal oyster tonnage tax law of Virginia.

Also, the petition of George H. White, of Baltimore, Maryland, with accompanying papers, praying for the intervention of Congress to protect all engaged in the oyster trade from illegal taxes by the authorities of Virginia.

Also, a petition from masters and owners of vessels of Tuckerton, New Jersey, praying the intervention of Congress to protect all engaged in navigation from illegal exactions by State and municipal corporations.

Also, the petition of Sidney P. Russell, of Accomack, Virginia, owner of schooner D. R. Wilson, with accompanying papers, praying the intervention of Congress for protection from the illegal taxes exacted by the authority of Virginia.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of Christian Sharps, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, for an extension of his patent for breech-loading firearms.

By Mr. PHELPS: The petition of Robert B. Goodyear, asking for an extension of his patent for improvement in power looms.

By Mr. VAN AERNAM: The petition of Lucetta Clements, for back pension.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 28, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, suggesting further legislation with regard to the erection of penitentiaries in the Territories of Nebraska, Washington, Colorado, Montana, Idaho, and Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, as provided in the treaty of the 7th of August, 1868, reports of the commissioners appointed to examine the claims of the Pottawatomie Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating information of the suffering condition of the Indians on the Upper Missouri river, and urging the necessity of an appropriation for their relief; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of Hon. John Scott, elected by the Legislature of Pennsylvania a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1869; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented two petitions, signed by citizens of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, praying that in any amendment which may be proposed to the Constitution of the United States there shall be no distinction between men and women; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of Charlotte Crane, of the town of Northfield, county of Richmond, and State of New York, widow of the late Colonel Ichabod B. Crane, asking a pension and setting forth special facts constituting the merits of the case. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING also presented the petition of the proprietors and inmates of Our Home, Danville, Livingston county, New York, praying that the women of the District of Columbia may not be debarred the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. POOL presented a petition of William Eley, of Virginia, praying to be relieved of disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POMEROY presented petitions of citizens of the State of New York, of the city of New York, of the State of Kansas, of the State of Connecticut, and of citizens of Watertown, Jefferson county, New York, praying that in any amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States there shall be no distinction made between men and women; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of R. F. Graves, of Powhatan county, Virginia, praying the removal of civil disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN presented the memorial of the Lake Shore Grape Growers' Association, praying the enactment of a law authorizing the granting of letters patent on new horticultural varieties; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

He also presented a petition of merchants of New York, in favor of an act of Congress legalizing the construction of the New York and Brooklyn bridge; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of wholesale grocers and merchants of Chicago, remonstrating against any increase of the duty on refined sugars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A few days ago I presented the memorial of the city council of Chicago, accompanied by a bill, asking for the passage of a law granting to the city the land under the waters of Lake Michigan for one league in front of the city in order to enlarge the harbor facilities of that city. I now present the memorial of Mahlon D. Ogden and others, property holders and men who have riparian rights upon the shores of Lake Michigan, remonstrating against the passage of any bill which shall interfere with the rights they have already acquired by purchase from the United States. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented the petition of naval officers at League Island, praying relief for Mrs. Jane Dean Bishop, widow of William S. Bishop, deceased, late a surgeon in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of the United States, praying for an appropriation for the Soldiers' Orphans' Home at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CAPTAIN CHARLES HUNTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Hunter, praying for pay from the 22d of June, 1863, to the 21st of June, 1866, to report a bill for his relief; and as this is a bill that will create no debate I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 844) for the relief of Captain Charles Hunter, of the United States Navy, was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Captain Charles Hunter, United States Navy, pay as commander in the Navy on leave from the 22d of June, 1863, to the 21st of June, 1866.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I presume there is a report accompanying this bill, or else there should be some explanation of it. I wish the Senator would let us understand it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will explain it in one moment. Captain Charles Hunter was in command of the United States steamer Montgomery in 1862. Cruising off the coast of Cuba he sighted a rebel steamer. He fired a blank shot, and the vessel showed very suspicious indications and endeavored to avoid him and ran toward the land. He endeavored to cut her off, but she got within neutral ground, within the marine league, before he could reach her. She then cast anchor. He sent his boats out to ascertain her character, and the crew fired the vessel and she was destroyed. She proved to be the steamer Blanche. She had also other names. She had been a very celebrated blockade runner, and was then, I think, upon her fifth successful voyage. The vessel was destroyed; but it was destroyed—although the act of her own crew—in neutral waters, and the Spanish Government complained against ours on that ground. For performing his duty too well Captain Hunter was tried by court-martial, and under the pressure of diplomatic necessity he was broken, but recommended by the court to executive clemency. The President and the Secretary of the Navy were disposed to restore him immediately. Admiral Farragut told me he ought to have been promoted for it. But in the then condition of the country it was not thought advisable or prudent to offend any foreign nation, and as Spain had made remonstrances on the subject the sentence was carried into execution. The Navy Department informed the State Department of its desire to restore Captain Hunter just so soon as it could be done with safety to our diplomatic relations. As soon as that period arrived Mr. Seward addressed a letter to Mr. Welles, stating that he had no further objection to the restoration of Captain Hunter; and he was immediately restored, nominated, and confirmed. This bill is to give him leave pay during the time that he was deprived of his commission for having performed his duty too well. The report is unanimously made by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 687) establishing a certain post road in the State of Connecticut, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 686) to establish a certain post road in the State of Connecticut, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 833) for the relief of Rufus M. Hollister, of Janesville, Wisconsin, have directed me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass. It is a small bill, appropriating $500 to pay for a destroyed bond, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at the present time. Does any Senator object?

Mr. CONKLING. I do not object if we may go through the morning business and introduce such bills as we have. I suppose the Senator has no objection to that. I have a bill that I should like to introduce for reference.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to make a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports from committees are still in order.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 838) to prevent the collection of illegal imposts under color of State authority, reported it with amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a petition of captains and owners of vessels, and citizens of different States praying protection from illegal taxes imposed by States, cities, and sea-port towns, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Montana in favor of an appropriation for a national road from Fort Benton to the Columbia river, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Wilmington, North Carolina, praying an appropriation for the purpose of building a post office in that city, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; which was agreed to.

Mr. VICKERS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 734) to create an additional collection district in the State of California, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Cecil C. Neil, surveyor of the port of Charleston, South Carolina, praying that he may be allowed a stated salary instead of fees, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas Rigney and other merchants of the city of New York, asking for congressional legislation with respect to certain charges alleged to be illegally levied by the custom-house of New York, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. NYE. The Committee on Naval Affairs, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate of December 16, 1868, to inquire into the practicability, expediency, and probable cost of deepening the entrance to the harbor of Midway Islands in the Pacific ocean, so as to afford a safe rendezvous and port of refuge and resort for the naval and mercantile vessels of the United States, have instructed me to report favorably upon the proposition. I desire to have the report and the accompanying documents, except the maps, printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be entered.

Mr. NYE. I desire in this connection to give notice to the Committee on Appropriations that whenever the naval appropriation bill is under consideration I shall move an appropriation of $50,000 to carry out the purpose of that report. I submit the amendment for reference to that committee, according to the rules.

Mr. DRAKE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Abbott Q. Ross, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 845) for the relief of Abbott Q. Ross. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1482) to restore the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the Department of War, reported it with an amendment.

APPOINTMENT OF MIDSHIPMEN.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1671) in relation to the appointment of midshipmen from the lately reconstructed States, to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage; and if there be no objection I should like to have it considered now. By the existing law the nominations of midshipmen to the Naval Academy must be made between the 4th of March and the 1st of July, on the nomination of the Representatives from the respective districts in Congress. In one or two of the southern States they will have no Representatives until after the 1st of July, their election not taking place this year until after that time. This bill provides, to remedy that evil, that the nominations shall be made before the 4th of March by the present Representatives. It is unanimously recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WARNER. I hope that motion will prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Navy to make the appointment of midshipmen to the United States Naval Academy, on or before the 4th day of March next, from any State in which the election of members of the House of Representatives to the Forty-First Congress does not by law take place previous to the 1st of July, 1869, upon the nomination of the members of the House of Representatives from such States in the present Congress; but no such appointment is to be made from any State not by law entitled to the appointment of midshipmen in the year 1869.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the title of the bill. I do not know but that it is as good a title as any, but it strikes me as being somewhat peculiar. I ask that it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The title now reads, "An act in relation to the appointment of midshipmen from the lately reconstructed States."

Mr. POMEROY. What States are "reconstructed?" It may be a proper title, but it is something new.

Mr. CONNESS. The title is all right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to amend the title. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the amendment?

Mr. POMEROY. It is to insert "certain States" instead of "the lately reconstructed States."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The bill has already passed the House of Representatives, and it is certainly very immaterial what the title of the statute is. The title is not part of the statute.

Mr. POMEROY. When we legislate for particular States we speak of "certain States," not "reconstructed States."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. An amendment sends the bill back to the House of Representatives, and probably defeats it.

Mr. POMEROY. We have got no States divided by the question of reconstructed or unreconstructed; but if this is a House bill I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORTON. Yesterday, at the expiration of the morning hour, a question of order was left undetermined, and for the purpose of having that question settled by the Senate I move to take up House bill No. 65.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the Senator will let us finish the morning business.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to call up a matter that will not occupy a moment.

Mr. CONKLING. I must object until we have an opportunity to finish the morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the motion cannot be entertained under the rule until the morning business is disposed of. The introduction of bills is now in order.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S.

No. 846) for the relief of Charlotte Crane; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 847) to furnish supplies for the Indian Bureau; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 848) for the construction of lines of telegraph between Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, under the direction of the Post Office Department; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. VICKERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 849) to incorporate the National Railway Trust and Loan Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads in the States, and ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS.

Mr. CRAGIN. By direction of the Committee on Naval Affairs I give notice that I shall offer an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1599) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1870, which I send to the Chair.

I ask also to offer an amendment to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 202) more effectually to insure the faithful completion of the Union Pacific railroad and its branches according to law; and I ask that it may be printed, so that it will be in order whenever it shall come up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made.

Mr. MORTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 793) in relation to the public debt and the currency; which was received and ordered to be printed.

CENTRAL BRANCH PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to make a motion—I make it now—to reconsider the vote by which the Kansas or Central Branch railroad bill was yesterday rejected. My object in moving the reconsideration is that the bill may lie upon the table until an amendment is prepared in the way of a substitute for it which promises to be more acceptable to the Senate and beneficial to the country. I now make the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for a vote on it. That is in order, I believe.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope that will not be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is not yet through with.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no unfinished business of the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair should have said that the business of the morning hour is not yet through. Nothing else is in order, except by unanimous consent, until the business of the morning hour is through with.

Mr. CONNESS. What else is before the Senate?

Mr. POMEROY. The Chair must be aware that a motion to reconsider is a privileged motion.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to give notice that I shall to-morrow, at one o'clock, try to bring up the river and harbor bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, this is not in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. And I shall press it to a vote.

Mr. CONNESS. This is not morning business.

Mr. MORTON. Is anything before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill called the Central Branch railroad bill was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that motion will be entered and not pressed to a vote this morning.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well, sir; if that is the wish of Senators I have no objection to that course being taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If it is now in order I ask for a moment's attention of the Senate to consider the resolution reported by the Committee on Agriculture, for the establishment of a standing Committee on Education. I presume there is no objection to the passage of it, and I ask for action on it at this time.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee consisting of five members, to be styled a Committee on Education, be added to the standing committees of the Senate.

The resolution was agreed to; and Messrs. MORRILL of Vermont, FRELINGHUYSEN, HARLAN, DRAKE, and WELCH were appointed the committee.

R. M. HOLLISTER.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President—

Mr. HOWE. I appeal to the Senator from Indiana on this ground: a short time ago I reported a small bill for the payment of a private claim from the Committee on Claims. I asked unanimous consent to have it considered at that time. That privilege was accorded to two other reports, but it was not accorded to the one that I made. Now, I think it will not occupy as long a time as I have been on the floor to consider and dispose of that bill. I hope the Senator will allow me to submit a motion to take it up.

Mr. MORTON. If it will not lead to debate I have no objection.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly not. If it does I shall give way to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield the floor for the purpose of this motion?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. I move to take up House bill No. 833.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 833) for the relief of Rufus M. Hollister, of Janesville, Wisconsin, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Rufus M. Hollister, of Janesville, Wisconsin, the sum of $500, to reimburse him for that sum, in seven-thirty bonds of the United States, lost and destroyed by fire on the 16th of June, 1866.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amount involved in that bill, $500, is too small to make a contest over; but the principle involved in it extends to hundreds of millions of dollars. It is whether or not the Government of the United States shall pay for bonds or notes destroyed by fire or by accident. We have had some cases brought to the attention of the Committee on Finance, to which, I believe, all such cases have hitherto been referred, where the proof appeared to be pretty plain that the bonds were destroyed, and yet where the bonds actually turned out afterward to be in existence. It presents the very grave and very difficult question whether the United States ought to become the insurer of its bonds payable to bearer.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator alludes to coupon bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are seven-thirty coupon bonds. In this case the prima facie evidence furnished to the Committee on Claims no doubt satisfied them that these seven-thirty bonds were destroyed. But if Congress undertakes to pay for all the bonds and notes the destruction of which is proved it will be a very difficult operation. You cannot distinguish between this case and the cases of notes of the United States lost or destroyed. It seems to me it is entering upon a very dangerous precedent.

Mr. HOWE. Let me say to the Senator from Ohio that among the papers in this case are the remains of the bonds identified by the Treasurer of the United States himself. He says that these are the remains of the seven-thirty bonds specified in the application.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there no possible question about their identity?

Mr. HOWE. He says there is none. Besides that, I want to say to the Senator that we have paid quite a number of these claims already.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no possible chance of doubt it may be safe to pay them; but generally it is a dangerous thing. If these particular bonds have been identified by the Treasurer I shall make no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. MORTON. Now, Mr. President, for the purpose of having a settlement of the question of order which has occupied the attention of the Senate on several occasions, I move to take up House bill No. 65, for the relief of William McGarrahan, and I hope the question will be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves to take up the bill mentioned by him, for the purpose of reference; and the question is whether it is in order now to take up this bill, it having been postponed indefinitely at the last session. That is the question for the Senate to decide.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think it due to myself and to all parties concerned, in view of the speech made yesterday by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] that I should say a word or two more upon this subject. When this bill was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims that committee proceeded to consider it, and counsel were heard on each side as long as they desired to be heard, and after three or four weeks of careful and patient investigation the report which has been filed was made by the unanimous vote of that committee. When the report was made Mr. McGarrahan commenced importuning me to have the case recommitted or sent to some other committee, and I absolutely refused to consent to any such arrangement; but finally, to rid myself of importunity, I told him that I would not call up the bill, but at the same time distinctly notified him that other Senators could do it; and I knew and he knew that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] was decidedly opposed to the bill. He so announced on the floor of the Senate when the bill came over from the House of Representatives. I stated to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] what I had said to Mr. McGarrahan. True, Mr. McGarrahan said that he wanted to obtain further testimony to show that he had possession of this property, but I supposed that that was a mere pretext for the purpose of delay, for the very ground on which this claim was rejected by the board of land commissioners in 1853 was that McGarrahan or his grantor was never in the possession of the property, and the want of equity was affirmed by the Supreme Court on this ground; and after this case had been litigated for fifteen years, and all through it had not been pretended that McGarrahan ever occupied this land or expended a dollar upon it, after this report was made he alleged then that he wanted to prove his possession. I supposed there was nothing in it; but I expected that he would go to the Senator from Nevada and to others who were interested in this claim. I cared nothing about it. I made the report and supposed my duties in reference to the matter were ended. I did not propose to say or do anything more about the case, but let other Senators who felt more interest in the matter than I did take charge of it. I cared not what the Senate did with the report; but I supposed McGarrahan would go to these other gentlemen and agree with them as he did with me. I have no control over other Senators; and when this matter was called up it did not attract my attention, and if it had I should have interposed no objection, because I had no control of other Senators and did not propose to take any further part in reference to the bill.

So much upon that point. Now I ask the attention of this Senate and of every Senator to what I am about to show in reference to the proceedings of this man McGarrahan as to this question of order. McGarrahan has filed a written brief upon this question, which has been laid upon the table of every member of the Senate, in which he undertakes to cite authorities to show that an indefinite postponement of a bill only puts off its consideration to the succeeding session; and one authority which he cites I will read from his brief:

"The motion to postpone indefinitely is of American origin, and peculiar to legislative assemblies in this country, in which it is used. In the House of Representatives it is provided by a rule, that when a question is postponed indefinitely it shall not be acted on again at the same session."—Cushing, 1386.

Now, sir, I will read paragraph 1386 from Cushing's work:

"The motion to postpone indefinitely is of American origin, and peculiar to the legislative assemblies of this country, in which it is used as an adverse motion to reject or suppress, and with the same effect."

Now, sir, this innocent and injured McGarrahan has filed here a brief in which he has mutilated the authority which he proposes to cite, and made it mean exactly opposite to what it does mean in the book. He has taken that paragraph down to the word "used."

"The motion to postpone indefinitely is of American origin, and peculiar to the legislative assemblies of this country in which it is used."

There the quotation ends, when the operative words of the paragraph are "as an adverse motion to reject or suppress, and with the same effect."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does he mean by "reject" and "suppress" the same thing, or does he express different ideas by these two words?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not now proposing to interpret that language; I will submit it to the honorable Senator from Vermont; but I am proposing to show that this man, McGarrahan, in the broad light of day has attempted by a falsification of an authority to mislead this Senate into making a false decision in his favor.

Sir, this is a specimen brick of this man McGarrahan. I think that the Senate will now see that this man is not so innocent and so much entitled to the sympathy and consideration of the Senate as he claims to be, when he has made this attempt to impose upon the Senate by citing an authority to show that an indefinite postponement only continues the case from one session to another, when the parliamentary law is, as it is clearly and explicitly laid down in the authority, that an indefinite postponement is equivalent to its rejection or suppression.

Now, sir, I shall say no more upon this subject. I want the Senate, however, to understand that in sustaining this motion they proceed to consider a bill which is at this time filed away in the pigeon-holes of the House of Representatives among the rejected bills of Congress. I want the Senate to understand that they are trampling under foot the parliamentary practice of this body for more than thirty years without an exception. I want the Senate to understand that they are trampling under foot the parliamentary law as it is pronounced by the best authorities in the country. I want them to understand that they are indorsing by this vote the action of a man who has attempted to cheat the Senate by misquoting an authority for the purpose of inducing this body to sanction his claim.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, as I was a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims at the time this bill was before the Senate, I ought perhaps to say a word in reference to it.

Mr. CONNESS. Not on its merits; we were suppressed yesterday.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope the point of order will be settled without going into the merits of the bill. It is simply a question of order; and if our rules are good for anything they certainly prohibit a discussion of the merits of a question on a point of order. We shall never bring this question to a close unless we confine the discussion to the point of order.

Mr. HOWARD. How does the honorable Senator know that I am not about to discuss the point of order?

Mr. POMEROY. I understood the Senator to say that he had some remarks to make about this case. That was the only reason I interposed.

Mr. HOWARD. About the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to say very briefly that it is true, as the honorable chairman of the committee has remarked, that the Committee on Private Land Claims heard this claim with great patience, and at some six or seven sessions of the committee, at which the claimant was assisted by very able counsel, and at which there was counsel and argument on both sides of the question. After a very patient consideration of the case, looking at all the proofs that were introduced, the committee came to the conclusion which is announced in the report presented to the Senate by the honorable Senator from Oregon. I had no doubt, as a member of the committee, of the correctness of the conclusion to which the committee arrived. After the report was made, however, Mr. McGarrahan, in whom I have never discovered any intentional fault or vice, came to me and had a conversation with me. I observed to him that in all the papers which he had produced before the committee there was none that related to the prior possession of the claim, and I asked him whether there was in fact any proof of prior possession on his own part or on the part of those who preceded him in the title. He answered very earnestly that there was such proof in existence and that such was the fact. I then suggested to him the propriety of returning to California for the purpose of procuring such proofs of anterior possession in good faith, and that he should take such evidence and give notice to the New Idria Mining Company of the time and place at which the evidence was to be taken by him, so that there should be no surprise to the opposite party, the New Idria Mining Company. I thought that was perfectly fair. He said he would do so, and he left the city, as I was informed, for that purpose. That was the foundation of the letter which I addressed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon which it seems he stopped proceedings for the present.

I then suggested to the honorable Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] who took an interest in the question, that he had better let the report lie over during the last session and give Mr. McGarrahan an opportunity to produce this supplemental evidence which he said was within his power. The Senator from Nevada did not agree to do so, but said that he would call up the report as soon as he could and ask action on it by the Senate. I told him that I thought justice required that McGarrahan should have a further opportunity to produce additional proof, as the question of possession was in my mind one of great importance, and upon that question there was no evidence whatever. I think so still, sir. I think it becomes the Senate, where a party seems to be acting in good faith, to allow him an opportunity to present his whole case before them.

That is all I desire to say upon that subject; but I beg further to remark that it does seem to me a little hard toward this claimant and toward other claimants who may have meritorious claims that we should apply this technical rule with the stringency which is insisted upon now by those who oppose the taking up of the bill. It is but a mere technicality if it be parliamentary law, and certainly in this case, as it seems to me, is likely to operate with great hardship on a claimant, who, notwithstanding the denunciations against him, may turn out to be an honest and meritorious claimant. I do not wish, sir, to hang up the claim upon such a small technicality.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the authority introduced by the Senator from Oregon this morning does not change in any respect the aspect of this case.

"The motion to postpone indefinitely is of American origin, and peculiar to the legislative assemblies of this country, in which it is used as an adverse motion to reject or suppress, and with the same effect."

Does anybody doubt that it has had the same effect? While the two sessions of the Congress were not connected together any motion that had the effect to put a question over beyond the session had the effect to destroy it; and that is precisely the way it was attempted to be used in this case; and if the two sessions were not connected together by the operation of the twenty-first joint rule it would be successful undoubtedly. While the sessions are totally disconnected, and all the business that is not finished at the end of one session is destroyed by the termination of the session, an indefinite postponement does have the effect to destroy the business, because there is thus no day beyond that session; that is all there is of it. One authority, which I have not now in my hand, in speaking of an indefinite postponement, says it has the effect to postpone the business to a day beyond the session at that time. There is a day beyond that session now. The two sessions are connected together by the operation of the twenty-first joint rule, and this is clearly unfinished business within the meaning of that rule.

Now, what does the authority to which the Senator refers amount to? Simply that while the sessions were not connected together a motion to postpone indefinitely was used for the same purpose as a motion to reject. Undoubtedly it was, and that was the very use made of it in this case. The question is whether it shall prevail; whether a mere technicality that is really, in point of fact, no technicality at all, shall prevent the reexamination of this man's case. Now, sir, I give no opinion about this case at all; I have not done so; but it is my judgment that it ought to be reexamined. I only know enough about it to make me think that it ought to be reexamined; and there is too much property at stake here to allow that reexamination to be prevented by a barren technicality, if it be one at all, which I insist it is not.

Mr. STEWART. How much property is it?

Mr. MORTON. I understand there is a good deal.

Mr. STEWART. How much?

Mr. MORTON. I understand there is property enough at stake to make the opposite party fight most desperately to prevent a reexamination of this case. Is not that so?

Mr. STEWART. If there was but one dollar to be taken in this form it would make me stand up for it; but I will inform the Senator that this property is not as valuable as has been stated. It has been stated at four, five, or six millions. The parties who own the property and paid for it would be glad to get rid of it at what it actually cost them in round dollars. They have invested about five hundred thousand dollars, and they would sell it for that amount. It is estimated here at millions.

Mr. MORTON. That is all out of the record and foreign to the question of order. We are now asking simply that this question shall be brought up again for reexamination. If the title is with the New Idria Mining Company, now said to be taking $50,000 a month of quicksilver out of this Territory, perhaps they can show it on a reexamination. If it is not, then the parties who own the title ought to have it. But, sir, although it may not be worth $6,000,000, it is worth enough to justify the Senate in authorizing justice to be done. It is worth too much to have a mere technicalality not as wide as a hair's breadth to stand in the way of a reexamination of the question.

Sir, there has been some display of feeling here. I have none. I have expressed no feeling, and I do not know how I shall vote on the main question. I was requested to bring this question up here in the way I have done. I have done it simply as my duty as a Senator. I have been somewhat surprised at the feeling that has been exhibited. I know of no reason for it. For my part I do not participate in it. I care nothing about that. I am simply acting in my capacity as a Senator in bringing this matter up in order to have it referred to a committee for the purpose of having a reexamination of this man's title. If he has not a good title he ought not to have the land, and if he has he ought to have it. I am aware that one committee, an able committee in the Senate, has made an adverse report. I am also aware that a very able committee in the House of Representatives has made an affirmative report, one of great ability. But I say nothing upon the merits of the case. All I ask is that this man shall have a chance to represent the title.

One word in regard to what the Senator from Michigan said. Mr. McGarrahan did go to California upon the understanding that this case was not to be taken up, and he has obtained the evidence.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to a point of order. My point of order is that a discussion of the merits of this question is not in order now. The honorable Senator objected to such discussion by me yesterday.

Mr. MORTON. It does not come with a very good grace from my friend. I think he went into the merits yesterday. I know the Senator from Nevada did.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A question of order is made, and the Senator must wait until it is decided.

Several SENATORS. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MORTON. I make this point, that this is a privileged question to be decided by the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to the honorable Senator proceeding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California makes a new question of order, that a discussion of the merits is not in order at this time. The Chair would observe upon that point that it is very difficult to arrest debate on the merits of a question. Senators have been permitted to make use of such arguments generally as to them appear proper and pertinent to the issue, although we are admonished in our rules that on a motion to take up a measure its merits are not in controversy. In this case a paper has been introduced from some quarter that seemed to allude somewhat to the merits of the case, and on that debate on each side has been had, and it appears to the Chair that he cannot arrest the debate on that subject now; it has gone too far. But the Chair was about to announce, what it is his duty to announce, that the morning hour having expired the special order of the day, fixed for one o'clock, is now before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. When I was interrupted by the honorable Senator from California I wished to make a question of order which, I suppose, I have a right to make, although I may be wrong in it. I have been advised by Senators who are much better versed in the rules and in questions of order than I am that this question of order is a privileged question and is not terminated by the morning hour. I am not prepared myself to discuss that question, for I do not claim sufficient information in regard to the rules to do so; but I am advised that it is a privileged question, and if so, I should be glad to have it determined this morning. It will continue to occupy the morning hour until it is settled. Senators may be satisfied of that fact that the solution of this question cannot be prevented by the consumption of the morning hour from day to day.

Mr. STEWART. And Senators may be satisfied of another fact, that my conduct having been brought before the Senate, by the introduction of letters, &c., outside of the question of order and commented upon, I shall, as long as the Senate will permit me, reply to that course of argument, and I shall have further remarks to make on this case.

Mr. MORTON. I think that it will be a saving of time to the Senate if this question is settled now, and I submit the point of order as to whether it is a privileged question or not.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the special order of the day be postponed informally for the purpose of having this matter settled and having it out of our way. It stands in the way of all morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. FERRY. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, that cannot be done. The Senator from Indiana makes a question of order over again that when a question of order is raised no other business can be done until that question is disposed of, as the Chair understands. That point was raised the other day, and it was the opinion of the Chair that such a question had no preference over the order of the day which intervenes. The Chair was not certain about the rule. He has tried to consult some books on the subject, but they give him no light upon it, and he will be compelled to stand by the decision then made unless it can be shown that there is some rule of parliamentary law conflicting with it which he has not been able to find.

Mr. STEWART. I understand that the special order is now before the Senate.

TAKING OF THE CENSUS.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to yield to me for one moment to enable me to send a resolution to the Chair, on which I shall not ask action, but desire to have read and lie on the table. I shall call it up to-morrow:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed by the Chair to inquire and report to the Senate whether any, and if so what, legislation is necessary touching the taking of the ninth census, as provided by the Constitution.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the reading of the joint resolution regularly before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order of the day is the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. I think it will be economy of the time of the Senate to dispose of this question, and not have it up morning after morning, and therefore I move to suspend the order of the day for forty minutes for the purpose of having this question settled.

Mr. CONKLING. You had better make it an hour.

Mr. MORTON. Well, I will say an hour, if it shall last so long.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will not be done. It is important to have action soon on this constitutional amendment, if ever, and I shall call for yeas and nays on any motion to postpone it.

Mr. MORTON. It is simply for the purpose of having this question of order settled, and then I shall be willing to go on with the constitutional amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. Is the motion of the honorable Senator from Indiana in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is. He has the floor, and moves to postpone the special order for the purpose of continuing the debate on the question of order.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I wish to say a word upon it. I wish to say to the Senate and to the Senator from Indiana that when the question which has been before the Senate shall come up upon its merits I want to occupy its attention a little while growing out of the character of the remarks that have been made by some honorable Senators, and also the circulation of letters and documents by Mr. McGarran, which seem to me make it necessary; and yet I am as anxious as any Senator can be that this question shall be disposed of; and in my opinion it could have been disposed of before this time but for the advocates of the motion that is sought to be made. The motion seems so extraordinary a one to me that any interest I could possibly have in any question could not induce me to vote on the affirmative side of it. But, sir, if the motion now before the Senate shall obtain, and a vote can be had upon the question without further debate, I will not attempt to occupy any time on the subject. If not, I give notice that I shall want to take part in the discussion and to reply to many things that have been said on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on postponing the special order for an hour, with a view to continuing the debate on the question of order.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of order is again before the Senate as to the motion made by the Senator from Indiana, to take up the bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of William McGarran.

Mr. POMEROY. I have taken no part in this debate, and I did not intend to do so. I have no opinion in regard to this case. I do not know anything about it. If I did know I would not express an opinion; but I do not know, and therefore I have none to express. But the question of order is more important to the Senate than the consideration involved in this case, I care not how large that consideration may be. The question of order involves the question whether we are to continue the precedents of the Senate, or whether we are to reverse them; and that is a question of the greatest importance. There is a way in which this question might have been reached under our rules. But before you can proceed to the consideration of a question the first thing to be ascertained is whether the question itself is before the Senate; whether the papers relating to it are here; whether you can proceed with it provided the motion is in order. To make a motion to proceed to the consideration of a question when the papers relating to it are not in the possession of the Senate is out of order, no matter what the question is. Now, the motion to proceed to the consideration of this bill is out of order, first, because the papers are not in the possession of the Senate. There are two ways in which we might proceed with this question: one is by a resolution asking the return of the papers from the House of Representatives, and another is by a proceeding in the House of Representatives. These are two ways which could have been pursued in order to get at the question. But to proceed to consider a question that is not here is certainly not in order. Then, secondly, the papers having got here by one of the two methods of which I have spoken, the question would come up whether we could proceed to the consideration of the case; and all I can say about that is that we can proceed to its consideration by unanimous consent or by reversing our rule. I do not know of any other way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question for the Senate to decide is, is it in order to take up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Indiana for the purpose of reference, it having been postponed indefinitely at the end of the last session?

Mr. CONNESS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I was a member of the committee which investigated this case. I have, however, nothing now to say about the case; but I do wish to say a very few words directly to the point of order. The question before the Senate is important in one particular. It is not by any means the mere technicality which the Senator from Indiana seems to suppose. The question before the Senate is, whether we will now abandon and abolish the very convenient mode of disposing of bills which committees recommend to have rejected by the motion to postpone indefinitely; whether we will abolish in our subsequent proceedings in the Senate the use of that motion; for if the present motion is declared to be in order, then henceforth it is idle at a first session of Congress to make and carry a motion for an indefinite postponement, for it will only heap bills and measures upon the table of the next session.

Mr. MORTON. I beg to ask my friend one question, with his permission.

Mr. FERRY. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. If that should be the effect, I ask him if the right to reject is not left?

Mr. FERRY. The action of the Senate upon the passage of a bill is still in order; but it occupies more time. It is not as convenient nor as rapid for the transaction of business as the motion to postpone indefinitely.

Now, sir, the question of order in this case turns, as the Senator from Indiana has correctly said, entirely upon the construction of the twenty-first joint rule; and in order to know what the twenty-first joint rule means we must ascertain what was the condition of the law at the time that rule was adopted. It is agreed on all hands that before the adoption of the twenty-first joint rule the adoption of a motion to postpone indefinitely was considered by the Senate as a determination of that measure. Everybody considered it so; and there has been no question made here on either side of the present controversy but that the passage of such a motion before the adoption of this rule, and at the time of such adoption, was considered by the entire Senate as a determination of the subject-matter. Now what is the rule?

"That all bills, &c., which, at the close of the next preceding session, remained undetermined in either House."

What did the committee that drafted that rule mean by the word "undetermined"? Did they mean to include bills which had been postponed indefinitely, or not? Does the word in its legitimate signification include such bills? Unquestionably, if what I have hitherto said be correct, it does not, and unquestionably the language of the twenty-first rule will not have the effect to carry over bills which have been postponed indefinitely at the preceding session, because those bills had been determined at the preceding session by the universal view entertained by the Senate at and previous to the time of the adoption of the rule. If, then, at the time of the adoption of this rule, the indefinite postponement of a measure at a preceding session was a determination of that measure the rule does not take the measure and carry it over to the succeeding session. I hence think the motion is out of order.

Mr. COLE. I cannot see that the merits of this claim are at all involved in the question of order now before the Senate, and so far as I am concerned I shall vote on the question of order without any reference to the merits involved in the proposition that was postponed indefinitely at the close of the last session.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to say just one word in reply to the Senator from Kansas. The point that he makes is a mere question of the mode of putting the proposition. If the papers are in fact over in the House of Representatives, if the Senate now, upon the motion of my colleague, decides to consider this measure, of course we shall call upon the House for the papers. That is a mere matter of form, of calling upon the House for the papers when we decide to consider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is whether it is in order to take up this bill for the purpose of reference, it having been postponed indefinitely at the close of the last session, and on that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question having been taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalow, Cameton, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Kellogg, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Osborn, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sherman, Thayer, Van Winkle, Vickers, Warner, and Welch—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Cole, Conness, Corbett, Dixon, Edmunds, Ferry, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Robertson, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Davis, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, McDonald, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Tipton, Wade, Whyte, and Yates—21.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate determines that it is in order.

Mr. MORTON. I move now to send to the House of Representatives for the papers, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to that form of motion. Nothing can be referred until it is in the possession of the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I move, then, to send for the papers to the House of Representatives. I make that motion first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Secretary be directed to request the return of the papers in this case from the House of Representatives to the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to know if that opens the merits of this case? I think it does. I understand that that is the broadest possible motion that can be made. It opens the propriety of sending for these papers for the purpose of correcting and again considering them. If the matter has been correctly disposed of, of course there is the end of it. If we are to call upon the House to return these papers it must be for the purpose of further consideration because the Senate is not satisfied with its action.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg pardon of my friend from Nevada for interrupting him; but under the decision just made by the Senate it appears to me to be an equivalent decision that they will finally order these papers to be returned or send a resolution to the House for them. That it is an extraordinary decision I understand; but I forbear, and am forbidden to say more on the subject. I think, if my friend will pardon me, that it is best not to occupy the time of the Senate now upon the merits, if he will excuse my saying so, because there are many Senators, including himself, on the great subject he has charge of who will feel that we ought to proceed to the consideration of more important matter. Besides, upon the merits of the case, after the exhaustive examination which has been given it by the committee to which it has been referred heretofore, for one I have no fear of the result. Therefore I hope that this motion will not be discussed at length by my friend, and I hope he will excuse me for making this suggestion.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] also suggests that that would be the better course, and I shall acquiesce in that suggestion. All I wish to say now is that I do hope to have an opportunity to discuss this matter, and I hope that Senators when it is discussed will give it sufficient attention to see who is right and who is wrong, and that it shall have a place here and a discussion. My object in opposing this motion was that the case might be reconsidered in the House of Representatives. I do not think the bill was ever properly considered in that House. It was not a unanimous report in the House; and I should prefer to have a new bill introduced in both Houses with a full opportunity for its consideration. But the rules have been so construed that it must be considered wholly in the Senate hereafter. The merits cannot again be considered in the House. Whenever that time comes I shall have something to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, that the Secretary be directed to request the return from the House of Representatives of the papers in this case.

The motion was agreed to; and a message was subsequently received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, returning to the Senate the papers in the case of William McGarrahan.

ENROLLED BILL, SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1158) for the relief of Commander John L. Davis; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

SUFFRAGE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the day is now before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator from Nevada allow me to put on its passage a bill that will save a few hundred thousand dollars, and which it is very important should be acted upon at once?

Mr. STEWART. I am afraid of this resolution losing its place altogether, and I cannot yield to anything. There are so many Senators pressing me that I must now insist on the consideration of the constitutional amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the day, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the pending question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing this great question at any length. It is the culmination of a contest which has lasted for thirty years. It is the logical result of the rebellion, of the abolition of slavery, and of the conflicts in this country during and before the war. Every person in the country has discussed it; it has been discussed in every local paper, by every local speaker; it has been discussed at the firesides; and now we are to place the grand result, I hope, in the Constitution of the United States. And let me remind my fellow-Senators that it is well that this work be now done, for we have realized the force of the very pointed sentence which was read here from the Swiss address, that "undetermined questions have no pity for the repose of mankind." This question can never rest until it is finally disposed of. This amendment is a declaration to make all men, without regard to race or color, equal before the law. The arguments in favor of it are so numerous, so convincing, that they carry conviction to every mind. The proposition itself has been recognized by the good men of this nation; and it is important, as the new administration enters upon the charge of the affairs of this country, that it should start on this high and noble principle that all men are free and equal, that they are really equal before the law. We cannot stop short of this.

It must be done. It is the only measure that will really abolish slavery. It is the only guarantee against peon laws and against oppression. It is that guarantee which was put in the Constitution of the United States originally, the guarantee that each man shall have a right to protect his own liberty. It repudiates that arrogant, self-righteous assumption, that one man can be charged with the liberties and destinies of another. You may put this in the form of legislative enactment; you may empower Congress to legislate; you may empower the States to legislate, and they will agitate the question. Let it be made the immutable law of the land; let it be fixed; and then we shall have peace. Until then there is no peace. I cannot add to the many eloquent speeches that have been made on this great question in this House. I will not attempt it. I want a vote. I will not occupy time. The proposition itself is more eloquent than man can be. It is a declaration too high, too grand, too noble, too just, to be ornamented by oratory. I hope we shall soon have a vote upon the question.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I propose to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am informed that there is an amendment of the committee pending. I will await the disposition of that. I suggest that the vote be taken on that at once. I believe there is no controversy about it; it is a matter of detail; and then I will offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, to strike out—

No State shall deny or abridge the right of its citizens to vote and hold office on account of race color, or previous condition.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote, and hold office shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Now, Mr. President, I propose the following, as an article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to be added to this resolution.

The second clause, first section, article two of the Constitution shall be amended to read as follows:

Each State shall appoint, by a vote of the people thereof qualified to vote for Representatives in Congress, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust and profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector; and the Congress shall have power to prescribe the manner in which such electors shall be chosen by the people.

Mr. President, the provision of the second article which it is proposed to amend reads at present as follows:

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector."

The changes proposed in that provision of the second article are two: in the first place, that electors of President and Vice President shall be chosen by the people of the several States instead of being chosen as the Legislatures of the States may direct. That will always secure the direct voice of the people. Instead of the electors being chosen by the Legislatures themselves, or being chosen in some other way which they may prescribe, a voice by the people will be secured at all times and under all circumstances. I suppose this is an improvement in our system which will receive unanimous approval. I doubt, sir, whether there is any sentiment or opinion in the country in favor of reposing the power at present confided in the Legislatures to them in future time.

I pass, then, to the second proposition in this amendment, which is that Congress may prescribe the manner in which the electors shall be chosen by the people of the several States. At present this power is reposed in the Legislatures of the States. By another provision of the same article it is provided that Congress may determine the time of choosing electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States. The power, then, as to fixing the time of the presidential election resides in Congress by virtue of the Constitution as it now stands. The amendment in addition to that will give to Congress the power of prescribing the manner in which the people shall choose electors. This amendment, which is a very desirable one, indeed, can be secured in no other manner than the one proposed by me; that is, by an amendment to the Constitution. It is morally impossible that the Legislatures should regulate the manner of choosing the electors so as to secure reform. Now, what is the fact? Many years ago the Congress of the United States abolished the general ticket system in the States for choosing Representatives in the lower House of Congress, because it was seen to be attended with great evils, inconveniences, and mischiefs which required the hand of reform. Fortunately the power existed in Congress to apply reform, and Congress did it. It required that each State electing more than one member to the House of Representatives should divide itself into single districts, and that a Representative should be elected from each. It was only because that power resided in Congress that that reform was possible at the time it was secured. Some of the States in fact resisted it. I believe two or three States continued to elect by general ticket in spite of the act of Congress, but they were finally compelled to conform themselves to the new and improved system which was established by Federal law; and we now have, therefore, in the election of Representatives in the other branch of Congress, a single district system established and enforced by congressional power. But Congress had no power to reform the system of choosing presidential electors by general ticket. The consequence is that we have that old, imperfect, clumsy, and often unjust mode of selecting presidential electors; and I believe that a general opinion exists throughout the country—among thinking and intelligent men at least—that we should have some change and reform in that particular.

I repeat, however, that the only mode in which you can secure that reform, or any other reform in the manner of choosing presidential electors, is to arm Congress with authority to establish a general system, a new and improved plan applicable to all the States. If you leave the Constitution unchanged the States will not introduce any new mode of electoral action. The political majority, for instance, in the State of New York, one of the great States, will not, by dividing their State into single districts, or by allowing the voter to cumulate his votes upon a less number than the whole number of electors to be chosen, consent to break, divide, and reduce the political power of his party in that State so long as other States do not at the same time adopt the new plan; and there is very good reason why they should not. Why, sir, a politician in the State of New York would see that he would injure his party, and injure it seriously, by breaking the power of the State as an aggregate body in the presidential election, while other States adhering to the old system and still electing by general ticket, would take the advantage of the change thus made by the State of New York.

This practical difficulty, this impediment, will always prevent the adoption of any reform by the States themselves, each acting for itself and separately from all the others in the manner of choosing electors of President and Vice President. There is, then, a necessity that this power shall be placed in the hands of Congress, and that Congress, by a general and uniform rule, shall apply this improvement to our system of elections throughout the country. Here it can be introduced, and doubtless it will be introduced promptly and at once whenever you have the power conferred upon the two Houses.

This is all I choose to say at present upon the amendment to the Constitution of the United States which I have proposed; but I will add a few words by way of explanation.

I do not propose that this amendment which I offer shall embarrass the consideration of the amendment which is pending before the Senate. The two propositions, although they both relate to elections and to electoral rights, are quite distinct from each other, and they deserve separate and distinct consideration in Congress and in the country. If, therefore, the Senate shall approve this amendment, my idea is that the formal part of the resolution which provides for the submission of the amendment to the different States shall be changed so that the amendments shall be submitted to be acted upon separately, so that the fate of one shall not necessarily be the fate of the other, that the several Legislatures who come to act upon the subjects embraced in this resolution of amendment can separate them, can adopt the one and reject the other, if they choose.

I repeat, it is not my intention to embarrass the consideration of the original proposition, but to obtain a distinct consideration for this, and although I offer it now, early in the consideration of this subject, I do not care to have an immediate vote upon it. I hope the debate will go on upon the amendment presented by the Senator from Nevada, and that after due consideration I shall be able to obtain a favorable vote upon this amendment which I have proposed.

The PRESIDENTIAL OFFICER. (Mr. FERRY.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILSON. I hope that amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. It seems to me the amendment is proper in every particular. I am for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the amendment be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. BUCKALEW.

Mr. STEWART. From the reading of that proposition it strikes me rather favorably, but it is a matter that ought to be examined by a committee, and certainly to attach it here would embarrass the original resolution. I should like to have the naked proposition with regard to suffrage submitted by itself; and I would suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania to introduce his proposition as a separate measure and have it referred to a committee.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I drew this amendment with the intention of offering it to-day as a separate resolution, and of having it referred to the Committee upon Representative Reform, and of calling a meeting of that committee for this evening to consider this very question. All I desire is that we have an opportunity to obtain the vote of the Senate on this proposition before the resolution now pending passes beyond the reach of amendment. That is my only purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand the reading of the amendment the only change made in the Constitution is to require presidential electors to be elected by congressional districts.

Mr. BUCKALEW. No, sir; the Senator is in error. There are two changes proposed by my amendment. The first is that the choice of presidential electors shall be by popular vote, instead of being as the Legislatures of the States may prescribe—a change to which I suppose there is no objection in any quarter. It is very proper. The second change is that Congress shall have power to prescribe the manner of choosing presidential electors. They already have the power to fix the time; and I merely propose to confer upon Congress the power to regulate the manner of choosing presidential electors, under which Congress may prescribe the single district system, or any other improved mode.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I would suggest, with regard to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, that while it is very important in itself, and certainly has much in its favor; it is hardly germane to the pending proposition. The amendment to the Constitution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary relates to the right of suffrage. Now, as I understand the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, he proposes to add to the amendment determining the right of suffrage a further amendment determining how presidential electors shall be chosen. Is it expedient for the Senate at this moment, in considering the other and more important question, to embark upon the question presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

I know what a history the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania has in its favor. I believe it may be traced substantially to the greatest mind that has been called to consider our Constitution; certainly the greatest of those who at the beginning of its history contributed his powers to its illustration. I mean Alexander Hamilton. This proposition will be found substantially in his writings; never, however, carried into practical life. I do not say that I will not support it; I do not say that it is not proper that it should be embodied in the Constitution of the United States; but I simply submit now to the Senate whether it is expedient to complicate the great question of suffrage with this other question, important as it may be.

Mr. STEWART. I do not understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania presses the question now.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator from Massachusetts will remember that the first and very material part of this amendment does relate to the subject of popular suffrage, and it is equally as extensive as the original amendment to which it is offered. It proposes to take from the Legislatures of the several States the power, which they now possess, of directing how presidential electors shall be chosen, and to provide that the people of the several States themselves shall exercise the right of suffrage in the choosing of those electors in the several States.

The second branch of my amendment also relates to the subject of suffrage. It provides that Congress may direct the manner in which that right of suffrage by the people of the several States shall be exercised in the particular of selecting electors of President and Vice President of the United States. Consequently, both branches of this proposed amendment to the second article relate to the subject of popular suffrage, and to the manner in which that right shall be exercised. The amendment is, therefore, most germane, is most appropriate, is most legitimate; and offered as an addition to the proposition presented by the Senator from Nevada no objection can lie to it upon that ground. I repeat, however, sir, that I only desire that this subject shall be considered distinctly and by itself at some time before the present measure passes from before the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I merely wish to inquire whether if this is adopted as an amendment the two propositions would be submitted as one article, or whether there would be a separate vote on each.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I explained before that it was my design, as soon as it should be in order, to offer to change the formal part of the resolution so that it shall be submitted separately and distinctly from the other.

The PRESIDENTIAL OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEWART. I should not like to vote for it as an amendment to this proposition nor as an additional section. I would rather it should be considered by the committee and come up separately.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is offered as a new section.

Mr. STEWART. But it is in the same article, and both are to be submitted together. I prefer that each single proposition should be submitted alone. So I shall vote against it as an amendment, and hope it will not be put upon this resolution, although it strikes me favorably in itself from the reading of it. I hope the Senator will not press it as an amendment. If he does my vote will be against it, but not on its merits. I shall oppose it as an amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was absent for a moment when the Senator from Pennsylvania introduced his proposition. Do I understand that it goes to regulate in any way the suffrage, or only the mode of electing, whether it shall be by the Legislature or by districts or by the popular vote?

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is that Congress may prescribe the manner in which presidential electors shall be chosen, and also that they shall be chosen by the people in the several States.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then the only power that it gives is to decide whether the election shall be by districts or by general ticket. Is there anything more than that?

Mr. BUCKALEW. It does decide that the people shall choose the electors. Next, it leaves to Congress the regulation of the manner in which they shall be chosen.

The PRESIDENTIAL OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The question being put, the amendment was declared to be agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I suggest that we cannot have two amendments at the same time. I call for a division on the question. I do not think the Senate intends to put these two propositions together. We cannot have two propositions pending before the Senate at the same time unless we unite them. I call for a division.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest to my friend who has this resolution in charge that it seems to me the Senate ought to have the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania on its table in print before it undertakes to embody it in the Constitution of the United States. The proposition has not passed through the ordeal of any committee. It comes from the careful brain of my excellent friend, [Mr. BUCKALEW;] but then I presume that even he would not expect that we should receive from him alone a text of the national Constitution without any consideration by a committee or others of the Senate. I think, therefore, in some way that we ought to secure for his proposition, important as it is, more careful consideration than it has had merely from being read at the desk. I hope that it will be printed and will be brought up for consideration on some other day when we proceed with this business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the objection that I would have to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania would be the very opposite to the objection that would come from the Senator from Massachusetts. The proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania is so obviously right that in no Legislature of the Union, I presume, would it meet with any hostility, but it would be a popular element in any amendment proposed, and would give strength to the proposition of the Senator from Nevada. I desire, if this amendment conferring universal suffrage shall go to the people, that it shall go alone, without that which gives it particular strength over and above its own claims to strength. That is the objection I have to the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, for I think experience, as far as it has shown anything upon this subject at all, shows that the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is a proper one, that the mode of selecting presidential electors should be otherwise than it is now regulated in the Constitution. But as the measure itself is right in my opinion I cannot vote against it. I do not see why any Senator who desires that the original proposition shall go with strength before the State Legislatures should object to this amendment, for I am sure its tendency would be to strengthen the other proposition.

The PRESIDENTIAL OFFICER. A division is called for on the question of agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I trust that the Senate will not adopt this amendment. The amendment to the Constitution which has been proposed by the Judiciary Committee has been considered by the people of the United States and been discussed before them for years; it has been discussed in Congress; it has been referred to a committee, and this is the result of all that deliberation.

Now, this amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania may be a very good one; but it would be a very hasty mode of altering the fundamental law of the country for the Senate of the United States, on the mere suggestion of an amendment, to change that which has been the law of the country ever since its foundation. I think there may be a good many objections in this amendment. It provides that Congress may regulate the manner of choosing presidential electors. That is taking the whole subject of suffrage from the States and giving it to Congress. It is the broadest step that has been made, if I understand the amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator is mistaken in supposing that this takes the whole subject of suffrage into the hands of Congress. It is a mere power of regulation of the manner in which the suffrage may be exercised. The Senator will remember that the Constitution now provides that Representatives in the lower House of Congress shall be chosen by the electors in each State qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. That is the rule already in the Constitution. Then, in the first clause of this amendment it is provided that the electors in each State qualified to vote for Representatives in Congress shall choose presidential electors—leaves it to the same rule which now obtains in the choice of Representatives. The same class of voters shall choose presidential electors that choose Representatives. There is nothing new introduced.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is very true, as stated by the Senator; and yet the amendment does contain these clear words: that "Congress shall have power to prescribe the manner in which such electors shall be chosen by the people." Just how far these words would carry us certainly merits more deliberation.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I beg the Senator to look to the first clause of the amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The first clause of the amendment corresponds with the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, but these other words may in some manner conflict with his construction. I hope, at all events, that we shall have time to look at it, and therefore that it will not now prevail.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, we have an illustration just now, it seems to me, of the propriety of giving mature consideration to this proposition by a committee. Already upon the floor of the Senate the purport of the proposition seems to be a matter of doubt. Although, like other Senators, I favor the proposition, certainly a matter of such grave import as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, affecting such important interests, before it is incorporated into the Constitution ought to be the result of mature deliberation. Every word of it should be considered carefully; and the purpose of the Senator from Pennsylvania ought to be so expressed that that purpose can hereafter be carried out so that there may be no doubt about it. I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania whether, in order to carry into effect beyond all controversy his purpose, it would not be better to have the matter referred to a committee, so that the bearing of each word may be considered and weighed, and so that the purpose which he evidently designs, proper in my estimation, may be truly accomplished by the proposition when it comes up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I do not care to crowd a vote on members if they are not ready for it now. If the Senator from Nevada is willing that this resolution shall be within reach of amendment to-morrow I shall be content to withdraw this proposition for the present, so as to have it considered this evening and proposed as an amendment to-morrow.

Mr. STEWART. I desire to hold on to this resolution and get a vote, if possible, to-day. I do not want to delay it for any consideration. It is a simple proposition, and I shall have to resist all amendments that are not germane to the proposition, and I must ask the Senate to dispose of it because there is other pressing business, and if this is delayed for a day or two we shall lose it altogether at this session. It is very important that if passed at all it should be passed at an early day. Senators all appreciate that importance. For that reason I do not feel disposed to discuss it; it has been discussed sufficiently. I hope no new matter will be introduced that will embarrass getting a vote on the distinct proposition contained in the resolution.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I see no reason why these propositions should not go together. The objection which has been urged against the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania, because it does not come from a committee, I do not think a valid one. I do not know of any great or thoroughly clean proposition that has ever been made which has not come from the careful consideration of a single individual mind. I would rather take a proposition well weighed by an individual who has had the subject before him for a considerable length of time, and has carefully examined it, than the result of the deliberations of a committee after a certain number of individuals have compared their views and brought their ideas together. Indeed, no very great expression can come from a committee; it must be the emanation of the conviction of some individual, personal mind. I would, therefore, be willing to take this amendment without referring it to a committee.

In regard to the proposition to amend the Constitution, I will say that it is known that I am altogether in favor of manhood suffrage, and have been for years. I do not know, however, that I prefer to see the Constitution changed to perfect that purpose. It is a matter that to some extent ought to be left to the reflection of the people, and the change ought to be made by the people of the various States themselves. I would rather see an indication on the part of the people of the United States expressive of their entire confidence in the freedom of the individual than to see us put into the Constitution an arbitrary and fixed rule that cannot be changed and cannot be reformed without revolution.

Besides that, there is another objection in my mind to this provision going into the Constitution, and that is this: if it is intended to be an expression of the fact that the American people have risen to the point of acknowledging the freedom of the individual—that the individual is free—if this is to be an expression of individual freedom, it does not go far enough. While I am in favor of all citizens of the United States having the right to vote and hold office, without respect to race or color, I would rather go a little further than that. I would not by any means be willing to debar the women of the country from giving their suffrage or their expression in regard to the authority of laws to control or govern them, as I do not believe that any responsible person can be controlled by the authority of any other one. There is no reason why you, sir, should be governed by any other person; and if there is any argument why you should vote, that argument will apply equally well to any intelligent woman in the country. I cannot see the force of the argument which would give to natives of China, of Africa, and of India a right to control the destinies of the women of this country—and recollect I am an advocate of that right—and exclude from a voice my mother or my sister or my wife, an American woman, from the exercise of this inestimable privilege. I intend, when the proper stage is reached, to move an amendment to this proposition for the benefit of the women of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I inquire if the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is disposed of?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I want the amendment adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I respectfully ask the Senate to pass upon this amendment which I have offered at this time. If the subject were to go over until to-morrow and the measure could then be within reach of amendment I would offer it for consideration at that time, and in the mean time have it printed; but it is so simple that printing it will convey no additional information to a single member of the body. It is, in the simplest language, that the people of the United States shall choose their presidential electors, and that the power to meddle with or molest their right shall not be in the State Legislatures; and it is also that Congress shall possess the same power in regard to the manner of choosing presidential electors that they now have in regard to choosing Representatives in Congress, and may prescribe the same rule, or any other uniform and equal rule, which will secure to the people of the United States fair representation. That is all there is in it.

Now, if at the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey I stand aside with my amendment, do not offer it upon this proposition, and bring it up hereafter, there is not time for its consideration at the present session. It is this difficulty which induces me to press upon the Senate the convenience and the propriety of now voting upon this subject; and if we should discuss it for a week not a single member of the Senate would be enlightened in the slightest degree with reference to the merits of the proposition. It is a subject perfectly familiar in Congress and out of Congress from one end of the country to the other. It is just one of those things that can be seized upon, commanded completely by our mind when first presented. Subsequent debate and prolonged consideration would produce no changes of opinion.

I am very glad, but I am not at all surprised, to hear every gentleman who has spoken upon this subject express a feeling favorable to the proposition. Why is this so? Because there is no objection to it, and because every one upon the mere statement of the amendment sees that it is one which would be adopted as a matter of course by probably every State Legislature in the country.

Besides, as I said before, it cannot embarrass the original proposition in the slightest degree because we propose to make it separately and distinctly from the other amendment accompanying it to the State Legislatures. If it have any effect, as suggested by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] it would be to give an odor of popularity to the whole resolution. At all events, even those who would be against the first proposition could say "Well, Congress at all events has sent us a proposition to which we can accede, which is a real measure of reform—a valuable improvement in our system of government."

Now, sir, if this were a subject that required a careful study of language; if it were an involved proposition contained in several paragraphs, it might be well enough to pause over it; but the amendment follows the exact language of the present second clause of the first section of the second article throughout, from beginning to end, with the exception of inserting the three or four lines which secure to the people of the United States the right of suffrage in selecting presidential electors, and give to Congress that necessary and indispensable power to the introduction of any improvement in the manner of selecting them which they now possess in regard to the Representatives in the other House of Congress. The power is identically the same, and presidential electors, under the amendment, are hereafter to be chosen by the same men that choose Representatives in Congress. I insist, therefore, that there is nothing new, nothing novel, nothing surprising, nothing requiring deliberation or prolonged debate in order to the comprehension of this subject. I respectfully ask, then, that the vote be now taken; and I will suggest, in addition, that as we are now in Committee of the Whole, the adoption of this amendment does not put it beyond the reach of the Senate. When the resolution shall be reported to the Senate and be on its third reading it will still be within reach of a vote, and if anybody can suggest any objection to it then that objection can be made.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, this proposition on the present occasion is an entire surprise to me, and I doubt not it is to many other Senators. It proposes a radical change in the system of choosing the President of the United States. Is the Senate ready to enter upon the consideration of that question—how shall the President of the United States be chosen? My friend from Pennsylvania who presents us this proposition has doubtless considered carefully the whole subject in all its bearings. He is doubtless prepared to express an opinion on a question greater than that which he has presented—whether the President of the United States shall be chosen by the people directly, without the intervention of Electoral Colleges. His proposition assumes that there shall be Electoral Colleges; that that early, but I may say now effete, system shall continue with a new sanction in the Constitution.

Sir, if there is to be a change I would prefer a much more radical change than that now moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I should prefer that the President of the United States should be chosen directly by the people of the United States without the intervention of any Electoral College. That college has become a sham. It is nothing but a name. It has never fulfilled the original idea of the founders when they constituted it. A practical question well worthy of debate is whether what has become nothing but a name shall not cease to exist. Now, sir, if we are going into the question of how the President of the United States shall be chosen, I prefer to present the question on a higher plane. I ask the Senate to consider whether this whole system of Electoral Colleges shall not be made to disappear. I would much rather do that than prop it up by supplementary provisions like that now proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether, under the last clause of his amendment, which provides that Congress may regulate the manner in which the presidential electors shall be elected, it would not be competent for Congress to pass an act authorizing minorities to be represented in the Electoral College?

Mr. BUCKALEW. If the Senator asks me the question I will answer very promptly: as a matter of course Congress could do so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose so; and therefore we see how important the proposition is, and one which is not certainly to be passed upon within half an hour. Whether we are prepared to say that the Congress of the United States shall have at any future time the power to authorize minorities to be represented in the Electoral College, is a grave question which ought to be pondered carefully before voted upon, and therefore I hope that this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator from New Jersey makes a suggestion which is pertinent, of course. The very object of establishing single districts was to divide representation in the States. I alluded to that subject before Congress did to pass such a law in regard to the choosing of Representatives in the lower House of Congress. Now, it is to get away from the very evil which the Senator from Massachusetts has depicted as attending upon Electoral Colleges that I propose to give this power to Congress. He justly denounces the Electoral Colleges as a sham. Why, sir, they are worse than a sham; they are positively pernicious. These elections by general ticket, it is understood throughout the country, are unjust and unfair. However, I do not propose to introduce any new plan here in this amendment; I only propose to leave it open to the judgment of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, upon which a division is demanded.

A division being had, it appeared that there was not a quorum voting.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUCKALEW. To save embarrassment for the moment, as I suppose the debate will go on upon the general subject, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I will offer it hereafter. Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to offer a substitute for the proposition reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon is not now in order, and will not be until the resolution shall be reported to the Senate, as already the amendment reported by the committee has been adopted, and he proposes to strike out that which has been already adopted. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon will be in order when the resolution shall have been reported to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was a misapprehension about that, I suppose, on the part of the Senate, particularly on my part. I did not know that the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee would cut off all other amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will remark that that amendment can be amended by adding to it, but not by striking out that which has already been adopted.

Mr. STEWART. The question can be tried in the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to amend the resolution by adding:

And this and all future proposed amendments to the Constitution, whether proposed by the Congress or a convention called by Congress on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, instead of being submitted to the Legislatures or to conventions of the several States, shall be submitted to the vote of the people of each State; and if a majority of the people entitled to vote on the proposed amendment in three fourths of the several States shall vote in favor of the proposed amendment it shall, to all intents and purposes, be a part of the Constitution.

Mr. President, the party in power professes to be very democratic. I believe it makes louder pretensions to democracy than the Democratic party ever did or now do. But what is its practice? The honorable Senator from Nevada, who has charge of this measure, wants to submit his proposed constitutional amendment to Legislatures already elected. He wants to attach the amendment to the Constitution by the first heat. How do he and his friends carry out their professions of democracy? The Legislatures already chosen are to act upon this amendment, although they were elected by the people in advance of it and without regard to it. Now, my proposition is that neither the Legislatures already chosen, nor those which may hereafter be chosen, nor any convention chosen in the several States, shall be called upon to act on the ratification of this proposed amendment to the Constitution, but that that question shall be submitted directly to the people of the various States.

Now, sir, what necessity is there for having a proposition to amend the Constitution submitted either to a Legislature or a convention in a State called for the purpose of acting on the proposition? They cannot add to the proposition; they cannot subtract from it; they cannot modify it. The proposition is to be voted for or against as a totality, as an entirety, as a matter beyond the control of the body to which it is submitted either for acceptance or rejection.

If the people are capable of self-government; if they can comprehend a simple proposition submitted to them to amend their constitution, which proposition when they act by a Legislature or convention of the State, that convention or Legislature has no power whatever to vary, where is the utility, the good sense, or the principle of submitting it to an intervening body either called a Legislature or a convention of the people of the State? Let the question come before the people of the State just as questions in relation to their own constitution are thrown before them. When a State proposes to amend its constitution it either submits to the people all the amendments as an entirety, or it submits the several amendments as distinct and separate propositions. Here the honorable Senator from Nevada proposes to submit a distinct proposition for an amendment of the Constitution. He desires and proposes that it shall be submitted to the Legislatures now in existence, now in being. I am opposed to it; among other reasons for this one: these Legislatures have not been chosen with a view to the question or principle involved in the proposed amendment of the Constitution. They have been chosen irrespective of that question of principle, in ignorance of it. They have been elected not with a view to act upon it. The people in selecting and choosing them had no reference whatever to what would be a proposed amendment of the Constitution before them, such a one as is embodied in the proposition that is now before the Senate.

Can the Senate of the United States, the Congress of the United States, the people of the United States, be engaged in a more important and solemn matter than that of amending their fundamental law? Is it a matter of substance that these propositions to amend the Constitution shall go before the people of the States, and shall be acted upon by the people of the States either through their Legislatures or their State conventions called for that particular and special purpose? If it is not an idle form—I agree that it is in practice nothing else—but if it is not intended to be continued as an idle form, why submit this important matter of amending the Constitution of the United States to a body that has been chosen some considerable time previously, and that was elected and chosen with no reference whatever to so important a matter?

But, Mr. President, I go further than that. I say that it is unseemly; it is not in accordance with the principles and analogies of our system of government, and it is unsafe in practice to submit these amendments either to the Legislatures already elected of the States or to the Legislatures to be hereafter elected, or to conventions elected in the States for the sole purpose of considering the proposed amendment. The best, the safest proposition, that in most analogy to all the principles of our Government, is to submit a proposition which cannot be changed, cannot be modified, can in no way be altered, not to a Legislature or a convention, but to the sovereign people themselves.

Sir, what objection is there to my proposition? There cannot be any objection on principle, but there may be an apprehension, and no doubt is an apprehension to a considerable extent, that if the submission of an important proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States is withdrawn from the existing Legislatures and is submitted directly to the people of the States the people of the States will reject it. I cannot conceive of opposition to the amendment which I have offered upon any other consideration than a fear to trust the people themselves with the decision of this important question. I therefore make the proposition in perfect good faith. If the proposed constitutional amendment was in accordance with my views and principles, which it is not, I would say as a permanent, unalterable principle of amending the Constitution of the United States, whenever a proposition to that effect has been made either by Congress or by a convention called by the States in obedience to the recommendation of Congress, that the proposed amendment should be submitted to the people themselves in their primary and sovereign capacity. I am utterly opposed to superseding the sovereignty of the people on the great question of altering their fundamental law in relation to a most important and vital principle. I am altogether opposed to the sovereign power being superseded by Legislatures that have already been elected without any reference whatever to the action of its members upon such a proposition.

I therefore hope, Mr. President—no; I cannot say I hope—I desire that my proposition shall be accepted. I have no idea that it will be, no faith that it will be, because it would defeat the purposes of the gentlemen who propose and advocate this amendment if they were to submit it to the sovereign people of their respective States. They are the most beautiful party in the world in theory, altogether for democracy, for the power of the people, the sovereignty of the people, their right to amend or alter, modify or abolish their governments as they see proper. These are the beautiful theories of this Radical party; but whenever the Radical party are asked to put their theories into practice, and the practice threatens to jeopardize any favorite proposition of theirs, they have the greatest facility in the world of putting aside their theories. Gentlemen, is not this so? If it is not, come up and vote to lay this proposed amendment to the Constitution before the sovereign people of your respective States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Would that not violate the Constitution?

Mr. DAVIS. It would not violate the Constitution. I propose to change the Constitution in that respect. What would be done in the State of my honorable and most respected friend if my proposition should be adopted? Why, sir, negro suffrage would not touch bottom; it would be ingulfed so deep that it would never be heard of again. What would be done in the Empire State, which my honorable friend [Mr. CONKLING] represents in part so ably? They might adopt it with a property qualification, but never in that latitude which is contemplated by the father of the measure, the distinguished and immortal Senator from Nevada. [Laughter.] What would become of this constitutional amendment in the State of Kansas, the State represented by the honorable Senator, [Mr. POMEROY,] who, in relation to questions of order, is always the oracle of this body? What would become of it in Michigan?

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will allow me, I think the Legislature of my State will adopt this constitutional amendment in twenty-four hours.

Mr. DAVIS. That is not my proposition. I have no doubt the honorable Senator believes so, and that is the very reason why he would vote against my proposition. My proposition is that it shall not be submitted in the State of Kansas to a Legislature already elected, manipulated, and I suppose as much committed as the human mind and will can be committed; but I want it submitted to the people of Kansas. Are you afraid to trust your people? If you are they ought to be afraid to trust you, and I am not satisfied that they would not have much more ground for their distrust than you would have. [Laughter.] No, gentlemen. If you are Democrats, if you are devoted to the principles that the people—

Mr. THAYER. We are Republicans.

Mr. DAVIS. Well, if you are Republicans you ought to adopt my proposition. What does a republican mean? He who represents the will of his constituency. Now, I ask if his constituency cannot express its will better than he can upon a proposition to adopt or reject an amendment to the Constitution? No, gentlemen; you are not going to have this amendment tried, but you will be tried and you will be found wanting, all of you. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. We have been tried.

Mr. DAVIS. But you may be tried again in the forum of the sovereign people some of these days. There will come a day of retribution. It is a long lane that never turns. Yours has run for rather a long time in the same direction, and in a direction to the common ruin of Government and people. It is time for you to change the route of your lane. Why will you reject this proposition? If you do, as I know you will, the people will say that you are more devoted to your own interests, to your own faction, to your own continuance in power, to the offices and spoils and plunder of the Government, than you are devoted to the Government itself and to their interests. That is what the people will say; I do not say so. [Laughter.]

Mr. THAYER. The people spoke last fall.

Mr. DAVIS. Yes; the people spoke last fall, and what did they say? They just said that General Grant should be President. Every man who has any notion, any political fantasy, any pet idea that he imagines General Grant would support, says that the people in electing General Grant decided in favor of his whim and his notion. That is all nonsense. The people last fall decided upon one question, and that was that General Grant should be President of the United States. They never decided any principle.

Now, sir, I submit this proposition to the Senate. It is one that I would make in any political position or with any political relations that it would be possible for me to have. I believe the proposition is right in itself. I do not want gentlemen to continue an unconstitutional, unjust, and mischievous system of legislation. I want them to do what is right and just for the people, under the Constitution, and that will promote their good and prosperity. So far as they make propositions of that character I assure them they shall have my support, and I think I am making a proposition of that kind now.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky tells us that in proposing this amendment we are seeking to perpetuate our power. A word to the Senator on that point. He knows and I know that this whole struggle in this country to give equal rights and equal privileges to all citizens of the United States has been an unpopular one; that we have been forced to struggle against passions and prejudices engendered by generations of wrong and oppression; that we have been compelled to struggle against great interests and powerful political organizations. I say to the Senator that the struggle of the last eight years to give freedom to four and a half millions of men who were held in slavery, to make them citizens of the United States, to clothe them with the right of suffrage, to give them the privilege to be voted for, to make them in all respects equal to the white citizens of the United States, has cost the party with which I act a quarter of a million of votes. There is not to-day a square mile in the United States where the advocacy of the equal rights and privileges of those colored men has not been in the past and is not now unpopular. Yes, sir, the cause of the poor, wronged, oppressed negroes has been, now is, and for some years will continue to be, an unpopular cause. The public man or the political party that honestly and zealously espouses their cause will continue to be misunderstood, misrepresented, and maligned. In the past the true and tried friend of the black man has been made to feel the hatred and power of the enemies of the black race. It is too much so now, and I fear it will be so in some portions of the country for years to come.

But my doctrine is, no matter how unpopular it is, no matter what it costs, no matter whether it brings victory or defeat, it is our duty to hope on and struggle on and work on until we make the humblest citizen of the United States the peer and the equal in rights and privileges of every other citizen of the United States. Sir, I do not intend to cease my efforts until that end is fully accomplished. Let us give to all citizens equal rights, and then protect everybody in the United States in the exercise of those rights. When we attain that position we shall have carried out logically the ideas that lie at the foundation of our institutions; we shall be in harmony with our professions; we shall have acted like a truly republican and Christian people. Until we do that we are in a false position, an illogical position—a position that cannot be defended; a position that I believe is dishonorable to the nation with the lights we have before us. Through all the contests of the past thirty-five years I have looked to the final consummation of the perfect equality of citizens of the United States in rights and privileges and the complete protection of all citizens in their rights and privileges. Peace can only come in all its power and beauty by the complete triumph of equality and justice.

To the Senator from Kentucky I say he may accuse us of anything else but the idea of advocating this policy with a view of obtaining votes or strength or power. He has already taunted us with the weakness of this cause; he has asked us how it would be if we submitted to the people this amendment; he tells us that in certain States we would be voted down. Sir, all our knowledge assures us that every single question pertaining to the rights of the black men of this country during the struggle of the last nine years instead of bringing us votes has cost us votes. We have had to battle against the persistent opposition of the Senator himself. We have had to battle against the powerful opposition of those with whom he has chosen to act; and, more than all, we have had to battle against the prejudices, as I think the ignorant prejudices, of a portion of our countrymen; against the prejudices, too, of a small portion of our own political friends. When the proposition was made to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia I remember that the Senator made an earnest, I may say a passionate, speech against it, in which he prophesied great evil to the city and to the country. I remember, too, that at that time there were many Republicans in Congress who hesitated and doubted; there were many Republicans throughout the country who hesitated and doubted. We had to drag along with us a great many of our reluctant political associates. When we put muskets into the hands of black men to help to fight the battles of the country we not only had stern opposition here in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, but we had it in the country; we had it in the ranks of the Army; we had it everywhere. We acted contrary to the sentiment and feeling of a great portion of the men who are with us. So it was on every question, until we came to Mr. Lincoln's proclamation of emancipation; that proclamation which the earnest men in the Senate and in the House of Representatives—which you, sir, and many of us here—pleaded and begged for day after day and month after month, because we knew it would put the country in harmony with the decrees of Almighty God. When it came it encountered a storm of passion and prejudice. State after State fell away. Thousands turned their backs upon Mr. Lincoln. That act of emancipation, so gloried over to-day, cost us for months the support of many of those who had acted with us. We had to encounter the sternest denunciation of those who were against us.

The crowning act of emancipation, the great constitutional amendment, was sternly resisted. The fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution, the civil rights bill, the Freedman's Bureau bill, every measure that we have passed to enlarge the rights and privileges of that emancipated race, to protect them, to lift them up, has encountered not only the sternest opposition of those who were against us politically, but it has encountered the prejudices of a portion of those who ordinarily vote with us. Men who have been trusted and honored, who have held seats in these Chambers and in the Cabinet, have hesitated, have faltered, have left us and joined the ranks of our defectors. This constitutional amendment, which if it be submitted to the people and sustained by the States is to crown the great work, to make every citizen equal in rights and privileges, will cost us the opposition of some of our political associates. But no matter what timid friends say about it, it is right, absolutely right, and it is our duty in the light of to-day to take the responsibilities of our position, submit it to the people of the country, and do all we can to have it speedily ratified by the States. When it becomes a part of the Constitution, as I have faith it will, then the great work, so far as legislation is concerned, will have been accomplished. Then we shall have equality among all male citizens of the United States at least; and then we will protect the citizens of the country in the exercise of those rights. With an administration coming into power pledged to liberty and equality of rights and privileges, pledged to peace, I believe before the four years pass away we shall become accustomed in all parts of the country to see all classes of our citizens peacefully exercising their rights. When that day comes, as come it will if we are true and brave, we shall have peace and good neighborhood and kindly feeling all over the country; these questions that have excited so much of passion and prejudice will have passed away; the country will be lifted up and carried forward. When the work is achieved all sections of the country will thank God that it is accomplished, and the people will wonder why it was that they ever made any opposition to its accomplishment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States now before the Senate. My opinions have been on one or two occasions expressed to the Senate upon that subject. I think that the history of the last two or three years does not strengthen the position of gentlemen who claim that the right of suffrage ought to be extended to the colored population. The governments that have been established in some of the States under that policy are not such a success in protecting person and property and promoting the prosperity and peace of the people as will justify any very confident demand made by the friends of this measure.

The question which I wish to discuss just now is that of the proper submission of this amendment to the people or to the States. I am not able to concur in all of the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky. One of the features of his proposition is that the amendment may be submitted to the people of the States to be voted upon in the popular way by the people. I am not aware of any provision of the Constitution of the United States authorizing the ratification of an amendment in that mode. So far as the future is concerned, I have no doubt that we may so amend the Constitution. The question which I wish to speak of now is, how shall this amendment be considered by the people? It is radical and important, and it should be decided in the country according to the will and the pleasure of the people. How can that be done? In the absence of a constitutional provision authorizing it, I cannot see how it can be submitted to a popular vote in the States.

There are only two modes of ratification: one is by the Legislatures of the States, and the other by conventions called in the States; and it seems to be competent for Congress to decide upon the mode of ratification as between these two modes. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DIXON] has proposed a submission to conventions in the States, as I understand it. That is the nearest possible approach that we can now make to the people with this amendment. I wish we could provide, but I am not clear that it is practicable, that this amendment shall not be considered by any Legislature already selected. If it could be submitted to Legislatures the members of which are hereafter to be elected that would answer every purpose, as I think, desired by the Senator from Connecticut; but I suppose it is not practicable or possible for Congress to say to the States what particular Legislature shall consider the amendment. I am not sure upon that question. I wish I could feel sure that we might say that the Legislatures now elected shall not consider it. I want, in some mode or other, the people to pass upon this measure. If they decide that suffrage in this country shall be without limit, then, of course, it becomes their voice; it becomes right so far as Government is concerned; but until that is done no submission will be altogether satisfactory. So that I know of no mode by which we can secure the voice and judgment of the people except that suggested by the Senator from Connecticut; and what I wish to say now to the Senate is in favor of that proposition.

I submit to honorable Senators on all sides that none of us to-day politically stand in a position to deny this proposition. It is proposed by the Senator from Connecticut that the people in the selection of delegates to the State conventions shall have a voice upon this matter. It is their matter. It is ours no further than we constitute a part of the body of the people. The Senator from Connecticut proposes that the people shall speak upon the great question of changing the Constitution of the United States in regard to the exercise of political power. Is that unreasonable? Is it not right? Did not this Government come from the people through State conventions? Is it not right that when we change it we shall come as near to the people as is possible?

Who says that a member of a Legislature elected last summer or fall ought to act upon a question that was not considered by the people when they elected him? Did I understand some Senator to say that this question was considered in the election? I think some Senator interrupted the distinguished Senator from Kentucky and called his attention to the election of last fall. I call your attention to the election of last fall, honorable Senators, and I ask you now to stand upon the pledge of honor that your party made to the people in the election last fall.

The position of the Democratic party last summer, I presume, is not a question of doubt or of uncertainty. That the Democratic party, in casting its vote for Seymour and Blair, did not vote for negro suffrage, is plain enough. That the Republican party last fall in voting for Grant and Colfax cast a vote against universal suffrage is as plain. You took the question away from the people. You said that they need not consider it. You said that they should not consider it last summer; and now I understand it to be proposed to submit it to Legislatures that are not again responsible to the people, but that were elected before this question is submitted. The second section of the Chicago platform, not yet a year old, declared the doctrine of the Republican party, and I simply ask honorable Senators now to make the pledged and plighted faith of their party to the country good and true, and not in the face of the nation and of humanity to give it the lie:

"The guarantee by Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained."

That is plain enough. In that you say that the guarantee of suffrage to all the loyal men in the South was called for by high considerations and must be maintained. Your party took plain ground upon that question; but in the northern States, in the State that I have the honor to represent in this body, what position did you take? You go on to say:

"While the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

Not yet a year old is this political faith, declared by the grand council of your party, upon which Grant and Colfax stood before the people; and now you propose, without giving the people a voice or a hearing upon the question, to say that the right to control suffrage in the northern States does not belong to the people of those States.

I ask honorable Senators, upon this question of submission for ratification, what that plighted faith of a great party to the people did mean? Was it an evasion? If so, your party is unworthy of a nation's support. Was it a trick and a fraud? Then you are not only unworthy of a nation's support but worthy only of the condemnation of virtuous manhood everywhere and in all ages. To the people you submitted the question last fall, did you? You interrupt the Senator from Kentucky and say that the election last fall meant something! If so, what did it mean? You said to the party when they cast ballots for Grant and Colfax: "Your ballot, if it means anything on this subject, means just two propositions: first, that in the southern States Congress shall maintain equal suffrage to loyal men; but in the other States, in the northern States, the right to control suffrage belongs to the people of those States." Did it belong to them? Then give them a voice upon it and make this declaration of your party true, and not stand before the nation and before the world as declaring a falsehood in a national platform.

Circumstances may change in a country so as that the policy of a party must change somewhat. I have heard much said about "the logic of events." I have heard inconsistencies in political action and conduct and faith apologized for upon the general proposition of "the logic of events." But since the 20th day of May last up to the present hour what events have occurred that change this question? The negroes were free then—as free as now; your understanding of the subject was as ample then as now; and you said that in Indiana the right to control suffrage properly of right belonged to the people of that State. Now you propose to take it away from them, and, whatever may be the voice of Indiana, if you can get the concurrence of three fourths of the State Legislatures you propose to say to the people of Indiana, "It is not properly your right to control suffrage; it does not belong to you; our Chicago platform was false upon that subject." Men may be untrue to their political faith elsewhere, where offices are to be obtained, where political power is to be held; but in the Senate of the United States may I not appeal to the representatives of great States to stand by pledged and plighted faith?

Now, is this wrong that is asked by the Senator from Connecticut? He asks that this amendment shall be submitted to the people, the people whose Government you propose to change, that they may have a voice on this question; not that the men who hold office now in the Legislature of the State of Indiana, but the great body of voters, three hundred and seventy thousand of them, in the State of Indiana, shall be heard upon this amendment. I almost understood the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts to be an admission that the people were against it. If the people are against it what right have you to change the Government? Is it not the Government of the people, made by them and for themselves?

Then, Mr. President, the proposition is a distinct one. Now, inasmuch as you propose to take a position contrary to the position upon which your President-elect was chosen by the people, now as you propose to throw upon the country a new position upon this question, the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut is that it shall go as directly to the people as can be under the circumstances of the case. My appeal then is, that Senators will so amend this proposition as that it shall go to the people. Then, when they decide it, let it stand.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, there have been fourteen amendments to the Constitution of the United States heretofore ratified. They have all been submitted to the State Legislatures for ratification, and have been ratified by the various Legislatures. That has been the course pursued from the beginning of this Government until now. Never before was it pretended that such a ratification was not a ratification by the people. In the beginning of the Constitution it is declared that "we, the people, do ordain this Constitution," &c.; and in this Constitution ordained by the people a mode of amending it was pointed out by the people; and that was to submit the amendment to the individual States. In the Chicago platform we did take the position that this matter to a certain extent belonged to the States; and that is what influenced several members of the Senate against legislation who had formerly thought there was power to legislate directly upon this subject; they thought they were committed to submit it to the several States. The platform says that so far as the rebel States are concerned it is the duty of Congress to maintain equal suffrage. It says further that the other question should be submitted to the several States; and it is not to be pretended that that platform meant that it should be submitted for ratification in any unusual manner. We have adopted the manner adopted from the foundation of the Government of taking the sense of the people.

A literal construction of the amendment would prevent any action whatever, because the Constitution does not point out any mode of taking the popular vote. In neither of the modes prescribed by the Constitution do the people act directly. There is no way of amending the Constitution so as to let the people act directly on the amendment. As the Constitution is now, you can submit the question to the Legislature or to a convention in the State—to no other body. It has been thought that the Legislature reflected more directly the will of the people than a convention irregularly called; and hence from the foundation of the Government all constitutional amendments proposed by Congress have been submitted to the State Legislatures for action.

Sir, it is very strange that whenever the Constitution of the United States can be construed to deny rights it is sacred with some; but whenever it can be used to secure right and liberty we are complained of for following the Constitution. Does the Senator from Indiana suppose that the Republican party intended in the Chicago convention to change the Constitution or to limit the power of Congress to submit propositions to the several States under the Constitution? No such construction is fair; no such construction can be maintained. The people understood perfectly well that Congress had power to submit amendments to the Constitution and ask for the action of the several States. They did regard that as a pledge against legislation; and that is the embarrassment in the way of legislation; but they did not regard it as a pledge against submitting propositions to amend the Constitution in the ordinary way.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President—

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator desires to go on to-night I shall not ask him to yield; otherwise, I desire to ask the Senate—

Mr. DAVIS. With the permission of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, I will withdraw the amendment which I proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President—

Mr. BUCKALEW. With the permission of the Senate, I desire to move that the amendment offered by me to this resolution be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I also desire to offer a resolution for reference.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 209) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move its reference to the select Committee on Representative Reform.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts who last spoke [Mr. Wilson] informed the Senate that the proposition to extend the right of suffrage to all the races—

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, as the Senator from Connecticut is desirous of making some remarks of moderate length, and it is late, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. I ask leave to call up a bill. Let this matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As the Senator from Connecticut is willing to go on, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have an amendment to offer to the measure that is pending; and I desire to offer it and have it printed.

The PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to lay this resolution aside informally for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 811, to provide for the reduction of the military forces, and for other purposes. I think we can pass the bill in fifteen minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEWART. I shall object, because if we commence that there are so many other things which other Senators will want to bring up. If we can keep this resolution before the Senate we can dispose of it to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON. This bill will only take a few moments.

Mr. STEWART. But if I give way to one there are others who wish to take up other bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut is entitled to the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the assent of the Senator from Connecticut, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STEWART. Before that motion is put I desire to say to the Senate that I shall try very hard to-morrow to get a vote on this resolution, and I hope the Senate will stand by me until we reach a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 28, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLAINE, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1870; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for Monday next after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter till disposed of.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I reserve any point of order upon the bill.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATION OF GEORGIA.

Mr. PAINE. I rise to make a privileged report. The Committee on Reconstruction have instructed me to offer the following resolution and to ask for its immediate consideration. I move the previous question:

Whereas it is provided by the reconstruction act passed March 2, 1867, that "until the people of the lately rebellious States shall be by law admitted to representation in Congress, any civil government which may exist therein shall be deemed provisional only, and that no persons shall be eligible to office in such provisional governments who are disqualified for office by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States; and whereas it is reported that the Legislature of Georgia has expelled the colored members thereof and admitted to their seats white men who received minorities of votes at the polls, and that members of said Legislature who had been elected thereto by the votes of colored men joined in such action, and that twenty-seven disqualified white men hold seats in said Legislature in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution and of the reconstruction acts of Congress; and whereas Senators from Georgia have not yet been admitted to the Senate of the United States: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Reconstruction be ordered to inquire and report whether any, and if any what, further action ought to be taken during the Fortieth Congress respecting the representation of Georgia in this House.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman says the resolution was ordered to be reported by the committee. I ask him if the preamble was also ordered to be reported?

Mr. PAINE. The preamble and resolution in this precise form were ordered to be reported by the committee.

Mr. BROOKS. One more question. I ask if this subject in its entirety is not now before the Committee on Reconstruction; and if so, what is the necessity of its resubmission? What action is proposed here which the committee is not already authorized to take?

Mr. PAINE. The condition of things generally in Georgia is before the committee, but—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. PAINE. I do not.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 70, noes 30; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PAINE and BROOKS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 33.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for a separate vote on the preamble.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. NIBLACK. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken on agreeing to the resolution; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 34, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Calk, Callis, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Deweese, Duckery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Gove, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kitchen, Koontz, Laflin, Lash, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Newham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pottis, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polisy, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Root, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Bart Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—128.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Baker, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Fox, Getz, Goldaday, Grover, Haight, Hochstetler, Humphrey, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, Niblack, Phelps, Pym, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stone, Taber, Tilt, Van Auker, Wood, Woodward, and Young—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Bowen, Boyden, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cornell, Delano, Dickel, Dixon, Eckley, Edwards, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, Garfield, Grossbrenner, Goss, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Asbel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Johnson, Kellogg, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Lunckbridge, Mallory, McCormick, McCutlough, Morrissey, Mungen, Nicholson, Nunn, Pomeroy, Robinson, Smith, Sypher, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Woodbridge—60.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE. I demand the previous question on the preamble.

Mr. CHANLER. Is it in order to move to recommit the preamble with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CHANLER. Then I move to lay the preamble on the table.

The question was put; and the House refused to lay the preamble on the table.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 94, noes 32.

The main question was then ordered to be put, being upon agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. CHANLER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 39, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Calk, Callis, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Deweese, Dodge, Donnelly, Edwards, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, French, Gove, Gravelly, Griswold, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketchum, Kitchen, Koonz, Ladin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Mallory, Marvin, Maynard, McCarthy, McKee, Mercier, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pettis, Pierce, Pike, Plants, Poland, Polscy, Price, Prince, Raun, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Seefeldt, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starkweather, Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—133.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chandler, Fox, Getz, Glassbrenner, Goldaday, Grover, Haight, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, Niblack, Phelps, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Tift, Van Aiken, Wood, Woodward, and Young—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Barnum, Bowen, Boyden, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cornell, Delano, Dickey, Dixon, Dockery, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Ferry, Garfield, Goss, Halsey, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Asabel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Johnson, Kellogg, Lincoln, Logan, Loughbridge, McCormick, McCullough, Morrissey, Mungen, Nicholson, Nunn, Pile, Pomeroy, Smith, Sypher, Taffe, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Trump, Vidal, and Cadwalader C. Washburn—53.

So the preamble was agreed to.

Mr. PAINE moved to reconsider the votes by which the resolution and the preamble were severally agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER.

On motion of Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Commerce was discharged from the further consideration of a letter from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 16th ultimo, relative to a bridge over the Missouri river at Kansas City; and the same was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. CHANLER moved to reconsider the various votes by which matters were referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE EAST RIVER.

Mr. BARNES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1804) to establish a bridge across the East river between the cities of Brooklyn and New York, in the State of New York, a post road; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the regular order of business.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 833) for the relief of Rufus M. Hollister, of Jonesville, Wisconsin; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1751) in relation to the appointment of midshipmen from the lately reconstructed States.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 844) for the relief of Captain Charles Hunter, United States Navy.

The message also requested the return to the Senate of the bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of William McGarrahan, which was indefinitely postponed by the Senate in July last, also the papers in the case.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

By unanimous consent, it was ordered that the bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of William McGarrahan, with the accompanying papers, be returned to the Senate, in accordance with its request.

GAUGER'S FEES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 25th instant, relative to gauger's fees for gauging and inspecting liquors; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PENITENTIARIES IN THE TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the construction of penitentiaries in certain Territories therein named; which was referred to the Committee on the Territories, and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF POTTAWATOMIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting a report of the commissioners appointed under the tenth article of the Pottawatomie treaty of August 7, 1868, to examine the claims of said tribe; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGIA CONSTITUTIONAL ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the resolutions reported from the Committee of Elections in reference to the case of John H. Christy and of John A. Wimpy, each claiming to be duly elected a Representative in this Congress from the sixth congressional district of Georgia.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That J. H. Christy, having voluntarily given aid, countenance, counsel, and encouragement to persons engaged in armed hostility to the United States, is not entitled to take the oath of office as a Representative in this House from the sixth congressional district of Georgia, or to hold a seat therein as such Representative.

Resolved, That John A. Wimpy, not having received a majority of the votes cast for Representative in this House from the sixth congressional district of Georgia, is not entitled to a seat therein as such Representative.

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the question of removing political disabilities from John H. Christy, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to have these resolutions considered separately.

The SPEAKER. A separate vote will be taken upon each resolution upon the demand of any member.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent that each of the gentlemen claiming to be entitled to this seat be permitted to address the House upon the merits of the case under the rules of the House.

No objection was made.

Mr. DAWES. The vote which has just been given by the House instructing the Committee on Reconstruction to examine matters connected with the State of Georgia has somewhat embarrassed the Committee of Elections as to what disposition it may be proper for them to ask the House to make of this case; whether, after having instructed the Committee on Reconstruction to inquire into these matters, it is not the proper course that these resolutions be referred to that committee. They would have no question but what that reference would be the most proper disposition to be made of these resolutions at this time were it not that the Committee of Elections were unanimously of opinion that neither of these parties was entitled to the seat claimed, even assuming that everything under the reconstruction acts had been complied with. Yet there may be, as every member of the House will see, a contingency in which the House might not agree with the committee in that respect, and then we should find ourselves involved immediately in the discussion of the very question which the House by a very decided vote—in which most of the members of the Committee of Elections, myself among the number, have agreed—has referred to another committee. Under these circumstances, the vote of the House instructing the Committee on Reconstruction having just been given, I have been unable to confer with all the members of the Committee of Elections upon this view of the case. I am, however, willing, and I do not know but that it is necessary—certainly I shall interpose no objection to that course—that before we enter upon this discussion, inasmuch as the House may think that one or the other of these claimants is entitled to represent this district, if the House shall deem it best, this subject shall be postponed for the present.

Mr. UPSON. Will my colleague upon the Committee of Elections [Mr. Dawes] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. UPSON. My colleague will recollect that in concurring in this report I distinctly announced to the committee that the question whether or not Georgia should be entitled to representation was not involved, and that on that subject I would not commit myself until that question, now pending before the Committee on Reconstruction, shall have been reported upon and decided by this House.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know that there would be any diversity of opinion among the members of the Committee of Elections upon the facts that came before the committee. But if the House should be of opinion that one or the other of these gentlemen was entitled, upon the papers before the Committee of Elections, to a seat upon this floor for the district named, I think there would be no difference of opinion in the minds of the members of the Committee of Elections that the question of the right of Georgia to be represented at all in this House should be decided before these resolutions shall be passed upon. Under these circumstances I am really at a loss to know what disposition to make of this case. It would be profuse for us to spend much time in discussing this question now if the result should be, after all, that it would be necessary to refer these resolutions to that committee for the precise examination which they have already been instructed to make. It is, however, desirable for these claimants to have their case determined. The Committee of Elections were unanimously of the opinion that neither of the claimants was entitled to represent that district in Congress under any circumstances. If, however, no member of the Reconstruction Committee is of opinion that the reference of the case of Georgia this morning takes this question away from the House for the present I may as well discharge the duty devolved upon me by the Committee of Elections, and present this case as I have been instructed to present it.

Mr. PAINE. If the chairman of the Committee of Elections will allow me—

Mr. DAWES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PAINE. I desire to say that the views which the gentleman [Mr. Dawes] has expressed on this subject seem to me to be correct; and it is, in my judgment, proper that a motion should be adopted by the House to postpone the consideration of this case until the question involved in the resolution agreed to this morning shall have been decided. But I do not feel willing to make such a motion if it will interfere with the direction which the Committee of Elections may see fit to give to this case. I will merely say that to me, as one member of the Reconstruction Committee, it seems quite proper that it should take that course.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Speaking for one of the contestants, Mr. Wimpy, I am quite content, as I understand he is, to have this case referred to the Committee on Reconstruction; but I think that the present posture of the question had better not be interfered with until after the case of Mr. Christy is settled. I do not think that Mr. Christy's case ought to be referred to anybody, and I am here for the purpose of arguing that proposition. But as to the question whether Mr. Wimpy is entitled to represent this district I can have no doubt that that should not be settled until the main question is settled. But Mr. Christy, I am prepared to show from evidence emanating from his own hand, does not stand anywhere, and ought not to represent anybody on earth.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully submit to the House and to the chairman of the Committee of Elections that the opening argument in favor of Mr. Wimpy, just made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] presents a cogent reason why this whole subject should be discussed before this House. To refer a matter of such great public importance, involving the right to a seat upon this floor, to the Committee on Reconstruction, even with the consent of the chairman of the Committee of Elections, when the latter committee has prepared a report, is out of order and inconsistent with the dignity of the question involved. Certainly the merits of these two contestants are sufficiently plain to be understood by this House as well as by the condensed intelligence of any committee whatever. The only object of a preliminary consideration of this question prior to its presentation to this House is, as it always is in such cases, to lay before the House the general merits of the case. Why should we transfer the decision of this question from the body of the House into the hands of the Committee on Reconstruction? Why should not the House decide upon this question after due discussion? This strikes me as the practical, fair, reasonable, and customary manner of proceeding in such cases.

I hope the chairman of the Committee of Elections will take into view my statement in reference to this case, and will bear in mind that practically any reference of this subject to any other committee than the Committee of Elections would be simply a postponement of the debate upon the subject. To call for a decision by another committee upon a question which exclusively belongs to the Committee of Elections would be derogatory to the dignity of the committee, as well as inconsistent with the practice of this House and the dignity of the question involved.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. I will do so.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, the resolution adopted by the House this morning referring a matter of inquiry to the Committee on Reconstruction seems to me to put an obstacle in the way of our inquiring at this time whether either of these gentlemen or anybody else is entitled to represent the sixth congressional district of Georgia in this House, for surely if the investigation results as it is manifest the mover of the resolution anticipated it might possibly result the question now presented from the Committee of Elections will necessarily be postponed indefinitely. Hence, until that examination be had and the result reported to the House, we should, it seems to me, be consuming time unnecessarily and meeting questions prematurely by taking up and considering the claim of either of these gentlemen to a seat. Appearing as a personal friend of one of the contestants, formerly a neighbor of mine, a young man raised in my immediate neighborhood—a "carpet-bagger," I may say, from my State, he having gone to Georgia somewhere about the year 1859—I am prepared, either now or at any future time, to discuss his claim to a seat in this House when it shall have been settled that his district is entitled to a Representative here and when his claim shall have been disbarred of the question involved in the order of the House adopted this morning.

Mr. DAWES. Let me say to my colleague, [Mr. CHANLER,] who is apprehensive I shall forget the dignity of the Committee of Elections, that I am quite as sensible as he can possibly desire to have me upon the subject of the dignity and jurisdiction of that committee, and as I may have strength I shall endeavor to defend it; but unless the gentleman can assure me that the House will agree precisely with the committee in the conclusions arrived at I do not see how we can avoid the discussion immediately of the very question which has been referred to the Committee on Reconstruction. If I were quite certain that the House would agree precisely with the committee in the conclusion that neither of these gentlemen under any circumstances is entitled to this seat, we might dispose of the matter so far as they are concerned, and leave the question of the further representation of Georgia to the Committee on Reconstruction to consider at their leisure. But no one can tell how the House will decide that question, and therefore there is danger that we waste time in this discussion. Hence, I will yield the floor, for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of the House, to a motion to refer this matter to the committee, or a motion to postpone it to any future time, or any motion consistent with the dignity and jurisdiction of the Committee of Elections. I will now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BROOKS. I was about to say that I heartily concur in the suggestion made on the other side, that after the vote taken this morning in the case of Georgia it was hardly worth while for us further to continue this discussion until the question can be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction and we can have a report from that committee on the subject. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that after the little experience I have had in this House, seeing the Committee of Elections so often overruled, so little respected as to have its conclusions trampled under foot by this House over and over again, I prefer that the matter should be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction; because, in my judgment, whatever report that committee makes will be sustained, while whatsoever report may be made by the Committee of Elections is more likely to be upset than to be sustained by the majority of this House. I therefore am decidedly of opinion, more especially after the vote to-day, in which the House has committed itself to certain principles and certain matters adverse to representation of the State of Georgia at all, that the question ought first to be decided by the Reconstruction Committee whether Georgia has a status in this House or is to be turned wholly out of the House.

In reply to an incidental remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] I have to say that whenever the merits of these two claimants, Mr. Christy and Lieutenant Wimpy, of the confederate army, are discussed, whenever a contrast is to be drawn between the antecedents of these two gentlemen, if the gentleman from Massachusetts is able to show that Mr. Christy was anywhere I shall be able to show that Lieutenant Wimpy was almost everywhere. But I will not enter into a discussion of the merits of these candidates or their claims upon the House now. The vote of the House twice this morning on the yeas and nays, on a fair and ample division, has decided that the first question to be settled by a majority of the House is, has Georgia a status here? Have her present members any right here, or are they mere obtruders upon the floor of the House, holding without right and without law? The majority of the House having so decided to-day, if the Reconstruction Committee upon reference of this case to them adhere to the expressed opinion of the House their report will be that Georgia is not entitled to representation at all. Therefore whatsoever time is consumed here upon the two or three resolutions of the Committee of Elections will be time wasted and an obstruction to the public business to be transacted in this House.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. DAWES. I will yield three minutes.

Mr. MULLINS. That will be time enough for what I have to say. It is not my purpose to go into detail about this matter at all. It presents one great, grand feature, as I term it, that overrides the minor considerations in the case. I cannot join entirely with the gentleman from New York in lecturing the chairman of the Committee of Elections. As far as I am capable of seeing, that committee has done what will be approved by the House, and what is doubtless right in the scale of justice. This body is a body entitled to respect, and is respected by the outside world whether it is by all its members here or not. Then, in accordance with the action had by this committee in making the report they have made touching the case now to be considered, in my view they have hit the merits of the question in several particulars. The first grand particular is that the State of Georgia is not fully reconstructed. Part of her representatives are now debarr'd from entering Congress at the other end of the Capitol, while she is in part admitted to representation in this body. They are standing with one foot in the grave of rebellion and the other upon the rock of loyalty. We propose holding them in that position until it is ascertained clearly and conclusively that the State of Georgia, the State government of Georgia, has placed itself upon a platform that the American people and the American Congress can and will regard as being legitimately sound in all Republican essences and quintessences intended and meant by the words "republican government." [Laughter.] And how can we do otherwise than to follow the directions of this committee and conform to the request they make at our hands? But a moment ago—and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is as cognizant of the fact I am about to declare as any other gentleman here—the Committee on Reconstruction have reported a resolution, with a preamble attached to it, declaring that they must and ought to consider the condition of Georgia and determine whether her political status is such that she is now entitled to be fully represented here. The House has declared by a decided vote, one that looms up and overshadows everything in opposition to it, that she is not in a condition now to be represented.

Now, one of the gentlemen contesting the seat is Mr. Christy. Well, Christy is a sweet name, a beautiful name, and if it had been "Christiana" or "Christianity" it would have been better still. [Laughter.] Some of the old apostles did stagger on the way, and I am afraid this man fell a little short of the mark; he ought to have so run as to gain; but he has missed the mark; he fell among the Bulgarians, and they have somewhat tattered his garments and covered him with mud. I want to wash him off if I can, but not at the sacrifice of loyal men. I hope the House will send this matter to the Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. DAWES. I yield now for three minutes to my colleague on the committee from Missouri.

Mr. STOVER. I do not exactly understand this question as my honorable friend from Tennessee does. I do not understand that the House has taken any decisive action on the right of the State of Georgia to representation in this House. The resolution adopted this morning was a resolution of inquiry merely. In regard to this case I will state that it went before the Committee of Elections simply upon its merits, and that Georgia occupied the same attitude that Tennessee, South Carolina, Mississippi, or any other of the States lately in rebellion would have occupied. I cannot see why this question should not be disposed of now. The committee have unanimously agreed that neither of the parties is entitled to a seat in this House. If the House should think differently and reverse the decision of the Committee of Elections and decide that one of the claimants is entitled to a seat here, he occupies the same position as any other member on the floor from the State of Georgia.

Now, as to the remark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] that "Lieutenant Wimpy, of the confederate army," may have been "everywhere," I will say, if it is intended to prejudice the case against him, that there was no particle of evidence presented before the committee that Mr. Wimpy ever held the position of lieutenant or any other commissioned office in the confederate army.

Mr. DAWES. I yield now for three minutes to my colleague, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not know whether the House desires to discuss this question at the present time. If they do not, however, allow this question to be settled, of course every gentleman representing Georgia ought from this time forth to represent her no longer until the report of the committee. I think on the whole it would be better now to settle this case, and, with the leave of the gentleman, I will state briefly the reasons. There is a unanimous report of the committee against Mr. Christy, in the first place, because he is ineligible and admits himself to be ineligible. They then report against Mr. Wimpy because they say that Mr. Wimpy is supposed to be ineligible under certain constructions of law. If these constructions of law are correct, perhaps Mr. Wimpy is ineligible, and his ineligibility consists in his having been in the confederate service at one time.

Now, the difference with me is this: I am willing to take by the hand any man who has been in the confederate service who has fought us honorably and fairly, and then, when the war was over, laid down his arms and yielded an honest support to the Government. I would rather take him by the hand than any man North or South who through the columns of a newspaper stirred up sedition which he did not dare to fight for, and who endeavored to make loyalty odious while he had not a particle of it in his own heart. In regard to this man, Christy, I have here a newspaper which was owned by him; I have seen a file of them, in which I find that as late as last May he poured forth a stream of venom against the loyal men of this Government such as I have never before seen or heard, counseling murder, sustaining the Kuklux Klan, advising that no negro be employed, calling us in this House conspirators and the spawn and crew of Thaddeus Stevens. And yet he comes here claiming a seat among us as a Representative from the State of Georgia.

Mr. DAWES. I will now yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.]

Mr. PAINE. If it be satisfactory to the chairman of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. DAWES.] and not otherwise, I will move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until the third Tuesday of February next, after the morning hour.

Mr. DAWES. I will allow the motion to be made.

Mr. PAINE. Then I submit that motion.

Mr. DAWES. I have yielded to allow that motion to be made in order to ascertain the sense of the House upon this subject, to determine whether we should go into the merits of this case at this time.

My colleague [Mr. BUTLER] has shown some disposition to go into the character of these gentlemen. At the proper time, if it be necessary, I trust the Committee of Elections will be able to make the House understand that we have fully appreciated the relative position of these two men and are disposed to do entire justice to them. I have not been very ambitious, representing that committee, to go into that question at this time. I am ready, however, if the House shall think it necessary and proper to dispose of the case now, to enter into the merits involved. If, however, the House shall decide that there may be a question whether the one or the other of these gentlemen is entitled to a seat then it will be necessary to learn from the Committee on Reconstruction precisely what we have instructed them this morning to ascertain and report to the House. Therefore I do not see how the case can be fully heard at this time. I will acquiesce in the decision of the House upon this question.

I will now yield for a few minutes to my colleague upon the Committee of Elections, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the motion to postpone, which is now pending, admits of but very limited debate under the rules of the House.

Mr. PAINE. I will withdraw the motion for the present so as to allow the gentleman from Ohio to be heard.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Had I known it would have taken even so much trouble as it has to enable me to state what I am about to state I should not have asked the opportunity to do so. The position in which we are now placed, as it seems to me, is just this: we will all agree upon the proposition that it cannot happen that any State is entitled to representation in this House when it is not at the same time entitled to its equal suffrage in the Senate. The question as to the position of the State of Georgia, in regard to the matter of its representation in the Senate, is now pending and undetermined in that branch of the national Legislature. It becomes proper for us, therefore, now to consider how that state of the constitutional law affects the matter now before the House.

In the position in which this case came before the Committee of Elections, as it turned out, the committee could dispose of all that was before them without determining anything in regard to the first question to which I have alluded, to wit, the propriety of the State of Georgia being represented in this House at all. But since the committee has acted and made its report to the House, that has transpired which it seems to me—and I of course now speak as a member of the House—makes it proper that we should postpone the question of the representation of Georgia in this House as well as the question now before the House until after that is disposed of which has transpired in this House since the committee made its report. I allude, of course, to the reference made to the Committee on Reconstruction. This House may not agree with the report of the Committee of Elections. If the House should agree to that report it will not touch or interfere with the question now referred to the Reconstruction Committee. But we cannot foresee the result of the vote of the House if we proceed with the consideration of this question now, and what I want to submit to the House is, that a decision which may dispose of the question of the propriety of the representation of Georgia in either branch of Congress should properly be postponed until the main question is disposed of. Although the report of the Committee of Elections as made would not touch that question, yet the decision of the House may affect it, and as we cannot foresee the decision of the House I suggest that it is perhaps well enough, all things considered, that the vote should be postponed.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] a question; and it is whether we must not "face the music," and unseat some half dozen members from Georgia already occupying seats in this House in order to carry out this idea of making Georgia a "republican form of government?"

Mr. DAWES. I will say to the gentleman that that is a question which has been referred to the Committee on Reconstruction this morning.

Mr. SPALDING. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has expressed, I think, the right view of the matter: that, in order to carry out the idea implied in the resolution adopted this morning we must unseat the representatives from Georgia already occupying seats on this floor.

Mr. PAINE. That may be the result.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether members from the whole State of Georgia, except this sixth district, have not already been admitted to seats in this House?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. Then I understand the question involved in the inquiry addressed to the Reconstruction Committee is whether, in case the Committee on Reconstruction should report against the State of Georgia, this House can assume the right of displacing the members already admitted to their seats under the reconstruction law, and whose seats are not contested? Now, in view of that fact, it seems to me it would be best to go on and decide at once the question presented in this report from the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to anticipate the conclusion to which the Committee on Reconstruction may arrive or any arguments by which they may sustain their report. I yield now to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] that he may renew his motion to postpone.

Mr. PAINE. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until the third Tuesday of February next, after the morning hour.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. Is not that the day assigned by the Constitution for other business?

The SPEAKER. The day to which the gentleman refers is the second Wednesday of February.

On the motion of Mr. PAINE, there were—ayes 78, noes 39.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes eighteen, noes not counted.

Mr. HARDING. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the motion of Mr. PAINE was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION LAWS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and the first business in order is the consideration of the bill pending at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 1682) relating to the operations of the pension laws, and for other purposes. The House having refused to second the previous question on the bill and pending amendments, the floor passes to the opponents of the bill, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.]

Mr. NIBLACK. I inquire, Mr. Speaker, whether this bill is in order during the morning hour this morning? The Committee on Invalid Pensions has already occupied two morning hours.

The SPEAKER. A committee is entitled, under the rules, to but two morning hours; but any bill pending at the expiration of the second morning hour must be disposed of before any other committee can be called. This bill, therefore, continues as the business of the morning hour until disposed of.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move, then, to recommit the bill and pending amendments to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. PERHAM. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. NIBLACK. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERHAM. Gentlemen will see at once that the recommitment of this bill will be the end of it; for the Committee on Invalid Pensions will not again be reached before the end of the session. While, therefore, the committee are desirous that members shall have ample opportunity to offer amendments to the bill, they hope that the measure will be definitely acted on now.

Mr. NIBLACK. I modify my motion, and move that the bill be recommitment with instructions to strike out the second section, and that the committee have leave to report at any time.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] by adding instructions to strike out of the first section after the word "widow" the words "is a non-resident of the United States and;" so that the clause will read:

Nor shall payment of such pension heretofore allowed be continued in any case when the widow has for five consecutive years immediately preceding his death lived separate and apart from him, and without receiving from him any support.

Mr. NIBLACK. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] as a modification of my motion.

The SPEAKER. That part of the motion of the gentleman which proposes that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be authorized to report back this bill at any time requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. ROSS. Object.

Mr. PAINE. I would like to inquire whether the instructions embrace the insertion of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WASHBURN?]

The SPEAKER. That is pending. If the bill is referred, that will be referred also, but the instructions will not cover it.

Mr. NIBLACK. I insist upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. ARNELL. I appeal to the gentleman—

Mr. NIBLACK. Gentlemen are appealing to me all around. I decline to yield.

On seconding the previous question there were—ayes 33; noes 40; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. NIBLACK and PERHAM were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 72.

So the previous question was not seconded.

The SPEAKER. The House having refused to second the previous question the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maine. The motion to recommit with instructions is pending.

Mr. PERHAM. I inquire whether on this motion it will be in order to discuss the merits of the first and second section?

The SPEAKER. It brings up the whole question before the House.

Mr. PERHAM. Mr. Speaker, the second section of this bill has met with opposition of a determined and persistent character, such as I confess I little expected. But I feel certain that the members who have taken an active part in opposition to this measure, if they had taken the pains to study the purport of the sections to which their opposition was more especially directed, would have refrained from opposing them. I am quite certain now, notwithstanding the impression that might have been made by remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] yesterday, that if I can get the ear of the House, and if members will only get an idea of what we want to accomplish by this measure and the necessity for it, the committee will be sustained. Why, sir, an impression was made yesterday upon some persons in the House, and outside of it, who came to me this morning and desired to know whether or not it was the fact that we had presented a provision in this bill requiring every widow of a soldier to be put under oath to testify as to whether she was a chaste woman or not. A very singular idea it was, but one which might have been very properly deduced from the remarks of the gentlemen who spoke on this subject.

I said I was surprised at the opposition the bill met with. The moment the second section was read my good friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] seemed to be thrown into a state of excitement such as I never witnessed on his part before during this session, and so loud and continuous, though sitting in his seat, were his exclamations of contempt and opposition to the measure that those of us in his vicinity could scarcely hear the rest of the bill read. He continued in that state of mind until I gave him an opportunity to make his speech. Since that time he has seemed to be comparatively quiet. But not only was that gentleman in a state of excitement, but the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL], the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE], and others, seemed to be struggling for the honor of moving to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman is mistaken in referring to me.

Mr. PERHAM. I thought the gentleman was desirous of the honor. But I awarded the floor to the gentleman from Ohio, believing that the other gentlemen who were exercised on the subject would be willing that he might have the honor of making the motion.

Mr. PAINE. I simply wish to say that I did not seek an opportunity of moving to strike out that section, although I should vote to strike it out.

Mr. PERHAM. Now, in regard to what this bill seeks to accomplish, the first question that arises is whether there is any occasion for this kind of legislation. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] declared in his speech yesterday, in language which I confess did not strike me as very becoming from a man representing a district that he does, that such a measure could only have emanated from the cold and frigid regions of the State of Maine. I will refer to that again at a later stage of my remarks. If gentlemen had read the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, which has been laid on the desks of members of the House, they would have seen that he called special attention to this subject. He says:

"Widows in increasing numbers cohabit without marriage, refusing this solemn rite and living in open prostitution." The Government should not be placed unwittingly in the strange attitude of offering a premium upon immorality.

Mr. PILE. What are you reading from?

Mr. PERHAM. From the report of the Commissioner of Pensions. I read it for the purpose of showing that this proposition did not emanate entirely from the "cold and frigid regions of Maine." Now, as for the occasion for legislation of this kind facts are coming to the knowledge of the Pension Office from different sections all over the country of numerous instances—and the number is increasing every day—of widows who are entitled to pensions who perhaps contract for marriage with men, but for the purpose of retaining their pensions they come together and live together as though they were married, and have children. In such a case, the woman every six months makes oath that she is still a widow and she draws her pension from the Government. You place the Government, by the law as it now is, in this anomalous position; and I ask my friends who oppose this measure to see just what they propose to vote for if they vote as they indicated they would yesterday. Here are two widows drawing pensions and living, it may be, in the same community. They both make an agreement with some gentlemen of their acquaintance for marriage.

Mr. WOOD. I rise to a question of order. It is that the gentleman is perpetrating a libel and calumny on these widows. If he knows of any such cases as he has referred to it is his duty to specify them, and not to thus slander the whole class.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, upon the ground that the remarks of the gentleman from Maine were parliamentary and decorous. The Chair can only decide parliamentary questions. A bill of this character brings up precisely this question, and the remarks of the gentleman from Maine are in order.

Mr. WOOD. Well, I hope the gentleman from Maine will name the parties to whom he refers.

Mr. PERHAM. My purpose is to keep myself within the parliamentary rules of debate. The gentleman from New York desires names. I am not going to peddle out any names here. It is not my business.

Mr. WOOD. You have no right to slander the whole class.

Mr. PERHAM. If the gentleman from New York desires to get names let him go to the office of the Commissioner of Pensions and there he can get names. I am not going to give them here.

I was going on to say that two widows living in the same community and entitled to pensions contract each with a man to marry. One of the women marries honestly, as she should do; under your law she forfeits her pension. The other declines to marry, but lives with the man just the same as though she were married, and she draws her pension every six months, making oath that she is still a widow. The Government is thus placed in this position: you take away the pension from the woman who is honest and has married as she ought to do, while to the woman who is dishonest and living in crime you give the pension as a reward for her sin. That is just the position.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask the gentleman a question at this point. Suppose the woman he speaks of should happen to live with a soldier who was also pensioned, which would be the greater, the crime of the woman or the crime of the male pensioner?

Mr. PERHAM. Perhaps it may be as well for me to answer that question now as at any other time. I know the question was asked the other day why we did not make this provision apply to soldiers who are entitled to pensions and who may have lived bad lives. To my mind the distinction is very clear. In the instance to which I refer the Government actually gives a premium to the woman who lives in sin and crime. You refuse to the woman who is honest, and marries as she ought to marry, any pension, while you continue the pension to the woman who is living in sin.

Now, a word in regard to the male pensioners to whom the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] refers. That is an entirely different case. You offer to the man no premium for crime. You give him a pension because he himself has personally bared his bosom to the storm of battle; he himself has personally suffered the loss of an eye or the loss of a limb or the loss of his health upon the field of battle. I do not know what the members of the House may think, but the members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions are of opinion that there is a great difference in the cases.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman tell us the name of the commissioner who is to decide these questions, and before whom these persons are to be arraigned?

Mr. PERHAM. That makes no difference at all. The name of the commissioner has nothing to do with the settlement of the question before the House, which is this: do the members of this House propose to continue a system which offers a premium to vice? We propose if a woman prefers to live on in this way we will not continue her pension; that is all.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to submit a proposition to the gentleman, as somewhat of a legal proposition. As I understand it, a pension is a gratuity, whether given to a soldier a male, or to a female the widow of a soldier; it is a mere gratuity on the part of the Government. It is proposed now to take that pension from the woman. Why? Because of crime on her part. The gratuity is to be stopped because of the crime on the part of the pensioner. Now, the male, who is a soldier, who receives a pension, receives it as a gratuity just the same as the woman does. And if he is guilty of adultery, living with this woman who is a pensioner, both refusing or neglecting to marry in order to continue to receive this pension, then I ask how is the crime on the part of the man any less than it is on the part of the woman? And if crime shall cause a suspension of the pension in the one case, why should it not in the other?

Mr. PERHAM. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] I desire to say that when you give or continue a pension to a woman acting in the manner I have described you really give her a reward for acting as she does act, because you withdraw the pension from the woman who marries.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. PERHAM. Certainly.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Long experience has taught us that it is wise to surround persons charged with crime with various safeguards. And our Constitution and laws provide that a person charged with the commission of a crime shall be presented by a grand jury, shall have a traverse jury to try his case, shall be allowed to meet his or her accusers face to face, and shall be allowed counsel on his or her behalf. Does my friend from Maine think it is wise to knock down all these safeguards and leave every widow of the war to the tender mercies of some person who from motives of vindictiveness or meddlesomeness may send a report to the Commissioner of Pensions charging her with crime, and requiring him to put her upon proof of her honesty before she can have her pension?

Mr. PERHAM. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] had been content to wait I would have answered his question at the proper time, without requiring him to ask it, and if gentlemen will allow me to proceed I will answer all their questions before I get through.

Mr. BOYDEN. I would ask the gentleman whether he supposes it is the duty of the Government or of its officers to take care of the morality of its citizens?

Mr. PERHAM. Not in all respects; but the Government should not offer a premium for crime. I have before me many facts bearing upon this subject, and the Pension Office is in possession of letters from the State of Illinois and from the State of Ohio and from other States whose members here are making opposition to this provision, which letters declare that this crime has become a very serious one there; and the Commissioner of Pensions reports that the number of persons who occupy this position is rapidly increasing; that more and more are entering upon this kind of life. And let me tell gentlemen of this House that though they may vote down this provision now the time is coming and not far distant when the people of this country will make such a demand upon Congress that it will be compelled to adopt some measure to prevent this evil.

Mr. MUNGEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PERHAM. For what purpose?

Mr. MUNGEN. I am opposed to charging the Commissioner of Pensions with the duty of superintending all offenses of this kind in the country. But I am willing that it should be placed in charge of the State of Maine.

Mr. PERHAM. The gentleman objects, I know, to the State of Ohio being named; but nevertheless the facts show that many such cases exist in the State of Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not believe it.

Mr. MUNGEN. Can the gentleman from Maine say in what part of the State any such cases have occurred?

Mr. PERHAM. Mr. Speaker, I find that this subject creates more excitement in this House than I had anticipated. I trust I shall be permitted to conclude what I wish to say in reference to these two sections, and then I will give way for other gentlemen. I was about to speak of the necessity for this kind of legislation; and I think that members on examining this subject, in view of the information that has been presented and that can be had at any time on application at the proper office, will concede that some such legislation as that proposed here is necessary. The question is, has the committee presented the best measure that can be presented?

The gentleman from Illinois has asked whether we are going to make the Commissioner of Pensions a censor of the morals of the pensioners in this country. The gentleman, it will be remembered, denounced this proposition as barbarous and an insult upon all the widows of United States soldiers who are entitled to pensions. The widows of our soldiers are, as a whole, virtuous and worthy women, and they do not ask that that class under consideration should have immunity for their crime, and they will not feel complimented by the declaration that this is insulting to them. Now, let me state what we propose. We do not propose to provide that on the presentation to the Commissioner of Pensions of any scandalous letter which may be written the woman whose character is impugned shall have her pension suspended. The bill provides that on the presentation of "satisfactory evidence"—mark the expression—"upon the presentation of satisfactory evidence" that a widow receiving a pension is living in this way, he may do—what? Not drop her name from the pension rolls, not suspend her pension; but on the presentation of satisfactory evidence to the Commissioner that the woman is living this kind of a life and receiving a pension, when by every principle of law she has violated her right to the pension, he shall make a copy of all the information that has been presented to him and send it to the woman accused. If there have been any scurrilous letters written that are considered evidence by the Commissioner of Pensions, copies of those letters go directly back to the community from which they emanated and to the woman against whom the accusation is made; and, without any forfeiture or suspension of the pension, six months are allowed to her to show that the accusations are unfounded. The committee were unable to devise any better safeguard than this. They may have failed to present the proper kind of measure, but the bill will be open to amendment, and any member can propose additional safeguards.

Now, let me pass to the third section. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] it will be remembered; moved to strike out both the second and the third section; but the speech which he made shows that he misapprehended entirely the purpose of the third section. The gentleman evidently understood it as a provision for withholding pensions from all pensioners employed in the civil service. Sir, that is not the purpose of the section. I will explain its object. In March, 1865, a bill was passed withholding from pensioners who might be employed in the civil service of the Government their pensions during the time they were so employed. The wisdom and justice of that measure I am not called upon to discuss. I will simply say that in all cases in which pensioners go into the Army they forfeit their pensions entirely. Every maimed soldier or officer now serving in the Veteran Reserve corps, or in any other branch of the military service, forfeits by going into the service the pension to which he would be otherwise entitled. A private soldier, though his pay may not be more than one fifth of what he would draw if employed in the civil service of the Government, can receive no pension on account of any wounds or disability which he may have suffered. Yet no one complains of that provision. But, sir, I do not intend to discuss the justice of that enactment. In 1866, about fifteen months after the passage of that act, the Government by another law restored to those men the pensions but not for the fifteen months that had elapsed between the passage of the two laws.

By the act of July, 1868, the time within which applications must be filed in order to allow the pensioner to draw a pension is five years from the time when the right accrues thereto. Under that provision of law there has been a decision of the Interior Department, one authorized by the act I presume, that pensioners who made their application after the passage of the act of July, 1868, even though they might have been employed during those fifteen months, are entitled to a pension for the whole time. The purpose of the committee was not to interfere with this law at all except to provide that those persons who happened to make their application after July, 1868, should have no advantage over those who made it before. That is all. We do not interfere with the law. If members of the House desire that this shall be restored, that this amount withheld shall be given back to the pensioner, that is a subject open to amendment, and any member of the House can have an opportunity to present it.

That, then, is all there is in regard to that subject. Now, sir, I would content myself with these remarks but for the fact that my friend from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] was pleased to characterize this measure in most unmeasured terms as an act fit only for a barbarous age; that it was indicative of barbarism, and that it could have emanated only from the cold and frigid regions of Maine. Mr. Speaker, Maine needs no defense on this floor. Her sons need none. Their impress is made upon the broad western prairies, the State of Illinois, that the gentleman represents, not excluded. The State of Maine furnished, according to her population, as many, as faithful, and as valiant soldiers as any other State. Proud as we all are of the soldiers who went from Illinois, I claim that those who went from Maine fought with equal prowess and valor upon almost every bloody field during the war. I detract nothing from the credit due to Illinois, and I claim that there shall be no detractation from the services performed by the soldiers of Maine during the recent struggle. That State has been as benevolent toward her soldiers as any other. She paid as good bounties as any other. While in the service she took care of their wives and little ones, and since the close of the war she has done and is doing. I am certain, as much as the State of Illinois. In addition to what the Government is paying, we are paying to our meritorious soldiers who are in needy circumstances a pension out of the State treasury. We have a separate department of the State government for the distribution of pensions. Our people by their legislation and by their acts toward the soldiers have indicated that they have as much regard for these men and their widows as the people of any other State. They have gone from their native State to the West, and have aided in developing the immense resources of the State of Illinois. If no Maine men had gone to that State would she, think you, have been quite up to her present prosperous and enviable condition? Many of her best citizens were reared in the "frigid" State of Maine, and were educated in her common schools, and wherever they have gone they compare favorably with the citizens of any other State. I know members of the House will feel that I give no offense when I say this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not desire to arrest the remarks of the gentleman, but he thinks they are scarcely germane upon the motion to recommit. If remarks in regard to the State of Maine are in order they may be extended to any other State.

Mr. PERHAM. I have but little more to say.

The SPEAKER. The remarks of the gentleman have been quite elaborate, and the Chair desires to bring the debate back to the bill.

Mr. PERHAM. I think I will be able to keep myself within the rule in order to finish what I desire to say upon this topic. Though what I have said may not have been strictly within the rules I thought that no member would be inclined to interfere with me, because I felt that the attack made upon this bill, characterizing it as a barbarous measure, which could only have emanated from the State of Maine, was one to which I ought to be privileged to reply.

Now, I was going to say that I had the privilege of visiting the State of Illinois some two years since, and I found people that had come from my State scattered all round. I found them there as lawyers, as doctors, as merchants, as mechanics, as statesmen, and where ever they were I found them leading men. Why, the good sense of the constituency that the gentleman himself represents sent here to this House for three successive Congresses a man who was born and reared and educated in "the cold and frigid regions of Maine." I refer to the lamented Owen Lovejoy, who had his birth there, who cultivated one of our farms until he was eighteen years of age, who was educated at one of our colleges.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must state to the gentleman from Maine—as the morning hour is so valuable to the committees—that the debate is certainly progressing beyond the range allowed under the rules. The motion is to recommit the bill, with instructions, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. If the remarks of the gentleman in regard to the distinguished citizens of Maide who have gone to Illinois are in order, then remarks in regard to all the other distinguished gentlemen who have gone there from other States would be in order. The morning hour is so valuable that the Chair must bring the debate back to the question before the House.

Mr. PERHAM. It is unfortunate that I have been obliged to make this reply in this peculiar form of the question. As it is, I recognize the justice of the decision of the Chair, and without making any further remarks I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN.]

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will detain the House but a moment, and what I have to say is in regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] to strike out the third section of the bill. I am satisfied that if the gentleman from Ohio had understood the effect of his motion he would not have made it, and if the members of the House can be made to understand the effect of the motion they will vote it down. Let me call the especial attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the effect of the third section. I understood him to argue yesterday that the effect of the section was to deprive soldiers of their pensions during the time they were employed in the civil service of the Government, and that it was unjust and wrong for us to do so. Such is not the effect of this section. The history of the matter is this: that from March, 1865, until June, 1866, a period of fifteen months, the law was that a person drawing a pension who was employed at full compensation in the civil service of the Government should be deprived of the pension during that period. That was the fact, and ninety-nine out of every hundred of those thus employed lost their pensions. But there is a class of cases yet pending, cases of a doubtful character, cases that were suspended at the Department for one cause or another, making perhaps an aggregate of one in one hundred, or perhaps a little more, but the number is few. This provision is merely that that one in a hundred shall be placed upon the same footing with the ninety-nine in one hundred that have already been dealt with. That is the effect of this provision.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Does this section apply to all pensioners who have made application since June, 1866?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It applies to all who were entitled to pensions under the general law, and also to those that we pension here every session by special acts.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Does it include all who have applied since 1866?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes; all of those who have applied since June, 1866, that were employed from March, 1865, to June, 1866, in the civil service. It merely places that one hundredth portion on the same footing as the ninety-nine hundredths that have been dealt with by the operation of the pension laws, thus giving that small number no advantage over the great bulk of them whose cases have already been disposed of by the Pension Bureau under the law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. One more question. Does not my amendment restore the ninety-nine, so that the whole hundred will get what was taken from them during that year?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The effect of the gentleman's amendment would be to cause the Pension Bureau to reopen all the cases that have been adjudicated on and disposed of during that period. I get this fact from the Pension Office, that there are about three thousand of these persons whose pensions were suspended during the fifteen months that they were receiving full salaries in the civil service of the Government. If they were all private—which we know they were not—drawing eight dollars per month, or ninety-six dollars a year, it would require the sum of $360,000 bonus to those parties, in addition to the large amount that we are now appropriating for the payment of pensions, to pay this class of persons that we never promised by any law or by any rule or by any regulation to pay. These parties went into the civil service knowing well what the law was. They forfeited eight dollars a month, and received from the Treasury from twelve to eighteen hundred dollars a year or from one hundred to one hundred and fifty dollars a month. For the purpose of getting the larger amount they forfeited the smaller. They were perfectly content to do so. It was a great advantage to them to do so; and as my colleague on the committee has stated, such is the law to-day in regard to our Army and our naval service. The law of 1865 only applied that rule to the civil service, but after its operation for fifteen months we repealed the law.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me interrupt the gentleman right here for a moment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will yield first to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman if the soldier does not perform the same services as the civilian alongside of him, and if this provision would not take from the soldier the amount of his pension?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I presume that such was the fact, but it was according to the law. I admit that the law was unjust, but still it was the law, and we administered the pension laws accordingly, and I am decidedly opposed to going back and opening up all these cases which have been passed upon, and which have passed almost into oblivion, for the purpose of bringing up the arrears of pensions at this late day.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not understand the section as explained, or else I misunderstand the explanation. My understanding of the section is this: by the law of 1863 or 1865—

Mr. BENJAMIN. The law of 1865.

Mr. LOGAN. By the law of 1865 persons were deprived of their pensions when they were employed in the civil service of the Government. That law was repealed in June, 1866. The Secretary of the Interior has decided that those applying for pensions since June, 1866, were entitled to this pension while in the civil service, but those who applied before that time were not. Am I correct?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Nearly so; not entirely.

Mr. LOGAN. I want the gentleman to explain this to the House; that is, if I am correct, and I think I am. In 1865 a law was passed depriving persons of their pensions who were employed in the civil service of the Government. Now, according to the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, if persons entitled to pensions failed to make applications for them until after June, 1866, they were not affected by that law, but were entitled to receive their pensions? Is that the case?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I want the gentleman to tell the House if the proposition of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is not this: it is to debar those persons who were not sharp enough not to file their applications prior to the time I have named from receiving pensions for the time they were in the civil service of the Government, while those who were sharp enough to withhold their applications until after June, 1866, are entitled to their pensions during that time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman entirely misapprehends this section.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well, then; what is it?

Mr. BENJAMIN. We say that those persons who did not apply until after the repeal of the law of 1865 shall have no advantage over those who applied before the repeal of the law.

Mr. LOGAN. The Secretary of the Interior has decided that those who applied subsequently to June, 1866, are entitled to pensions during the time they were in the civil service, and this provision proposes to deprive them of that right.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, and I will tell the gentleman the effect of it.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman will pardon me; I yielded only for a question.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. BENJAMIN. According to the Secretary of the Interior, those who are entitled to receive pensions at all, whose applications are pending to-day, or who neglected to make application until after June, 1866, are entitled to receive their pensions for the fifteen months that the law was in force while they were in the civil service. As I said before, probably ninety-nine of every hundred persons entitled to pensions made applications before the repeal of the law. But under that decision the one in the hundred who neglected to make application until after the repeal of the law will get the pension. The proposition of the committee is to put that one on the same footing with the ninety-nine.

Mr. LOGAN. Another question right here.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Very well.

Mr. LOGAN. Do you not believe, as one of the Committee on Pensions, having examined this law, that it was wrong in its inception?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. Then why not say that the law was wrong, and restore pensions to all those whom that law deprived of pensions?

Mr. BENJAMIN. We have already repealed that law.

Mr. LOGAN. Then if the law was wrong and not right that is not the point here. But the point with the gentleman is that because the decision of the Secretary of the Interior will take money out of the Treasury this provision is to extend that wrong, because to right it will cost the Government a few dollars. That is the point exactly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The argument of the gentleman would overturn a great part of the laws upon our statute-books. We are constantly amending upon every conceivable subject for the purpose of perfecting them. We find them wrong in some particular and we try to amend them. But we never make the amendatory laws retrospective in their character. We pay these parties all that we promised them at the time. But there is one in a hundred, as I have already said, whose case is still pending, and we propose to put him on the same footing with the ninety and nine.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me right here to ask him another question?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will yield to the gentleman directly.

In 1861, soon after the breaking out of the rebellion, we passed a general pension law promising to soldiers a certain amount of pension, to their widows a certain amount, to their children a certain amount. In 1868 it was found that the amounts which had been fixed in 1861 were too small, and Congress largely increased the amount of those pensions, making an increase in the aggregate of at least one third. The principle which is advocated by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Indiana would require us to extend that increase of pension back to the beginning of the war. But when the Government of the United States pays what it has promised to pay it has discharged its duty.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman says that to strike out this section and insert the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana would have a retrospective effect, and that we are not in the habit of passing such retrospective enactments. Now, I ask the gentleman whether every law passed by Congress upon the report of his committee granting a special pension is not retrospective? Has not every law giving a pension to widows not on the pension-roll gone back to the date of the death of the soldier? Now, where is the difference in principle?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I admit that as a general thing what the gentleman says is true; but it is not true in all cases. I will state the distinction. In every one of the cases to which the gentleman alludes the parties were within the spirit of the law, though not within its letter. They had failed to receive pensions because their cases were outside of the letter of the law. But the Congress of the United States, believing them to be within the spirit of the law, placed them upon the same footing as those whose claims had been allowed by the Pension Bureau. But in the case now under consideration these parties are within neither the spirit nor the letter of the law. We are not under an obligation to them in virtue of any express or implied promise. The entering of the civil service by these parties was a voluntary act, they knowing very well what the law was.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I think the gentleman is certainly in error in one respect at least. This law could not be retrospective so far as regards the pension due to the party; but the act passed in 1865, like the carving of one estate out of another, merely took out of the pension already allowed to the pensioner by law the amount of pension to which he would have been entitled from the time he entered the civil service until he left it. It was a mere carving out of a portion of that gratuity which the Government had given the pensioner by law, and was not a deprivation of the pension.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman misapprehends the purpose and effect of that law. It took from the pensioner nothing in the world. It merely provided that the pensioner employed in the civil service should be placed upon the same footing as similar parties in the military and the naval service. It said to those who were pensioners under our laws, "If we furnish you employment at the rate of one hundred or one hundred and fifty dollars a month in the civil service, and pay you full wages, we will withhold from you the pensions we have heretofore paid you in consequence of disabilities contracted in the military service." The party entering the civil service elected to receive the larger salary and forfeit the smaller.

Mr. LOGAN. Is not the distinction between the military and the civil service this, that we put nobody in the military service who would be entitled to a pension, because they are all presumed to be able-bodied men?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The gentleman is mistaken as to the Veteran Reserve corps.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I was going to except the Veteran Reserve corps. What is that corps? It is nothing more than a corps of crippled officers, composed of pensioned soldiers or of officers who could not possibly, perhaps, have drawn their pensions under the laws.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over till the morning hour of Tuesday, when the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] will be entitled to ten minutes remaining of his hour.

DOWLING CLAIM.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the request of the Commissioner of Public Lands, a report to the chief of engineers concerning the alleged claim of one Mr. Dowling, of California, to Government land in San Francisco harbor; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

REVISION OF THE LAWS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report from the commissioners to revise the statutes, presenting their revision of the laws relating to the Army, the Navy, patents, and public printing; which was referred to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States.

GEORGE N. HUNTSMAN.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1805) for the relief of George N. Huntsman, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

RONDOUT HARBOR.

Mr. CORNELL, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House such information as he may have in reference to the survey of Rondout harbor, New York, with such information as he may obtain from the Treasury Department in relation to such survey.

F. A. GIBBONS.

On motion of Mr. COVODE, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was discharged from the further consideration of the papers in relation to the claim of F. A. Gibbons, and the same were referred to the Committee of Claims.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 1672, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1870.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Owing to the illness of my colleague on the committee, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois,] I move that this bill be laid aside, and that the Indian appropriation bill be taken up.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I object.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is that motion amendable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, except in this: that the Indian appropriation bill, not being a special order, a motion to lay it aside and take up another bill would be in order, and would be carried by a majority of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I trust nobody will object to the legislative bill being laid aside.

Mr. MOORHEAD. If it is laid aside, I move to proceed with the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Indian appropriation bill is next in order, but it is not a special order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suppose a motion to proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bills takes precedence and must be put.

The CHAIRMAN. The first motion is to lay aside the legislative appropriation bill as the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the rule on the question raised.

The Clerk read as follows:

"In Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union general appropriation bills, and, in time of war, bills for raising men and money and bills concerning a treaty of peace, shall be preferred to all other bills, at the discretion of the committee; and when demanded by any member the question of consideration shall first be put in regard to them. Existing special orders, however, being made under a suspension of the rules, take precedence of all other business."

The CHAIRMAN. This bill, although not a special order, has precedence if there be no order made in regard to it; but it is in the discretion of the committee to lay it aside by the vote of a majority, and to take up any other bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. It is very necessary that we should get on with the appropriation bills.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I call for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order will be the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill, unless a majority of the committee shall decide to lay it aside and take up another bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to lay aside the Indian appropriation bill, and to proceed with the consideration of the tariff bill. I desire to ask whether the tariff bill has not already been under consideration, and is not still under consideration in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BROOKS. I know the motion is not debatable; but let us understand this matter. Will the Chair state to the House what is the exact issue, and what would follow after the Indian appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. There is now before the committee the tariff bill, which has been partly considered by the Committee of the Whole. There is also in order, not as a special order, however, the Indian appropriation bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations. Under the rules the Indian appropriation bill will have, as an appropriation bill, precedence, unless at the discretion of the committee it be laid aside to give preference to some other bill. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAXNARD] moves to lay it aside. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] demands that the committee shall go on with the Indian appropriation bill, which will be in order unless the committee decides otherwise by preferring another bill to it. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to lay aside the bill in order to proceed with the tariff bill, which has been partly considered by the committee.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me ask if the tariff bill has not been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means for the committee to make a report upon the tariff, and if that committee are not preparing to make such a report?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is mistaken in regard to the bill having been recommended to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BROOKS. Referred.

The CHAIRMAN. Or referred in any sense. It is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, although the Committee of Ways and Means may have been engaged in modifying it in some form and preparing amendments to be submitted whenever it shall be taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I rise to ask a question on a point of order. I understand the Chair to state that the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, to lay aside the Indian appropriation bill for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the tariff bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the question.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I assume that that is not the question; that the Indian appropriation bill is not up; that the tariff bill is the first bill in order, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts would have to move to proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the assumption of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Indian appropriation bill is in order, because the rule makes it so in providing that it shall have preference. It has that preference if it be asked to proceed with it; but it has it subject to the discretion and power of the committee to lay it aside and give preference to another bill, as is now proposed.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the Committee of the Whole has power to control the question as to what bill it will take up? When the House has gone into Committee of the Whole on a particular bill can the Committee of the Whole reverse that action of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole have power under the rule which has been quoted to proceed with another bill in preference to the one called for, if a majority of the committee so desire.

Mr. WOOD. Although the House has resolved to go into Committee of the Whole on a particular measure?

The CHAIRMAN. There was no order of that kind. It was simply an order to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] had a right to demand that the committee should proceed with a preferred bill—the Indian appropriation bill. That demand was made under the rule, which at the same time provides that in the discretion of the committee they may lay it aside and take up another bill.

Mr. WOOD. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to move in the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the legislative appropriation bill. If that was so, then the committee cannot change the order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is entirely within the power of the committee to lay aside the bill named to bring up the tariff bill; that being the first bill in Committee of the Whole if the Indian appropriation bill be laid aside. The committee has just laid aside the legislative, &c., appropriation bill, for the reason stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER]—the illness of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Having gone into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the legislative, &c., appropriation bill would first come up; but the legislative bill having been laid aside, the next bill in order having preference is the Indian appropriation bill. It is proposed to lay aside the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish to ask what is the effect of the motion. If the Indian appropriation bill is laid aside, then, as I understand, we will come to the tariff bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be the effect, the tariff bill being the next bill on the Calendar.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 64; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. Wood and Mr. MOORHEAD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 78.

So the motion was disagreed to.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the committee would now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1788, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1870.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, here took the chair.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Can that motion be made in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The CHAIRMAN. It can be by unanimous consent.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Chairman, before the bill is read by paragraphs for amendment, I wish to explain to the House for a few moments the theory upon which these appropriations are made. The appropriations are generally the same as those last year for the same objects, and the House will remember that the Indian appropriation bill of last year was carefully considered and sifted. The appropriations here are generally only those required by existing laws. The additions are only where new treaties have been made, ratified, and proclaimed, and estimates sent to the committee. I believe, with one or two exceptions, there will be found no substantial variance from what was done last year; and as it is a subject which does not require general debate I will propose, unless some gentleman desires to discuss the general subject, that the committee rise for the purpose of closing the general debate in five minutes.

Mr. McKEE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. McKEE. I wish to inquire whether in this bill there are any appropriations for tribes of Indians with which we are now waging war? We are now trying, as I understand, to destroy certain hostile bands of Indians, and I wish to know whether this contains any appropriations for them.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There are appropriations for that tribe of Indians, and for this reason: there are treaties with those Indians which have not yet been abrogated, and this bill is for 1870, and we do not know what Indians will be "crushed out" before that time. And I will say that the committee have appended to this bill some sections which provide that no appropriations made for one tribe of Indians shall be used for another. Of course, then, the appropriations to which the gentleman from Kentucky has referred will not be expended if the Indians are not in peace with the United States; nor if the House shall pass these added sections, as I have no doubt it will, can one appropriation be transferred from one object to another.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has this bill in charge, whether it is intended in this bill to deal with the proposal heretofore made to place the Indian Bureau under the control of the War Department?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir, in no way; this is an appropriation bill only.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to ask the gentleman a question or two, and I hope he will yield me the floor for that purpose.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. I understood the gentleman to say that this bill does not materially differ in principle from the one passed last year; and he informed the House that the Indian appropriation bill of last year was carefully considered and sifted so as only to carry out treaty stipulations, and yet there is a statement at the end of the bill that "the amount appropriated by the bill is $2,312,260 12, being $1,624,822 18 less than was appropriated by the same bill last year." If the bill last year was simply to carry out treaty stipulations I desire to know what treaties he proposes to violate by this bill?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I shall be glad to answer that question, and the answer is this: a great many treaty stipulations have expired by their own limitation. In the treaties made with Indians we stipulate to pay them yearly installments for fifteen, twenty, or thirty years, and as a large number of those stipulations have expired by their own limitation the appropriations called for in this bill are therefore reduced in that respect.

Then again we appropriated last year for the removal of the Navajo Indians almost half a million of money. Those Navajo Indians have now been removed to their reservations and have been pretty well established upon them, so that in this bill a very small appropriation relatively is necessary. So also with various other matters that were to be done last year, but which have not to be provided for this. If the gentleman will turn to the estimates of the department he will find the same explanation which I have given.

Mr. WINDOM. I was not aware of that fact. I thought certain treaties had been shaved off by the Committee on Appropriations, and that they had carried out only such portions as they deemed proper.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir. The Committee on Appropriations consider that it is not within their power to shave them off. They would if they could, and they hope that Congress will take some means different from those we now have of dealing with the Indians. The bill makes appropriations according to the law as it now stands. We have to obey the law, and are glad to do it.

Mr. WINDOM. One word more. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the Committee on Appropriations have kindly come to the conclusion to carry out Indian treaties. I believe, sir, and I propose to state it as broadly as I believe it, that because of the failure of the Committee on Appropriations to carry out Indian treaties at the time as provided in said treaties, by making the necessary appropriations in 1867 and in 1868, they have caused a loss to the Government of $50,000,000. I believe, sir, that because of their failure to carry out treaty stipulations with the southern Indians we were forced into the Indian war which we are now waging at a cost of $2,000,000 a week. Treaty stipulations were carried out with the Sioux of the North, by far the most savage of all the tribes, and as a consequence we are at peace with them. We have expended on these northern Indians, for the purpose of feeding instead of fighting them; in order to maintain our plighted faith and to carry out treaty stipulations with them, something like seven or eight hundred thousand dollars, and they are at peace to day. General Harney, armed with the power to partially fulfill our obligations, went among these Indians, where he found two military posts. I think I am correct in saying that in each of those military posts there are ten soldiers. He saw that there was no necessity for these soldiers, and ordered every one of them to leave the reservations. No troops have been there since. It may have cost us seven or eight hundred thousand dollars to comply with agreements made with them, but on the other hand, by refusing to execute our treaties with the southern Indians, it is now costing the Government at the rate of $300,000 a day, or in other words it costs us as much every three days to fight those with whom we have violated our plighted faith as it does to feed the same number a whole year with whom we have kept our agreements.

What I have said will sufficiently illustrate the evil consequences of the Indian policy which has been pursued by the Committee on Appropriations. I believe in keeping the plighted faith of this nation with the various Indian tribes, but it has not been done, and because it has not been done in years past this Government is now compelled to pay at the rate of fifteen or twenty million dollars every year for military expeditions against them. I do not desire to criticise the action of the House, but its Indian policy, if it can be said to have any such policy, convinces me that we are far more ready to vote twenty, thirty, or fifty million dollars for Indian wars than to give $1,000,000 to keep the peace with them by carrying out in good faith our treaty stipulations.

I propose in about thirty days from this time to leave this Hall, when I shall have no more responsibility on this question. Indeed, I have not felt much responsibility in regard to it since the House took the whole subject out of the hands of the Committee on Indian Affairs and turned it over to the Military Committee. But I want to say that the $50,000,000 that have been expended in the last year or two for Indian wars are entirely due to our breach of faith; and having said that much I do not wish to discuss the subject any further.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. A single word or two in reply to the gentleman from Minnesota. I know that he does not mean any discourtesy to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WINDOM. Of course not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I know it, and I will give the reason for it. He was on the committee of conference with me on the Indian appropriation bill at the last session of Congress and agreed to every appropriation in it. I think it was his fault as much as mine if they were not correct.

Mr. WINDOM. I will say further that I agreed to several which the gentleman did not, and which, in my judgment, ought to have been in the bill.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I did not know that we disagreed on any. Certain it is that I want to acknowledge his valuable services in that regard. He agreed to all those in the bill, and I did not know that we disagreed as to any one of them.

But, sir, there are two things to be said about this matter. I agree that it costs more to fight the Indians than to feed them. It cost a great deal more to fight the revolutionary war than to pay the tax on tea; so that that is not always a safe rule. In order to carry out the treaties made and ratified, and which were brought to our knowledge, we have made the necessary appropriations. Last year we gave $200,000 to General Sherman to carry out the provisions of certain treaties in advance of their being ratified. Mark that—in advance of their being ratified! Thereupon those $200,000 were spent, and $400,000 more without any appropriation. Well, sir, if that course is to be permitted, if the Indians are to be fed in that way, then this House of Representatives can have no control over the appropriations at all. And, let me say again, that without any treaty with the Navajo Indians we paid half a million to put them back, because we thought they had been wronged. Without any treaty with the northern Indians, ratified and declared, we appropriated $200,000, and put it in the hands of General Sherman to take care of them; and without any treaty General Sherman and General Harney spent $400,000 more for the same purpose.

I have no doubt if we boarded all the Indians at Willard's Hotel, or at any one of the first-class hotels in the country, that we should not have any war with them; but the question is whether we shall or shall not do that. I mean to say that there is a limit to this method of feeding and taking care of them. I will state to this House that we have appropriated enough money to take care of all the Indians in the United States better than the majority of the white people are taken care of; but the difficulty is that only one dollar is got to them out of every ten that we appropriate for their benefit, and when that one dollar does get to them it is generally in the shape of glass beads, lead medals, and yellow ochre. They do not get anything with it that they really do want, but when it does get to them it gets to them in such form as to influence them against the Government instead of making them grateful to it.

If we had not any Indian agents, if we had not any Indian traders in the West, if we had not anybody to interfere with the Indians, there would be no war with them. Mr. Chairman, just look at it for a moment. There runs through this continent an invisible line separating the British dominions from the United States. That almost trackless wilderness is full of Indians, as many on one side of the line as upon the other. Yet, sir, on one side of that line, in the British dominions, there has not been an Indian war for sixty years, while on the other side, within the limits of the United States, we have had upon our hands perpetual Indian wars. Why is this? It results, sir, from the manner in which we have been dealing with these Indians; treating every man who has half a dozen ragged—no, not ragged, for they do not even have clothes of any sort—treating every Indian who may happen to have half a dozen followers as a separate nation and making a treaty with them. And in all such treaties the first five articles declare what sort of houses, what sort of stores, and what other provisions shall be made for Indian agents, all to be paid for out of the money of the United States. That is the system which we have been following. I can point the House and the committee to treaty after treaty where there has been provision after provision for the most extensive establishments for these Indian agents. And expensive houses are also provided for physicians, farmers, blacksmiths, and everybody who has anything to do with the Indians. There is one estimate which has been sent to our committee for starving Indians near Devil's Lake. It is stated in the report transmitted to us by the Secretary of the Interior that there is a necessity for $119,000 to save these Indians from absolute starvation. When we come to look over the estimates, what do we find? Why, sir, we find an estimate of $54,000 for houses and mills and horses and everything else wanted by the Indian agents, and not wanted by the Indians.

I therefore trust, Mr. Chairman, that we shall not start off on this bill with any false spirit of philanthropy. I agree that it is cheaper to feed the Indians than to fight them. I agree that we should never have had this Indian war; but, sir, we will continue to have Indian wars until we do away with the extravagance of the present system of dealing with the Indians, and until we refuse to recognize in any shape or form the going upon the war-path of Spotted-Tail or Waggle-Tail, or any other Indian with a few followers, as an Indian war which is to be settled by another Indian treaty granting new appropriations of money. When we get rid of that system we will have no more Indian wars and no more of these extravagant appropriations of money. Then we will look upon them as subjects to be protected and cared for; who are to be kept in order; to whom the courts are open; who shall not have lands to sell out of which they will be cheated for a few bottles of whisky; who shall not be considered as lords of the domain and brought on to Washington to enter into negotiations with the treaty-making power of this Government, we paying the expenses on both sides, and all for the advantage of some land speculators. When we get rid of this most vicious and accursed of all systems we will get rid of all these Indian wars, but not until then.

Mr. HIGBY rose.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I cannot yield to the gentleman now. The difficulty about the matter is this: the question which the gentleman from Minnesota discussed, and which I am discussing, does not belong to the Committee on Appropriations. You tie our hands, and you say we must make appropriation where there is law for it; and not only that, we have to make an appropriation where there is no law because some treaty has been concluded between the agents of the Government and the Indians.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask the gentleman, then, whether his complaint is not against the Senate, who ratify these treaties?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I make no complaints; I am only stating facts.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the gentleman to allow me the floor for a few moments.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota for five minutes.

Mr. WINDOM. I wish to say, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that two or three efforts have been made in this House to establish a better system of dealing with these Indians than the present one. I am glad to find that he agrees to what I have tried to accomplish, or rather what the Indian Committee tried to accomplish two or three years ago. I am not here to defend dishonest Indian agents. The bill which the Indian Committee reported three years ago was designed to prevent all such wrongs as are charged against Indian agents. The bill was introduced and pressed upon the attention of the House, and, if passed, I have no doubt that it would have put a stop to Indian stealings and Indian wars.

Let me for a moment call the attention of the House to the provisions of that bill. It was the result of a thorough examination of the Indian question. A joint committee of the Senate and of the House was appointed, who went into the Indian country, took the testimony of the leading chiefs of almost all the tribes in the West, and indeed thoroughly investigated this whole question. They decided upon a policy in reference to our Indian affairs. The bill was passed by the Senate and came to this House, and by direction of the Committee of Indian Affairs I urged its passage. It provided that the country occupied by Indian tribes should be divided into five districts, and also provided for a commission of three men in each district, one of whom should be appointed from persons selected by the various religious denominations at their yearly meeting, another from the people at large, the third being a military officer of high rank. It was believed such commission would, if any could be, free from suspicion of corruption. It was provided that they should be constantly in the Indian country to supervise the acts of Indian agents, and if they found any stealing or mismanagement on the part of those agents they were clothed with the power to at once suspend them. At the same time provision was made to extend the laws of the country over the Indians and to give them the protection which white men have. In fine, the design of the bill was to carry out, as far as it could be done honestly and in good faith, the treaties we had made, and to prevent stealing and corruption under these treaties. I brought that bill before the House as an organ of the Indian Committee. A member moved as an amendment that the Indian Bureau should be transferred to the War Department, and it went through under the previous question almost without discussion. Ever since then there has been a standing dispute between the two Houses, and nothing has been done. I think if the House had accepted that proposition we would have had no Indian war to-day costing us millions of dollars.

Now, one word as to the difference suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts between our success in dealing with Indians and that of our British neighbors. I think there is a great difference in the circumstances of the two cases, which will account for the difference of result. In this country emigration is constantly pushing westward. We are opening new mines and new farms and new States, and driving away the game upon which the Indians subsist. In the British territory the Hudson Bay Company rules supreme, and its only object is to get as many furs as possible. Instead of driving away the game they really are the partners of the Indians; and it is not to be expected that the Indians will fight them so long as they protect the game and furnish food and ammunition. That is one reason why they have better success than we have. Another reason is, because those Indians were placed under the charge of the Roman Catholic church. I am not myself a Roman Catholic, but I will do them the justice to state that their priests in that region have managed Indian affairs exceedingly well. They have been there as missionaries, and they have kept the peace with them. Acting in harmony with the policy of the Hudson Bay Company, they have managed them without wars. Now, if you will keep the pioneers back, prevent the pioneer from going to the West, we will have peace with the Indians. But you cannot now have peace with them, unless when you make treaties you carry them out faithfully, and in addition provide means for punishing them effectually when they break those treaties themselves, which we cannot possibly do at the present time.

I had the honor to state my views pretty fully on that point the other day, when I argued that we must construct railroads across the continent if we would effectually control the Indians. You may now occasionally destroy an Indian village; or a Black Kettle with his friendly band, but when you undertake to chase down the hostile savage of the plain you will find such wars as fruitless in the future as in the past. The Quaker policy and no other is the true one.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Without taking time now to reply to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] I propose to move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing all general debate on this bill in five minutes.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Cannot that be done by unanimous consent, without the committee rising?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If that can be done it will answer my purpose.

No objection was made; and all general debate was ordered to be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.) The first reading of this bill having been dispensed with by unanimous consent, it will now be read by clauses for amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill for amendments.

The following clause was read:

For the contingent expenses of the Indian department, namely:

For the pay of eleven superintendents of Indian affairs and of fifty-eight Indian agents, $113,200, as follows.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We have now made a treaty with the Crow Indians, which require another superintendent. I therefore move to amend this clause by striking out "eleven" and inserting "twelve."

Mr. HOLBROOK. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] In proposing to strike out "eleven" and to insert "twelve" as the number of superintendents he states it is for the purpose of providing a superintendent for the Crow Indians. I wish to call his attention to the fact that in the Indian appropriation bill of last year the superintendencies of the Territories of Montana and Idaho were united. I think the gentleman is now convinced that a superintendency embracing those two Territories is too large; that it is impossible for one superintendent to attend to all the business for those two Territories. I therefore ask the gentleman to amend his amendment so as to increase the number of superintendents to thirteen. I have a letter here in my possession from the first person who was appointed to the superintendency of those Territories after they were united. He has had much experience with various tribes of Indians in the West, and he states that it is an utter impossibility for one superintendent to attend to all the business pertaining to those two Territories. Those Territories, as members of the House are well aware, are separated by a mountain range, extending the entire distance from their northern to their southern boundaries, and for months in the year communication across that range of mountains is impracticable. If the gentleman from Massachusetts intends the additional superintendent for the Crow Indians I ask him to make the number thirteen instead of twelve. I believe I have consulted with every member but one of the Committee on Appropriations, and they have agreed that the Territories of Montana and Idaho should be separated, and each have a superintendent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand that there is very considerable difficulty in the superintendency of the two Territories of Montana and Idaho dealing with the Indians on both sides of the range of mountains which divides those Territories. And when we reach the proper place in this bill it is my intention to move an amendment which will give a superintendent to each of those Territories.

Mr. HOLBROOK. That will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. ALLISON. I would like a little information on this question of superintendencies. The bill now provides, in the paragraph under consideration, for eleven superintendents. In another portion of the bill there seems to be a more particular description of the location of those superintendents. One is provided for the State of Nevada, while a little further on we find that there is only one Indian agent provided for Nevada. What I desire to know is whether or not it requires one superintendent to supervise the acts of one Indian agent. It occurred to me that we might reduce the number to ten. I observe also that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in his communication to this House does not propose that we shall provide a superintendent for the Crow Indians, but only an agent. From all the information I can obtain I am inclined to think that we had better reduce the superintendents to ten, rather than increase them to twelve. I only make this suggestion for the purpose of eliciting an explanation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman will find, in turning over this bill, that these appropriations have to be made in accordance with the terms of existing laws. He will find, for instance, that under the head of Indian agents the bill provides for "eleven for the tribes east of the Rocky mountains; two for the tribes east of the Rocky mountains," &c.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend by striking out "twelve" and inserting "ten." I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that he may tell us why he thinks it necessary to have twelve of these superintendents.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As I was saying, these Indian agents are provided for by existing laws, and the appropriations have to be made in accordance with the terms of those laws. Now, there are a great number of Indian agents in Nevada; but they have to be provided for in such terms as the gentleman will find in lines twenty-four, twenty-five, and twenty-six, on the second page of the bill. We there provide for "eleven for the tribes east of the Rocky mountains; two for the tribes east of the Rocky mountains; four for the tribes east of the Rocky mountains," &c. The gentleman will find such provisions occurring quite a number of times.

Mr. ALLISON. Nevada is not in there.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am aware of that; I am only giving an illustration. Any one reading the bill would naturally inquire, why not provide in gross for a certain number of Indian agents east of the Rocky mountains, or a certain number for a particular State? But we have to conform our appropriations to the various laws establishing these agencies. I think there are five or seven Indian agents for Nevada and the tribes adjacent thereto. I will state the reason which influences me in fixing the number of these superintendents. A large number of Indians have, under a treaty made within the past year, been removed up into Idaho. Besides that, another superintendent is required for the Crow Indians, and it is necessary to have one superintendent for Idaho and one for Montana, because of the line of mountains running between those two Territories.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object to separating Idaho and Montana; I think it should be done. I only wanted to know why we should have an additional superintendent for the Crow Indians. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I move to amend by striking out "eleven" and inserting "twelve." I make this motion for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. The portion of the Crow Indians known as the Mountain Crows are, under the treaty made by the peace commissioners, located in Montana; and there is already a superintendent for that Territory. I wish to inquire whether this appropriation is intended to provide a superintendent for the River Crows, who are outside of the Territory of Montana, or the Mountain Crows, who are within that Territory?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not propose to have another superintendent for the Crows, but an agent.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. PRUYN. I move to amend by reducing the number to eight. I make this motion for the purpose of saying that I heartily approve the very philanthropic and noble views expressed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] in regard to this question; and I wish to ask him whether he proposes to reach the objects he has indicated by any amendments to this bill, or whether a separate measure, embodying the views which he has expressed, is to be brought before the House?

Mr. WINDOM. If it were possible under the rules to reach at this session the bill now pending before the Committee on Indian Affairs I should be most happy to bring that bill before the House. But, as every gentleman understands, the Committee on Indian Affairs will not be again reached this session, and we shall have no opportunity to report. As to offering it as an amendment to this bill, I apprehend that it would not be in order.

Mr. PRUYN. It strikes me that the amendment would be perfectly in order. It does not require any appropriation, and we have a perfect right to direct how these appropriations shall be made.

Mr. HIGBY. It calls for an additional appropriation; but that can be made hereafter. I trust that the gentleman will propose his amendment to this bill. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to strike out the word "eleven" and insert "ten," so that the bill will provide for only ten superintendents of Indian affairs instead of eleven; and I give notice that in the next paragraph I shall move to strike out "three" and insert "two," so as to provide for only two superintendents for the tribes east of the Rocky mountains instead of three. I understand that there are three superintendents east of the Rocky mountains, one located at Omaha, Nebraska, one in Kansas, and the other in the Indian territory. As a matter of fact, ever since the commencement of the Indian war the superintendent of Indian affairs for the territory south of Kansas has actually had his office and carried on his business in Kansas. I will say to the House that I am familiar with the operations of these Indian superintendents, and I see no reason why two instead of three should not be able successfully to perform all of the duties performed at the present time by three superintendents. I think I can say to the gentlemen who have charge of the bill that by reducing the number to two the headquarters of the Indian superintendent can still be left in Kansas, while at the same time the Government will save the salary of one of these superintendents of Indian affairs.

If I may be allowed to make a remark further, I will say that when we reach the third page of the bill I will so move to amend the proviso that it shall not only provide that the President may dispense with Indian agencies and require the same person to perform the duties of two agencies for one salary, but that he may, if he finds it necessary for the public service, combine the duties of two or more superintendencies in one.

Mr. ALLISON. I think if we are to have a superintendent for Montana and another for Idaho we should leave the number as it is.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Superintendents of Indian affairs:

Three superintendents for the tribes east of the Rocky mountains: one for Oregon, one for Washington Territory, one for the Territory of New Mexico, one for the Territory of Utah, one for California, one for Nevada, one for the Territory of Arizona, one for Montana and Idaho.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to strike out "three" and insert "two," so it will read "two superintendents."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend, in the eighteenth line, so as to make it read "one for Montana and one for Idaho."

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move to amend the amendment, so as to provide one also for Dakota Territory. I understand by the present arrangement that the Indians are all to be located in Dakota, and if that be so, we ought to have a superintendent there.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes six, noes not counted.

Mr. BURLEIGH demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indian agents:

Three for the tribes in Oregon; four for the tribes in New Mexico; one additional for Indians in New Mexico; one for the tribes in New Mexico; one for the tribes in Utah; one additional for the Indians in Utah; one for the tribes in the Territory of Utah; eleven for the tribes east of the Rocky mountains; two for the tribes east of the Rocky mountains; four for the Indians east of the Rocky mountains, namely: Sioux and Seminoles, the Omaha, Kickapoo, Kansas, and Neosho agencies; three for the tribes east of the Rocky mountains; one for the Indians in the State of New York; one for the Delaware Indians; one for Green Bay, Wisconsin; three for the tribes in Washington Territory; one for the Wichitas and neighboring tribes west of the Chocataws and Chickasaws; one for the tribes east of the Rocky mountains; one for the Indians in the Territory of New Mexico; one for the Ponca tribe; one for the Pawnees; one for the Yancton Sioux; three for the tribes in the Territory of Washington; one for the Grand River and Uintah bands of Indians in the Territory of Colorado; two for the Upper Missouri and the country adjacent thereto; one for the Ottawas, Chippewas of Swan creek and Black river, and Christian Indians in Kansas; three agents for the State of California; one for the Kiowa, Apache, and Comanche Indians; one for the Sisseton and Wahpeton bands of Dakota, or Sioux Indians; one for the bands of Sacs and Foxes of the Mississippi, now in Tama county, Iowa; one for the Indians in the State of Nevada: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the President to dispense with the services of such Indian agents herein mentioned as may be practicable; and where it is practicable he shall require the same person to perform the duties of two agencies for one salary.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to amend by inserting before the proviso "and one for the Crow tribe of Indians, $1,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire further to amend, in lines eleven and twelve, by adding $1,500.

The CHAIRMAN. That is going back, and requires unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. When it is understood there will be no objection. One additional agent necessarily increases the amount to be appropriated for salaries.

Mr. HIGBY. I wish to call attention to an amendment I am about to propose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. HIGBY. Not if the gentleman accepts my proposition. I ask him to wait till I propose the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will wait.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to strike out in line forty-one the word "three" and insert "four;" so that it will read "four agents for the State of California." There are four reservations in that State, and no two of them are less than fifty miles apart. Why the number of agents should be reduced from what it has been heretofore I do not understand. Possibly the Committee on Appropriations can give us some information on the subject. I see, however, by the estimate that came from the Department that there is no reduction in the number of agencies in California, and I know from actual observation and examination which I made as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs in 1865 that these agencies cannot get along without each having a separate agent. For that reason I move this amendment. There can be no object in trying to get along with the Indians unless we keep them under the management of distinct agents, as they have been heretofore.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will look at the law of last year he will find this appropriation: "For removing the Indians from Smith river reservation to Round valley reservation, $3,500, or as much thereof as may be necessary; and Smith river reservation is hereby discontinued." Now, having discontinued one reservation by law last year, we discontinue one agent.

Mr. HIGBY. I would ask if the Indians have been removed?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They are in process of being removed; but the gentleman must remember that this is an appropriation from July next to July, 1870; and they will be removed if everybody does his duty.

Mr. HIGBY. If the removal is effected I suppose there will be needed but three agents.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The removal is ordered by law, and I have no doubt it is being carried out.

Mr. HIGBY. With that statement I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to amend by inserting in line forty-seven, after the word "agents," the words "and superintendents;" also in line fifty, by inserting after the word "agencies" the words "or superintendencies."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend by striking out in lines thirty-three and thirty-four the words, "one for the Indians in the Territory of New Mexico." I do this for the purpose of ascertaining from the chairman of the committee why it is that we have so many Indian agents in that Territory. I find in line twenty-one a provision for four agents for the tribes in New Mexico; then, in line twenty-two; two more for the tribes in New Mexico; then, in line thirty-four, one additional agent for Indians in New Mexico. So that we have six for the tribes of New Mexico and one for the Indians in New Mexico. It seems to me we can dispense with at least one of these agents.

Mr. BUTLER of Massachusetts. The reason why these appropriations are made in this way is because there was once a law or treaty which gave four agents for the tribes of New Mexico; then another law was passed by Congress giving one more for the tribes of New Mexico; then another giving one for the Indians in New Mexico, and then another law giving one additional agent for the Indians of New Mexico. The Committee on Appropriations have to report an appropriation wherever the law has given an agent. The reason why they have so many Indian agents in New Mexico is because they have so many Indians there. There are a large number of Indians in New Mexico. These agents are all controlled by the superintendent. There are small roving bands of Indians in New Mexico that require to be dealt with, and these general agents are employed in moving the tribes and consolidating the Indians and getting them on to their reservations. The Indian agents for tribes are fixed by treaty. These additional agents are fixed generally by law. Each tribe, by treaty, has Indian agents who must live there. For the purpose of dealing with all the Indians other agents are appointed by law. I do not know whether there are too many or too few. I only know that the wisdom of Congress, for which I have high respect, has provided by law that there shall be so many, and the committee have framed the bill to carry out existing law. The House can strike out anything they please.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I move to strike out line fifty-one, which is as follows: "For pay of sub-agents, $6,000." There is no necessity in my opinion for that appropriation. These sub-agents are set down for no other purpose but to absorb the $6,000. I have never known them to do any good.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. All I can say is that the committee have no objection to its being stricken out. We had no right to omit it, but if the House sees fit to strike it out well and good.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I move to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out by inserting "$9,000" in lieu of "$6,000." I would ask the gentleman from Dakota why he is opposed to the sub-agency system? There is one agency in my Territory now where the agent resigned over six months ago and no successor has been appointed, and the sub-agent there is taking charge of the Blackfeet tribe of Indians. There was another case last fall in which the agent of the Flathead tribe of Indians committed suicide in this city, and the Department had to send a sub-agent or special agent to discharge the duties of the office. In every Indian country sub-agents and special agents are needed. I now withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I must insist on my amendment to strike out the clause. If the agent in Montana was not at his post of duty, there was no reason why he should not be there.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. He resigned.

Mr. BURLEIGH. And if the other agent to whom the gentleman referred committed suicide rather than go back there, it was the most sensible act of his life. [Laughter.]

The question was put on Mr. BURLEIGH's amendment; and there were—ayes 38, noes 10; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ALLISON and VAN AUKEN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 27, noes 56; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLARKE, of Kansas, and ROBINSON, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty, noes not counted.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to strike out the clause "for pay of clerk to superintendent at St. Louis, Missouri, $1,200." I understood the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] to state that there is no superintendent at St. Louis, and I desire to know why it is that this clerk to the superintendent is located there.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I think I can answer the gentleman from Iowa. I understand that this superintendency was originally located at St. Louis. Since the progress of settlements it has been moved westward, and is now located at Atchison, Kansas. By an amendment made on page 2 of the bill the superintendencies of Kansas and of the Indian territory have been combined, and if in order I will move in line fifty-three that the word "two" be stricken out and "six" inserted, so as to make the salary of the clerk $1,600. I dislike to offer any amendment which looks like raising the salary of anybody, but by the action of the House the two superintendencies have been combined, and it is within my knowledge that the duties of the clerk of what is now known as the central superintendency, provided for in this amendment, are very heavy; and that it has been almost impossible for the central superintendent during the last year to obtain and keep the services of a competent man for the performance of the duties of the office.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Very well.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I would like to know if there is any clerk or superintendent at St. Louis?

Mr. PILE. Permit me to answer the gentleman. There is.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Who is he?

Mr. PILE. I do not remember his name; but I know he has been changed two or three times within the last year.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I know that since I have been in the western country, for the last eight or nine years, the clerk of the central superintendency has been in the habit of going down to St. Louis to superintend the shipping of Indian goods to the western country; and this is the first time I ever heard that there was a superintendent at St. Louis.

Mr. PILE. I do not say that there is a superintendent there, but there is a clerk there to superintend the shipping of good, making purchases, &c.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to modify my amendment so as to strike out the words "at St. Louis, Missouri," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "of central superintendency."

The CHAIRMAN. That is not now in order except by unanimous consent, pending the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas; [Mr. CLARKE.]

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. HARDING. I object.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, to strike out "$1,200" and to insert "$1,600," in the following clause:

For pay of clerk to superintendent at St. Louis, Missouri, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I now move to further amend the clause by striking out the words "at St. Louis, Missouri," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "of central superintendency."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARDING. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes seventeen, noes not counted.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following clause:

For vaccination of Indians and furnishing vaccine matter, $1,650.

Mr. TAFFE. I move to amend this bill by inserting the following after the clause just read:

For damages sustained by the citizens of Niobrara township, Nebraska, by the action of the Government in moving the Santee Sioux Indians upon their lands in the year 1868, such sum as may be found just after proper investigation by the Interior Department, $15,000.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I would like to ask the gentleman who is to investigate this question of damages?

Mr. TAFFE. It is to be done under the direction of the Interior Department.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I am opposed to this amendment. The whole township of Niobrara was never worth $15,000 or the half of it.

Mr. TAFFE. This is in accordance with the estimates of the Department, which I hold in my hand, and which do not seem to have been regarded by the Committee on Appropriations. If it shall be found upon investigation that no damage has been done, then there will be nothing to pay.

Mr. BURLEIGH. When I went to Dakota Territory in 1861 I was located just above Niobrara township, and I have never seen the day since when I could not have bought the whole township for half the amount proposed in this amendment.

Mr. TAFFE. In what capacity did the gentleman go there?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I went there at the commencement of the rebellion as an agent to take charge of the Indians there.

Mr. TAFFE. That may account for the gentleman being able to buy so much. This amendment does not appropriate $15,000, but only so much as may be necessary. If upon investigation it shall be found that nothing is due on this account, then nothing will be paid out of the Treasury for this purpose.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. TAFFE; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following clause:

Arikarees, Gros Ventres, and Mandans:
For third payment, to be made during the pleasure of Congress, to be expended in such goods, provisions, and other articles as the President may from time to time determine, $5,000 of which may be expended in the purchase of stock, animals, and agricultural implements, in instructing in agricultural and mechanical pursuits, in employing mechanics, educating their children, providing medicines and medical attendance, care for and support of the aged, sick, and infirm, for the helpless orphans of said Indians, and in any other respect to promote their civilization, comfort, and improvement, and also for pay of head chief, soldier chiefs, second chief, and Pierre Garneau, for his services to the Arikarees, $0.000.

Mr. McKEE. I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I would like to ask the gentleman his object in making that motion.

Mr. McKEE. I will tell the gentleman my reason for the motion. I make it simply to obtain some information in regard to this "head chief, soldier chiefs, second chief," and the other person named here. I understand that an appropriation was made last year for some such purpose as this. I wish to know why we propose now to pay this money to this "head chief," these "soldier chiefs," this "second chief," &c. I have merely made my motion for the purpose of obtaining some information.

Mr. BURLEIGH. If the gentleman will yield to me I will try to give him the information he seeks. During the war in which we have recently been engaged, these chiefs, the leaders of the war party, were invariably found upon the side of the Federal Government fighting its enemies. No man can point to a single instance in which they have ever raised their hands against the Government or shed the blood of the white settlers in the western country. These friends of our Government, who have always been ready to fight its battles, ought to receive not merely this appropriation of $40,000, but double that amount.

Mr. McKEE. I withdraw my amendment. The Clerk read the following:

For transportation of goods to the Apaches, Kiowas, and Comanches, under same article, $5,309.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to offer an amendment, coming in after the paragraph just read, to carry out a new treaty which has been agreed upon since the bill has been printed. I send the amendment to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line one hundred and thirty-two insert the following:

Northern Cheyennes and northern Arapahoes:
For fulfilling treaty stipulations with the northern Cheyenne and northern Arapahoe Indians, under treaty of May 10, 1868, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870:

For construction of school-house, per fourth article treaty May 10, 1868, $5,000.

For first of thirty installments for purchase of clothing, per sixth article treaty May 10, 1868, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, $10,000.

For first of ten installments to be expended by the Secretary of the Interior (ten dollars for each Indian roaming—nine hundred and sixty souls) in the purchase of such articles as from time to time the condition and necessities of the Indians may indicate to be proper, per sixth article treaty May 10, 1868, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, $9,600.

For first of four installments to furnish said Indians with flour and meat, per sixth article treaty May 10, 1868, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, $66,576.

For the purchase of cows and oxen, per sixth article treaty May 10, 1868, $10,000.

For salary of physician, $1,200; teacher, $1,000; carpenter, $720; miller, $720; engineer, $800; farmer, $720, and blacksmith, $720, per seventh article treaty May 10, 1868, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, $5,880.

For first of three installments to be expended in presents to the ten persons of said tribe who, in the judgment of the agent, may grow the most valuable crops for the respective year, per ninth article treaty May 10, 1868, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, $500.

For insurance and transportation of goods, &c., for the northern Cheyenne and northern Arapahoe tribes of Indians, for fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to amend by inserting after the amendment just adopted the following:

Provided, That whenever that portion of the public domain of the United States included within the limits of Indian reserves be disincumbered of Indian title the same shall be done by the United States, and the land opened to actual settlement only under existing laws, or in tracts not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres to any one individual, and at not more than $1 25 per acre.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That amendment, if it should, be inserted in any part of the bill, ought to come in further on. I am therefore compelled to raise the point of order that the amendment proposes new legislation, and is therefore out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ARNELL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1738) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1870, and had come to no resolution thereon.

NATIONAL MECHANICS' AND FARMERS' BANK.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of the 5th instant, a report by the Comptroller of the Treasury relative to the condition of the National Mechanics' and Farmers' Bank of Albany, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE ON THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. ROOTS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That in order to grant the States recently admitted to representation a place upon the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, the rules of the House be so amended as to increase the said committee during the remainder of the Fortieth Congress by the addition of two members.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. McCARTHY obtained leave of absence for eight days.

SUFFRAGE.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the House that I propose to demand to-morrow the previous question upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was recommitted, leaving the bill upon the same subject where it now stands.

A MEMBER. Where is that?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The bill as well as the joint resolution has been recommitted, and a motion is pending to reconsider the vote recommitting it. I am satisfied, from the discussion already had and from what I know of the feeling of the House, that I cannot consistently bring the House to a vote upon the bill at a very early day. But I desire that the vote shall be taken on the proposition to amend the Constitution at once, for the reason that there are some Legislatures, as I understand, now in session which will terminate as early as the 1st of March. I understand there has been a general agreement that some amendment to the Constitution should be proposed, and I desire that the vote should be taken on that proposition at once. In order that the debate in the House to-morrow may be directed to the proposed amendment of the Constitution, I ask unanimous consent that the speeches to-morrow shall be limited to twenty minutes.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the gentleman intend to abandon his bill?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not intend to abandon the bill. I desire to have action at first on the constitutional amendment.

Mr. BROOKS. Is not that an abandonment of the bill?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the gentleman not intend to carry these matters along as in the first instance?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have already stated that I propose to-morrow to demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to limiting the speeches to twenty minutes?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think I shall object.

Mr. SHANKS gave notice of his intention to amend the joint resolution and the bill by inserting the word "property" before the words "race, color, or previous condition."

The amendment was ordered to be printed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, submitted an amendment in reference to the Southern Pacific railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

CORRECTION.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to call the attention of the House to what appears to be a mistake in the report of the Globe, which escaped my attention, although I tried to revise the manuscript. I am made to say the "Treasurer and the Comptroller of the Currency act as the servants of the banking interests." I used the word "Treasurer" instead of "Treasurer." I did not mean to say that my good friend, General Spinner, had anything to do with that.

DESTRUCTION OF AMERICAN VESSELS.

Mr. STARKWEATHER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, if not incompatible with the public interest, communicate to this House such information as may be in possession of said Department relating to the destruction during the late war by rebel vessels of such American vessels as were engaged in trade or commerce, giving the name, character, and ownership and value of vessels and cargoes destroyed or taken; also, a statement of damages claimed by the owners of said vessels respectively, and the time and place of capture or destruction, and by what vessels.

TIMOTHY J. BURNS.

Mr. TWICHELL, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of Timothy J. Burns, of Boston, Massachusetts, demanding compensation as a spy during the war; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

RECLAMATION OF DESERT LANDS.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1806) granting lands to aid in the reclamation of desert lands in the Territory of Utah; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

INHABITANTS OF UTAH, ETC.

Mr. HOOPER, of Utah, also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1807) for the relief of the inhabitants of cities and towns in the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Utah; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SCOFIELD moved to reconsider the several votes of reference; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK ELECTION FRAUDS.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, from the select Committee on New York Election Frauds, reported the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House be, and the same is hereby, directed to arrest and bring before this House Henry Johnson, to answer as for a contempt in refusing to appear before the committee of this House appointed to investigate alleged frauds in the late election in the State of New York in pursuance of a subpoena duly issued and served on said Johnson on the 13th of January, requiring him to appear and testify before said committee on that day; and that a warrant be issued by the Speaker of this House to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him or his special messenger to arrest said Johnson and bring him before this House accordingly, and to abide the order and judgment of this House.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to make a motion which takes precedence. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question will be upon taking a recess, as the House has ordered an evening session.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., pursuant to order.

SUFFRAGE.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House this evening will be devoted to debate on the proposed constitutional amendment in regard to suffrage.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Leave was granted to Mr. WHITTEMORE and Mr. CORLEY to print remarks.

SUFFRAGE—AGAIN.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, I propose to reply to the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who introduced, and in his elaborate and carefully considered speech doubtless set forth, the views of those who advised the proposed law: first, because his is the only speech on that side which represents the views of those who present it; and second, because it is through the politeness of his colleagues, Messrs. MARSHALL and ELDRIDGE, the Democratic members of the committee, that I am entitled to the floor. Coming as it does from a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, the leading lawyers of the House and the country, the measure is vouched for by no common authority. I speak of the bill, because it was on that his argument was made, though my remarks will apply with equal force to the amendment, and are so intended. The proposed amendment to the Constitution, unwise as I think it, is one Congress may possibly have a right to propose. Indeed, I suppose Congress may propose anything that two thirds of both Houses concur in. The proposition amounts to nothing until the Legislatures of three fourths of the States ratify and approve it.

This singular anomaly is presented for the first time in the history of this, or, I suppose, of any other country. The States are asked to so enlarge the grant of powers in the Constitution as to enable Congress, by appropriate legislation, to enforce the right of any citizen of the United States to vote in any State, regardless of race, color, or previous condition of slavery, the constitution and laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding. The proposition asking for the grant of power from the States, by whom alone when thus proposed it can be granted through their Legislatures, admits upon its face that the power to grant or refuse to grant the proposition or request of Congress is lodged in the States, and that if they refuse to transfer it Congress has no right to exercise it; and yet before the proposition has received the sanction of a single State Congress proposes, by the bill now under consideration, to exercise all the power which the proposed amendment would give it, and which, for aught we know, every State may refuse to surrender when the proposition is submitted to them. The reputation of the majority of the Judiciary Committee of this House will not be promoted in the eyes of the civilized world by the serious presentation of such anomalous and inconsistent propositions. To ask States to grant powers, and at the same time to exercise them in spite of the constitutions and laws of the States who are asked to make the grant is, it seems to me, too absurd for grown men seriously to consider. If we have the power now the proposed amendment to the Constitution is folly. If such an amendment is required to confer the power upon us the proposed law is the grossest and most shameless usurpation and oppression.

When the distinguished gentleman was goading his party on with the lash of necessity, and telling them it was too late to look back—that their only safety lay in consummating the revolution they had inaugurated—I could understand him; but when he urged that both the amendment and the law were indispensable, because the party was divided in opinion as to where the power now was, I hardly think he was intelligible to himself.

The idea that this is a nation—that the national Congress is vested with all power necessary to preserve whatever a majority of Congress may consider the life of the nation which, properly speaking, now means the life of the Radical party, was urged with a vehemence only equaled by the contempt with which the idea that this is a Union of coequal, confederated States was scouted and sneered at.

Whatever stress may be laid on the language of the preamble, the fact remains that we are living under a Constitution framed by States, ratified by States, and which has been and can be only amended or altered—which is the better word when applied to the present and the last so-called amendment—by States. We are in no sense a nation; and whenever we become so we will be a centralized despotism in some form. The United States of America will have ceased to exist; anarchy or empire will have come. Nothing short of separate, independent State governments can manage and control the great, diversified, widely-separated, and often conflicting interests of this people. Perhaps the best way to determine who framed the Constitution is to ascertain who has the power to alter and amend it, as it can hardly be supposed that its framers would transfer to a power other than its maker the power under the guise of amendments to alter and destroy it. How can it be amended? The Constitution says:

"Only by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

This Congress, of course, prefers and proposes the former, for the very obvious reason that it does not desire nor intend that the people of the States shall have any right to deliberate or decide on the propositions, choosing rather to trust their partisans in the State Legislatures, all of whom have been elected already, without reference to and without any knowledge on the part of the people who elected them that they would be called upon to consider so grave a proposition as the annulling of their own State constitutions on the question of suffrage.

In the action of the State Legislatures or in the State conventions there is no approach on this question to popular equality. Florida is the equal of New York, Nevada neutralizes Pennsylvania, Rhode Island is the peer of Ohio; while Delaware and Nebraska, Oregon and Kansas offset Illinois and Indiana, Missouri and Kentucky; yet the last census shows that New York alone had seven times the population of all the seven small States I have named; and it shows further that the seven States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, and Kentucky, the great central belt, had about a million and a quarter more white population than all the other States and Territories of the United States combined; yet the constitutions of these seven States, and the united, and if you please unanimous, will and voice of all their people can be constitutionally set at naught, disregarded, and overthrown by the action of the Legislatures or conventions of other States—it might be representing not only a minority, but less than one tenth of the American people. In view of these palpable and indisputable facts, what becomes of the twaddle about "We, the people," in constitutional changes and amendments? Is a citizen of New York less entitled to all the rights and privileges of a citizen of the United States than a citizen of Florida? Is his voice and vote less potential than that of a citizen of Delaware, Oregon, or Nevada? Certainly not in any matter where the power is in the people as a people. Then all are free and equal. "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." So says the original Constitution; so says your fourteenth amendment.

How, then, does it happen that sixty thousand people in Nevada in the exercise of the highest rights of sovereignty, the alteration or amendment not only of the fundamental law—the Constitution of the United States—but the destruction of the constitution and laws of the State of New York, for example, not only without the consent, but against the will and solemn protest of the four million people of that State, have as much power as sixty-six times their number residing in New York? Simply because the changes are not made by the people but by the States, to whom the power was reserved when the Constitution was formed. If, as the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts asserts, ten at least of the great States of this Union, Pennsylvania and Ohio included, have not now and never have had a republican form of government, and if, as he contends, it is not only the right but the duty of the United States to interfere and guaranty it to them against their will because they have seen fit, in accordance with their own State constitutions, some of which were in existence before the Federal Constitution was formed, and under which they were acting when they aided in its formation, to determine for themselves who should and who should not exercise the elective franchise within their borders—if, I say, that constitutes their State governments aristocracies, which we in Congress are in duty bound to subvert, what will the gentleman say about the republicanism of one citizen of Nevada or Florida having the same power over the fundamental laws of the United States and the several States as sixty-six citizens of the State of New York have? What doctrine of republican equality and right gives New England, with less than three and a half millions of population, twelve Senators, while the State of New York, with a population of over four and a half millions, has only two?

Passing from the more general positions taken by the distinguished representative of the Judiciary Committee to his specifications I may state them under three heads. He claimed the existence of the power now sought to be exercised as being vested in Congress by the Constitution prior to the adoption of any of the late amendments. First, because there was no express grant of absolute power over the question of suffrage granted to the States, but rather a qualified one which was set forth in that portion of section four of article one of the Constitution, which provides that—

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof."

Admitting as he did what could not well be denied, that this, taken in connection with that part of section two of article one which prescribes that—would give full authority over the subject of suffrage to the States but for the limitations imposed in what may properly be called his second proposition in the following portion of section four aforesaid, to wit:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature,"

"But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Which authority he contended, especially over the "manner of holding elections," gives this Congress full power to pass the proposed bill. His third proposition is that none of the States which prohibit negro suffrage are, because of that prohibition, republican in form, but are all mere aristocracies, and that Congress in order to guaranty to each of these States a Republican form of government is in duty bound to impose universal negro suffrage upon them, set aside their State constitutions, annul their laws, and make them conform to the orders of this most august and omnipotent Congress. I will notice each of these positions briefly in the short time allotted to me before I notice his argument as to the effect which the fourteenth amendment has on the question, and I can only suggest objections to each, want of time making it impossible to elaborate them.

As to the first ground assumed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I have only to say that it is the first time I have ever heard it intimated that the States were dependent on the Constitution for a grant of power in order to be able properly to exercise it. On the contrary it is well known and universally admitted that their delegates met and framed that instrument as the representatives of free, equal, sovereign, and independent States. That—"The Constitution of the United States is one of limited and expressly delegated powers, which can only be exercised by the General Government as granted, or in the cases enumerated."

That—

"The Government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted are such as are expressly given or given by necessary implication."

That—

"This instrument contains an enumeration of powers expressly granted by the people to their Government."

And, as if to render this construction certain, as if to make assurance doubly sure, it provided that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

Why, sir, when a lawyer looks into a State constitution to see whether a law of the State is in conflict with it, what does he do? He looks to see whether or not there is anything in the constitution prohibiting the Legislature from so acting, because all the power of the State is in the Legislature of the State except what is taken from it by the State or Federal Constitution. But when he looks into the Federal Constitution to see if a law of Congress is constitutional he takes exactly the opposite view. He looks to see whether that power has been granted to Congress, and if it has not been expressly or by necessary implication granted to the Federal Government then the power is not there; it is in the States or the people thereof. If the gentleman will look at the decision of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of McCullough vs. Maryland, he will find that the words "necessary and proper" do not mean everything that Congress thinks is necessary. It must be necessary and proper. You must use constitutional means to carry out constitutional ends.

But I will not elaborate this idea. The gentleman from Massachusetts is triumphantly answered, and all his arguments overthrown by the very able and logical argument of the distinguished lawyer and advocate from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] when on the floor of this House he was urging the passage of an amendment to the Constitution for the purpose of investing Congress with the power now assumed by the gentleman from Massachusetts to have existed always. It was delivered on the 28th day of February, 1866, and may be found in the Globe, volume fifty-seven, page 1093. I adopt the following portion of it as expressing my ideas better than I can express them myself.

Mr. BINGHAM said:

"I beg leave to read, in confirmation of the truth of what I say, an utterance made in the hearing of the whole people of this country in 1788, when the Constitution was on trial for its deliverance. I read from No. 45 of the Federalist, a paper written by James Madison:

"The powers reserved to the Federal States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State."

"I submit that this is the text of the Constitution, except as the new amendment prohibiting slavery, and providing for legislation to prevent it except as punishment for crime. It stands as the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States in the great case of McCullough vs. The State of Maryland, in 4 Wheaton. It stands as the ruling of the same tribunal in the case of Ogden vs. Gibbons, in 9 Peters. It stands, in short, as the uniform ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States, concurring with the continued action of the other Departments of the Government from the year 1789 till this hour, there being no law anywhere upon our statute-books to punish penal any State officer for denying in any State to any citizen of the United States protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property. It stands as the very text of the Constitution itself, which declares that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

"The word 'powers' controls the whole question. The Government of the United States has no legislative powers, save the express grants and the general grant to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into execution all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or any officer thereof, and the implied powers necessary to carry the express powers into effect. A grant of power, according to all construction, is a very different thing from a bill of rights. In support of what I have said on this point I ask attention to the following citations:

"McCullough vs. Maryland, 4 Wheaton, 405, Marshall, C. J., says:

"The Constitution of the United States is one of limited and expressly delegated powers, which can only be exercised as granted, or in cases enumerated."

Speaking of the authority given to Congress by the last clause of the first article, eighth section, of the Constitution, Judge Story in his Commentaries, section 1238, says:

"The plain import of this clause is, that Congress shall have all the incidental and instrumental powers necessary and proper to carry into execution all the express powers. It neither enlarges any power specifically granted, nor is it a grant of any new power to Congress."

"In Martin vs. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheaton, 321, it is said:

"The Government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted are such as are expressly given or given by necessary implication."

"In Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 187, Chief Justice Marshall, speaking of the Constitution, says:

"This instrument contains an enumeration of powers expressly granted by the people to their Government."

"In Kent's Commentaries, volume one, pages 388-390, there is this language:

"The correct principle is that whenever the terms in which the power was granted to Congress, or the nature of the power required that it should be exclusively exercised by Congress, the subject was as completely taken away from the State Legislatures as if they had been expressly forbidden to act upon it."

"You have the express power to define the punishment of treason; the express power to punish the counterfeiting of coin or securities of the United States; the express power to define and punish piracy and felonies committed upon the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations; exclusive legislative power within this District; express powers to govern all Territories; but where is the express power to define and punish crimes committed in any State by its official officers in violation of the rights of citizens and persons as declared in the Constitution? And from what expressly delegated power in the Constitution can any such power be implied? Passing the anti-slavery amendment, is there any one prepared to say that the Bill of Rights confers express legislative power on Congress to punish State officers for a willful and corrupt disregard of their oaths and oppressive and flagrantly unjust violations of the declared rights of every citizen and every free man in every free State? The words of Madison cited are very significant: 'The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people.' The fact is that Congress has never by penal enactment in all the past attempted to enforce these rights of the people in any State of the Union."

The second proposition, to wit, that the portion of section four of article one of the Constitution which provides that Congress may at any time alter such regulations as the Legislatures of the States may prescribe as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, invests Congress with any power to determine who shall and who shall not exercise the right of suffrage in the States, seems to me even more absurd than the first. What Patrick Henry may have said, bitterly opposed as he was to many of the provisions of the Constitution; what any man in Massachusetts may have said about the power of Congress over suffrage in the States under this clause, I care not. The language of the instrument and the uniform recognition of this power as one belonging exclusively to the several States sufficiently refutes all their theories. But when it is asserted that Mr. Madison asserted or admitted that Congress had any such power I deny it. He took precisely the opposite ground, asserting that this power was not only absolute in the States, but being as to Representatives in Congress required to be fixed and determined in the constitutions of the States; it was equally beyond the authority of Congress or the fluctuating legislation of the State Legislatures. I read from the first part of No. 52 of the Federalist, pages 242-243:

"From the more general inquiries pursued in the four last papers I pass on to a more particular examination of the several parts of the Government. I shall begin with the House of Representatives."

"The first view to be taken of this part of the Government relates to the qualifications of the electors and the elected."

"Those of the former are to be the same with those of the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures. The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as a fundamental article of republican Government. It was incumbent on the Convention, therefore, to define and establish this right in the Constitution. To have left it open for the occasional regulation of the Congress would have been improper, for the reason just mentioned. To have submitted it to the legislative discretion of the States would have been improper for the same reason; and for the additional reason that it would have rendered too dependent on the State governments that branch of the Federal Government which ought to be dependent on the people alone. To have reduced the different qualifications in the different States to one uniform rule would probably have been as dissatisfactory to some of the States as it would have been difficult to the Convention. The provision made by the Convention appears, therefore, to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established, or which may be established by the State itself. It will be safe to the United States, because being fixed by the State constitutions, it is not alterable by the State governments, and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitutions in such a manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution."

Can language be plainer? Could Mr. Madison have expressed his conviction more clearly that the question of suffrage was not only vested in the States, but, so far as electors for Senators and Representatives in Congress are concerned, they are defined and fixed in the constitutions of the States, so that their rights are secured against the prejudices and vascillations of even State legislation, as the same persons who can elect the State Legislatures can always vote for members of Congress? Why does he regard this section of the Constitution as eminently proper and satisfactory? Because suffrage being a fundamental article of republican government it would have been improper to have left it open for the occasional regulation of Congress, and so far as representation in Congress is concerned, which is the only thing the United States was concerned about or had anything to do with, it is safe and satisfactory both to the States and the United States by having the right of the electors fixed, defined, crystallized, as it were, in the constitutions of the States themselves, which it was, as he says, not to be feared that they would alter so as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution. But this bill goes greatly beyond what either the gentleman from Massachusetts or any of the learned committee for whom he speaks will venture to assert that they can find any pretense of constitutional warrant; for it declares null and void the constitutions and laws of every State, and punishes with heavy fines and prolonged imprisonment all State officers who refuse to receive the votes of negroes in elections for electors for President and Vice President or for members of the Legislature of the State in which they may reside. What section or clause of the Constitution gives Congress the right to regulate even the times, places, or manner of holding elections for President or for members of the Legislatures of the several States? I ask this question because, unless the language of the instrument itself and the uniform decisions of the tribunals provided by it to expound its meaning are all set aside and disregarded; if the power is not given either by express grant or by necessary implication, it not only does not exist in Congress, but is expressly reserved to the States respectively or to the people. As to who shall be electors for the State Legislatures the Constitution is silent, even as to the time, place, and manner of their action, and is among the absolutely reserved powers, while the electors for President shall be appointed in such manner as the State Legislatures may direct, negating all idea of power in Congress even over the manner of the election. Yet this bill assumes control over all.

The Constitution was not designed by its framers to interfere with or in this matter to limit or control in any way the absolute sovereign power of the States in any manner, except to secure to the people thereof representation in the Federal Congress, and by the powers granted to Congress in the fourth section of the first article that right was secured by giving Congress control over the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives there. When Mr. Hamilton, in the fifty-ninth number of the Federalist, vindicated the wisdom of this provision, and used the language on which so much emphasis has been laid, and which has been so much perverted that "its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation," he uttered only an axiomatic truth, and explained fully what he meant in this application of it. The people of each State had the right to be represented in the Congress of the United States. The people of each of the other States had the right to expect, perhaps to require, the presence there of the Representatives of all the States. It was well known that each State was compelled to elect periodically a State Legislature; its very existence required that to be done. Certain classes of the citizens of each were of necessity obliged to be qualified electors for Representatives in the most numerous branch of the Legislature. The numbers and qualifications of these electors might vary in every State; negroes, women, foreigners, might be admitted to or excluded from the privilege. Universal suffrage or educational or property restrictions or qualifications might be allowed or imposed as each State thought most conducive to its own prosperity, security, and peace. With all that the United States had no concern and no right to interfere. But knowing that some class of citizens in each State must have the qualifications for electors for their Legislatures, it provided that that class, whether numerous or restricted, should by virtue of these qualifications possess all the qualifications requisite for electors for Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States. Indeed, all the States, had, when the Constitution was formed, State constitutions republican in form, at least in the opinion of its framers and of all the statesmen and jurists who have succeeded them until within a few years past, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts and a few others similarly organized have discovered that all these men were fools, and that these constitutions were the most odious aristocracies; but of that hereafter. A class of electors being thus secured beyond all peradventure who could vote for members of Congress, it was equally important that the privilege of exercising the right should be assured to them beyond all contingency.

The times, places, and manner of holding such elections were to be prescribed by the State Legislatures. Congress was not expected to interfere except in case of failure or refusal of the local Legislatures to make proper provisions, but the State was not to be left unrepresented in Congress nor the qualified electors therein deprived of their right of representation in the common council of the Union because of the failure or refusal of the State Legislatures from any cause, no matter what, to furnish them the means legally to elect men to represent them. Hence the provision that "Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations" as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for members of Congress. This provision gave the Federal Government the power to use again and apply as he did the words of Mr. Hamilton, "that every Government ought to contain within itself the means of its own preservation." As long as there is in any State any number of electors qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures, as long as there is a man who has the constitutional qualifications of a member of Congress, this body has the constitutional power, and it is its duty to see that the electors and candidates are not only allowed but furnished proper facilities for the exercise of their rights and privileges.

If the State Legislatures refuse to fix a time for holding such elections, or fix an improper time; if they fail to designate places or to authorize them to be designated, or if they are unsuitable or inadequate, or if they fail to appoint or cause to be appointed suitable persons to conduct and determine the result of such election, or in any regard fail to conduct them in a proper manner, I take it to be not only the right but the duty of Congress by proper laws to provide and prescribe the proper times, places, and manner of conducting such elections, which, when complied with by the electors in the States, will entitle the Representatives chosen by them in conformity thereto to take their seats in Congress and represent their States with the same binding effect as if all the machinery of the election had been provided by the States themselves. That seems to me to be the whole scope, intent, and meaning of the constitutional provision upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts seeks to overthrow and subvert the constitutions and laws of at least ten States of this Union, most of them older than the Constitution itself, and under which or under others not materially different their people were living when they framed it.

I venture the assertion here before the House and the country, and in the face of the long array of distinguished names which the gentleman from Massachusetts has paraded, and extracts from whose speeches he has published, that all his authorities, with perhaps one exception, sustain me and my views and contradict him and his. Story, Kent, the Supreme Court, all the expounders of the Constitution, official and unofficial, are against him; and even Patrick Henry, the bitterest and most unrelenting of all the opponents of the Constitution, whose opinions were all overruled and disregarded, only objected to this provision because, as he says:

"According to the mode prescribed Congress may tell you that they have a right to make the vote of one gentleman go as far as the votes of one hundred poor men. The power over the manner admits of the most dangerous latitude."

He even did not believe they had any such power, but he says Congress may tell you that they have this dangerous power. Nearly a century has rolled on since he spoke, and no Congress ever thought of it. He was about to go down to posterity as a false prophet, a croaker, or an alarmist, when the gentleman from Massachusetts and his friends set up the claim and have verified his fears, and now cite him as authority to sustain them in their revolutionary course.

But I must hurry on. The third proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is that no State which excludes a portion of its citizens from the exercise of the right of suffrage is republican in form; and as by section four of article four of the Constitution "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," it is our duty to pass this bill to comply with that guarantee. The distinguished source from which this proposition emanates alone entitles it to serious consideration. If I or any other common member of this House had enunciated and advocated it we would not have been listened to; it would have been treated simply as an absurdity. I suppose it will hardly be denied that the framers of the Constitution knew what constituted a republican form of government, and that each of the thirteen States that by the Constitution formed and constituted the United States were recognized then as having republican forms of government. It is hard to understand how they could have become parties to and have ratified the Federal compact if it had not been so. Mr. Madison, whose views coincided with those of Mr. Hamilton, in the forty-third number of the Federalist assumed as an unquestioned and undoubted proposition that each of the States then had governments republican in form. He says, when speaking of when and how the Federal Government can interfere under the guarantee clause in the Constitution:

"It may possibly be asked whether it may not become a pretext for alterations in the State governments, without the concurrence of the States themselves. It may be answered that if the General Government should interpose by virtue of this constitutional authority, it will be of course bound to pursue the authority. But the authority extends no further than to a guarantee of a republican form of government, which supposes a preëxisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms they have a right to do so, and to claim the Federal guarantee for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is that they shall not exchange republican for anti-republican constitutions."

"Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, quoting these opinions of Hamilton and Madison, says:

"The Federalist has spoken with so much force and propriety upon this subject that it supersedes all further reasoning."

Let us see wherein these States, having then beyond all question governments republican in form are now less so than they were then; let us see by what act or change they have lost their republican forms of government, so as to authorize the United States to interfere and restore it under her obligation to guaranty it to them.

Twelve out of the original thirteen States were then slave-holding States to begin with. Now slavery is abolished in all of them. They had republican forms of government while they held slaves and excluded the whole negro race from the right of suffrage. Will it be contended that the abolition of slavery has made their forms of government anti-republican? I presume the gentleman from Massachusetts and his colleagues on the Judiciary Committee will not so contend. Suffrage in nearly all these twelve States was confirmed when the constitution was adopted to free white men, and in a number of them property qualifications were prescribed as a condition precedent to the exercise by the citizen of the right of suffrage. Yet Mr. Madison, in the extract I have read, assumed as an undoubted and indisputable fact that the then existing State governments were all republican in form.

Massachusetts by her constitution of 1780, under which she maintained her republican form of government without amendment on the question of suffrage till 1836, limited the right of suffrage thus by article four, chapter one:

"Every male person, being twenty-one years of age, and resident in any particular town in the Commonwealth for the space of one year next preceding, having a freehold estate within the same town, of the annual income of three pounds, or any estate of the value of sixty pounds, shall have the right to vote in the choice of a representative or representatives for the said town."

That property qualification doubtless deprived half her white citizens of the right of suffrage, yet none of her statesmen of that day for a moment supposed that her government was anti-republican, or that the Congress of the United States, under the constitution she had helped to create, could set aside her constitution and laws because she had an aristocratic and not a republican form of government. No one knows better than the gentleman from Massachusetts that suffrage was not universal in any of the republics of ancient times. None knows better than he that it was not universal in any of the republics of America when they united in the formation of the Federal Constitution, and none knows better than he that in the changes made by the thirteen original States in their constitutions after the Federal Constitution was adopted a large majority of them limited, and still limit, the right of suffrage to white male citizens; and he knows as well as any man on this floor, and every school-boy knows, that every State that was admitted into the Union after the formation of the Federal Constitution, prior to 1862, without a single exception, limited the right of suffrage in their constitutions to white male citizens, and that all of those that changed their constitutions in any way prior to 1864 continued the limitation, and confined the right of suffrage to white male citizens. Yet all these States so admitted into the Union, slave-holding and free, were admitted by a distinct resolution of Congress, in each case declaring that they were so admitted under the constitutional provision authorizing the admission of new States, because they had each adopted constitutions republican in form.

The resolution admitting Illinois and Indiana, which can both be found in volume third of the United States Statutes-at-Large, page 536, may be taken as specimens of all the others. They fully verify what I say. Look for a moment at the changes made by the States in their State constitutions since the Constitution of the United States was adopted, or since their admission into the Union as States, and what do we find upon the subject of suffrage? I have the State constitutions all before me, and they can be examined by any member who desires to do so. New Hampshire, by her constitution of 1792, and Maine in 1819, excluded paupers only. Massachusetts in 1836 excluded paupers and all those who could not read the Constitution in the English language and write his name. Rhode Island in 1842 excluded, and still excludes, all naturalized citizens of the United States, and imposes a property qualification on all others. Connecticut in 1818 limited the right of suffrage to white males over twenty-one years of age. New Jersey in 1844, Pennsylvania in 1838, Maryland in 1851, Delaware in 1831, imposed the same limitation. New York in 1846 excluded all negroes from the right of suffrage, except those who had resided for three years in the State and owned freehold estates worth $250, no such restriction being imposed upon white men.

I will not speak of any of the original thirteen that attempted to secede, though they all, while undoubted members of the Union, limited suffrage to white men. Of those admitted after the adoption of the Constitution, Ohio in 1851 formed a new constitution, and limited suffrage to white male citizens; Indiana did the same thing in the same year; Illinois did so in 1847, and Michigan made the same provision in 1850. Iowa imposed the same restriction on this right in 1855, and Kansas in 1859. A similar limitation was made by Wisconsin in 1848, and the constitutions of Minnesota and Oregon contain precisely the same limitations. Congress admitted Texas and California with similar restrictions, while Missouri in 1848, and Kentucky in 1849, placed precisely the same restrictions and qualifications in their State constitutions, and these restrictions and limitations remain in nearly all the constitutions of the States I have named to this day. In view of all these facts it is amazing to hear a gentleman assuming to speak for the majority of the Judiciary Committee of this House, and one of the leading and most influential members of it make such a statement as this which I read from the Globe:

"Mr. BOUTWELL. I was proceeding to consider the distinction between an aristocracy and a republic. I say without hesitation that none of those States in which men are denied the elective franchise for themselves and for all their posterity are republican. They are aristocracies more or less offensive to republican institutions and republican government, and inasmuch as by the Constitution the United States has power, and it is made its duty to guaranty a republican form of government to each State, if upon observation we find, as I think we do find, in Delaware, in Kentucky, in Maryland, in Ohio, and in Pennsylvania, that the governments are not republican, it becomes our duty to exercise the power vested in us by the Constitution and make those governments republican by law."

And the following from the same speech is equally indefensible—I had almost said ridiculous:

"But, sir, consider the anomalous feature in our Government if the doctrine be successfully maintained that we cannot legislate on this subject. There are citizens in Kentucky and Maryland who, if the doctrine set forth by the opponents of this bill be a sound constitutional doctrine, are eligible to the office of President or Vice President of the United States, and yet who cannot vote for Representatives in Congress or even for a State, county, or town official. What is the qualification for the office of President? He must be a native citizen of the United States and thirty-five years of age. Nothing more. These are the only qualifications for the office of President. By the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution we have declared that all the black men in Maryland and other States shall be citizens of the United States. Certain State governments have for the present denied these people the right to vote, and yet one of them may be elected President of the United States and another Vice President. Is there such an anomaly in our Government? Are we prepared to admit its existence unless the Constitution imperatively requires it? The Constitution provides that any one twenty-five years of age, who has been a citizen for seven years, may be elected a Representative upon this floor; and colored men, although denied the right of suffrage in their own States, may be elected to legislate for the whole country. Thus is the General Government put in an anomalous and inconsistent position."

As the speech progressed the following colloquy occurred:

"Mr. WELKER. I desire to inquire whether there is anything in this bill that will prevent any of the States from requiring of voters a property or educational qualification?

"Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not suppose there is.

"Mr. WELKER. Then the States may, under this bill, require such a qualification?

"Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose they may."

I never expected to hear such positions taken on this floor, even by the most obscure member; surely not from one of the great leaders of his party. Two Presidents of the United States have been elected from the State of Massachusetts; and while they each had all the constitutional qualifications for that high office, yet neither of them may have possessed the property qualification required at the time of the election of each to have enabled either of them to vote for a member of the Legislature or even a constable in the State of Massachusetts. A pauper may be elected President. Belisarius is said to have become a beggar. Misfortunes may reduce the wisest and best to be dependent on the community, and while in that dependent condition a man may be elected President; yet he is deprived of the right of suffrage by the constitutions of Massachusetts, Maine, and New Hampshire. It is not so in Kentucky. Intellect, and not wealth, is the qualification in the proud State I have the honor in part to represent. It is admitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts that he does not propose by his bill to prevent disfranchisement by the States to any extent if wealth is made the measure of the right.

But further elaboration seems to me useless. A simple statement of the facts refutes all the sophistries of the argument of the gentleman. If the constitutions of the States he named as having anti-republican governments can be subverted and overthrown by Congress as "odious aristocracies," there were no republican State governments when the Constitution was framed, and there are few, if any, now. New York, Connecticut, and all the western and north-western States must be added to his list. Their Representatives must be expelled from these Halls, and Vermont alone will rule the continent. His idea of a guarantee is equally puerile. If these States ever had republican forms of government they have them now. The original thirteen States certainly had; and each agreed with the other that they had by the very act of framing the Constitution for the better protection of and more effectually to guaranty to each the preservation of their then existing republican governments; for the very idea of a guarantee presupposed the existence of the thing guaranteed. So with the States afterward admitted. The act of admission of each into the Union by the Representatives of all, with the solemn declaration in each case that their State constitutions were republican in form and that they should severally be protected and guaranteed in the preservation and perpetuation of them, is conclusive against the power of Congress on any pretense whatever now to annul and subvert them.

This bill, so far from guarantying to every State in the Union a republican form of government, actually, avowedly destroys and obliterates it. When Congress forces voters upon a State against its expressed will it assumes the reins of government then; the State is the mere serf of Congress, executing its orders, obeying its mandates. The government is congressional, not State, as much so as if Congress ordered it to fill all its State offices with men selected and named by Congress. Authority over the electors would give it equal authority over the office-holders in a State. There can be no State republican government if Congress dictates and enforces the government it sets up. Instead of protecting the State in the exercise of its freedom, this bill proposes to destroy that freedom; instead of guarantying that freedom to the States which is the very essence of republican government, it strikes it down. They have said in their State constitutions what they want guaranteed. They are making no complaint and asking for no interference; neither foreign nor domestic enemies assail or threaten them; peace prevails. Yet we say we will not only not guaranty them in that, but we will annul their constitutions, set aside their laws, and make them obey our orders whether they want to or not. I assert when we propose to do that we are plainly, palpably establishing a congressional despotism over the whole country. It is sheer folly for gentlemen to stand up here and think to hide their purposes from the country or the world by any such hollow pretenses as are set up in the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The ostrich with his eyes closed and his head stuck in the sand is about as well concealed as the purposes of this bill are by all the high-sounding declamation of the gentleman. A centralized, consolidated despotism will swallow up these great United States.

I now propose to show that the fourteenth amendment gives Congress no power over suffrage in the States, and that even the Republican party never claimed that it did, but, on the contrary, distinctly avowed in the most solemn form that it did not, pledging themselves to the people of the country that they would so maintain if they were again intrusted with power and place. When General Grant was nominated, the convention which met at Chicago in May, 1868, after the whole meaning and effect of the fourteenth amendment was fully understood, laid before the country a platform of principles which it pledged itself to uphold and be governed by. Congress took a recess, and its Republican members were there en masse, doubtless its most active members, and the following resolution was unanimously adopted, being the second in the series:

"The guarantee by Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained, while the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of the States themselves."

If that resolution was not intended to delude and deceive the people whose confidence and support they were seeking to obtain because of the principles they were pledging themselves to uphold and perpetuate, this bill cannot be supported by any man who did not publicly disavow the published principles of his party. If the question of suffrage in all the loyal States rightfully and properly belongs to the people of the States themselves Congress cannot legally or properly interfere with it, and it would not only be bad faith but gross usurpation so to do.

But independent of that, it is evident, not only from the debates in both Houses of Congress at the time the fourteenth amendment was proposed, but from the language of the amendment itself when considered in reference to the peculiar and anomalous condition of the negro race, to which it more specifically, indeed almost exclusively relates, that the first section of the amendment, even if we leave out of view the second, which, making clear the meaning of the first, fully sustains the position which I in common with the Republican convention—and we agree but seldom—maintain, that the question of suffrage was not thereby interfered with, but was left where it properly belongs, with the States themselves.

Prior to that amendment negroes were not citizens of the United States. They possessed none of the rights or privileges and were entitled to none of the immunities of citizens. They could not sue in the courts of the United States. Passports to travel in foreign countries could not be granted to them because the United States could not protect any but her citizens. A negro born abroad could not be naturalized, that right being limited to free white persons. When the Constitution was adopted they were not regarded in any of the States as constituting any part of the people or citizens thereof, and the only two clauses in the Constitution pointing to the negro race treat them as persons whom it was legally and morally right to deal in as property and hold as slaves. The then civilized world acted on that idea in regard to them. Of course, no State could, after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, by any State legislation, make either a foreigner or other description of persons citizens of the United States, nor entitle them to the rights or privileges secured to citizens by that instrument; and while a State might by its own laws place a negro or any other person on a footing with its own citizens as to all rights, privileges, and immunities enjoyed by them within its own dominion, it could not make him a citizen of the United States so as to confer upon him any of the privileges or immunities of a citizen of any other State. It was because of these well-settled principles that Massachusetts was unable to afford protection to negroes who were citizens of that State when they were seized and punished in South Carolina, which prohibited free negroes from other States from landing on her soil. It was because they were well established that Dred Scott could not test his right to freedom in the courts of the United States.

By section two, article three, of the Constitution the judicial power of the United States so far as it is controlled by the personal status of the litigant is limited to controversies "between a State and citizens of another State, between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants from different States, and between a State or the citizens thereof and foreign States, citizens, or subjects," so that it was up to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment impossible for a negro resident in a State that refused him the privileges of State citizenship to assert any rights in the courts of the United States; and it was equally impossible for him to obtain any of the benefits of section two, article four, of the Constitution, which provides that—

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

It was to give to the negro race, nine tenths of which had been held in slavery until the adoption of the thirteenth constitutional amendment, the benefit of the protection which citizenship confers that the fourteenth amendment was adopted, if it be adopted, which, for the purposes of this argument only, I propose to admit. Under it negroes, as well as Indians, Gipsies, Chinese, and all the Mongolian races born in the United States, men and women, young and old, can now sue and be sued in the courts of the United States.

They can travel under the protection of the Government in foreign countries; they can move from State to State, locate in any State, acquire, hold, and enjoy property under the protection of the laws of the State upon the same terms as white citizens going there from other States can; they are entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and those rights are not to be abridged by State legislation when such citizen of the United States comes within the local jurisdiction of the State. But as it must be conceded that being a citizen of the United States, whether by birth or naturalization, never gave any man the right against the will of the State to go there and exercise the right of suffrage, the refusal of the State to grant it cannot in any sense abridge his rights or privileges as a citizen of the United States. It is impossible for any privileges to be abridged that a man never possessed. The very idea conveyed by the term abridge is that existing rights, privileges, or immunities shall not be impaired, taken from, diminished or made less beneficial, but it conveys no idea of the acquisition of rights or of the requirement now assumed that new privileges shall be granted.

Whatever privilege he possesses by virtue of being such citizen when he goes within the local jurisdiction of a State shall not be taken away, impaired, or abridged. But no new grant is either required or expected from the State. She shall not interfere with his right to sue in the courts of the United States, nor withhold from him the equal protection of her laws; to do so would abridge his privileges. The first section has that extent—no more. States may allow persons to exercise the right of suffrage who are not citizens of the United States; most of the northwestern States have done so; some of them now do, or they may refuse to allow it to citizens of the United States, as Rhode Island now does, to those who are naturalized. A grant of the right of suffrage in a republic is an investment of the individual to whom it is granted with the highest rights of citizenship, yet it is by no means an element necessary to establish unqualified citizenship. All the native-born white females in the United States, and all persons, male and female, under twenty-one years of age, are as much citizens of the United States and of the States in which they reside, and are as fully entitled to the protection of all the laws, State and Federal, as those males to whom the right of suffrage is intrusted. The paupers in Massachusetts, and those who cannot read the Constitution in the English language nor write their names, all of whom are excluded from the right of suffrage in that State by its constitution, are citizens of the State as much as those who vote. If the gentleman and his friends had given the people of the southern States the same constitution that the people of Massachusetts in 1836 imposed upon themselves, ninety per cent. of the negroes there would be excluded from the exercise of the right of suffrage; and while they are fastening negro equality, social and political, upon that people, Massachusetts, in her code of laws passed in 1836, prohibited the marriage of any white person with a negro or mulatto, declared all such marriages null and void, and their children bastards, punishing by a fine of fifty pounds any person who should join them in marriage. I think Massachusetts was right; but with her high pretensions to justice she ought to apply the same rule to others that she does to herself.

Mr. Speaker, it seems like child's play to cite authority to sustain a proposition so plain as that the right of suffrage is by no means a necessary incident of citizenship. It may not be amiss, however, to say that in the discussion of the civil-rights bill, which makes all negroes born in the United States citizens of the United States, and gives them all the right that citizenship can confer, as well as in the discussion of the rights given to them by the fourteenth amendment, Senator TRUMBULL, chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and all the Republican lawyers in both Houses whose opinions were worth anything, admitted that neither the act nor the amendment conferred, or were expected or intended to confer on them the right of suffrage. All agreed that each State regulated that matter as each might consider that extension or limitation of the right most conducive to the welfare of the State. It was in view of these well-known facts and admissions that I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts, while making his speech, the following questions, which, with his answer, I read from the Globe:

"I desire to ask if by the first section of the fourteenth amendment it was intended to prevent the States from determining who should and who should not vote, why, when it provides that 'no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States,' it did not add, nor makes discriminations among the citizens of the State itself in the exercise of the right of suffrage?"

Mr. BOWTLE. There was the plainest reason in the world. It was not necessary. The article provides, as it stands, that there can be no discrimination by the States among the citizens of the United States, who are as well citizens of the several States and entitled equally to the privileges of citizens."

The answer not only does not meet, but carefully avoids the question. All may be equally entitled to the privileges of citizens without impairing the absolute right and power of the State to limit suffrage there as it pleases. The women and children, as I have stated, are all citizens of the State and of the United States. The paupers and those who cannot read or write in Massachusetts are all citizens, and their rights, privileges, and immunities cannot be constitutionally abridged; but that does not make them voters in the State. It never entered into the brain of any statesman till a majority of the Judiciary Committee of this House took it up by presenting this bill, that every State constitution, with the exception perhaps of Vermont, is overthrown and annulled by that amendment, and that every State is now carrying on the State government under a constitution which contains provisions inconsistent with and antagonistic to the Constitution of the United States, and are therefore now living in contempt of, if not in rebellion to its authority. If the words—or any others equivalent thereto—suggested in my question had been inserted, despotic and revolutionary as the exercise of such power would have been, being subversive of the freedom and rights of the States, indeed of their very existence as States, still it could have been understood that universal suffrage was to be enforced, the failure to insert some such idea is conclusive that it was only intended to invest this class of people with the protection which the Federal Constitution throws around its citizens, and such as the State constitutions grant to all their citizens, young and old, male and female, rich and poor, all of which can be done without any changes in the fundamental laws of the States; purposely leaving the question of suffrage as it stands in the several State constitutions, so that the people thereof may extend the right or not as they see fit. Congress doubtless desired that all the States should adopt universal suffrage, and so desiring, determined to so exercise the power it possesses of apportioning representation among them as to make it their interest to do so. It had been heretofore provided that population should regulate representation in Congress, with some modifications. Now it is provided that suffrage shall control; hence the second section of the amendment, which provides:

"SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

It is contended by the gentleman from Massachusetts that this is only a political punishment to be imposed on such States as refuse to obey the mandates of the first section till such time as Congress can enforce its provisions, which he asserts provides that the right to vote for certain officers cannot be denied or abridged. A more unfounded assumption cannot well be imagined. The right to vote is not only not secured by the first section, as he assumes, it is not even alluded to; nor, as I have shown, is there any language in it which indicates that was so intended. Just the reverse; and as the right to regulate that question was by the first section left the States, the consequences which are to follow their refusal to make suffrage universal are determined in the second.

If the first section secured the right to vote at all, the second was the most absurd and abortive effort to secure that right to the parties entitled to it that can well be conceived. It is very hard to see how the disfranchised or unenfranchised persons are better protected, or their right to vote in any way forwarded, by a diminution of the representation of the States of their residence in the Congress of the United States. The conclusion of the gentleman on that subject is singularly lame and impotent. This amendment being part of the Constitution is, of course, subject to and governed by the same rules of construction as the original instrument, which is a grant of express powers, or of powers properly and necessarily inferable from the express grant. There is no bill of rights in the Federal Constitution, while nearly all the State constitutions contain them; the amendments to the Constitution being all limitations on the General Government and not applicable to the States. Why is this? Simply because the Federal Constitution could grant no rights; it only received powers, and is authorized to enforce restrictions which the States put upon themselves.

Construing the force, effect, and meaning of this amendment as I do, there is no difficulty in carrying it out by appropriate congressional legislation; but if the other view is attempted to be enforced and the existing constitutions and laws of the States are to be set aside by legislation here, as this bill proposes, it will be very difficult to find either an express grant or a properly implied one anywhere in that first section.

As to the fourth section of the bill, I have only time to say that, even if there was no other objection to it, it is so cruel and inhuman in its penalties, and is kept open as a constant bid for perjury on the part of those who want the offices to which others have been elected—and their name is legion—for such a length of time, (ten years,) that it ought to be at once rejected. I would commend to the gentleman the careful and serious consideration of the twenty fourth article of the bill of rights of the Massachusetts constitution, which provides that—

"Laws made to punish for actions done before the existence of such laws, and which have not been declared crimes by preceding laws, are unjust, oppressive, and inconsistent with the fundamental principles of a free government."

Following up that fundamental idea, the Constitution prohibited Congress from passing bills of attainder or ex post facto laws; and lest the States in the exercise of their reserved powers might at any time so far depart from the established principles of republican liberty and law as to do so, the Constitution further provided that no State should pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts.

There is at least enough doubt about the construction of the third section of the fourteenth amendment, on which the fourth section of this bill is based, to make it not only extremely oppressive, but grossly unjust legislation. The provision to punish "any person who shall exercise the powers and duties of any office therein specified" who is disqualified by the third section of the amendment by imprisonment at hard labor for two years, without in any manner defining what offices he must have held to impose the disability upon him or without giving him any information which will enable him to understand, for example, what is meant by being an executive or judicial officer of any State.

Are city, town, and county officers included? Does it apply to men who had been fully pardoned, and had been duly elected to State offices before the amendment was passed? These and many other questions will arise, and men must not only run all risks of what the ultimate decision will be, but one court may decide one way, and another the reverse; men may be assured that their case is not covered by the law, and in the utmost good faith continue to hold office, and yet be convicted and sentenced to ignominious punishment for two years at hard labor, when they were not only wholly unconscious of being guilty of any wrong, but believed they had a perfect right to the office. These prosecutions may be prosecuted by this law at any time within ten years from the commission of the offense. What is the offense? Is it the holding of the office or the disqualifying act? The evidence may be oral, and supported by statements purporting to have been made ten years before. Recollections of what was said ten years before, when party bitterness is aroused, and motives to commit perjury to secure place are held out, make it, as I said, a most oppressive and unjust law. If I can get an opportunity, and the bill is to be considered, I shall move to amend by inserting after the words "who shall exercise the powers and duties of any office therein specified" the following: "after having been declared ineligible to such office by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction," and limit the time for such prosecution to two instead of ten years. But I will not discuss this section. It was not discussed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and all the principles in it have been so fully and ably discussed and exposed by my colleague, [Mr. KNOTT,] whose argument has not been and cannot be answered, that I am willing to rest it there.

My time is nearly exhausted. I have endeavored to confine myself strictly to the law and the facts as I understand them. I have made no allusion to the repeated insinuations against the State of Kentucky. She needs no defense. She stands to-day the peer of the proudest Commonwealth in this great Republic. When this or any other Congress shall strike down her State government and those of her sister States, as this bill and amendment proposes to do, it will be the darkest day this country ever saw. I have no response to make to the rallying cry of party necessity so warmly, I had almost said so fiercely, urged. The principles involved reach far beyond and rise high above party; they strike down Republican and Democrat alike, for they strike down the columns that support the temple of liberty itself. Five years ago a proposition of this sort would have brought down denunciations loud and deep from men of all parties on the heads of the committee or the member proposing such a bill; but revolutions progress, usurpation if successful encourages and develops further encroachments until all the original landmarks of liberty are lost. A distinguished historian says—and we would do well to heed it and see that we do not verify it:

"We find in the history of all usurping governments time changes anomaly into system and injury into right. Examples beget custom, and custom ripens into law, and the doubtful precedents of one generation become the fundamental maxims of another."

Mr. SHANKS. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising at this time is to say that I will vote for the bill and proposed amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and have offered an amendment thereto by inserting the word "property" in the seventh line of the first section of the printed bill, and in the eleventh line of the amendment to prohibit the practice adopted by some of the States of requiring a property qualification for voters as well as for the purposes previously intended by the bill and amendment, that of prohibiting encroachments on the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery. But, sir, I here wish to state further that I do not think the amendment to the Constitution necessary. In my opinion the bill is ample to reach the case.

I have long thought that it was not only in the power but in the duty of Congress to protect the right of the elective franchise to all the people against any attempt by State or local legislation or by force or fraud to curtail, embarrass, or defeat its full and equal enjoyment by all adult citizens. It would seem to be a remarkable termination of a great and good purpose upon the part of our ancestors, as well as all other founders of free government and of the principles of free government itself that they should declare the equal rights of all men as a cardinal doctrine, and then abandon it in the practical workings of the institutions they thus formed to secure those equal rights?

If, indeed, free government exists only in theory, and has no practical virtues, we are mistaken, and the sooner the masses of mankind are rid of the delusion, and the more readily they return to the pathway of subjection, oppression, and humility, before their more assumptive followers, the better for them. and the more readily and heartily they will be forgiven for believing the heresy that they had valuable natural rights given of God and equal to those of other men. I have implicit confidence in the existence, purity, and majesty of a supreme Ruler of the universe, and I have not lost confidence in mankind. The large majority of the people of all countries, if untrammelled and left to their own judgment, are honest, generous, and even noble in their conceptions and distribution of justice and right, and always magnanimous toward their fellows. It is generally in the minority, but who are the more assumptive, arrogant, ambitious, and not unfrequently vicious portion of society that evil is engendered, that, like leaven, it affects the entire society and often impresses belief diametrically opposite to the real truth. The ambition and vigilance of such often make them rulers among men, and thus republics and free institutions are wasted by falling into bad hands, and being thus used for sinister purposes weaken their hold upon the confidence of the masses and are easily wrenched from them, they caring little for the theory of political blessings that bring to them no real protection.

No man is safe in his person or property in a community where he has no voice in the protection of either. The subjugation of his rights and liberties, the seizure and waste of his property, the degradation of his character, and the insecurity of his life are only questions of time that are not often long deferred. Our own much-injured country furnishes examples enough of the proof of this to both awaken and astonish the civilized world, and to demand the most certain and radical remedy against their recurrence, which can only be secured to society by placing in the hands of all men both the right of self-defense and of the ballot, by which the Government becomes sacred in the hands of the people, because it is the reflected will of all the people. It is only then, it may be truthfully said, that the Government is of the people, for the people, and by the people.

When our forefathers declared to oppressed and astonished mankind the day of a brighter civilization in the birth of the immortal declaration of the equal rights of men they believed that there was a living reality in the declaration. When in support of that declaration and its legitimate consequences they, at great loss of property and life, both of which they deliberately staked on the eventful issue, had founded a Government formed in support of these views, they were still confirmed in the justness of their cause. When, years afterward, in the judgment of the people it became necessary, in support of the cause they had espoused through the Government they had founded to secure a more perfect union of the States, they, after due deliberation and debate, both in the national Congress and in the Legislatures of the several States, establishing a Constitution for the United States, adorning it with this synopsis of its contents and declaration of its purposes:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

This they understood to be a declaration of universal right, and is sufficient for the purpose, for it teaches the genius of the Government and the character and purpose of its founders and protectors. If there were no other teachings in its articles or sections touching the equal rights of the people this preamble is enough and to spare. But if it be said that the blacks were not included because they were slaves I answer, sir, that many of the blacks then were voters, and aided in support of the men who taught these doctrines and established this Constitution, while many white men were denied the ballot because they were poor.

It is poverty more than complexion that dictates the fate of mankind. There has not been an hour since the commencement of the barbarism of slavery in America that money would not purchase the liberty of the slave, nor has there been a time that a white man could vote in some States unless he paid a tax, while in some States the black man could vote if he had property and in others without that qualification, and in others still he could not vote at all, while in many others he is not permitted to vote though more than half his blood be white. Again, I say, it is property more than complexion that dictates the fate of mankind, and republics can only stand when the ballot-box is secured to the poor as well as the rich, when every one is interested in supporting the Government because the Government secures his rights. Have the opponents of this measure learned nothing by the past? Has that revolution conceived and executed by those who held an undue and unequal balance of power in the management of the Government, with all the great sacrifices of that struggle, taught them nothing? Have they walked blindly through these past years of severe schooling? Is the history of the past dead to them? Has the strength of the people of this nation in field and forum, in legislative hall and at the ballot-box been only a pastime and folly to them, or have they deliberately, with true Mussulman zeal, set their souls against progress and determined to destroy civilization in the house of its friends and make this Republic a mockery and by-word among the nations of the earth, instead of a political high-school for the civilized world? Have our fathers established a Republic with a Constitution so fragile as to be controlled by mere traditions and governed by prejudice in violation of its plain teachings? Will the Constitution, that is the written will of all the people, and that declares the rights of the citizen, yield before the anti-republican prejudice of a portion of the people against other citizens, only because they are all or partly of different blood; and would you call this a stable and a free Government? Has the Government no power to secure to all the people their rights, and have the people no power to compel the Government to this duty?

And are the opponents of this measure opposed to trusting the people with the destinies of their own Government, lest they should destroy it or take to themselves the right to manage it for just purposes? And do you call this liberty? Are the few to control the many; the people's servants to govern the nation, while they stand powerless to secure their own rights through the means established for the general good at the hands of their servants? The better sense of honest men revolts at such duplicity and double-dealing, and demands that equal and exact justice be done to all men before the law; that taxation and representation shall go hand in hand, and that the right to participate in the management of the Government whose laws we must obey shall be forfeited only for crimes whereof the parties have been duly convicted.

I believe now, as I have in the past, that Congress had the power, and it was its duty, to abolish slavery throughout the nation at any and every hour of its sessions from its first meeting under the Constitution to that time at which slavery was abolished through other means.

It was with deep mortification and sorrow that I saw Congress stand idly by, even appalled before slavery's high crimes and doubting its power to prevent them, until the necessity was forced upon the nation to declare through its Executive that liberty of the people as a necessary war measure which the legislative power of the Government, vested by the people in a Congress, should have done in time of peace as a light to mankind and a duty to God, and, too, a duty which they could not pass or omit without incurring the responsibility of crime. The sequel has shown how little I was mistaken. I believe that the power and duty of Congress to protect the equal rights of all the citizens of the nation has been perfect since the adoption of the Constitution to this hour. The fact that this is a national legislative body secures that power and carries with it the duty. A war power, then, is power above the law making. A nation that cannot protect its citizens against encroachments of others of its citizens is defective or already in revolution. The nation that will not is an aristocracy and needs correction. If the defect is in the organic law, it should be amended by the people; but if it is only in the practice of the Government, as I believe it is in this case, either by its commissions or its omissions, it may and should be corrected by its own voluntary but prompt and efficient action. We should do that work here now, and do it well.

I am not one of those who labor among the musty records of aristocratic and monarchical Governments for rules and precedents to carry on this free Republic. I do not first tie my feet and then attempt to walk. I do not give the Government and all its blessings to the few and then ask them generously to yield at their pleasure to consider propositions in favor of the people. All that has had its time; it is in the dead past. It is of the things that were. However, its relics still crop out, and become manifest in the haughtier style of the would-be oppressor, the remnant of corrupt power, who, self-styled and conceited, full of vice and crime, commits murder as a satisfaction to appease his hatred to progress, justice, and law. But this the people and the age alike condemn. They must soon pass away; the fiat has gone forth, and civilization is advancing, justice is triumphant, and the equal rights of men must follow. Those who because they are more idle and vile than their neighbors assume to control, rule, rob, own, or sell them and their families at pleasure for gain have always found in the Constitution, as in the holy writings, proof in support of their great wrongs to mankind; and now, even in the light of the total abolition of that statuted twin relic of barbarism, human slavery, and in the brighter light of an advanced Christian civilization, do not seem to learn the apparent truth that society is moving forward; that mankind has aroused from the scourge of ignorance; that men have learned to comprehend the teaching that has ruled them, and that they have determined to be free. The people will not longer ignore the fact that this is their own Government, founded to secure their own rights.

The public servant who in this age of political advancement, in this free and enlightened country, cannot comprehend how the people can in safety to the public welfare exercise all their just and equal rights in the Government is not the proper person to be trusted by them with its destinies. The public servant who has not firmness enough to do right at all times, regardless of private interest and public prejudice, is an unsafe sentinel. He who will not do right though he could is a willing instrument for evil, not entitled to public or private confidence. He who thinks or believes that this nation can prosper while its legislators are unjust to the people is a fool. He who assumes for himself a superiority over his fellows is worse than either—a knave. It has long been and is yet the practice in Congress to refer with pride to the expansive provisions and conceptions of the Constitution, and to dwell with pride upon the noble generosity of its makers in support of a power in Congress to enact all laws; many to admire the social, pecuniary, commercial, agricultural, scientific, or mechanical interests of the nation and people. Yet our records present the strange fact that whenever that great subject, that absolute necessity to the proper or full enjoyment of social, pecuniary, commercial, mechanical, agricultural, or scientific interests, namely, human liberty, is under consideration, the Constitution is eagerly evoked by every political lilliput to prove the virtues of that miserable, antiquated doctrine of inferior races, castes, and privileged classes.

In this land of freedom, this home of free men, this school of liberty, though in advance ground when compared with other nations, yet our counselors are so badly educated, so wretchedly deficient in a true knowledge of the character of free institutions, that when that great question for which all other political questions were made, and which stands so high above them as not to be compared with them, that which is the foundation and only support of material and social progress, and upon which this Government was founded—human liberty and equal political and religious rights—is discussed in this American Congress. Men, Rep-representatives of a great people, seem to be ambitious to place on record for all time the evidence of their want of knowledge of the spirit and truth of the institutions and Government in which they live. And yet these men are called statesmen, and the world believes that they are such; a sad mistake, and sadly do we answer for it. There exists a strange fancy for past errors and oppressions; a reluctance to go forward; a Musselman stupor and hatred of progress; an inconsiderate and narrow view of men and things that continually looks backward while being thrust forward; an attempt to gather from the dull, dark past the only hope and instructions of a brighter future, a future that the past never knew and never could, because between the two there was no affinity and no common relation except that in time one was and the other unlike it, unknown to it, but inconceivably brighter, purer, grander, and better, because more just and liberal. The past type of society is monarchical, aristocratic, pro-slavery, oppressive, cruel, sensual, and slow to progress. The future is republican, democratic, liberal, kind, intellectual, generous, and swift in the march of the arts and sciences.

Mr. McKEE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to-night or at any time hereafter in discussing this subject to enter at any length upon a discussion of the constitutional question involved in the bill that is before the House. It is chiefly to the bill that I propose to confine my remarks. I would say, however, in regard to the amendment proposed, that while perhaps it is not such as in all respects meets my approval, and such as may be necessary for the times and for the country, yet in some shape or other I regard it as a necessity in order to secure to every citizen in the land the rights that belong to him. I think that one defect in the text of our constitution as it originally stood was that it failed to embody any declaration as to what constitutes a citizen. That defect has been cured by the fourteenth article of amendment, which has now become the fundamental law of the land. A second defect, in my opinion, in the original instrument, is that there is no declaration in it as to what are the rights of the citizen. Until, therefore, an amendment is ingrafted upon that instrument defining clearly what a citizen's rights are, we are continually to have trouble because of the different constructions and different legislative enactments by the different States in regard to these questions.

In regard to the proposed amendment as several gentlemen have already offered substitutes for the proposition, I have drawn one myself which I propose to offer at the proper time, and I will read it in order that it may be incorporated as a part of my remarks. It differs very little from those which have already been offered in effect, only perhaps changing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLBARGER] to an affirmative proposition. It is in this language:

Every male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years and upward shall be entitled to the elective franchise in all elections in the State in which he shall have actual residence as shall be prescribed by law, except such as have engaged or may hereafter engage in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or such as shall be duly convicted of treason, felony, or other infamous crimes; and no State shall make or enforce any law disfranchising any citizen for any other cause than herein mentioned.

In my judgment this amendment should be affirmative and not negative, and by that means we will have the right of the citizen to the elective franchise clearly defined, and behind which no State can go. That is all I propose to say in regard to this question of the amendment except to give my assent to the proposition in whatever form the majority of this House may finally submit it.

And now I propose to pass to the consideration of the bill which has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, and in passing to the bill I will simply say in reference to the remark made by my colleague who preceded me, [Mr. BECK,] near the close of his speech, in which he uttered the language, "I have no defense to make of my own State, Kentucky," that as Kentucky stands to-day, the only State in all this Union that strips utterly two hundred and fifty thousand citizens of every right, I do not believe my colleague would dare come here and offer any defense for her. He followed up that with the declaration that this measure is aimed particularly at Kentucky. Perhaps it may be. There is a necessity in the declaration that it should be aimed at her. Then my colleague followed it up with the further declaration that when this Congress saw fit to strike down that proud State it would be one of the darkest hours of the Republic.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I supposed the time had gone by when the Congress or this nation was to be frightened by the cry that Kentucky stands in the way of an act of justice. We have heard that cry ever since 1861, and too often was that cry listened to during the administration of the late lamented Mr. Lincoln. I believe that the time has gone by and gone by forever when the people of this land will be any longer frightened by her threats coming officially from her Governor or from her Representatives upon this floor. I believe furthermore that the time has now come and is upon us to-day when we are recreant to our duty, recreant to freedom, recreant to justice, recreant to right if we sit quietly in our places here and suffer her to trample the laws of our country under foot and grind into the dust the rights of a quarter of a million of freemen.

Now, sir, the fourteenth amendment, upon which this bill is proposed to be based, has been ratified and officially proclaimed as a part of the organic law of the land. I know that my colleague threw out the intimation, "if it were an amendment;" and I know that the doctrine held by the officials of the State of Kentucky is that it has not been adopted; but I believe that it will be a long time in the future before this Government, or any part of it outside of Kentucky, will question the validity of that amendment.

The first section of the amendment reads as follows:

"SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Sir, that provision stands to-day as a part of the Constitution of the United States; but without a law to enforce it it is a dead letter.

All over my own State, all over the State of Maryland, and in many parts of the unreconstructed South to-day, the chief places are held by men who, by the third section of this fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, are declared to be not entitled to the right to hold such offices. In my own State to-day the first section of this amendment which I have read is a dead letter entirely, except so far as it is enforced in the Federal courts of our country. Not a State court in Kentucky to-day admits the right of two hundred and fifty thousand colored people in that State to testify in any matter concerning their lives, their liberty, or their property in any case in which the matter at issue is between themselves and white persons. Her high officials are enforcing that state of affairs in Kentucky and defying your laws to-day, overriding your Constitution to-day, trampling it into the dust to-day. Without a law to enforce that constitutional amendment it stands upon your statute-book to-day as a simple declaration.

Now, sir, the right to pass this bill under that amendment is certainly unquestionable. There can be no constitutional question in regard to that right; but if there was such a constitutional question, as I have already said, I do not propose to argue that question. But in this state of affairs I might repeat the language of William Pitt, in the English Parliament, on the 14th day of January, 1776, on the bill to tax America. Replying to an argument which had been made on the proposition he said:

"I came not here armed at all points with law cases and acts of Parliament, with the statute-book doubled down in dog's ears, to defend the cause of liberty. On such a subject I will not debate points of law, but rely for the defense of liberty on a general principle—a constitutional principle. It is a ground on which I stand firm, and on which I dare meet any man."

I say, sir, in a case like this, when all over a part of our land the right of perhaps more than half a million of freemen, citizens of our country, are trampled by State laws into the dust, it becomes us not as men loving justice and right to stop and talk about constitutional principles. But we should go on as a matter of right; and when we are satisfied that we do right, we will not only have the approval of our own consciences, but in the end it will be demonstrated we will have acted justly. I will read the third section of the fourteenth constitutional amendment. It is as follows:

"SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability."

This third section, as well as the first section, of the fourteenth constitutional amendment is systematically defied in my own State, openly and defiantly set at naught, and has been so ever since it was proclaimed. At least one half—and I think I do not overestimate it when I say that three fourths—of all the State officers in my own State, executive, legislative, and judicial, to-day are obnoxious to that third section which I have read. Although disqualified by this amendment they are holding offices in defiance of the same. They were elected to the offices which they now hold after this amendment had been proclaimed as a part of the fundamental law of the land, and they assumed the offices which they to-day are in possession of after this amendment had been proclaimed as a part of the Constitution of the land.

More than all that, there is a particular reason why this bill should be passed, and why it should be enforced in the State of Kentucky against those men who thus dare to defy the law. In the canvasses before the people, prior to the election in August last, they openly proclaimed it their purpose not to submit to this amendment. They openly denounced it as no part of the Constitution of the United States; and when they had been elected to these offices and came to take upon themselves the oath of office the Governor of the State himself, in a public speech reported in the press, made after the election, said to those men in substance, "Go on and assume the places to which the people have chosen you, and I will see that you hold office until the terms expire for which you have been elected by the people." With such an assurance as that they went on and assumed those offices. And to-day, while thus acting in violation of law, they are each and every one of them engaged in grinding out the liberties of more than a quarter of a million of freemen in that State, who by the first article of this amendment are declared to be possessed of all the rights of every citizen in our land.

Now, sir, to show the spirit that animates this class of people in my own State, I have selected at random a few extracts from their declarations, which I propose to read that the House may see exactly what class of people are now controlling that State. I read first from a speech delivered by Judge Pryor at a judicial convention in one of the districts in Kentucky in the month of July last. In accepting the nomination Judge Pryor said:

"Fellow-citizens, I desired this nomination. No man in the country ever wanted an office or a position more than I wanted this, not to gratify any personal ambition of my own or to satisfy any prejudices I might have against this man or that man, but as a vindication of my right to run for and to hold an office if the people saw proper to give it to me. [Cheers.] And I tell you, my friends, we will hold these offices."

Still further on in his remarks he paid the following tribute to the efforts of those Kentuckians who are assisting in keeping the rebels in power in this State:

"Public sentiment perhaps in its madness six years ago forgot your rights and mine, but to-day the people are awake upon the subject of their own interests. Why, about three years ago, at the close of the war, a confederate (whether the cause in which he fought was right or wrong it is not necessary to discuss here) was hardly received at his door upon his return home. He had to hide to protect himself from a writ from the Federal court. He was not allowed to hold any office in the county, but to-day, they tell me, not only in the State of Kentucky, but all over this glorious Union, that to have been in the confederate service is a recommendation to a man everywhere."

Loud applause followed this last declaration. This language was uttered about the time the New York convention assembled to do honor to and to do the bidding of the leading rebels of the land. It was about the time of the famous declaration of Francis P. Blair, that it would not only be the right but the duty of the incoming administration (assuming the success of the Democratic party) to trample in the dust all the reconstruction acts of Congress. These men there in the State of Kentucky supposed that that was coming to pass, and they were ready to aid in the work; and but for the triumphant success of the Republican party and the election to the Presidency of the great man who headed our armies in crushing out treason these very men who made these declarations would be to-day engaged in the attempt to trample in the dust all these laws enacted by the Congress of the country.

Furthermore, at that same convention J. D. Lillard, a representative in the Legislature of Kentucky, offered himself as a candidate for the position of Commonwealth's attorney, and at the conclusion of his speech, as bitter and malignant as that of Judge Pryor, he used this language:

"That God Almighty may, in His wrath, speed the arrow of death to the base hearts of those who have crushed the liberties of this land and this people, is my living desire, and will be my dying prayer."

And the declaration, like that of Judge Pryor, was received with loud applause. What do these men mean by having "crushed the liberties of this land and this people?" They mean the crushing that the loyal heart of the country, sustained by the strong arm of our gallant citizens, gave to the cause of treason, which these men advocated in the past and are enacting to day.

Such are a few of the declarations made by these men who now hold office in my State, and these compare favorably with the expressions of all those who made canvasses and speeches in that contest. I will read also from a speech delivered by General John S. Williams (a general in the confederate service) at a meeting held in the city of Lexington, in the district which my colleague has the honor to represent on this floor, and at his very home. General Williams is thus reported:

"He prided himself upon his service in a rebellious cause, and boasted of his achievements in furtherance of treason. He said he repented of nothing, asked no pardon for anything, and was sorry only that a failure was made to accomplish a dissolution of the Union. He said another war would soon be upon us, and when it came he would again buckle on his armor and fight for the cause so recently lost."

Such, sir, is the character of the men who now hold in their hands the destinies of that State, and who are engaged in this work of trampling the law and the Constitution of the country into the dust, while we sit here and hesitate as to the question whether we have the right to pass a law to stop that sort of work. It is true that this man Williams was not nominated for the office of Commonwealth's attorney in that district; but this was only because another man who had done more service than he had for the confederate cause and stood higher with them beat him in the convention. It is equally true that a distinguished relative of a man once Vice President of the United States, and bearing the same name, W. C. P. Breckinridge, who had also done gallant service in the cause of the confederacy, also stood before that convention and was beaten, but was beaten because he had dared to say publicly that he favored the repeal of the laws which keep two hundred and fifty thousand people of the State of Kentucky out of her courts as witnesses.

Now, sir, these people in the State of Kentucky have not changed their opinions in regard to this matter. They hold to-day the identical opinions which they have held heretofore, and are equally bitter and vindictive as then. I will read now, sir, from an article published in the Clark County Democrat on the 14th of January in the present year, and in the district which my colleague [Mr. BECK] has the honor to represent on this floor. Speaking of this question—of this amendment to the Constitution and this proposition for relieving political disabilities—the editorial I have referred to uses this language:

"Relieving Disabilities.—When the war closed it was apparent to the leaders of the Radical party that under existing laws none of the confederates could ever be convicted of treason or any other crime, because they had been warranted in their course by the fundamental principles of the American Government. The farce of indicting Jeff. Davis and a few other prominent leaders was gone through with to satisfy popular clamor in the North, but no lawyer of any standing in that section ever expected to hear of their conviction unless it was brought about through the medium of that packed jury which the infamous Judge Underwood assured a congressional committee he could easily empanel. It was plainly to be seen, moreover, that the chiefs of the so-called rebellion would have the confidence of their own people in a greater degree than ever, and that their influence would gradually extend northwardly from an innate consciousness on the part of the Yankee nation that these same men had been right from the beginning. To do away with this apprehended danger the fourteenth amendment, as it is called, was devised, by one of the provisions of which nearly all in the South who ever held any office of profit or honor before the war under the State or Federal Government are ostracised from public life and disabled from holding any position to which an admiring constituency may choose to elect them. This is an outrageous violation of the plainest and simplest provisions of our organic law and the most clearly defined principles of American liberty."

It prescribes a punishment for an offense committed long before its enactment, and deprives the people, who are sovereign, of the precious privilege which they have always enjoyed heretofore, of electing to official stations their representative men. It is claimed by the Radicals that this infamous attempt to rob men whom the southern people honor and respect of their rights has succeeded, but they know full well that such is not the case. It has never been ratified in a proper manner by three-fourths of the States, and even some of those which really gave their sanction have since retracted. No man with a grain of sense believes that the action of the bogus carpet-bag States down South in a matter of so great moment will be allowed to stand after the Republican party has met that fate to which its crimes are so rapidly hastening its steps. The constitutional amendment and the reconstruction laws will then be buried under the same mountain of contempt. Congress is acting on the assumption that the so-called amendment has become a law, and proceeds to relieve from its disabilities those who will eat dirt and kiss the holy Kaaba known to school children as Plymouth Rock. Occasionally, when in a gracious mood, it relents so far as to forgive some good Democrat his sins, and has even permitted an unrepentant ex-rebel major general to become a member of Congress and take his seat by the side of the immaculate loyalists therein assembled. The question of relieving those officials in this State who are disabled by the so-called amendment is now agitating a certain circle in Washington. Dr. Breckinridge, who had near and dear relatives in the "so-called," William Brown, who is said to be a gentleman; General Burbridge, who has some ax to grind perhaps; and other pure bloods favor the proposition; but the active ruling members of the party in this State are bitterly opposed, because yet hopeful of getting the offices themselves.

"The gentlemen now filling the public places in this Commonwealth were selected by the people because believed to hate the Radicals with an especial hatred. If any of them should be relieved by congressional enactment of disabilities which their constituents considered their chief glory and recommendation there will be good ground for suspecting that they have weakened in the faith."

"We know of none who, according to Radical ideas, are entitled to any favors on account of loyalty, and should any be relieved it will be satisfactory evidence to us that either Congress has been deceived or some quondam brother has strayed from the path of rectitude. Let no true Kentuckian ask such a favor of BEN. BUTLER and the scoundrels who now hold the reins of power. There is no fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, and the courts will so decide after awhile. Be patient. If ousted now, you will be elevated still higher in that good time coming, whose dawning made bright the political sky of Kentucky in 1866, and has since spread to Connecticut, Maryland, Delaware, California, Oregon, Louisiana, and Georgia."

That is the language of a Democratic paper, and reflecting the sentiments of the Democratic party in the State of Kentucky to-day. It was published in the district represented by my colleague who has preceded me on the floor.

I have another article here of the same tenor from the Frankfort Yeoman, published at the seat of government and edited by J. Stoddard Johnson, who had the honor of being sent on here by the electors of the State of Kentucky to bear the vote of that State in the presidential election, in which this language occurs. I read the conclusion of the article, dated June 16, 1869:

"We maintain that said article constitutes no part of the Constitution, for various reasons, and that the courts must so decide; first, because it was not submitted to the States by a vote of two thirds of the Congress of the United States, but only two thirds of a rump; second, because the States of Ohio, New Jersey, and Oregon having rescinded the action of their respective Legislatures ratifying the said amendment before its promulgation, it has not received the ratification of the requisite three-fourths of the States—said three States being necessary to make up that number; and third, because the pretended ratification by the southern States is utterly void and of no effect, the Legislatures ratifying having been elected under the so-called reconstruction acts, which are unconstitutional, and they, constituting the foundation, falling, the whole superstructure must fall also. But enough for the present."

That is the spirit of the party to-day, a party which, as I have said, defies all your laws on this question; a party which refuses to submit to the verdict of the nation, rendered first in the field and then ratified by the voice of the loyal millions at the ballot-box.

I have other extracts which I might read showing the same tone and of the same tenor by other prominent individuals in that State and from their press. The men who made these declarations (some of them) and some of those who were elected to office indorsing and uttering such sentiments, are here to-day before a committee of this House asking that their disabilities be removed; and without ever having retracted a single statement, and without to-day retracting the opinions they held then and now hold, they ask this Congress to relieve their disabilities that they may continue to hold office, fearing the Federal courts, notwithstanding their boasts. When they learn to do justice to others it will be time for us to grant relief to them. I trust the day may soon come when we can with safety relieve them all, but that day should not come until these men not only submit to the laws, which we intend shall not be a matter of choice with them, but until they go to work and aid in seeing that justice is done to every citizen of the State, and that all have enforced through her own courts the same equal and exact justice, and the same equal political rights which as men and as citizens we propose to declare they shall have irrespective of race or color. When they as a party do this, then, for one, and I think I speak the sentiments of the party I represent from my State, I shall be willing to see all their disabilities removed; but, sir, not until then.

Mr. Speaker, all over the State of Kentucky for the last two years we have had outrage upon outrage, murder upon murder, assassinations by night and by day by the Kuklux Klan, or Regulators, or whatever you may choose to call them. In the dead hour of the night they have gone to men's houses, dragged them from their beds, beaten them and murdered them in the presence of their families, taken them out and hanged them; yet, sir, notwithstanding all this, there is not a single case on the record of that State where one single man engaged in this system of outlawry has been either arrested or punished for the commission of these crimes. Can you expect otherwise when the highest officials in the State themselves openly, systematically, and daily violate the laws of the land? First, sir, you must remove those who countenance violations of the law, violations of the statute, and who themselves trample your own laws in the dust. Until you have done that you cannot expect to have peace in that State, the execution of the laws of the land, or any protection of life and property. I might read many extracts in support of what I have said, and to show that these outrages take place almost within gunshot of the Governor's mansion, and yet nothing is done to prevent them. I will read from an extract from the Frankfort Commonwealth of a late date:

"Murder.—On Sunday night last a man named Samuel Davis, jr., who was confined in the Mercer county jail on a charge of counterfeiting, was taken therefrom by a body of 'Regulators,' and hung a short distance from Harrodsburg, on the Lexington turnpike. This man Davis was at one time in the Federal Army. A number of other prisoners in the jail, on charges of murder, &c., were not disturbed."

And another from the Lexington Statesman, January 14, 1869:

"Kuklux Outrages.—They Whip One Man, and Fire on the House of Another.—A correspondent writes us from Lincoln county that on the night of Saturday, the 2d of January, some ten or twelve Kuklux went to the house of W. Baker, in that county, and took him off some distance from it and whipped him unmercifully. Baker begged them to end his troubles by shooting him; but the fiends preferred the severer punishment of lashing and lacerating his flesh. Baker is said to be a man of good character, respected by his neighbors. He is a Republican. After whipping Baker they went to the house of Jesse Davis, in the same county. A dog gave the alarm and aroused Davis. They shot the dog, and asked Davis to come out, representing themselves as hunters who had lost their way. Davis refused to come out, but invited them to come in the house. This they would not do; and seeing that Davis would not come out they commenced firing upon the house. One of the balls went through the door and struck the bedstead that contained Davis's little children. After the firing ceased, Davis lit a candle and again invited the fellows in, being now prepared for them. They refused to accept the invitation."

I have many other extracts, all showing the truth of the declaration of what I have said, but it is unnecessary to insert them.

Mr. Speaker, there is no law in my State to protect the two hundred and fifty thousand freemen of color who are there. I wish to read one extract from the last annual message of the Governor to show what is the spirit which animates him. Referring to a case of murder by two citizens in Lewis county, Governor Stevenson says in his message to the General Assembly:

"But recently two persons, John Blyew and George Kinnard, were arrested and indicted in the Lewis circuit court of Kentucky for alleged murders committed by them in Lewis county upon the 30th of August, 1868, a place over which the jurisdiction of the United States did not extend, and while so in custody of a State court of competent and unquestioned jurisdiction to try them, these two prisoners were, by the coercive process of the Federal court, forcibly taken from the custody of the State authority, and against its consent, to Louisville."

Here, sir, we have the declaration of the Governor of the State of Kentucky, in his official message, that your jurisdiction does not extend over Kentucky. It is in regard to the case of an atrocious murder in Lewis county, Kentucky, and this is only one example of the many that have occurred in that State during the last two years. The house of an old man was entered at night by these two men, Blyew and Kinnard, and the old man and his wife were murdered in the most atrocious and brutal manner and without any cause whatever. A small boy of about eleven years of age, a grandson, perhaps, of that old, worthy, and respectable couple, the man and his wife, was also beaten by these two men and left for dead. Not another human being witnessed the murder except these persons and one little child, who was concealed and was too young to testify. The only testimony that could be had in regard to the murder was that of the colored boy, whom the murderers left for dead but who recovered. It occurred in my own district, and I know the circumstances. By the laws of the State of Kentucky had there been twenty colored men present at that scene of death there is no court in the State where one of them could have opened his mouth to testify against the murderers. In defiance of your fourteenth amendment, by laws enforced by men elected and holding office against its provisions, no man of color who might have witnessed that murder could have been heard in the courts of Kentucky. The perpetrators of the foul deed were white men, and could not be convicted in the State courts, because no person of color could testify against them. But your Federal courts came to the rescue. The men were taken to Louisville, tried and convicted in the United States circuit court, and condemned to death, and but for the fact that the State of Kentucky, under the advice of her Governor, employs counsel to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, they would have suffered the penalty of the law ere this.

Now, sir, the spirit of these colored people of Kentucky is everywhere one of submission and obedience to law. They are far from being arrogant. They live there at their peril. To-day I can walk in broad daylight into the cabin of any colored man and rob him of all he possesses in the presence of all his family, and there is no court of Kentucky that will convict me; to-day I can enter the church where one of the colored ministers preaches to his flock, and in the presence of his own congregation drag him from the altar and murder him on the spot, and there is no court of Kentucky that can convict me unless a white person saw the deed. It is against such laws as these, against the men of Kentucky who uphold these infamous enactments in direct conflict with your Constitution and your laws, that this bill is aimed.

I cannot do better in presenting the cause of these two hundred and fifty thousand people of my own State than to read a petition presented by a mass convention of these people, held at the city of Lexington in the month of November, 1867, to the Legislature, asking only the right to testify in the courts of justice. I read it because the language is perhaps better than I can use:

"Much of the property now constituting the aggregate wealth of Kentucky has been acquired or improved, in whole or in part, by our labor. None know better than the citizens of this State how we have protected and cared for both the property and the lives of our former owners. Suddenly freed by act of war we were mostly thrown upon our own resources, without property or means of protecting what little we now have, the product of our own toil and care. It is larceny to steal it from us; it is murder to feloniously deprive one of our people of his life. Is there any member of your honorable body who would offer inducement to crime, outrage, and lawlessness by saying that the white man's property and the white man's life are protected under our law, but the property and the life of a black man are unworthy of protection, and beyond the pale of our law? We hope not; but this is what the law now says, for we can be despoiled of our property, our families may be outraged, our school-teachers shot down at their desks, and our ministers murdered in their pulpits by any person lawless enough to do so, and the sad history of the past few years must convince you that many men, thus lawless, live in Kentucky, and we have no remedy in the courts, if the only witnesses happen to have African blood in their veins, no matter how truthful or intelligent they may be. On many of the lonely farms of our State, in the absence of the owner the wife and daughter are the only white persons remaining."

"His property may be stolen, his wife and daughter may be outraged and murdered during his absence, in the presence of every colored servant on the place, by a white man, and the villain go free of punishment if no white man witnesses the awful crime. We believe that much good will accrue, both to the white and the black people, when this right of testimony is given to our people in all cases; and thus society will be more effectually protected from crime of every character than it is at present. We do not expect by our rights of testimony to influence wrongfully the action of any court or jury, but simply desire the right of any of our people to go before any court or jury and testify to matters within their knowledge, the testimony to go for what it is worth under the circumstances attending every case. And that equal and exact justice may be administered to both white and black, we ask that all disqualifications on account of race or color, in so far as they apply to testifying, be removed, and that the plaintiffs and defendants in every action, whether white or black men, shall be made competent witnesses, with the right to testify in their own behalf, subject only to such exceptions as are made for white men."

"For this simple act of justice, as a poor and oppressed race, we appeal to you by every consideration of civilization and love of right. And for your favorable action will ever pray."

Such was the humble appeal of these people, citizens of this country, and under the Constitution and laws entitled to all the rights which we ourselves possess, made to the Legislature of Kentucky in 1867. That Legislature has sat through two winters at the capital of the State, and never so much as a response or a movement has been made by any Democratic member of the Legislature in the State looking to the granting of this simple right asked by these downtrodden people. Such is the state of affairs there. Then, sir, I say it behooves us, as an act of justice to these men whom we have declared entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens by our law, to set aside the men who now enforce these wrongs against them.

One word more, and I shall conclude. I have spoken chiefly in regard to the third and fourth sections of the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. I have a word to say in regard to the first part of the bill, that relating to the right of suffrage. As I have said, I have no constitutional arguments to make on this matter. If I ever had any doubts in regard to the constitutionality and the right of Congress to legislate on the subject of suffrage, as I confess I have had, all that doubt was removed when this fourteenth amendment was declared part of the fundamental law of the land; and I am not sure but the doubts which I had upon the question were doubts which I ought never to have entertained. But, sir, when this fourteenth amendment was adopted, which made all these people citizens, and declared that they should be entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens, I had no longer any doubt as to the constitutional right of the Congress of the United States to declare that these men shall be voters in any and every State on the same footing with white men. You cannot in any manner so forcibly—I might say you cannot in any manner at all—secure to a man the protection of his rights and immunities in any other way in a free republic like this than by giving into his hands the ballot.

I have no further constitutional argument to make; but as a matter of justice, as a matter of right, as a matter necessary to enforce that which is already a part of the Constitution of our country, I give my voice and my vote for this measure, believing that while we may secure the same ends by the amendment which is proposed we shall secure it more efficiently by the passage of this bill. In so doing we shall do an act of justice, which, as a party pledged to the rights of man, we owe to every citizen of this land. I believe, furthermore, that every day we hesitate to do this simple act of justice, we, as the representative body of the nation, put ourselves in the position before the world of having declared in favor of a principle which we have not the courage to carry out.

Mr. MILLER addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BURR. Mr. Speaker, it has been truly said that the Republican party is a party of progress. Whether its progress is in the direction of the greatest good of the greatest number is quite a different question. On the limitless subject of reconstruction the party has made startling advances from one position to another, pausing at each successive advance only sufficient time to call its stragglers into line, satisfy the timid and wavering by declaring the given step a finality, and thus, having restored confidence among its own adherents, prepare the way for still more alarming advances in what it pleases to term the path of progress.

From the moment when the proclamation of emancipation was under consideration among politicians, and being by them urged upon President Lincoln, down through a series of events, including the arming of negroes as soldiers, their recognition as citizens, the bestowal upon them of the elective franchise in the States lately in rebellion, their elevation to office, and assured control of those States by means of white disfranchisement, the exclusion of those States from practical union with the others until acquiescence could be secured in these revolutionary measures, until the present moment, not a plan has been proposed or a measure advanced on the subject of reconstruction without a solemn assurance by the party to the people that the one plan or measure was the only one intended or upon which the public would be called to pass its sanction. Yet ever as each advance has been made, acquiescence secured, and the public led to believe that all was well, some one more bold and adventurous than his fellows, or some group constituting the vanguard of the grand political army, has always been ready to discover the necessity of another advance, and on each occasion the announcement has been made that the "life of the nation" was in peril and the peril could only be averted by the sanction of new and untried measures and adoption of experiments often urged outside of the Constitution.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] in his speech advocating the pending bill and amendment, declares with most commendable candor that "the Republican party must move forward and consummate the great work it has undertaken." What that great work is he informs us in another sentence, when he says:

"Sir, I doubt not that nine tenths of the Republican party of the country are in favor of manhood suffrage. One tenth of the party are not in favor of it, and they constitute the great obstacle in the way of perfecting this benign measure. For one, I am in favor of taking the responsibility of the position which we occupy. We are responsible for universal suffrage as one of the crowning measures of an administration of eight years' duration, to be continued for four years by the judgment of the people already pronounced. The great majority of the people—and in this connection I will say that by 'the people' I mean those who on the 3d of November last supported General Grant for the Presidency—the great majority of them expect of us the consummation of this plan."

Sir, according to this declaration the great mass of the Republican party expect the passage of a law by Congress to carry negro suffrage into all the States North as well as South. It is not my province to answer for the Republican party, nor assume what it should expect, but if it does expect what the gentleman from Massachusetts has declared, it must be because it has at last learned to expect just what its leaders promise to avoid. Why, Mr. Speaker, only last May, when the party assembled by its delegates in Chicago and nominated General Grant, it announced its political creed, the very first article of which congratulates the country on the assured success of the reconstruction policy of Congress. Did the reconstruction policy of Congress then demand an extension of suffrage to negroes in Illinois and Ohio; and did that convention promise or propose to assume new ground upon the subject? Let us see if any one of their declarations in that political creed gave room for the expectation which "the people" are supposed to share on this subject. In the second resolution the party declared as follows:

"II. The guarantee by Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained; while the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

Sir, it is as I said a moment ago, apologizing for what the party had done, but promising forbearance in the future. That convention appealed to the gratitude and magnanimity as well as the fears of the people to indorse what had been done in giving the negroes unlimited political power in the South, and in order to avoid defection in the ranks and hold the wavering in their party allegiance the convention further declared its policy as to the North by adding the declaration that "the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

Sir, if I remember aright the gentleman from Massachusetts was content with that platform. Upon it he went before the people advocating the election of the nominees of that convention, and in voting for those candidates he indorsed the declaration of his party, that the question which he now proposes to settle, or rather to unsettle, by congressional act, properly belonged to the several States, and should only be decided by them, each acting for itself. Sir, the nominees of that convention stand before the people of the United States pledged to maintain the rights of each State to regulate the question of suffrage for itself, except in cases where the people had by rebellion forfeited all political rights according to the theory of the party, and only "lived and moved and had their being" by the merciful permission of the Congress of the United States. When the distinguished gentleman who for years has presided with such signal ability over the deliberations of this body accepted a nomination from that convention for still higher honors than those he has so worthily won in this Hall, he pledged to his followers and supporters the influence of his high position to prevent just such legislation as is now proposed, by indorsing the proposition that, except in rebellious States, the question of suffrage properly belongs to the States themselves.

But, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the distinguished gentleman who opened the discussion in favor of this measure declares that "universal suffrage is one of the crowning measures of an administration of eight years' duration," thereby assuming its indorsement by President Lincoln during his lifetime, it may not be inappropriate to recur to some of his expressions upon this subject. Among his earliest utterances on this question were his declarations in a joint discussion with Senator Douglas at Charleston, Illinois, while they were rival candidates for the United States Senate in 1858. In his speech on that occasion, he says:

"I will say, then, that I am not, nor ever have been, in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races; that I am not nor ever have been in favor of making votes or jurors of negroes, nor of qualifying them to hold office, nor to intermarry with white people; and I will say in addition to this, that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality. And inasmuch as they cannot solve while they do remain together, there must be the position of superior and inferior, and I as much as any other man am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race."

Such were his views when by the unanimous voice of his party in Illinois he was called to dispute senatorial honors with one whom he had designated as the "Napoleon of American politics." But if it be assumed that his views were modified or his sentiments changed by the war or its incidents let me refer to a much later declaration. On the 14th of August, 1862, a delegation of free men of color waited upon President Lincoln, and an interview was held, which is described in McPherson's History of the Rebellion as follows:

"Having all been seated, the President informed them that a sum of money had been appropriated by Congress and placed at his disposal for the purpose of aiding the colonization in some country of the people, or a portion of them, of African descent, thereby making it his duty, as it had a long time been his inclination, to favor that cause. 'And why,' he asked, 'should the people of your race be colonized, and where? Why should they leave this country? This is perhaps the first question for proper consideration. You and we are different races. We have between us a broader difference than exists between almost any other two races. Whether it is right or wrong I need not discuss; but this physical difference is a great disadvantage to us both, as I think. Your race suffer very greatly, many of them, by living among us; while ours suffer from your presence. In a word, we suffer on each side. If this is admitted it affords a reason at least why we should be separated.' 'It is better for us both, therefore, to be separated.'"

Such were the last declarations of Mr. Lincoln on this subject. He declares a "broad difference" between the races—this bill assumes equality. He favored a separation—this bill proposes a perpetual union. He insisted that both races suffered from contact—this bill anticipates a joint exercise of political power by whites and blacks throughout the Union, terms such joint exercise the crowning measure of reconstruction, and places the whole future of our country in the partial control of an inferior race.

But, sir, my opposition to this bill is based not so much upon the fact that it vests full political rights and privileges in an inferior race as upon the more important fact that by it Congress arrogates all power over what our Constitution regards as the proper subject of State action exclusively; and rising above the views of individuals and the pledges of party, let us examine first the question, has Congress the constitutional right to pass this bill? Assuming that the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts in favor of this exercise of power presents the subject in its strongest light, I find him claiming to derive that power from three several clauses in the Constitution, each of which he claims embodies a grant of power in the direction he proposes to act. Let me very briefly examine each:

Article one, section four, reads as follows, and is the clause first relied upon as a grant of power to Congress:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators."

This clause undoubtedly gives to Congress the right to make or to alter regulations in the States as to the time and manner of electing members of Congress—nothing more. The whole article treats of the elections, returns and qualifications of members of the two Houses of Congress, and the mode of organizing those Houses and conducting business. It provides for two Senators from each State, and designates the number of Representatives to which each State would be entitled until the next enumeration of inhabitants. For the purpose, as is claimed, of perpetuating the Government and securing the continued existence of both branches of Congress, the authority was given to Congress to "make or alter" regulations regarding the election of its own members except as to the places of choosing Senators. But from what portion of this section is it claimed that Congress derives a right to prescribe the qualification of voters in Illinois? We are told that it results from or is connected with the right to make or alter regulations as to the "manner" of holding elections for Senators and Representatives. The distinguished gentleman from whom I have already quoted, in commenting on the "manner" of elections, says:

"It includes, as I maintain, everything relating to an election, from the qualification of the elector to the deposit of his ballot in the box."

If that view of the extended meaning and significance of the word "manner" be correct, then the whole sentence is liable to an objection never before urged against any part of our Constitution. I have been taught to regard that instrument as embodying the perfection of human reason, as expressing in few words all it intended and avoiding tautology and redundancy in language. But if "manner" in this clause includes "everything relating to an election," then manifestly it must include both the time and place of that election, for both are essential ideas in connection with the whole subject. This rule of interpretation throws ridicule upon the instrument itself, and is a reflection upon the wisdom of our fathers in framing it. But it is asserted that debates in the several State conventions on the question of ratifying the Constitution afford means of interpretation of given clauses of that instrument, and that such debates show that the uniform opinion existed that by this clause Congress would have the right to prescribe the qualification of voters in the several States as connected with the manner of electing Senators and Representatives.

Let us understand that at the time the several States acted upon the Constitution the public mind was divided on the question of its adoption, and those opposed to its adoption based their objections mainly on the allegation that in the instrument the independence and identity of the several States was not sufficiently guarded. Fearing the exercise of dangerous powers by Congress, and jealous of the rights of the States as sovereigns, they predicted that under various clauses Congress would exercise powers not really intended to be granted; and their predictions that Congress would claim the right to do certain things is now distorted into an admission of the absolute right in Congress to do those very things which they, in fear, predicted. When it was proposed to arm negroes and place them in the army as soldiers those objecting to the measure—not exclusively Democrats—based their objection in part upon the assumption that those who made them soldiers during the war would claim that justice would require that they be vested with political rights after the war. Did that objection admit in advance the justice and policy of enfranchising them at the close of the war? By no means. During the pendency of the so-called fourteenth amendment, which assumed to make citizens of negroes, Democrats predicted that in the event the amendment should be adopted those advocating it would insist that one of the "privileges and immunities" of citizenship was the elective franchise. And now that such prediction has been verified, are we estopped from denying that such claim on the part of the advocates of that amendment is just and well founded in law and fact?

These questions indicate the position and views of those who predicted in an early day of our Government that Congress would ultimately wield certain powers to which they objected. In each case the prediction has been verified, and in each case the prediction has been pointed to as a justification in advance of the very thing to which the objection was made.

But, sir, we need not resort to doubtful language or impassioned utterance to determine how our fathers viewed this question of power under the clause in contemplation. I will show what was meant by the word "manner," as used in this clause, and it will be found by high authority to mean just what the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts said it did not mean. One of the best, if not the very best of American writers on the Constitution, its interpretation, limitations, and restrictions, was Justice Joseph Story. In his comments upon the clause in question he reviews the argument of those advocating and opposing the Constitution, or this part of it, and continues:

"Such were the objections, and such was the reasoning by which they were met, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. A period of forty years has passed by without any attempt by Congress to make any regulations, or interfere in the slightest degree with the elections of members of Congress. The States now regulate the time, the place, and the manner of elections, in a practical sense exclusively."

By this extract it will appear that in his judgment this right in Congress, whatever it might be, related to the election of members of Congress exclusively. But he defines what he understands by the "manner" as follows:

"The manner is very various, and perhaps the power has been exerted [by States] in some instances under the influence of local or party feelings to an extent which is indefensible in principle and policy. There is no uniformity in the choice or in the mode of election. In some States the representatives are chosen by a general ticket for the whole State; in others they are chosen singly in districts; in others they are chosen in districts composed of a population sufficient to elect two or three representatives; and in others the districts are sometimes single and sometimes united in the choice. In some States the candidate must have a majority of all the votes to entitle him to be deemed elected; in others (as it is in England) it is sufficient if he has a plurality of votes. In some of the States the choice is by the voters viva voce; in others it is by ballot."

Such was the view of this eminent writer as to what was embraced in the expression "manner of electing;" and it will be noticed that while he states the great diversity of manner in the different States, he refers only to the districts within which elections are held, the proportion of votes required by various States to elect, and the two ways of casting those votes by the elector.

To illustrate, let me refer to my own State. Before the census of 1860 was completed Congress apportioned to Illinois thirteen representatives. The State Legislature provided thirteen districts wherein they should be severally elected, but after the adjournment of the Illinois Legislature, and on full review, Congress decided that the population of that State entitled it to fourteen Representatives. The session of the Legislature would not occur in time to correct the apportionment of congressional districts, and the exigencies of the period, as well as the right of the State, required a full representation. Under this right "to regulate the manner of electing Representatives" Congress, adopting or rather not disturbing the thirteen districts created by State act, provided by joint resolution for the election of the fourteenth member by vote of the whole State. It followed State action, so far as the State had acted at all, and where from lack of opportunity the State had not acted it proceeded in harmony with and in obedience to all the State regulations, never once assuming to regulate either the qualification of the voter or the deposit of the ballot.

Why, Mr. Speaker, with the great diversity then and now existing in different States as to the qualifications of voters, Justice Story would hardly omit to refer to that fact had he deemed that question embraced in the expression "manner of electing." We, then, are authorized to conclude that Story dissents when the learned and eloquent gentleman from Massachusetts asserts that the term "manner" embraces everything from the qualification of the voter to the deposit of the ballot. But if this quotation from Story be deemed negative in its character, I refer to his affirmative statements in another part of his work, where he treats directly of the qualification of voters. Section two of article one reads as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications required for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

After commenting upon the first clause in this section the learned writer discusses the qualification of voters, and vindicates the wisdom of our fathers in leaving that to be determined by the several States, and in this connection uses the following emphatic language:

"When the revolution brought about the separation of the colonies and they formed themselves into independent States a very striking diversity was observable in the original constitutions adopted by them, and a like diversity has pervaded all the constitutions of the new States which have since grown up, and all the revised constitutions of the old States which have received the final ratification of the people. In some of the States the right of suffrage depends upon a certain length of residence and payment of taxes; in others upon mere citizenship and residence; in others upon the possession of a freehold or some estate of a particular value, or upon the payment of taxes or performance of some public duty, such as service in the militia or on the highways. In no two of these State constitutions will it be found that the qualifications of the voters are settled upon the same uniform basis. So that we have the most abundant proofs that among a free and enlightened people, convened for the purpose of establishing their own forms of government and the rights of their own voters, the question as to the due regulation of the qualifications has been deemed a more matter of State policy, and varied to meet the wants, to suit the prejudices, and to foster the interests of the majority."

With this understanding the clause under consideration was adopted by unanimous vote in the convention of 1787, and in commenting upon it the Federalist makes the passing remark, "It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established by the State itself."

The next clause relied on by those claiming this power is as follows:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

Having on a former occasion given my views of this clause I will be very brief in considering it here. It is assumed by those advocating congressional power over States that the word "guarantee" is used in the sense of making, erecting, building. This error leads to others still more grave, which would sanction a tyrannical usurpation on the part of Congress in entering into a State, and under pretense of guarantying a republican form of government impose one repugnant to all the ideas of our fathers. The truth is, when properly understood, this clause is really a safeguard against intervention from abroad as well as from the effect of violent outbreak at home. The States as such existed at the time this clause was adopted. Each had a form of government, and in yielding in part their sovereignty to a general government by express grant and enumerated powers they naturally desired some assurance that the power they were yielding for the general good would not in turn be used for the destruction of their preëxisting State governments. Being called on to surrender the power to make war or keep armies or create fleets, the States respectively desired some assurance that in case their existence or either of them should be threatened some Power would, if necessary, make war in their defense; in other words, defend their governments to them as they then existed, or as they might thereafter see fit to change them. They did not wish Congress to make or create governments for them, but only to guaranty, and the very term "guarantee" presupposes the existence of the thing to be guaranteed. That I am right in this construction I will show by the same author I have heretofore quoted. After vindicating the necessity of the clause in question, he states in form of a question the strongest view our antagonists urge, and himself proceeds to answer it:

"It may be asked what need there could be of such a precaution, and whether it may not become a pretext for alterations in the State governments without the concurrence of the States themselves. These questions admit of ready answers. If the interposition of the General Government should not be needed the provision for such an event will be a harmless superfluity only in the constitution. But who can say what experiments may be produced by the caprice of particular States, by the ambition of enterprising leaders, or by the intrigue of foreign Powers? To the second question it may be answered that if the General Government should interpose by virtue of this constitutional authority it will be of course bound to pursue the authority. But the authority extends no further than to a guarantee of a republican form of government, which supposes a preëxisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms they have a right to do so, and to claim the Federal guarantee for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is that they shall not exchange republican for anti-republican constitutions; a restriction which, it is presumed, will hardly be considered a grievance."

By this, sir, it will be seen that the continued governments of the States under their own chosen forms was secured by this very clause, and in adopting it it was pledged to those States not only that Congress would not itself interfere with their several State governments, but would neither permit foreign or domestic foes to interfere. Such was the nature of the guarantee, and properly considered it pledged Congress against just such intervention in State affairs as this bill provides.

But, sir, the next argument is that this amendment is necessary to "preserve the life of the nation." Great God! what outrages have not been perpetrated under pretense of "saving the life of the nation!" Under that pretense liberty of speech has been denied, the press has been muzzled or perverted, the right of the citizen outraged, and his person incarcerated in dungeons in violation of law; and now, under the same pretense, the States which furnish the foundation upon which the superstructure of Union is based are to be degraded to the lowest level for the mere sake of party and to secure party results in future. "The life of the nation!" Why, sir, the rights of States constitute the life of the nation, not the pernicious doctrine of State's rights asserted by Massachusetts in resisting the fugitive slave law, nor by South Carolina in asserting control of Federal property within the limits of the State, but the doctrine based on a balance of power admitting variety, yet maintaining harmony throughout the whole system. It is the doctrine asserted by the State of Illinois in her sovereign capacity, adopting a State motto: "State sovereignty; national Union." Speaking of Illinois reminds me of the last test vote in that State on the subject of political rights to the negro. The proposition was squarely submitted to the people, "Shall negroes have the right of the ballot in Illinois?" and by over one hundred thousand majority our people answered, "No."

That was in 1862. Has any event happened since 1862 to satisfy this Congress that Illinois is more ready for mixed suffrage in 1869 than in 1862? Will our fourteen Representatives of the sovereign people of Illinois here to-day violate their last authoritative instruction upon this point under pretense that they are aiding Massachusetts to save the life of the nation, or will these fourteen Representatives unite as one man in obedience to the almost unanimous voice of Illinois, and assert in the language of Douglas, "This is a white man's Government, made by white men for white men and their descendants forever," and indorse all that is correct in the second plank of the Chicago platform by declaring again that suffrage is a question properly belonging to the States? But to recur for a moment to the expression used by the eloquent advocate who leads in favor of this bill, [Mr. BUTWELL,] "preserving the life of the nation." It seems to me, sir, he has confounded the nation with the Radical party. I can readily understand that this measure is needed to save the life of the Radical party; if, indeed, even this can save it; and I think that is really the meaning of the gentleman himself, for in the eloquent peroration of his speech, in appealing directly to his party to rally to the support of the bill, he admonishes them that there is for the party "power on one side and ruin on the other."

But, sir, it is urged with great confidence by those advocating this bill that if Congress has never possessed this doubted or disputed power until of late it certainly has a clear and express grant of that power in the so-called fourteenth article of amendment. Before considering that article, however, let me remark how passing strange it is that no considerable number of our opponents agree as to the source from which this disputed power is, if at all, derived. If it be in Congress it must be there by virtue of an express grant on the one hand or a clear prohibition of such power in the States by the Constitution on the other, for by the tenth article of amendment it is asserted that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people."

Of those in the Republican party who claim the power to have been granted in the Constitution hardly two will agree as to which clause grants it. One says one section, another a different section; still another claims that it is derived from the joint operation of several clauses or sections combined, and not a small proportion of these theorists, ambitious of results but reckless of means claim that the right "exists in the nature of the case, and is based on the right of a nation to save its own life." Before this argument "outside of the Constitution" can have force it must be found or demonstrated, first, that the "life of the nation" is imperiled by the refusal of Illinois, Ohio, and other States to give the ballot to the negro; and second, that congressional intervention in the affairs of those States without their consent, and in violation of constitutional limitations and party pledges alike, will save the imperiled life of the nation, and that nothing else will.

But, sir, this appeal to aid in saving the life of the nation is only, as of old, a cry to rally the party followers and bring the stragglers into line. I myself believe the life of the nation to be imperiled, but its danger is from too much legislation. The world is governed too much. We have for years been trying to make statutes supply the lack of brotherly love among our people. Pains and penalties have been the strong incentives to patriotism, and equality with the negro has been the reward for that patriotism when proved to exist. "Let us have peace," says the President-elect. Every true heart echoes the invocation. In a political sense, what part of the Union is now in a condition of peace? Only those portions where negroes are denied the ballot. Where is strife, contention, discord, and anarchy? Radicalism answers in every State of the South where negroes are permitted to vote by law of Congress.

If, then, Congress has by "regulating" ten States produced or perpetuated strife in each will the same experiment bring peace in ten others? If one third of the Union be prostrated by a given system, is it not marvelous to believe that that same system extended to all will "save the life of the nation?" If those who use this argument wish credit for both sense and candor, let them modify the expression and talk of "saving the life of" the Radical party, by means of this unconstitutional action, distasteful to every man who is not ashamed of Anglo-Saxon origin. But, sir, does not every gentleman know that the period of unpunished infractions of the Constitution has gone by? During the war the great masses of the people of northern States were so intent in conquering the rebellion that they passed unheeded many warnings full of significance, and tolerated many practices by those in power which were equally dangerous to popular rights and constitutional government as was the rebellion itself. But now approaches a day of reckoning, and let politicians beware of popular condemnation when, by playing upon party passion, they attempt to prompt an invasion of reserved rights and a desecration of those time-honored principles which passed without challenge or cavil until touched by the polluting finger of a faction that would blot out all reserved rights of States, and over the ruins and embers of dismantled, dishonored, and destroyed States would erect the dazzling throne of consolidated empire. Let the following earnest protest against the exercise of forbidden or even doubtful powers by Congress be heeded as uttering on that subject the sentiment of every Democrat, and according to the press a large majority of Republicans in my own Illinois.

In November last Major General John M. Palmer was elected Governor of our State. On the 11th day of this month he was inaugurated. No one suspects Governor Palmer of having ever been too deeply tintured with the doctrine of State rights. During the war it was by many thought that he ignored the existence of any right whatever in a State as an independent organization. In his inaugural message, referring to the pending attempt of Congress to regulate or organize corporations in the States, he uses very earnest language; and in his protest against exercising the power, even if its existence be admitted, he is crystalizing, even in the Republican mind of his State, a higher, nobler, more correct, and patriotic view than prompted the introduction of this bill and the attempt to exercise still more dangerous powers for a still more objectionable purpose than those condemned by Governor Palmer in the following language:

"Now that the war is ended and all its proper objects attained, the public welfare demands a recurrence to the true principles that underlie our system of government, and one of the best established and most distinctly recognized of these is that the Federal Government is one of enumerated powers." "It is essential to the usefulness of the State governments that their just authority should be respected by that of the nation. Already the authority of the States is in a measure paralyzed by a growing conviction that all their powers are in some sense derivative and subordinate, and not original and independent. The State governments are a part of the American system of government. They fill a well-defined place, and their just authority must be respected by the Federal Government, if it is expected that their laws will be obeyed. A frequent recurrence to the fundamental principles of government is essential to civil liberty, and in this view I have thought it proper to invite your attention to these subjects."

"It is the clear duty of the national Government to decline the exercise of all doubtful powers when the neglect to do so would be to bring into the fields of legislation already occupied by the States, and thereby raising embarrassing questions, and presenting a singular and dangerous instance of two jurisdictions claiming the right to control the same class of subjects, and creating rival corporations with differing powers. Arguments may be found for the exercise of this class of powers by Congress, but they are greatly overbalanced by the evils it would produce."

How full of meaning these sentences at this particular time! How like "apples of gold in pictures of silver" some of his declarations! "One of the best established and most distinctly recognized" of the principles that underlie our system of government is that the "Federal Government is one of enumerated powers." And again:

"The authority of the States is paralyzed by a growing conviction that all their powers are in some sense derivative and subordinate, and not original and independent."

If, in Governor Palmer's view, there was danger and mischief in the attempt to regulate corporations in States by act of Congress, because of liability to a collision in jurisdiction, how much more clear and positive would have been the danger in his judgment where the interests to be affected are vital and involve the very existence of the State, and where the conflict in jurisdiction is not merely liable, but absolutely certain and unavoidable? So far as the exercise of this power is claimed under the so-called fourteenth amendment, I have little to say. When that article shall have been pronounced by competent authority part of our Constitution, its text may be of importance. At present I have only to compare text with text. The first section of that article is as follows:

"Sec. 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

If this clause be operative at all it is simply declaratory of the condition of certain classes therein named. The prohibition against any State making or enforcing laws which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States is of no moment until it be shown that some State has proposed or now proposes to do so. In this view the question arises, does this section secure the elective franchise to the negro in the several States? Did any one of the advocates of that amendment, while it was pending here, claim such a construction? So far as I can ascertain they did not. The public were informed by them, and by speakers who advocated that amendment on the stump, that its intention and effect was to permit every State to do as it might elect on that subject, with the understanding that such States as refused suffrage to the negro would be curtailed in representation to that extent. It was held that the whole article affirmed the right of a State to act on suffrage, and that because they would not all act alike it was necessary to equalize representation. To accomplish that equality the second section was submitted, as follows:

"Sec. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State."

Suppose now these two sections be admitted to be parts of the Constitution, may Congress under any power derived from them, when construed together, declare that negroes shall vote in Pennsylvania? No! What, then; is the whole article void? By no means; but if the article be valid Congress may, under the two sections, say to a given State, "The negroes constitute one half your population; you have a given number of Representatives in Congress; that number is based on your whole population; if you see fit by State law to disfranchise one half of your inhabitants, we, by virtue of the power to apportion Representatives, will decrease your representation to one half of the present number." That, and that only, is the extent of power resulting from the clause in question if there be any validity in the view of those who hold that the General Government is one of delegated and enumerated powers; and if there be any vitality in the tenth article of amendment, which declares that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Before Congress can act on any subject it must appear to be either, first, "delegated to the United States by the Constitution," or second, "prohibited by it to the States."

Having already considered the delegated powers, let me briefly refer to those which the States are prohibited from exercising. With the exceptions already noticed the prohibitions on States are all embraced in the tenth section of the first article. There, in plain, bold, language, requiring no interpretation, it is declared that—

"No State shall enter into any treaty, &c., grant letters of marque, and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligations of contracts, or grant any title of nobility."

Other prohibitions are embraced in the section under consideration, and it is observable that among all the inhibitions on State action none in the body of the Constitution can be even so tortured as to refer to the question of suffrage within the States.

And now, having briefly as I could given my objections to the bill, I close without reference to the proposed amendment, also pending. Upon the last we can talk before the people. I can but hope that we will be spared the humility of seeing this bill pass, and protest in the name of my people against Federal intervention in the domestic affairs of the several States.

Mr. PAINE obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. KELLEY, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ARNELL: The petition of C. B. Davis, of Tennessee, for relief from political disabilities.

By Mr. AXTELL: The petition of J. G. Morrison, Niel McSwain, and others, of Snelling, California, praying for the establishment of a post route from Tuolumne City, Stanislaus county, to Millerton, county seat of Fresno county.

By Mr. BEAMAN: The petition of C. H. Parshall and 81 others, citizens of Detroit, Michigan, praying for the passage of the civil service bill, &c.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: The petition of Charles A. Russell, of Texas, for removal of disabilities.

By Mr. FERRISS: A petition of citizens of New York, that a bronze medal commemorating the preservation of the Union be struck and distributed to the officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines who were honorably discharged from the Union Army, and to the children of those who died in the service of the Union.

By Mr. KERR: A statement in the case of the application of the widow and children of the late Captain John S. Davis, of Indiana, for a pension.

By Mr. LAFLIN: The petition of M. R. Carter, of Annapolis, Maryland, in favor of increase of pay of paymaster's clerk at Annapolis.

By Mr. LINCOLN: The petition of Elizabeth Knowles, for relief.

By Mr. LOAN: A petition of citizens of Holt and Nodaway counties, in the State of Missouri, for the establishment of a post route.

By Mr. MERCUR: The petition of E. M. Davis, of Philadelphia, asking that the law making gold a legal tender be repealed, and that a new money system be adopted by which, to any one who can offer productive real estate security, the nation shall loan, with proper guards, in money similar to the "greenbacks," one dollar for every six of security, and charge for the same not exceeding four per cent. per annum until the public debt is paid; that then the interest shall be reduced to the cost of producing the "greenbacks;" to conducting the system and to guaranteeing losses on errors in securities; that the loans shall be payable at any time by the borrowers, but never demandable by the Government so long as the interest is paid punctually and the security does not decrease; that the borrowers shall fix the denominations of the money within certain limits, and that said money shall be a legal tender and the only legal tender of the country. Also, that Government notes be prepared having twelve months to run (not a legal tender) bearing three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. interest, to be issued to any one who may wish to invest his money, thereby furnishing an absorbent or sinking fund for any surplus money on the market.

By Mr. MOORE: A petition of masters and owners of vessels of Elizabethport, New Jersey, praying the intervention of Congress to protect all engaged in navigation from illegal exactions by State and municipal corporations.

By Mr. STARKWEATHER: A petition of owners and masters of vessels in the State of Connecticut, praying the intervention of Congress to protect those engaged in navigation from illegal taxes and exactions by State and municipal corporations.

By Mr. WHITTEMORE: A petition of citizens of Tennessee, president of the senate, and members of the State Legislature, and judges of the courts, asking that James Cox, late a private of company C, first regiment of East Tennessee cavalry, may be placed on the pension-roll.

By Mr. WINDOM: The petition of Z. M. Brown, Samuel E. Adams, and 80 others, citizens of Monticello, Minnesota, asking for aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad.

Also, the petition of Hiram H. G. Bradt, Cyrus H. Reed, A. Seymour, and 20 others, citizens of Walnut Grove, Minnesota, asking for an amendment to the homestead law so as to give Union soldiers the right to enter their homesteads after an occupancy of one year.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 29, 1869.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, communicating an estimate of appropriation required for defraying the expenses of negotiating the treaty of March 2, 1868, with the Ute Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of Hon. ZACHARIAH CHANDLER, elected by the Legislature of Michigan a Senator from that State for the term commencing March 4, 1869; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present the petition of Rev. Dr. McCosh, president of Princeton College, and the other members of the faculty, setting forth that a total eclipse of the sun will take place on the 7th of August next, and petitioning that a small appropriation be made to the United States Naval Observatory or to the National Academy of Sciences for the purpose of taking observations of that eclipse. They represent that these observations are not only very interesting to science, but very useful in fixing exactly the latitudes and longitudes, that the observations cannot be made at the Observatory, as it is not within the region in which the total eclipse will be visible, and that the opportunities for making such observations are very rare. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN also presented a petition of citizens of New Jersey, praying that suffrage may be extended to women on equal terms with men in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of Reuben D. Hill, of Virginia, praying to be relieved from political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of Reuben F. Watts, praying to be relieved from political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POOL presented a petition of citizens of North Carolina, praying that Joseph D. Davis, a resident of that State, may be relieved from political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of Boston, praying that a reciprocity treaty may be made with the Dominion of Canada and the British Provinces; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, praying the repeal of the duty on plants and seeds; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that the right of suffrage may be extended to women equally with men in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of merchants and other dealers in distilled spirits in Boston, praying for certain amendments or modifications of the internal revenue law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the petition of George B. Upton, a merchant of Boston, in which he says that he has read what purports to be a copy of a treaty between this Government and Great Britain for the settlement of claims, and among others for a settlement of the so-called "Alabama" claims. Before stating the subject of this petition I will say that I have hesitated whether to present it in open or in executive session; but considering that the subject has received publicity on the other side of the water, that it has extensive publicity on ours, and also considering the gravity of the question, I have felt that upon the whole I should present this petition in open session.

He remonstrates against the ratification of the treaty on account of the injustice which would thereby be done to himself and other claimants. He sets forth the character of that injustice. He then says that he has higher objections to its confirmation; "that the so-called treaty proposes to put upon the same footing claims by British subjects which have arisen under a disagreement in regard to the ordinary forms of neutrality and claims of our own citizens upon the British Government for piracies committed by British-built, British-manned, and British-armed vessels; by vessels and armaments which left British ports under the protection of the British flag and burned American ships, and your memorialist's among the number, upon the high seas without taking them into port for condemnation, and without any action being taken upon the part of the British Government when these atrocities were laid before it to prevent the same." I will not read any further in this memorial. What I have read presents its substance. I move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present a petition from the national executive committee of colored citizens, praying for the passage of House bill No. 267. The object of this petition is to secure to colored people in the rebel States a piece of land; in other words, to secure the operation of our homestead law to certain lands in the rebel States. The Senator from Kansas, [Mr. POMEROY,] I believe, has had this subject in hand. May I have his attention for one moment, for I wish to ask what should be the destination of the petition relating to House bill No. 267, which I understand the Senator has reported?

Mr. POMEROY. There are two bills on that subject. The particular bill to which the Senator refers is still in committee and not reported.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Public Lands, and I ask the earnest attention of my friend to the petition.

The motion was agreed to.

ALPHEUS C. GALLAHUE.

Mr. WILLEY. If there is nothing before the Senate I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up a little private bill which will occupy but a moment. I move to take up Senate bill No. 781.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 781) for the relief of Alpheus C. Gallahue. It provides that Alpheus C. Gallahue shall have leave to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for the extension of the letters-patent granted to him for an improvement in machines for pegging boots and shoes on the 16th of August, 1853, antedated 18th of February, 1853, for fourteen years from the latter date, in the same manner as if the petition for the extension had been filed at least ninety days before the expiration of the patent; and the Commissioner of Patents is authorized to consider and determine the application in the same manner as if it had been filed ninety days prior to the expiration of the patent, and with the same effect as if it had been regularly filed and acted upon under existing laws; but any such extension of the patent is not to affect the right to continue to use the machine of any person who, since the 18th of February, 1857, and prior to the approval of the act, may have procured and at the time of such approval shall be using the machine.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the House of Representatives, returning, in answer to the request of the Senate, the bill (H. R. No. 65) for the relief of William McGarrahan, with the papers relating thereto.

Mr. MORTON. I move to refer the message, with the bill and accompanying papers, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FERRY. I do not understand the motive of this proposed reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. I do not suppose that the Senator from Indiana intends to cast a reflection upon the Committee on Private Land Claims?

Mr. MORTON. Not at all.

Mr. FERRY. All that has been done with regard to this case of Mr. McGarrahan is this: it has been referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; they have examined the case and made a report; that report was acted upon partially at the last session, but in such a manner that the bill is now called back from the House of Representatives, and we are told that Mr. McGarrahan wishes to submit additional testimony, believing himself to be injured by the report, and that he has acquired additional testimony since the last session. The proper place evidently for a reference of the papers is to the Committee on Private Land Claims; and it certainly is a reflection upon that committee if their report, immediately upon its being presented here in the Senate without any examination, is referred to another committee, as if they were incompetent to examine the case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I certainly trust that this matter will not be referred to the Judiciary Committee after what has transpired in the Senate. It is a matter appropriately belonging to the Committee on Private Land Claims; and after that committee has investigated the matter and made a report, which it is alleged has been hastily acted upon and without consideration, and that there is some other testimony to be submitted, to take it away from the Committee on Private Land Claims and refer it to another committee of this body—to take it from the committee to which it appropriately belongs and refer it to a committee to which it does not belong—would certainly be a reflection upon the committee that has had charge of the subject which I, for one, would not be willing to make. One committee certainly ought not to undertake to revise the action of another committee; and, as is suggested by one of my associates upon the committee, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] it would involve a labor to which the Judiciary Committee should not be subjected. This subject has been investigated by the members of the Committee on Private Land Claims, and if any further investigation is to take place certainly that committee is the proper one to make it. I trust the Senate will recommit the matter to the Committee on Private Land Claims and let them hear such further explanations as are to be made or receive such testimony as the parties may offer.

Mr. MORTON. There is no disrespect whatever intended to the Committee on Private Land Claims. If they choose to make disrespect out of it it will be difficult to avoid it, but there is no such intention. This bill came from the Committee on the Judiciary in the House of Representatives, and it ought to have been referred, I should think, to the Committee on the Judiciary in the Senate. It properly belongs to that committee. It is not the case of a person claiming land from the United States; it is not in the nature of a private land claim from the Government of the United States, to be referred to that committee; but the questions involved are questions of law as well as questions of fact, and it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from Connecticut insists that it will be disrespectful to him, as a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims, if it should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I should rather suppose the Senator from Connecticut would be glad to be discharged from the consideration of it. He has committed himself on this question; and if it is to be reexamined it ought at least to be reexamined by a committee the majority of which has not committed itself against the party who asks the reexamination. For my part, if I were on that committee I should be glad, as a matter of delicacy, to be discharged from the further consideration of it.

Mr. FERRY. I do not know what the Senator from Indiana means by saying that I have already committed myself in reference to this case. I united with the report of the committee, but in the discussion which has taken place upon the questions presented now by the Senator from Indiana I have said not one word in regard to the merits of the case. If, because the members of the Committee on Private Land Claims, upon the investigation of the case on the evidence presented to them, found that evidence insufficient its members are to be considered as committed, then all that the Senator is asking is that the action of one committee shall be revised by another committee, and I cannot consider that as anything else than a reflection upon the first-named committee, and if we must submit to it, so we must, as the Senator seems to think there is nothing for us to do but for the Senate and the committee both to submit to his dictation in this matter.

Now, Mr. President, I cannot think that the Senator from Indiana properly understands this case. It is simply a claim under a Mexican grant of land—such a claim as the Committee on Private Land Claims have been called upon to investigate more than twenty times since I have been on that committee. It involves similar questions of law and similar questions of fact to those which have arisen in other cases. It is no more appropriate to the Judiciary Committee than any question which has ever been referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims growing out of these ancient Mexican land grants. It is an ordinary case, but a strange feeling has been created in regard to it apparently in the minds of some Senators. I certainly am unconscious of entertaining any feeling myself in regard to the case or the parties or the questions involved; but I do not like, after the matter has been referred to a committee of which I am a member, and the report of that committee has not been discussed in the Senate, and the case is brought back from the House of Representatives solely because it is said there is additional evidence to be offered—I do not like to have the imputation upon a committee of which I am a member that they are not to be trusted with the examination of this additional evidence. The Committee on Private Land Claims has been changed since the last session. A majority of the present members of the Committee on Private Land Claims were not on the committee at the last session, and certainly it is impossible for the Senate to adopt the motion of the Senator from Indiana without creating at any rate some unpleasant reflection in the breasts of those who are members of that committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I have always understood that the Committee on Private Land Claims was organized for the purpose of examining questions between the United States and citizens. Where the citizen claims a right to a portion of what appear to be the public lands, and that question is to be decided between the Government and the citizen, the case should be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. But if it be only a controversy between two citizens as to which citizen has the better right, that is a judicial question. It is not a question of policy at all. The Committee on Private Land Claims may consider questions of policy between the citizen and the Government; but when a question of legal right between two citizens in regard to lands the legal title to which is yet in the United States arises, that question probably belongs to the Committee on the Judiciary, as I suppose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish simply to inform the Senator, so that he may understand it, that this bill recognizes the title as in the United States, and it is simply a controversy between McGarrahan and the United States. The bill does not claim that the title is in Mr. McGarrahan, but it provides that he may enter the land at a land office of the United States as though he was a settler upon the public land. These other parties come in incidentally. There is no controversy between Mr. McGarrahan and those parties as far as Congress is concerned. It is a question between McGarrahan and the United States so far as Congress is concerned.

Mr. HENDRICKS. So far as the legal title is concerned perhaps the Senator states it aright, that the legal title is in the United States. McGarrahan seeks that legal title, but which has the better right to this land, some mining company, the name of which I do not recollect, or McGarrahan, is a question that ought to go to the Judiciary Committee. I think there are other interests opposed to Mr. McGarrahan. I have not read any report, and I have not read the bill, but I understand that it is really a controversy between a mining company and Mr. McGarrahan. I understand that to be the fact, and, I think, some of the correspondence that has been referred to shows that fact. I think the Commissioner of the General Land Office was called upon to complete the title of some mining company, or some parties, at least, who claim in hostility to McGarrahan. If it be a question, as I understand it is, which has the better claim to this land, the mining company or McGarrahan, that is a judicial or legal question which ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. The distinction is a very broad and plain one, not only in reason, but, as I understand, in the practice of the Senate. This belongs to that class of cases which have gone to the Judiciary Committee. I think I could name some cases that have been referred to the Judiciary Committee where the questions were like this, between claimants to the same piece of land.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, this is not such a case as was stated by the Senator last up. It is a case where the claimant now presenting himself to the Senate, Mr. McGarrahan, asserts that he is the rightful owner of a grant made by the Mexican Government to one Gomez, and that that grant covers a parcel of ground which contains a valuable quicksilver mine. Two questions are involved. The first is, whether that grant was ever made by the Mexican Government or not; and if it was, and he is the rightful owner of it, the United States have, by treaty with Mexico, bound themselves to confirm it to its rightful owner. The first question, then, is: was such a grant ever made? The next is: if the grant was made, does it cover the particular parcel of land in question? Both of these questions belong to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Now, Mr. President, let me state a fact in this connection. When the House bill now before us for reference came to the Senate at the last session of Congress Mr. McGarrahan desired to have it referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. He urged me to support that reference. I believed it, for the purposes of his investigation, the best and most proper committee, because it had cognizance of that class of cases always, and because its members—I allude to the honorable Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] and the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD]—were of the foremost lawyers of this body. I apprehend their legal knowledge was not unfavorably affected because they were not members of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senator from Nevada, [Mr. STEWART,] impressed and convinced that the claimant's claim was not a good one, wished it sent then to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which he was a member. I opposed that. There was a discussion, and it was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, where it received, as all these gentlemen tell us, and it is undoubtedly a fact and will so appear, an exhaustive examination.

But now the claimant comes forward and makes application to my two honorable friends from the State of Indiana that they may rise here and see that justice shall be done him; and they rise accordingly, alleging that he has discovered additional testimony which was not submitted to that committee, and whereupon they say that the case shall be submitted now in propriety to the Judiciary Committee de novo; that they shall go over the entirety of the investigation of this case which involves piles of manuscripts and books almost incalculable, because he desires to submit additional testimony upon what point? As stated by the Senators when they undertook to reverse the standing and uniform rule of this body the other day, testimony affecting his possession of the land in question, not whether the grant was made by the Mexican Government to Gomez under whom he claims; not whether the land in question is the land upon which this mine exists; but whether he was in possession or not. And now the Senators rise, and for the purpose of taking it out of the hands of this committee make it out to be a case involving a question between two private persons, citizens of the United States!

There are two Senators here, Mr. President, representing to the best of their ability and capacity the State of California. This claim is located in that State. Its history is a part of the history of questions that we have become necessarily familiar with. The assumption from the beginning of this controversy seems to me to be that McGarrahan could not have justice at our hands, and hence this advocacy of his claims out of that State. Well, Mr. President, I do not think there is any citizen of that State or of the United States who has a claim to prefer which has justice for its basis, or who, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it has justice for its basis, cannot find advocates in my colleague and me. Nor do I state this, sir, for the purpose of confining Mr. McGarrahan to our support or to our determination of his case or to our advice. But the Senator from Indiana last up, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] when discussing this matter the other day, said some things—I have not the report now before me—which implied very nearly that such justice as Mr. McGarrahan was entitled to was not obtainable from us. There was paraded here a copy of a letter printed for Senators' convenience by Mr. McGarrahan, which contained my name among others, addressed to the land department, upon this subject; and another Senator, while that was before the Senate, used the language that the "secret"—that was the word, sir—the secret of the course pursued on this subject might be found in that paper.

Mr. President, there are no secrets connected with my action on public affairs. He who states it, and he who implies it, both imply and state what is false—that is the word, sir. Mr. McGarrahan might have had my letters addressed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his behalf, demanding all the attention that he could give him for the purpose of his investigations, printed also and spread before the Senate, but he did not.

Between these claimants I care not the weight of the piece of paper that I throw from my fingers. But, Mr. President, it is a case involving a very important question to the people that I in part represent here. When the American population went to that State they went and fell heir to a system of land disposition not previously known to any extent in our country, namely, the perfect and imperfect and the simulated grants made and alleged to have been made by the Mexican Government to various parties; and they had to be examined, investigated, and determined under laws made and provided for that purpose. The existence of these grants prevented settlement upon the public lands in our State everywhere, and now, sir, in the twentieth year of the location and settlement of that State, these questions are yet impoverishing our State and harassing our people. After the exhaustive report, which I gave attention to if the Senators did not, made by an able committee of this body, a committee than which there is none abler, none more honest or painstaking, when Mr. McGarrahan had not stated to me—and he had access to me every day and every moment—that he desired to present additional testimony, was it any wonder that I was in favor of finally disposing of the case and settling the titles to that land, as I had favored the settlement of these titles at all times?

This, Mr. President, is a case of consequence to us. It affects us. It is one of hundreds like it. Hundreds of these grants have been confirmed and hundreds of simulated ones have been rejected; but pending the confirmation and rejection the State has been torn, disturbed, settlements prevented, industry checked, investments prohibited; and it has been our business and our duty—and we have understood the questions, too, sir—to bring these controversies to a close as soon as possible; and hence I joined in a letter asking that a patent should issue in this case; but it was after I had demanded for this claimant and in his behalf, both on the part of the land department and the legislative department, all the investigation that this subject was capable of having.

So much, sir, for the parade of this letter which was paraded in connection with dissertations upon parliamentary law, mutilated for the special purposes of the Senate on that occasion, and which gave the convenience to Senators of being able to get all that was known upon parliamentary law upon a single sheet in place of turning to a volume for that purpose!

Now, Mr. President, for the present I say, in conclusion, that I care nothing to what committee this goes. I will not vote to take it away from a committee offensively whose capacity in all respects to investigate is beyond question. But if it shall go to the Judiciary Committee of this body, in whom I have the greatest confidence, I shall be satisfied with the result of their investigation; and I have no doubt, whatever their report shall be, I shall vote affirmatively for its adoption.

Mr. WILSON. I move—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to say a word in reply to the Senator from California.

Mr. WILSON. Three or four mornings have already been occupied with this matter, and we have had no time to do other business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It would not be very just if I should not be permitted to make an explanation after what has been said by the Senator from California.

Mr. President, the Senator from California notified us a day or two ago that he was about to demolish some of us—I could not understand his threat in any other way—and it seems the effort has been made this morning, I think, however, without any very great success. I do not understand myself the extraordinary excitement that seems to prevail on the part of some gentlemen at this motion. I wish to state that all I know with regard to this matter is contained within a very narrow compass. Mr. McGarrahan—a person entirely unknown to me—called with another gentleman, with whom I was acquainted, at my room, and stated to me the condition of this case, and handed to me the report made by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary in the House of Representatives and requested that I should read it. He also handed me a printed copy of the letter from the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] and stated the fact that on the last night of the session, without any hearing whatever, a motion was made, contrary to the intimation conveyed in that letter and without his knowledge, to postpone the bill indefinitely, and it was so acted upon. He requested that I would read the report, and if I thought he had a just cause to be heard before the Senate that I would sustain the motion to be made by the Senator from Indiana to give him a hearing to bring the matter back.

Mr. CONNESS. Let me ask the Senator at this point what report he refers to—the House report or the report of the Senate Committee?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The House report. He stated also that a report had been made adverse to his claim by the honorable Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims of the Senate. That report, however, he did not hand me, and I did not see it; but I have seen it since and read it. It appeared to me that he had been treated—it never occurred to me intentionally treated—but that on the whole he had been treated unfairly and had not had what he was entitled to, a hearing before the Senate of the United States; that he had been unwittingly induced to suppose that the matter would not be acted upon at that session; that he would have an opportunity to obtain more testimony; and that without his knowledge this action had been taken by the Senate, and the consequence would be, as he stated, unless it was reversed in some way, that he would lose all claim to the land.

Sir, when a man calls upon me from any section of the country, the Pacific coast or any other coast, a fellow-citizen, and asks me to examine a claim of his before the Senate, if it is in my power to do so I invariably do it. Cases have occurred in which gentlemen have asked me particularly to examine their claims, and I have done so, and after that examination have come out and opposed their claims, being satisfied that they were not well founded. In this case I told Mr. McGarrahan that I thought he was concluded by the action of the Senate on the subject. He stated, however, in reply, that he was instructed otherwise, and handed me a brief of the authorities which have since been exhibited, which I examined, and it seemed to me that I was mistaken as to the effect of it; and I told him therefore that if I remained of that opinion I would support the motion to be made by the honorable Senator from Indiana, in order to give him a hearing. I formed no opinion whatever upon his case as to the exact merits of it. I knew nothing about it, and drew no inferences with regard to the action of anybody. I supposed it had been done unwittingly, and believing that that was the case, and that he was a fellow-citizen entitled to redress, I told him that so far as I was concerned he should have it. That is my action, sir; and I care not what gentlemen choose to say about it on the one side of this Chamber or the other. It commends itself to my judgment and my sense of right, and I stand by it.

Now, sir, as to the matter of offense by the honorable Senator from California, it never occurred to me to cast an imputation upon him or any other Senator in the transaction.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether he did not raise this letter—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yer, sir; and I am about to explain how I did it and why.

Mr. CONNESS. And push it toward the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly I did, and I had a perfect right to do it; and there was nothing offensive in it and nothing at which gentlemen should take offense, or had a right to take offense in any way whatever, and I meant no offense toward anybody in doing it. There was a letter on my table which was an illustration of a statement that I made.

Now, let me read a little from that debate to see what cause the honorable Senator has for his heat, so far as I am concerned. The honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] was arguing this matter, and what did he say? I will read a few sentences:

"I have nothing to say about McGarrahan or about his claim at this time. If it ever becomes necessary to discuss that I may have something to say on that subject; but I consider it foreign to this discussion. Under this invariable practice, and in view of the fact that the bill is now in the possession of the House of Representatives, that this vote of indefinite postponement has been regarded as a rejection, and that no motion to reconsider would be in order at this time, even if the bill was before the Senate, it seems to me extraordinary that an effort should be made to subvert the settled practice of the Senate. Mr. McGarrahan can introduce another bill—there is no objection to that—and have the question considered in the Senate again."

I had understood that the Commissioner of the Land Office would consider the final disposition of this question as authorizing him to issue a patent to other parties, and that a new bill would therefore do Mr. McGarrahan no good at all. It was in relation to that that I interrupted the Senator from Oregon. He had stated that this particular proceeding was "extraordinary," in his judgment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there not this objection: it is perfectly well understood that if this bill is finally disposed of the Commissioner of the General Land Office will then issue his patents to other parties, and that will close the matter. Is not that the whole secret?

What "secret?" The secret of this movement to get this bill back again. No other secret than that was alluded to in any shape or form. The Senator from Oregon said that it was an extraordinary proceeding, and that Mr. McGarrahan might have another bill introduced. I interposed, and said that that would afford him no redress, because it was understood that a patent would be issued, and that was the secret of what seemed to be this extraordinary proceeding. Is there any imputation on the Senator arising from that statement, and from the fact that the word "secret" is used in that connection? Not the slightest in the world; and nothing but a very sensitive state of mind could have induced the Senator, if he had read the whole passage, to come to any such conclusion. Then the Senator from Oregon goes on:

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that that is the case.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am so informed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I presume the Senator has much information derived from Mr. McGarrahan that is not in the possession of myself or others, but be that as it may, I suppose that if a bill was introduced and was pending here the Commissioner might be induced to withhold any patent in reference to these lands until the bill pending could be determined. I do not know anything about the proceedings before the Commissioner one way or the other.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Here is a letter laid on the table addressed by Senators to the Commissioner, requesting patents to be issued. Has the Senator seen it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not seen it, and know nothing about it.

That is the whole of it. Now, sir, when in support of the information that I had received, that it was understood that the Commissioner would, when this bill was disposed of, issue a patent to the other parties, I produced as evidence a paper lying before me which requested the Commissioner to at once issue that patent, was there any impropriety in that? I made no imputation upon Senators. I had nothing to do with their motives, nothing to do with their views. I adduced it as a fact, and I had a perfect right to do so without being accused of any disrespect to any Senator. Is there anything in the letter itself that is improper? Is there anything in the fact that the Senators made such a communication that is improper? It did not occur to me that there was. If it occurs to them that it was a great impropriety, and that it is an insult to allude to it, that is their concern, if they choose to put that construction upon it, and not mine. Why Senators, with regard to a transaction so open, not a secret, the mere fact that they claimed that a patent should be issued in this case, should consider it an imputation on them that the fact is adduced in evidence of the conclusion that the Commissioner intends to or is called upon to issue a patent in the case is to me a mystery. I do not understand it. I repeat that I had no sort of intention of casting any reflection whatever upon those gentlemen who signed that paper; but if they choose to take it so it is their construction of it and not mine.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the discussion this morning is among the surprises of this whole proceeding. I intended no disrespect to the members of the Committee on Private Land Claims. I have as much respect for them as for the members of any other committee; and when a member of that committee rises and in behalf of the committee claims that the reference of this subject to another committee would be a disrespect to them it places me in an embarrassing position, and I can have but little to say about it.

The Senator from California gives us to understand this morning that it is a proper subject for the Committee on Private Land Claims, because it is a contest between the United States and Mr. McGarrahan. That is another new thing. I had supposed that the contest was between a mining company and Mr. McGarrahan; that the United States had no interest in the matter one way or the other; for it made no difference to the Government which party it went to. Now, Mr. President, they have a Committee on Private Land Claims in the House of Representatives, but this bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in that body, and in my opinion it properly belongs to the Committee on the Judiciary in this body. I think it went improperly to the other committee.

But the Senator from California drops an intimation here that this matter ought to be referred to the two Senators from California, as it is a matter of public consideration there.

Mr. CONNESS. He did nothing of the kind, Mr. President, and the Senator does not find it in anything I said.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator disclaims it of course I retract it.

Mr. CONNESS. I am sure the Senator does not intend to misrepresent what I said.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; but I so understood him when he referred to both the Senators from California. I do not understand that the Senator from California on my left [Mr. COLE] has taken any distinct ground on this measure, or is concerned in it one way or the other; so his moral support cannot be brought up on this question.

Now, one word in reply to the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY.] I said that I thought he was committed on this question. Perhaps I ought not to have said that. I made that remark, however, from a conversation I had had with the Senator. But, sir, if the Committee on Private Land Claims now say to the Senate that this bill cannot be referred to another committee without its being considered a personal disrespect to themselves, and as I am the last one to offer personal disrespect to any honorable committee of this body, I have nothing further to say. It seemed to me to be a matter of justice and propriety that it should go to a new committee, a committee the members of which were not enlisted by any feeling or by any controversy or by any labor upon the one side or the other of this question; but if the Committee on Private Land Claims claim it as a legitimate part of their business I have no further argument to make.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. President, I have not risen to discuss the question of reference. The Senator from Connecticut has stated very emphatically that if this motion prevails it will be a reflection on the Committee on Private Land Claims. Now, if I follow the example set by the honorable Senator from Connecticut on a former occasion he cannot blame me. When the bill from the House of Representatives transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department came before this body a motion was made to refer it to the Committee on Indian Affairs, where it properly belonged. The honorable Senator voted against that motion, and said:

"Mr. FERRY. I voted against the motion to refer to the Committee on Indian Affairs because I believe that if that motion were to prevail it would be fatal to this bill. Favoring the bill I should prefer its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs."

Now, if I follow the rule laid down by the honorable Senator in that case I trust he will not blame me. I have no belief about this matter. I know nothing about this bill, and I know nothing about the feeling of the committee toward the bill; but if I should be led to believe that its reference to the Committee on Private Land Claims would have the effect to kill it or to bury it I might vote for its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary under the rule laid down by my honorable friend from Connecticut. It seems that it makes a difference what committee it is which is to be reflected upon when a proposed departure from the rule is made.

Mr. CONNESS. One word, sir—I shall detain the Senate but a moment—in regard to the statement made by the Senator from Maine. What I complain of and did complain of in the Senator's treatment of this subject as affecting me personally is this: that he exhibited and used here a paper which was a part of a garbled correspondence of mine on this whole subject with the land department that was put in his hands by an interested party, while I, as a brother Senator, was near him, might have been consulted, could have made him understand it in a word, and was not so consulted. This man who prefers this claim has letters of mine on record in the land department as much stronger than that, demanding all the investigation that his case required at their hands, as one letter can be over another, and the letter brought in here and printed by him and used by the honorable Senator was specially selected with a view of showing that I had a purpose of foreclosing him in the case when it was written by me or signed by me after I believed that the case had been exhaustively considered. That is all, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It seems that the Senator changes his ground a little; it is now a want of courtesy.

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir; more than that; it involves justice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, I cannot understand what may be in the mind of the Senator, and I will not undertake to trace it. He must satisfy himself on that subject. All I can say is, it was not put in my hands by Mr. McGarahan. I found it on my desk, and I suppose a similar paper was placed on the desk of every Senator. I do not know that it was placed on my desk for my benefit particularly or anybody else's specially. I found it here, looked at it, and in the course of the discussion, to show what the real difficulty was in the case, I alluded to it and pointed the attention of the honorable Senator from Oregon to it. But I will say that if I had had the slightest idea that either of the Senators signing that paper whose names were affixed to it considered it a transaction improper to be referred to, and one that was in any way tending to cast an imputation upon them, I should certainly have taken some other course in regard to it; but looking at it as a mere fact in the case, I exhibited it. I have no apology to make for doing so, and I should do precisely the same thing under similar circumstances unless I was led to suspect that there was an impropriety about the thing itself. But as it did not occur to me that the Senators had done anything improper, of course I did not suppose I was affecting them in any way.

Mr. STEWART. I justify it. I take all the responsibility.

Mr. CONNESS. One word, and I dismiss this matter so far as I am concerned. I did not rise as a candidate for the approbation of my friend from Maine. His affirmation of my integrity here I did not seek at all. I said what I thought I had a right to say because of what I regarded as an offense by him, and I am willing to let it rest.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the morning hour has expired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the order of the day is regularly before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senator from Nevada will let us take a vote on this question, so that we may have an opportunity to do something else this session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no objection be made the question will be put on the reference of the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CORBETT. I merely wish to say that as the Senate decided in the former case referred to by my friend from Nebraska to refer that bill to the appropriate committee—the Committee on Indian Affairs—when another committee sought to take jurisdiction, I think it is due to the Committee on Private Land Claims that this case should be referred to that committee, which I believe is the proper and appropriate committee for its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill and accompanying papers to the Committee on the Judiciary, upon which question the yeas and nays are called for.

Mr. CONNESS. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. MORTON. In view of the ground it has been put upon this morning by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY,] I withdraw any further application to refer the case to the Committee on the Judiciary. He puts it on a ground that I cannot answer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion for reference to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to make a report.

Mr. POMEROY. I have some petitions to present.

Mr. STEWART. I will give way for morning business merely if that be the sense of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, if there be no objection, will receive petitions and reports and other morning business.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of citizens of Maine, a petition of citizens of Massachusetts, a petition of citizens of New York, a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, a petition of citizens of Ohio, a petition of citizens of Michigan, a petition of citizens of Illinois, a petition of citizens of Iowa, and a petition of citizens of Missouri, praying that the right of suffrage be extended to women; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying the establishment of a mail route from Hutchinson, via Cedar Mills, to Granite Falls; a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying the establishment of a mail route from Lynde, in Minnesota, to Sioux City, Dakota; and a petition of citizens of Minnesota, praying the establishment of a mail route from Ottertail City to the White Earth reservation in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. VICKERS presented a petition of citizens of Maryland, praying the establishment of a light-house at Lone Point and for the deepening of the harbor at Queenstown, near the mouth of Chester river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARLAN presented the memorial of the representatives of the religious society of Friends, praying that measures be taken to establish permanent relations of peace and good-will with the Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of James W. Long, brevet major United States Army, praying to be reimbursed for moneys paid out by him while engaged in the recruiting service; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, relation to the improvement of the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. FOWLER,
Ordered, That Charles C. Neal have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1570) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1870, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it back with amendments. While I am up I desire to say that to-morrow at one o'clock I shall ask the Senate to allow me to proceed to the consideration of certain appropriation bills which have been reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORTON. The Committee on Representative Reform, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 209) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, have directed me to report it back without amendment. I will state that the report is unanimous.

Mr. CHANDLER. I gave notice yesterday that I should try to bring up the river and harbor bill to-day. I ask now if a motion to postpone the pending order of business for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of that bill would be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order to move to postpone the order of the day for the purpose of taking up other business.

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. MORTON. I have another report to submit yet.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the report.

Mr. MORTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 661) for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel John W. Davidson, of the United States Army, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. In reference to the report just made, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to pass that little bill, which is simply refunding to an officer of the Army $218 25 stolen from him in 1847 in California. The money was stolen by soldiers, and he made it good to the Treasury, and this bill is simply to refund it to him. The committee report in favor of it.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DIXON] is entitled to the floor on the order of the day, and he objects to my yielding it. He is not willing to yield the floor for anything except such morning business as has not yet been received. He is willing to yield to allow reports of committees to be made and bills to be introduced, but no further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the day is regularly before the Senate. It has not been postponed, and nothing else is in order unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield the floor to a motion. He is willing to allow morning business to be received, and the moment that is through with he desires to take the floor at once. It is merely by his courtesy that this morning business is now being allowed to be received.

Mr. DRAKE. I withdraw the request.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 697) granting lands to the States of Wisconsin and Michigan to aid in the construction of the Wisconsin and Lake Superior railroad and its branch, reported in favor of the indefinite postponement of the bill; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 767) to regulate the disposition of lands that may be hereafter granted to aid in the construction of railways, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 717) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin," approved May 5, 1864, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 796) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in securing the navigation of the Mississippi river immediately above the falls of St. Anthony, reported it without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 748) to amend an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 813) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1439) authorizing the remission of penalties in certain cases, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 724) to declare the meaning of the first section of an act entitled "An act in relation to the competency of witnesses, and for other purposes," reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 726) to authorize imprisonment with hard labor as a punishment in certain cases, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 727) to provide for the trial and punishment of accessories to criminal offenses, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 728) to repeal an act entitled "An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain States where by the laws thereof their admission is prohibited," reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 348) to provide for holding terms of the United States district court for the western district of Missouri at St. Joseph and the city of Kansas, in said State, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred a petition of citizens of Kansas and a petition of citizens of Massachusetts asking that suffrage may be extended to women in the District of Columbia, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Philip Johnson, praying for the passage of a law to compel landlords to comply with their leases, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the American Missionary Association, praying the adoption of measures for the protection of loyal persons in the South in the enjoyment of their civil rights, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. HARLAN, on December 19, 1868, that the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress in accordance with the provisions of section two of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 196) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Lincoln, widow of the late President of the United States, who was killed during the war of the rebellion, submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 675) to incorporate the United States Accident and Life Insurance Company, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 669) to incorporate the National Junction Railway Company, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DRAKE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 172) relative to Captain Thomas H. Stevens, United States Navy, reported adversely thereon, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1746) for the removal of certain disabilities from persons therein named, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S.

No. 850) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa McDougall; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 851) providing for the sale of lands to aid in the construction of the West Virginia Central railroad; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 852) for the relief of the Drew Theological Seminary, of Madison, New Jersey; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 853) to aid the Memphis, El Paso, and Pacific Railroad Company, of Texas, in the construction of a railroad and line of telegraph from the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government of the United States the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARLAN. I introduce this bill at the request of the friends of the bill. I have not read the bill, and do not know that I shall be able to approve of it. I move that it be printed and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 854) to further the administration of justice; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WELCH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 855) to relieve sundry citizens of Florida from disabilities; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 210) concerning certain lands granted to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain wagon roads; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

STEAMER CONGRESS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask leave to offer a resolution of inquiry:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate copies of papers filed in the Department of State, October 9, 1866, relative to the claim of Owen Thorn and others against the British Government for indemnity for losses sustained by the detention of the steamer Congress by the Canadian authorities.

I ask for its present consideration if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. It will raise a question as to the form—

Mr. STEWART. I object, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

FINANCIAL STATISTICS.

Mr. POOL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to communicate to the Senate, for the purpose of being printed for use, a statistical statement prepared in the Treasury Department, being a compilation of statistical, historical, and financial matter, referring solely to this Government and compiled from its records, from its organization to the present period.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. RICE. I ask leave to offer an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 1276) for the sale of the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to give notice that when the bill (H. R. No. 1599) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1870, shall be under consideration I shall move an amendment, which I now submit, and ask to be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1714) to close the land system in certain States, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 394) confirming title to Little Rock Island, in the Mississippi river.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 833) for the relief of Rufus M. Hollister, of Janesville, Wisconsin;

A bill (H. R. No. 1751) in relation to the appointment of midshipmen from the lately reconstructed States; and

A bill (H. R. No. 394) confirming title to Little Rock Island, in the Mississippi river.

SUFFRAGE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order of the day is the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, upon which question the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DIXON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, the importance and the gravity of the subject now under consideration by the Senate ought to lift its discussion out of the region of mere party politics, and elevate the Senate in its consideration into an atmosphere purer and higher than that of mere party controversy; for, sir, it is not, perhaps, too much to say that this is the most important question in many of its bearings which has ever been presented to Congress in the shape of a proposed constitutional amendment.

What is the question? It is not merely a question of suffrage. That of itself is a subject of vast importance, and is now agitating the public mind of this country to a very great extent. The question whether the female sex should be permitted to participate in the privilege of suffrage, whether other restrictions should be removed, the question of age, the question of property, a multitude of questions are or may be raised which are vastly important and interesting in connection with the right of suffrage. But, sir, we are not now dealing merely with the qualification of voters. The question is not what shall be the qualifications of the voter, but who shall create, establish, and prescribe those qualifications; not who shall be the voter, but who shall make the voter.

In considering that question we ought to remember that it is utterly impossible that any State should be an independent republic which does not entirely control its own laws with regard to the right of suffrage. Nor does it make the slightest difference with regard to this that any abdication or abnegation of its power is voluntary. It may be said that it is proposed that the States shall voluntarily relinquish their power to control the subject of suffrage within their respective limits. Sir, suppose a State should voluntarily assume upon itself a foreign yoke, or declare by a majority of its own people, or even by a unanimous vote, that it would prefer a monarchy, would the fact of its being voluntary at all affect the question whether it was still an independent republic?

Now, sir, it may be that the people of this country in their present condition of mind are ready to relinquish the power in the States of regulating their own laws with regard to suffrage; and if it should so prove, and the result should show that your own State (Ohio) and my State, (Connecticut,) having once or twice voted against extending the right of suffrage to the negro race, should now consent that a central power should regulate that question, and should do this voluntarily and freely, nevertheless they would by that action lose their character as republican governments. And, sir, that is the reason why it was that in the formation of the Constitution of the United States there was an entire neglect to interfere in the slightest degree with the question of suffrage in the several States. Look through the Constitution as it was formed, and you find no allusion whatever to the question of suffrage, except by reference to existing laws and qualifications in the then existing States. And why was that? We are not left in the dark upon that question. Was it because suffrage was not considered an important question? Was it not deemed of sufficient importance for the convention to consider and consult upon? We find, sir, that there were many propositions in the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States to interfere with suffrage in the States. In the first place it was proposed to apply a variety of restrictions, among others a freehold qualification. I will barely refer, without tiring the Senate with a long reference upon that question, to what was said by Mr. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, on that subject:

"Mr. Ellsworth thought the qualifications of the electors stood on the most proper footing."

That is, without being interfered with by the Constitution.

"The right of suffrage was a tender point, and strongly guarded by most of the State constitutions. The people will not readily subscribe to the national Constitution if it should subject them to be disfranchised."

And added:

"The States are the best judges of the circumstances and temper of their own people."

Thus, sir, Mr. Ellsworth was of opinion that the States being sovereign republics should be left to control and regulate that matter according to their own discretion.

We find that the question of suffrage and the interference of the General Government therewith in the States was fully discussed in the Federalist by Mr. Madison and Mr. Hamilton. Mr. Madison, in No. 52 of the Federalist, writes as follows:

"The first view to be taken of this part of the Government relates to the qualifications of the electors and the elected."

"Those of the former are to be the same with those of the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures. The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as a fundamental article of republican government. It was incumbent on the Convention therefore to define and establish this right in the Constitution. To have left it open for the occasional regulation of the Congress would have been improper for the reason just mentioned. To have submitted it to the legislative discretion of the States would have been improper for the same reason; and for the additional reason that it would have rendered too dependent on the State governments that branch of the Federal Government which ought to be dependent on the people alone. To have reduced the different qualifications in the different States to one uniform rule would probably have been as dissatisfactory to some of the States as it would have been difficult to the Convention. The provision made by the Convention appears, therefore, to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established, or which may be established by the State itself."

I read this from page 226 of the edition of the Federalist I hold in my hand, that of 1831. On page 236, in No. 54, Mr. Madison says further:

"It is a fundamental principle of the proposed constitution that as the aggregate number of Representatives allotted to the several States is to be determined by a Federal rule, founded on the aggregate number of inhabitants, so the right of choosing this allotted number in each State is to be exercised by such part of the inhabitants as the State itself may designate. The qualifications on which the right of suffrage depend are not perhaps the same in any two States. In some of the States the difference is very material."

So far Mr. Madison. In No. 59, written by Alexander Hamilton, at page 255 of the same volume, I find the following words:

"Suppose an article had been introduced into the Constitution empowering the United States to regulate the elections for the particular States, would any man have hesitated to condemn it both as an unwarrantable transposition of power, and as a premeditated engine for the destruction of the State governments?"

That was the objection taken by Alexander Hamilton to the interference of the General Government in State elections except so far as was necessary to protect the very existence of the national Government, which required that the national Government should have power to interfere in the choice of Representatives and Senators as to the time, place, and manner of choosing them, leaving the question of the qualifications of the electors wholly to the States. He says:

"The violation of principle in this case required no comment."

What was the principle that would have been violated? It was the principle that an independent republic must necessarily control the question of suffrage in its own elections. This lies at the very foundation of all government, and it is therefore wholly impossible for any State to be an independent republic or an independent government in which the right of suffrage is controlled by an external power, whether by the consent of that State or against its consent. For that reason when it is proposed to amend the Constitution of the United States in this respect it is very questionable whether it is not an amendment which subverts the whole foundation and principle of the Government. Suppose an amendment were offered here to-day proposing that this Government, instead of being a Republic, should be a monarchy; suppose it were proposed to strike out the clause of the Constitution guarantying a republican form of government to each State, and instead of that to insert a guarantee of a monarchy to each State. I do not know that this amendment would not be within the power of Congress to propose. The Constitution provides that Congress may propose such amendments as in its own judgment it shall think best and proper. If a proposition of that kind were made it is very true it might be objected "this goes to the foundation of your Government; this is not amendment; it is revolution, it is subversion." Can that not be said in this instance? Is the proposed amendment any more a fair carrying-out of the intentment of the Constitution when it provides for its own amendment than it would be if it proposed directly to subvert the form of government, if it be true that the right of exercising and controlling the power of suffrage must necessarily exist in a State or it ceases to be a Republic?

Sir, when we view the question in this light it must be acknowledged that it rises far above the question of any mere detail as to suffrage; far higher in importance than the question even of abolishing slavery in the States; far higher than any proposition which has ever been made with regard to the amendment of the Constitution, because it is in its truest sense radical and revolutionary. It strikes at the very root and foundation of the Government; it removes its corner stone, and changes the entire character of the State governments. Nor does it relieve this difficulty at all to say that the interference is not by this amendment perfect and complete; that some shadow of liberty is left to the States to control their own suffrage laws. The proposition submitted by the Committee on the Judiciary provides that no restriction on the right of suffrage shall be made by a State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It may be said that in all other respects the State is left free to prescribe its own restrictions. The first answer to that is that when you once begin to interfere with the right of a State to regulate for itself independently the question of what shall be the qualifications of the voter, you abandon the whole principle. It is not necessary to utterly subvert the power of the State in this respect and make it wholly dependent upon a foreign—and when I use the word "foreign," I mean merely external—power outside of itself. But, sir, in this case it so happens that the very question upon which the public mind has mainly been agitated is the question of the extension of the right of suffrage in respect to race and color—I should say, perhaps, mainly with respect to race. I do not acknowledge that in the State of Connecticut any man is disfranchised merely on account of his color, although the word "white" is used in the Constitution. It is precisely as if it had been said, "none shall vote but those of the white race." That this is so shown by the fact that it excludes negroes and Indians. Certainly the Indian patriarch who once lived in the neighborhood of Norwich had as good a natural right to vote as any imported African, but in the State of Connecticut the right has always been claimed and exercised entirely to control the Indian race; to keep them in a state of tutelage; to refuse them even the power of making a contract, much more the power of governing the State. It was a question of race; it was not merely a question of color.

Although it may be said that in this case the intention is not entirely to deprive the various States of the right to control their own suffrage laws, it so happens that in some of those States most interested, as, for example, the State of Ohio and the State of Connecticut, this is the very question. It is therefore a subterfuge and an evasion to say, "We do not interfere in any other respect," when there is no other respect in which it is possible to interfere, or in regard to which anybody ever proposed to interfere.

Having, as I think, shown the importance of this question, and that it is not merely a question of the qualification of voters, that it is in no sense a mere party question, that it is a question to which a statesman may well apply the best powers of his mind, I think I am safe in saying that a question of that importance, one so vital to the life and actual being and existence of the State governments, ought to be submitted to the people themselves for their action and decision.

It has been said that the proposition is to deprive the people of the respective States of this power of controlling the right of suffrage within their own limits by their own consent, and that therefore their rights are not interfered with. How by their consent? Technically or in fact? I admit that technically this question is proposed to be submitted to the people of this country, but is it in point of fact? Is there any real submission? I beg leave, Mr. President, with all respect, to take your own State as an example, for it so happens that in consequence of the peculiar political character of that State at this moment, the present Legislature of Ohio, if this question were submitted to them, would not perhaps agree with your own sentiment on the subject or with that of a majority of the Congress of the United States. Would it be fair to submit a question of this character to the present Legislature of the State of Ohio? You would not think so if every Legislature had the same sentiments and had been elected a year and a half ago, and was still in existence. I ask any Senator whether it could be said that a Legislature with those sentiments thus elected upon other issues was a fair tribunal to express the sentiments of the people of that State upon a question of this character? It so happens that in other States the members of the Legislature entertain different views. They also were chosen without direct reference to this question. It may even be said that the Legislature of the State of Ohio was chosen with more reference to this question than the Legislatures of other States, because when that Legislature was chosen the question of colored suffrage was pending before the people of the State, and the people actually voted down the proposition by a majority of nearly fifty thousand votes. But notwithstanding that fact, which shows that the subject was under consideration, I still say that I cannot as a Senator declare that I believe it would be fair to submit a proposition of this character to the Legislatures of all the States having the same views as the Legislature of Ohio, chosen a year and a half ago. That, sir, is what you propose to do, because it happens that the Legislatures are in favor of your proposition. Would you do it if they were against it?

A word further as to the question whether this is a submission to the people. When the Constitution was formed provision was made that amendments to it might be submitted to the Legislatures or to conventions in the various States. Of course the intention was that Congress should select and judge as between these forms of submission; but can any man suppose that at that period in the history of our country it was ever supposed that questions of amendments to the Constitution would come to be party questions, submitted with party views, and to a party majority? I do not reproach anybody that that should now be the fact. It is, perhaps, a necessity of the case, and cannot well be otherwise; but when the Constitution was formed there was probably no anticipation of such a state of things, and therefore when it was proposed to submit questions of amendment to Legislatures or conventions the meaning and intent was that the people should have an opportunity to act, that they should at least have an opportunity to elect those Legislatures or those conventions with reference to the consideration of the proposed amendments.

But suppose now you say that this question shall be considered by the Legislatures of the States, and not by conventions. Then, from the very necessity of the case, you must place it before bodies actually chosen by the people before the question was presented. It is impossible, in my judgment, for Congress by any particular phraseology of their submission of the proposition, to prevent an existing Legislature from acting on a question submitted. The Legislature of Ohio chosen two years ago, if this subject is submitted before they go out of existence, have a right to act on it. The Legislature of Connecticut now existing, if the proposition were submitted in season, might be called together by the Governor and act upon it. You cannot prevent it. Therefore it seems to me that it is absolutely essential, in order to get the action of the people on this question, that it should be submitted to bodies to be elected by themselves subsequently, to wit, conventions, because you cannot control the question of submission to the Legislatures.

But I was more particularly upon the point of the technical consideration of this question by the people. I think that the Senate of the United States in a question of this gravity and this importance ought not to stand upon technicalities. They ought not to insist that a mere submission de jure shall be sufficient when there is no submission and can necessarily be no submission de facto, and there are peculiar reasons in the present case why such a submission should not be insisted upon.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] said yesterday that he had no doubt that the Republican party had lost, I think he said, seven hundred and fifty thousand votes by this question of colored suffrage. I will not contend with him as to the number of votes they may have gained or lost, but I cannot but think as he said, that that possibly was a reason why under his guidance and control and that of other distinguished Senators the Chicago Republican national convention not only ignored this question, but actually declared a doctrine utterly in opposition to this proposed amendment. That convention assembled last spring in Chicago. They were compelled to meet this question. It was one of those questions which could not be avoided. It would not do to say that suffrage should be granted in accordance with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, as they said the debt should be paid in accordance with the letter and spirit of the law. They were obliged to say something definite. It was true they could not satisfy my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] nor the Anti-Slavery Standard. In that paper their course was very severely condemned, and I suppose my friend from Massachusetts would condemn it. But what did they say? Their resolution on this subject was read yesterday by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS.] I will dwell upon it but for a single moment. This is the Chicago resolution:

"The guarantee by Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained."

That is explicit. So much was to be done by act of Congress. The resolution then proceeds:

"While the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States."

The honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] attempted to show that the true intent and meaning of this was that the subject should be left to the people of the States by a constitutional amendment. Why, sir, if he will look at this resolution for a single moment he will see that it makes a distinction which the proposed amendment to the Constitution does not make and cannot make between the several States. There was to be one mode of action as to the southern States and one mode as to the northern States. Can you do that by a constitutional amendment? The fact that the two are separated and divided conclusively proves that the convention had in view a different mode as to the two. Congress was to interfere as to the one, the people of the northern States were to regulate as to the other. The people of all the States? By no means. The people of the States interested—the loyal States—had preserved their powers and rights inviolate, whereas the southern States had sacrificed theirs by rebellion, and it was therefore necessary for the General Government to interfere in their case. That was the plain meaning.

This is conclusive against the construction given to it by those who say that the object and end of the resolution was that Congress should propose an amendment to the Constitution of the United States by which the people might regulate it, for that amendment must include the whole country and cannot include merely a part of the States.

How was it understood in point of fact? I did not share very largely in the discussions during the last canvass, although I had very firm and decided convictions with regard to what ought to be done. In the discussions before the people in all the northern States the ground was taken by all the orators of the Republican party, almost without exception, that the question of suffrage was to be left to the States for their separate action. The honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who had the kindness to send me his able speech; the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] who did me the same favor; and other Senators, with the exception of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER]—every one of their great orators before the people in that exciting canvass took the ground that this question was to be left to the States in their separate State action, and if any constitutional amendment was to be made it was to be an amendment to the State constitutions made by the people of the respective States. I have some indistinct recollection that my colleague took the same ground. At any rate it was never claimed anywhere, in any newspaper from the New York Tribune down to the humblest organ of the party, that the intent and meaning of the resolution to which I have referred was that Congress at this session should propose a constitutional amendment to Legislatures chosen in November last. Why, sir, if it had been so your Legislatures would have been of a very different character, in my humble judgment.

Therefore I say that not only from the importance of this question as subverting the character of the Government, but also from the pledged faith of the great Republican party, acting in solemn council, declaring and promulgating its principles, stating to the people what would be its action in case it should receive a renewal of their confidence—in view of all this, I say that this Republican party is bound in solemn honor, at least, to submit this question, in fact, to the people; to give them an opportunity to be heard upon the subject. Your convention, at least, said that it should be left to the people of the States. If you say now that you meant by "people" existing Legislatures, or Legislatures to be chosen on the day when General Grant was chosen, do you suppose that if this had been so understood the result would have been precisely what it was? I do not speak of party results; but would legislators have been chosen, precisely such as were chosen, if the people had supposed that the great question of the right of the States to continue their existence as independent republics was to be decided—a question far greater than the question whether a negro or a Chinaman shall vote?

I say, then, in solemn honor you are bound, and you cannot, as men of honor and of character, refuse to submit the question to the actual, genuine sense of the people, nor can you hide yourselves safely and honorably behind technicalities, and say that when the question is submitted to the Legislatures already chosen it is presumed to be submitted to the people.

Sir, I do not wish to bring railing accusations against the leaders of the Republican party, but I beg leave to suppose a case. I beg leave to suppose that the Democratic party in national convention had pledged itself by a solemn resolution to carry out a certain line of policy; that upon that line of policy it had succeeded in carrying the popular vote, and had elected the honorable candidate for whom its members voted to the office of President of the United States. Suppose, for example, the pledge had been on the question of the national debt and the Democratic party had resolved in solemn convention that the debt should be paid in gold, and upon that pledge of their faith and honor the confiding people of the country, not believing it possible that a great party, an honored party, a party which had inherited the glory and the fame of Jefferson and Madison and Jackson, could violate its pledged word, and in that confidence had elected a President and a Congress and State Legislatures in accordance with the views of the Democratic party; suppose they had met here to-day in the Senate of the United States, controlling it by more than a two-thirds vote, and controlling also the House of Representatives, and in violation of their pledge had passed a resolution repudiating the public debt. What would be said of them? Does it require a very great stretch of imagination to suppose that the leaders of a party who had thus violated their honor would have been held up to popular scorn and indignation; that they would have been stamped with infamy as violators of faith, as having obtained power by false pretenses, and that the leaders who devised and suggested such a palpable breach of faith would have been expelled by the common sentiment of mankind from the association of honest and honorable gentlemen throughout the world? Nor would any quibbling gloss or subtlety of interpretation by the leaders of the Democratic party, by which the words of the pledge were claimed to be complied with while its true spirit and meaning were violated, render the proceeding any the less contemptible, any the less worthy of the detestation of honest men.

Sir, I have supposed the Democratic party to have been guilty of such an outrage. Mutate nomine, de te fabula narratur.

"Change but the name
Of thee the tale is told."

Or in another form, more scriptural, "Thou art the man." Now, sir, in saying this I do not mean to say that the leaders of the Republican party, as individuals, intend to violate their pledges any more than I should be willing to believe the Democratic party capable of such an outrage. They scorn to violate any, the slightest implication, by which their honor is involved and pledged in private life; and so I trust they will do in public life. I would not be so offensive as even to suppose that the party in power would ever by any possibility violate knowingly and intentionally a pledge they had made to the whole people in their party platform; and still, Senators, this is the brink of the precipice upon which, in my judgment, you stand, if you refuse to submit this question in honor and in good faith to the actual vote of the people of the United States.

I think I may say more. I think you are pledged not to attempt to amend the Constitution of the United States on the question of suffrage in the States, but to leave it to the people of the States to amend, if they see fit, their own State constitutions. That is my belief as to the meaning of this resolution; but without insisting on this extreme view of the case, I only now say that you are at least under obligations to give the people an opportunity to say whether or not they are willing, by the adoption of this amendment, to subvert their old form of government and become subject provinces to an external power. There is no possible mode by which you can give them this opportunity except by submitting the question of the ratification of the amendment to conventions of the people, as proposed in the amendment which I shall offer.

Mr. President, I have already said that the question before the Senate is not merely a question of suffrage, but that it goes to the very foundation of republican government and strikes at the power of the States to determine and establish, each for itself, the qualification of its own voters. It is important to bear in mind this distinction. There are in the State of Connecticut, and doubtless in all the States, many who are in favor of universal suffrage without distinction of race or color, who yet cling to the right of each State to decide as to the qualifications of its own voters. The pending constitutional amendment proposes to transfer this power from the States to the General Government by the consent of three-fourths of the States; but the character of the Government is no less changed by this mode of effecting the alteration than if it were done by act of Congress. All the States will not consent to the change, and those States which do not thus consent will be deprived by external power of the essential characteristic of self-government as completely as if the change were made by a mere law of Congress.

Furthermore, those States which consent to the amendment are merely the artificers of their own ruin as communities entitled to local self-government. They destroy freely and voluntarily, but yet they not the less destroy their character as independent States of this Union. Even the consent of a State, however freely rendered, would not prevent the necessary consequence, namely, the loss of the vital and essential element of self-government, consisting in the power of deciding freely, independently, and without appeal upon the qualifications of voters. Therefore it will be found that many advocates of negro suffrage will condemn and oppose this attempt to overthrow the State governments and reduce them to utter insignificance by the establishment of the principle involved in this amendment. They are unwilling to see the ancient Commonwealths which won our national independence and formed our national Government, together with their younger sisters who fill up the number of our United States, reduced from the proud position of independent, self-governing republics to the humble and helpless condition of subject provinces whose people exercise the right of suffrage under conditions and regulations imposed by a central power.

For myself I can speak only for Connecticut. For a brief period I may still speak for her in this Senate Chamber; and for her and her people I protest against this proposal to strip her of the distinguishing badge of her sovereignty, the chief remaining sign and evidence that she is still the proud republic which she has been for more than two hundred years, and I trust for untold centuries will continue to be. In her own good time and by her own will and pleasure she may, when she sees fit, extend, as she has heretofore, in the exercise of her undoubted and unquestioned right seen fit to deny, to the colored race the right of suffrage; meanwhile she inflicts on that race no wrong. If her constitution forbids their voting, her statutes also exempt them from all taxation. It is possible that she would sooner or later, if left to the exercise of her own generous and just convictions of duty, in view of the general enfranchisement of the black race, extend the same privilege to her own colored population, but I think I may safely say that her people will not willingly consent that her ancient laws on this subject shall be altered by the action of other States. Whatever she does in this regard she must do voluntarily and freely. When she acts she must grant, or at least acknowledge and confer, a privilege; not like a galley-slave, be scourged to the performance of a neglected duty. For myself, I cannot conceive how any true son of Connecticut who cherishes her stainless honor and high renown, and feels a just pride in her illustrious history, can consent that she should be compelled by the action of any external power to strike from her constitution provisions relating to suffrage which she has deliberately established and persistently maintained. I trust no such humiliation is in store for that proud and patriotic State. Now, as ever, she is proverbial for her spirit of independence and for her unyielding resolution to manage her domestic affairs, civil and religious, in her own way.

"For still her gray rocks tower above the sea
That crouches at her feet, a conquered wave.
'Tis a rough land, of earth, and stone, and tree,
Where breathes no castled lord or cabled slave,
Where thoughts, and tongues, and hands, are bold and free,
And friends will find a welcome, foes a grave;
And where none kneel save when to heaven they pray,
Nor even then, unless in their own way."

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, I desire to have read for the information of the Senate, it not being strictly in order at this moment, an amendment which I shall propose at the proper time to this pending question before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read if there be no objection.

There being no objection; the Chief Clerk read the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. POMEROY, as follows:

"Strike out, in lines fourteen and fifteen, the words 'on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude,' and in lieu thereof insert 'for any reasons not equally applicable to all citizens of the United States'; so as to read:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote and hold offices shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State for any reasons not equally applicable to all citizens of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. With the permission of the Senator from Kansas, I will ask to have the amendment reported by the Committee on Representative Reform read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Relating to this subject?

Mr. MORTON. The amendment was submitted yesterday to that committee by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the resolution so as to make it read:

That the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and the said articles, or either of them, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, namely:

And then to add as a new article:

ARTICLE 16. The second clause, first section, second article of the Constitution of the United States shall be amended to read as follows: "Each State shall appoint, by a vote of the people thereof qualified to vote for Representatives in Congress, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector; and the Congress shall have power to prescribe the manner in which such electors shall be chosen by the people."

Mr. POMEROY. Mr. President, during the discussion of this question yesterday the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] made use of the following words, as reported in the Globe:

"There is not to-day a square mile in the United States where the advocacy of the equal rights and privileges of those colored men has not been in the past and is not now unpopular."

And then he goes on to say that on every square mile the Republican party lost votes by its advanced views upon the question of equal rights. I only desire to reply to that in a word, as I did not have an opportunity then, that that is only one side-view of this question. Let it be known in this country that the Republican party have abandoned the cause of the rights of man, of the rights of the colored men of this country, and instead of losing a few thousand votes, as the Senator from Massachusetts intimated, I apprehend that the party itself would not be worth preserving. The strength of the Republican party consists in its adherence to principle, and to that embodiment of its principles, equality of rights among men. Without that, I repeat, there would be no motive to sustain the party, and the party would not be worth sustaining. It is, to my mind, all that makes it valuable. It was that for which it was organized; and instead of being a source of weakness it is, in my opinion, a source of strength and power.

But I have had read the amendment which I propose to offer to the present constitutional amendment for the purpose of discussing this question still further. My amendment provides that no State nor the United States shall make any inequalities that are not equally applicable to all citizens. If you want a condition of intelligence, of education, of any quality that applies equally to all, it can be adopted by the States under the amendment that I have proposed. I shall now take it upon me in a few brief words to demonstrate the proposition that inequality of rights secured in either constitution or law is a source of weakness.

Mr. President, by this amendment I mean something more than an hour's delay in the passage of this joint resolution. To delay it is no pleasure to me; I am but too anxious for it to become part of the fundamental law. And I would not support this amendment to the amendment but from the conviction I entertain that the Constitution will be incomplete without it. Indeed, I hold it will be radically defective without this amendment. The great error of the past, when the Constitution was formed, grew out of inequalities among men, as it respects their rights. It has been the contest of the century, and it finally culminated in a legal dogma, pronounced some years ago by one of the justices of the Supreme Court, that one class had no rights which the other was bound to respect. To deprive a citizen of any one right will tend to produce the extinction of all. And the right to take the least prepares, if not justifies, the way to take the whole. I know Senators are in haste to pass this resolution, but the opportunity does not often occur to amend the organic law of a nation. It may not come to us again in a lifetime, and what is worth doing at all is worth doing well and right. I approach this question filled with distrust and some misgivings, knowing as I do that the views I entertain are not accepted and adopted as the accredited principles of the majority of this Senate with whom I act. But upon questions of private judgment and personal belief we are accustomed to extend the greatest liberality and to exercise that "charity which vaunteth not itself" and "is not puffed up" with immaculate self-conceit, but "beareth all things" and "never faileth." For the exercise of that charity I plead. To an attractive entertainment I cannot invite you without premonitions of sure disappointment. A plain and honest effort to set forth the truth in faithfulness and with candor is all that I shall aspire to.

The fathers who framed our Constitution "sowed to the wind" when they admitted into that instrument the shadow of the substance, afterward claimed, that there could be a class of persons of which it would take five to make three of the average representative weight. And in our day and time "we reaped the whirlwind." I know they were not called slaves, but it matters not so much what a thing is called as what it means. It meant that they were to be held, each one, as but three fifths of a man for the purposes of representation. And that was the first inequality admitted into that immortal instrument which had on its title page those glorious words, radiant with light and promise to the lowly and oppressed:

"That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

This was a monstrous inconsistency, which has marred the beauty of that instrument as well as the peace and honor of the country for a hundred years.

Now, Mr. President, I do not want to strike upon such a rock again. We have hauled up the old ark of the Constitution for repairs, and I want above all other things to secure it against the possibility of the admission that there can be inequalities of rights among citizens. It matters not in what those inequalities consist; if they relate to and impair the rights of the citizen, even the poorest and the weakest, they are fatal and destructive to the safety and peace of the Government and to its character as a model of republicanism to the world, and also to the well-being of those whose rights are destroyed or abridged. Amend the Constitution to-day and leave in the possibility of the rights of any of our citizens being insecure or destroyed or neglected, and you have perfected nothing. A contest will go on until we or some more faithful men who come after us shall complete the work neglected at this moment by us.

The work of reorganization, made a necessity by the war, cannot be perfected throughout the nation with the rights of any citizen imperfectly or partially secured. Complete justice, fairly secured equally to all, is the highest expediency and the only safety; and, thank God, "to that complexion it must come at last." The period of the surrender of Lee and Johnston, terminating the existence of armed rebellion in this country, and the months following the assassination of President Lincoln, will evermore be held sacred, as it opened the era of reconstruction, not in the South alone, but throughout the North and the West. Having pulled down by fire and sword, by law and Constitution, it became a necessity to build up. The States having been disorganized and their governments overthrown, it was a work of no ordinary magnitude to "build again the old waste places" and to "lay the foundations of many generations." The demoralization which led to disorganization grew out of a false conception of the rights and duties of the citizen, and injustice, organized into the Government and sustained as a system, soon worked its overthrow.

Gathering lessons from the past, it now becomes a most solemn duty to inquire how to lay the foundations of a government that will stand securely both as against its dissatisfied citizens within and its jealous and opposing enemies from without. To give strength and character to any form of government there must be entire fairness and equality among all its citizens subject to it. Injustice framed into law or put into the Constitution is destined to work its overthrow. You can make an edifice of granite and marble stand upon the drifting sand sooner and better than you can found and maintain a Government whose foundations are not laid securely in impartial justice and in an equality of rights, obligations, and duties where the conditions are equal.

The framers of our form of republican government copied after no model. Indeed, there was no precedent in history, ancient or modern, for the American form of republican government. One thing, from their long and bitter experience, the fathers surely intended to avoid, namely, placing the power of this Government into the hands of one man or one class of men, be it president, king, or cabinet. Indeed, this Government was ordained by and for the people:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, secure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, and to promote the general welfare, &c., do ordain and establish this Constitution and Government."

The power of a Government must rest somewhere. And it became a most serious question where and who should be regarded as the safest depository of political power. The fathers said "the people," and all the people. If the few are safer than the many, then the fewer the better. And why not let the divine right of kings and cabinets be at once established, so that the work of the fathers upon this continent may speedily come to an end? But if the people are safer to guard the precious trust of government than any mere individuals, why not all the people? Why trust a part sooner than the whole? The safety of a Government, I apprehend, lies in the patriotism, loyalty, virtue, and love of man, as well as of God, in the hearts of the people. This is not alone found in schools or books or in men alone of family name and descent.

The safety of a good Government is secured when it rests near to the hearts of good men and women—the people—whether wise or unwise, whether learned or unlearned, in books or schools. The very instinct of virtue and a love of human kind, binding indissolubly the citizen in the one bond of equality of rights, where liberty is secured in the law and the law made, upheld, and executed by the citizen, now forms and cements to some extent this national Government, which will tower in its magnificence and stand forever, provided that in this work of reconstruction we allow no injustice, no inequality among citizens, no proscription of rights, either civil or political.

It is worthy of an inquiry here, and without proceeding further, who are the citizens under our Government entitled to the high prerogative of forming and upholding the civil Government? I answer in the language of the fundamental law, article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, section one:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, shall be citizens, &c., and no State shall make any law abridging the rights of citizens."

The citizens, then, of the United States are the body-politic, possessing the power of the Government and alone the basis of its strength and power. We might inquire, if the question admitted of doubt, whether it is a source of weakness or strength in a Government ordained like ours to make inequalities among her citizens who have forfeited no rights and been convicted of no crime.

The irresistible tendency of modern civilization is in the direction of the extension of the right of suffrage, and not at all toward proscription. The day when a few men did the voting and governing for the many has gone by. Seven hundred thousand colored men were enfranchised in a day, and they have not disappointed the reasonable expectations which were entertained by them. They were unlearned and, for the most part, ignorant men. But instinct is wiser than logic. The negro has blended and is lost sight of in the man. Manhood suffrage is now held to be the native and the inherent right of every male citizen of a prescribed age; and some there are who claim the enfranchisement of negro and rebel together. But is there no injustice in completing the work of reconstruction upon such a basis? Are not the men and the women citizens of the Republic alike? And how can there be in a just Government an equality of citizens with a proscription of rights? I mean, of any of their rights:

"For whatever link you strike from Nature's chain, Tenth or ten thousandth, you break the chain alike."

And as the strength of a chain is only equal to the weakest link, so the strength of this Government is tested, to failure when any of its links are sundered and alienated. Any man who supposes that you can disfranchise any innocent citizen, with the lights of the past blazing in his face, has become blind, and will not or cannot read the lessons of experience. The ballot is its own instructor. It is an educator. It teaches, and it speaks a language, and that for human rights. It is the great vindicator and protector of individual and personal, no less than of national honor and character. But human nature, claiming its rights, has no sex; the mind and the soul have no gender, and there is no blending of the responsibility of one citizen into that of another. Sir, the criminal for himself or herself goes alone to dungeon or scaffold. To his own master he standeth, falleth; and by no ingenuity or contrivance can the responsibility of one citizen be shifted upon the shoulders of another. In the primary and individual capacity must each speak, vote, pray, believe, love, hate, live, and die for himself or herself alone. Stamped upon every soul is an individual character and individual responsibilities which can neither be laid aside nor transferred to another. In this respect no one can have a representative character. In this ordeal each one stands for himself, and no one for another. These are the duties of this life which cannot be discharged by proxy. You are your own free agent, but you have no power of substitution, and it cannot be delegated. These are duties pertaining to one's self alone, and it is monstrous to talk of one person voting or representing another in the unorganized and primary state. As well may he live another's life, or die another's death.

I now propose to speak of what I consider to be the essential matter in the proposition to extend or regulate the elective franchise in our Government. I prefer, on the whole, to do this by an amendment to the Constitution rather than by a congressional enactment, even if the question of the power of Congress was admitted, because the fundamental law is the place to rest the question of fundamental rights, and when put into the Constitution it is beyond the reach of party legislation and removed from party politics. Unlike a law, it is unrepeatable.

Now, if this question of suffrage is to be settled, and settled by the law of the Constitution, it is of the highest importance that it be settled upon the right basis and upon one entirely in harmony with the genius and spirit of our Government and institutions. I only claim the logical sequence of our political organization. All other Governments save ours have their privileged men or classes and their unprivileged; some are citizens, others are mere subjects; one class control public affairs, the other bear its burdens with voices silenced. But in this Government, ordained by the people, the citizens, their right to administer it should not be questioned. And how can this Government be administered but by the ballot? Laws are made and executed by the representatives of the ballot. An elective officer is but a consolidated ballot; one person exercising the voice and will of many.

And how did the citizen obtain this power in our Government, or how was it exercised by one class and denied to others? Citizenship was not obtained by colonial charters, for then would their rights have perished with the charters themselves; not by any hereditary right or title, for all such were forbidden in the Constitution; not by successfully wielding the sword in battle, for then would it have been confined to warriors alone. How, then, was it obtained? I answer: it was given in the fundamental law when the Government was ordained for "all men" who are possessed of the "inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." And the word "men" is as comprehensive as the word "people," for they all had the same title to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The right of self-government springs from the consent of the governed, and there can be no just mind that will consent that a part shall exercise the will of the whole. Such an act would be a palpable usurpation of power and only one step removed from the right of a king or despot to rule; because if you desert the principle of equality of rights and circumscribe them to a part, that principle would not be violated if you proscribed still more and lodged the power finally in one man. And if by virtue of citizenship all are not entitled to the ballot as the source of power and rights, then none are; for power to deprive one extended would deprive all; and if you admit the existence of the power, you must not deny its exercise to any extent.

I now come to this point to say that to deprive any citizen of the right of suffrage is a violation of the principles of our Government as it was ordained, and is a blow direct at the Government itself. I have studied this form of government to no purpose if its logic does not lead me to universal and impartial suffrage. The Constitution places all the powers of the Government in the people who ordained it, (and it resided in them in any event;) but while they delegated the exercise of certain powers to departments, State and national, still they held the reins of modification of all that was delegated, and provided for the exercise of that right. Hence it is that I can say that this is not only no "white man's Government," but it is no male Government; and it is a historical fact that in the early days of our history both colored men and white women were admitted to the ballot upon precisely the same terms as white men. This was done in some instances, but their number being few does not affect the principle. If you admit but one woman to vote or one negro it is a confession that there is no legal bar to all.

Citizenship is of birthright or of choice in our form of government, and the ballot is one of the rights admitted, ay, conceded, and cannot be conferred. Who gave any class the right to monopolize the elective franchise? If a majority, however large, can strike down one right not forfeited then they can another, and hence, as I have said, all. So that if you admit the doctrine of legal disfranchisement you cannot stop short of admitting that the power exists to strike down all rights. It may be said this will allow not only but require that minors and even children should be entitled to vote. To this I reply that a right may exist where the person is not entitled to the exercise of the right until a prescribed period. A child is entitled to the right of walking, marrying, and inheriting property; still it must wait for development to exercise that right. When we become members of society under an organized form we consent to the regulation of the exercise of our rights, but not to their extinction.

I will cheerfully comply with all regulations respecting the time, manner, and place of voting, as well as the age and residence required, when made equally applicable to all citizens; but a man who will not resist a law of disfranchisement has lost the spirit of his manhood. Such a one deserves to have no rights if he dare not maintain them. The citizen who will tamely submit to one robbery will soon be prepared to welcome all. When you have taken away the ballot you have left nothing secure.

Do not tell me that the rights of one class of citizens are safe in the hands of another, that the men will take care of the rights of the women. The rights of individuals allied to you may be or may not be safe, but of a class they never can be.

The property and character of your own wife and child may be safe in the hands of the husband and father; but would you trust the property and character of all other women and children in his hands? There are instances where one man may safely speak, vote, and act for a whole community; but would you organize and administer a government upon such a theory? Anything short of entire enfranchisement is as destructive of the theory of our Government as it is dangerous and destructive of individual rights. When one right is destroyed the way is prepared to lose all. I would urge all citizens, by all that is valuable in liberty and desirable in the pursuit of happiness, to maintain and demand that equality of rights and those means of their defense which to a free man are better than an army with banners. I urge it by all that is valuable in a republican form of Government and by all that is dear to human life under it. Citizens who will submit to disfranchisement tamely deserve their fate, no matter whether they be men or women; and the men who demand it and deny the ballot are only one step removed from tyrants. As I would not be a slave, so I would not make a slave; and the man who would do or be either under our form of government does not merit the condition of a freeman. "He ought," as it has been said, "with garters, ribbons, and stars upon him, to be bolted with a golden chain to the blazing pavement of some palace court yard, that when his lord and master goes out to hunt of beasts or men he may be there—the slave—to crouch down and let his majesty vault from his shoulders to the saddle," for he does not deserve to breathe the pure air nor to drink the cool springs of a free country. He ought to live where darkness curtains the heavens, and frosts and winter enchain the earth! Thenceforth and forever let him dwell where man is not honored nor woman loved!

But I maintain and defend the right of the ballot to be in the hands of the citizen by virtue of his manhood and not of sex. It was man who was created a "little lower than angels," and not males! "In the image of God created He him," "but male and female created He them;" "and He called their name Adam." It is said, "I will destroy man," not males, "from off the face of the earth," by a deluge. But seven souls were saved that the generations of men might live upon the earth, and by men is meant mankind, and of this one blood are all the nations; and these nationalized here have a right to all that inherits to a free American citizen. These rights, I repeat, inhere to his manhood and are as inalienable as his immortality. I care not if he may have come to us from the center of dark, fettered Asia, from the plains of long-abused Africa, from the snows of Siberia or the heat of the tropics, he is a man, and hence a brother, entitled to all the rights that are inalienable in man and to all he can possess and attain by the honest labor of his hands or by the powers of his mind.

In this work of reorganizing States we should look North and West as well as South. The robbery of the ballot for men—I mean male citizens—is perpetrated now in more than half of what are called the loyal States, and the prejudice of caste, of race, and color, that child of the devil, is rampant in all the States. This reconstruction should now begin in the fundamental law, and be applied to all the States and extend through all departments of the national Government and then the State governments, and through society at large, the schools and churches, and through politics and religion. Let this country in this way elevate humanity and honor God.

I trust this nation has been founded, and of late preserved from dissolution, for high and noble ends. It is the only free Government on the earth that is expanding and growing with reasonable hope of being indissoluble and perpetual. Since it was founded other nations have been going to decay or changing their form. No sooner was our national authority established and vindicated than the imperial form of government, which in the hour of our trial undertook to subdue a foothold in the republic of Mexico, subsided and retired. And, as never before, can we say this land shall be an asylum for the oppressed of all nations who are longing and struggling to break the links of steel which enchain them. But our superiority over other nations is lost if we perpetuate in the Constitution cruel inequalities of rights among the citizens of the Republic. All that make other Governments oppressive and hateful is the proscription and inequality among their citizens. And what right have we to go counter to the tendencies of the highest civilization of this age, to the lessons of history, and to the voice of passing events now being pressed upon our attention. The Constitution is to-day under our molding hand. As the wax to the seal, the impress given to it by Congress in this amendment will remain as its permanent character for the years to come. We ought to despise ourselves, as we shall be despised in history, if we fail to meet this emergency by an adequate and liberal amendment to the Constitution which shall secure to posterity what the fathers thought they had "ordained" one hundred years ago. The Government then elevated to citizenship three million people, and ten years ago thirty millions, and to-day nearly forty millions; and yet it is not clearly defined by the law of the Constitution that all the citizens have and shall have the power in their own hands to maintain and defend those inherent rights to preserve which "Governments were ordained" among men.

I ask the ballot for woman, not on account of her weakness or on account of her strength; not because she may be above or below a man; that has nothing to do with the question. I ask it because she is a citizen of the Republic, amenable to its laws, taxed for its support, and a sharer in its destiny. There are no reasons for giving the ballot to a man that do not apply to a woman with equal force. She may use it or neglect it, as many men do; still it should be hers whenever she chooses to exercise the right. This would tend to its elevation and purification; for when the sacredness of the ballot is preserved it would not soil a woman's heart, hand, or dress, or the place of voting any more than when she uses the Bible and the prayer-book in the congregation of humble worshippers. In all the walks of life, retired or public, she adds grace, elegance, and purity to every step of her pathway, to every work of her hand, and to every love of her heart. I am for the enfranchisement fully and without restrictions of every man in the land who has the rights and discharges faithfully the duties of a citizen of the Republic, no matter how depressed or oppressed he may have been. The way of his elevation is by the way of the ballot, and that should be as fixed and as settled as the fundamental law itself. But I would put in the form of law precisely the same provision for every woman in the land; for it is as safe in her hands as in his; it will be used with as much intelligence and with as good results. And besides all that, the distinctive character of our republican Government on the basis of the original design can be perpetuated in no other way. The highest justice is the only safety. Let it come, then, by one comprehensive amendment striking out all inequalities among citizens, and the dream of the fathers of a free and pure Republic shall be realized, and there shall be peace throughout the land and good will among men.

Mr. President, when John Stuart Mill unrolled his petition in the British Parliament a few years since it was found to bear the names of those English men and women whose very thoughts were an inspiration to the civilization of the age. It asked for the enfranchisement of woman, and, upon a vote taken, seventy-three members voted for it. Thousands of our own countrymen and women have passed their petitions to the bar of this Senate, through me, that woman might have the ballot in this Government of the people; and in obedience to their ten thousand voices I ask a vote upon my amendment, and I shall move at a proper time a call for the yeas and nays upon it. I leave the wisdom of this vote to the judgment of history, and will cheerfully meet the verdict of posterity.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I desire to speak for a few minutes on the amendment reported this morning from the Committee on Representative Reform, which we hope to have considered in connection with the report from the Committee on the Judiciary. I will ask the Secretary now to read the amendment proposed.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ART. 16. The second clause, first section, second article of the Constitution of the United States shall be amended to read as follows: "Each State shall appoint, by a vote of the people thereof qualified to vote for Representatives in Congress, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress; but no Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector; and the Congress shall have power to prescribe the manner in which said electors shall be chosen by the people."

Mr. MORTON. As the Constitution now stands the mode of choosing a President is left entirely to the Legislatures of the several States. The fact that the people vote for President and Vice President is not derived from the Constitution of the United States, but from the action of various State Legislatures. The Constitution provides that—

"Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the same may be entitled in the Congress."

I believe the State of South Carolina from the time of the formation of the Constitution up to the rebellion selected electors by the Legislature. The question of the election of President and Vice President was never submitted to the people of that State; and what was done in the State of South Carolina may be done in any State in the Union. It is always in the power of a State Legislature, just in advance of a Presidential election, to repeal the State law by which the people are called upon to vote for President and Vice President, and by the Legislature itself to choose the electors who shall cast the vote of that State in the Electoral College. I think that there cannot be two opinions now upon the question that this is a blemish and a defect in the national Constitution. The election of a President and Vice President should be referred to the people.

It is proposed by this amendment that the people of each State shall appoint the electors, and that the Congress may determine the manner in which these electors shall be appointed. The effect of this amendment is to take away from the Legislatures of the several States the great power which they now have, and which may under certain circumstances be a most dangerous power, and which might bring on civil war and revolution where a Legislature, finding itself in a minority, and unwilling that the people of the State shall vote directly for President and Vice President, may, as it has the power now, repeal the law by which the people can vote at all for these officers and select electors who shall cast the vote of that State. In the desperation of party and in the contingencies of politics such a great power as this should not be left to the Legislature of any State; and while we are engaged in the business of amending the Constitution we should now provide that the people of the several States shall themselves appoint these electors, and that the power shall not be left in the hands of the Legislatures. The concluding portion of the amendment is in these words:

"And the Congress shall have power to prescribe the manner in which such electors shall be chosen by the people."

This does not require Congress in the first instance to prescribe the manner in which these electors shall be chosen by the people, but gives to Congress the right to do it if it shall see proper to do so. I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that that provision of this amendment is in substance the same power which Congress now has to provide the means by which Representatives shall be chosen by the people. I will read that clause of the Constitution:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

In other words, Congress now has the power, so far as Representatives are concerned, to provide the times, places, and manner of holding elections; and this amendment gives to Congress the power to prescribe the manner in which the people shall choose these electors; so that the power proposed to be conferred upon Congress in regard to presidential electors is substantially the same that Congress now has in regard to the choice of Representatives by the people.

I make this explanation with a view to a remark made perhaps by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] yesterday upon that point. The committee carefully examined and compared the two powers, and we think they are precisely the same, although the words are not the same. The phraseology in the amendment proposed by the committee I think is better than that which exists in the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution in regard to Representatives. This, Mr. President, is all I have to say in regard to this amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senator from Indiana whether the committee's attention in examining this subject was called to the question whether under the fourth section of the first article, giving Congress the power of prescribing the manner of holding elections of Representatives, Congress has or has not the right to make a registry law regulating the election of Representatives?

Mr. MORTON. Well, sir, I should think, off hand, that Congress had.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I agree with the Senator as to that, and that is a subject which may be of importance.

Mr. MORTON. And I think under the amendment presented Congress, having the right to prescribe the manner in which electors shall be chosen by the people, would have the right to provide for a registry law for the choice of electors; in other words, I think the two powers are substantially the same, although the language is different.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President—
Mr. DIXON. Will my colleague allow me to offer the amendment of which I gave notice?

Mr. FERRY. Certainly.
Mr. DIXON. I move to amend the recital in the proposed amendment by striking out the words "the Legislatures of" and inserting the words "conventions in," and also where the word "Legislatures" occurs in the second place to insert the word "conventions" in lieu of it. I find that the Constitution merely refers to "conventions." When the Constitution was first submitted for ratification it was submitted by the seventh article to conventions, not saying how they should be chosen, implying of course that they should be chosen by the laws of the State. I do not think it is necessary to provide how they shall be chosen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was in line four to strike out the words "the Legislatures of," and to insert "conventions in;" and in line six to strike out the word "Legislatures" and insert "conventions;" so that the joint resolution will read:

That the following article be proposed to conventions in the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said conventions, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, &c.

Mr. DIXON. When the vote is taken on that amendment I wish it to be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I am in favor of the principle both of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana and of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut as abstract propositions; but I will not vote for them at this time in this assembly. If the State of Kentucky was excluded by force and violence from representation in the Senate of the United States I should deem that the whole residue of the Senate would not have the constitutional right to propose an amendment to the Constitution. Well, sir, there are three States in the Union that are as much entitled to representation at this time in the Senate as any State that is represented in it that are violently and by force excluded from representation in the Senate—Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How about Georgia?

Mr. DAVIS. The case is worse in relation to Georgia, because she is represented in the House of Representatives, and the extraordinary anomaly of her exclusion from representation in the Senate is presented. Was there ever such a condition of things in the world in a deliberative assembly that represented the power of a regular and well-organized Government?

I will state what I understand to be the principle of the Constitution in relation to amendment, and I ask the attention of the honorable Senator from Kansas for one moment to the proposition. The great leading idea of the amendment which he proposes is, that no citizen of the United States should have any right whatever that every other citizen is not entitled to share. Do I understand the honorable gentleman's idea?

Mr. POMEROY. My idea is that civil and political rights belong to all citizens alike; I do not mean the rights of private property.

Mr. DAVIS. We understand each other. Now, I lay down the proposition with more distinctness, with more truth and philosophy than the honorable Senator's proposition, that every State in the Union is entitled under our Constitution to all the rights and privileges that any or every other State is entitled to. Here is the State of Virginia, with all her illustrious history and with all of her revolutionary reminiscences, excluded by force and violence from her just representation in the Senate of the United States. Here is the State of Mississippi in the same predicament. Here is the State of Texas in a like predicament. Here is the State of Georgia in a sort of hybrid condition, neither flesh nor fowl, neither fish nor bird, fully represented, I believe, in the other branch of Congress and without a voice in this assembly of the conscript fathers of the nation; and in this condition of things the Senate of the United States undertakes the burlesque of gravely amending the Constitution of the United States!

Sir, I say it is not competent for the Senate of the United States to act in this state of its organization upon a proposed amendment to the Constitution. It is a mockery. If there was communication between the other world and this, or with the ashes of the illustrious dead who have been so long since borne to their graves, the enormity of such a proposition would be enough to reanimate their ashes and to make their illustrious persons turn over in their tombs. Is the extravagance of this day and generation of ours to have no bounds? I ask you, Mr. President, (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair,) an advocate of all these anomalous and revolutionary movements, by what authority can the Senate of the United States proceed to propose amendments to the Constitution excluding the State of Georgia from her representation in the Senate? I put it stronger than that: what right has this Senate or this Congress to exclude the other three States that I have named from their representation in the two Houses of Congress, and to undertake the most important function of Government in the United States; and that is, to alter the fundamental law in their absence?

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, I will state that what I said was that the equality of citizens not convicted of crime was the same, and so of the equality of the States. If they have been faithful in their relations to the Government they are entitled to perfect equality. They may have forfeited it, as the citizen may, by crime.

Mr. DAVIS. Where is the law of forfeiture, I will ask the honorable Senator? Read it. Let us know the law of forfeiture.

Mr. POMEROY. It consists in the relation that one State bears to another.

Mr. DAVIS. And who is to judge of that relation? Where is the tribunal to decide it? What legal or constitutional sanction has it? How do you get it into court? How do you prepare the action that involves that question? How do you have that action decided? What is the power to render judgment upon that question of relationship, and how is it to be enforced?

Mr. POMEROY. It was decided after a contest of four years, at the time of the surrender of Lee.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Constitution recognize the sword, as deciding any question under it? Is there any principle of constitutional law that is referred to the bloody arbitrament of the sword? No, sir. The Army in time of war makes no law, no Constitution in this country.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator told us the other day that in the presence of arms the laws were silent. This was a question decided by arms and where the laws were silent.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Constitution say that its provisions are silent in the midst of arms? No, sir. That was a powerful expression, not of sentiment but of fear, by Cicero when Pompey's soldiers were present in the Forum. There is no such maxim, no such principle, no such monstrosity in our system. Here we have a Government of law founded upon a Constitution and law subordinate to that Constitution. Among the principles of the Constitution is this: that one State of the Union has as much power, as much right to proceed in all of its processes in the important business of altering the fundamental law as any other State. Where States are in insurrection, where they are making flagrante bello against the Government of the United States, you can not in that condition of things proceed to alter the Constitution at all. You must first reduce the insurgent States to obedience to the Constitution and the authority of the United States, and then you may proceed to amend your Constitution. You cannot do it under any other state of case.

But the present condition of things is incomparably stronger than that. Here there is no war; there is no rebellion; there is no insurgent in arms against the authority of the Government of the United States. All have submitted. The law reigns supreme, except so far as it is violated by the machinery of the party in power. At any rate, the insurgents have all submitted. They are no longer in resistance to the laws of the United States or its authority. They have been vanquished in battle, and they have submitted in the best and noblest faith that ever was professed by a discontented people who had been warring on the Government of their country and all of its authority. Now, when peace and order reign, except so far as they are disturbed by the revolutionary movements of the party in power; when, if they were disposed to perform their functions under and according to the Constitution there would not be a ripple upon the surface of our great political sea, but it would be as placid and as transparent as a mirror, as peaceful as though there was not a breeze stirring—when this is the condition of things you have a right to claim the representation and the presence of the representation, both in the House of Representatives and the Senate, from every State in the Union. They are anxious to be represented; craving, beseeching, praying, adjuring you to allow them to be represented; and yet you still, by lawless force, keep them out of your councils, and in their absence, under the operation of this force, you proceed to alter the fundamental law, the Constitution of our common Government, when that Constitution gives to all the States the free and perfect right to take part in this important business.

Sir, your amendments to the Constitution are all void; they are of no effect. They were proposed by a mutilated Congress; they were proposed by a mutilated House of Representatives and Senate. That mutilation at one time was voluntary, but now, since it has been healed by the submission and obedience of the insurgents to the Constitution and laws of the United States, you have proceeded to continue it, to enlarge it, to protect it indefinitely; and with all this violence done by you to the Constitution, and to the rights of the people and the sovereign States of the United States to take part in this important business of amending the Constitution, you still continue the mockery of your amendments. How ridiculous! How absurd!

Sir, these amendments of the Constitution, your Freedmen's Bureau bill, your civil rights bill, and all your monstrous and unconstitutional laws will be decided in the course of a few years by the sovereign people of the United States of America in their paramount power and sovereignty, to be null and void, mere debris that you have thrown over the Constitution. They will be swept away from it. You are now indulging a dream of power as did Belshazzar before the inscription appeared upon the wall of his palace. That inscription will come to you. You will be weighed in the balance and you will be found wanting, and another Cyrus will sweep you from power. Mr. President, I do not expect to live many years, but I expect to live to see the day of that deliverance of our country and of our glorious Constitution. When I have seen that day I shall then be prepared to exclaim, Simeon like, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace." But I want to see that day; and I do not care who the deliverer is. If the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] would undertake that office he would find me an humble follower, and there would be no one more devoted to him in that mission than myself. Sir, tyranny in any form is never long submitted to by the mass of the people. They may be unable at the time to redress their wrongs and to overthrow the power that oppresses them, but hope springs eternal in their breasts, and they strive and strike on until eventually they do their work. That work is ahead of the people of the United States. They are going to undertake it in earnest, and when they do so their power will be found resistless; and all the efforts that this or any other party accidentally in possession of power in the Government may make to stay the progress of this only sovereign power in our land will be put under foot.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I desire to make some remarks both upon the amendment offered by my colleague and upon the proposition reported by the committee. I prefer, however, not to go on this afternoon, and will give way if any Senator will move an adjournment.

Mr. RAMSEY. I make that motion, that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate bill No. 811. It will take but ten or fifteen minutes to dispose of it, and it is very important that it should be acted upon.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion. I desire to know whether we can have an agreement or an understanding to take the vote on the constitutional amendment. If we cannot have such an understanding, we ought to sit it out to-night and not allow an adjournment until it is disposed of. We want to dispose of it this week.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope the Senator will not make us sit it out to-night.

Mr. RAMSEY. With the consent of the Senator from Connecticut, I made a motion to adjourn in order that he might have an opportunity to speak on this subject to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair.) The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts can only be entertained by unanimous consent. If any objection is interposed the bill cannot be considered.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have moved that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion to allow this bill to be considered.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should be glad to do it, but the Senator from Connecticut desires an adjournment in order that he may have the floor to-morrow.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Connecticut will not object to our doing this kind of business.

Mr. FERRY. I cannot allow the constitutional amendment to be displaced without the consent of the Senator from Nevada who reported it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A single objection carries the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts over.

Mr. RAMSEY. At the instance of the Senator from Connecticut, I have submitted a motion to adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. I will say to the Senator from Nevada that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] has the floor and desires to speak on the constitutional amendment, but he does not wish to do so to-day. Now, sir, I have been trying here for four or five days to get ten or fifteen minutes to pass a bill that it is important to pass, and which will save a little money. I do not know that I ought to say that; but it is important to pass it; and I am told by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House of Representatives that that committee cannot be called at this session, and it is important to send the bill to the House that they may take it from the table there and secure action. I ask the Senate to give me ten or fifteen minutes to pass it.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to know about how many desire to speak on this proposed constitutional amendment, so that we can have some little understanding about it, because on next Monday the chairman of the Finance Committee is going to antagonize his bills. I understood from the Senator from Wisconsin that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] desires to speak.

Mr. RAMSEY. I rise to a point of order. Was I in order in moving an adjournment a few moments ago?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is always in order.

Mr. RAMSEY. I made it some time ago, at the instance of the Senator from Connecticut, who desires to speak to-morrow, and not to-day.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn, a division was called for; and there were—ayes twenty-seven.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I presume it can be understood—

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it in order to debate this question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish, Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order. The yeas and nays are demanded on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. I think the Senate all want to do the same thing; they wish to allow the Senator from Massachusetts to pass his bill and then adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Kellogg, McCreery, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Robertson, Thayer, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wade, and Whyte—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Fessenden, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Rice, Sawyer, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Warner, Welch, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Edmunds, Ferry, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, McDonald, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and Yates—16.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

MILITARY FORCES.

Mr. WILSON. I now modify my motion and move to pass over informally the pending business for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 811. I hope nobody will oppose it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is the bill?

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator from Indiana will allow the bill to be read, I am sure he will not oppose it.

The Chief Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (S. No. 811) to provide for the reduction of the military forces, and for other purposes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to know what the "other purposes" are? [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will hear the bill read I am sure he will be for it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then let us hear the bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read for information. Is there any objection?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Not till we hear it read. I do not want to consent to its consideration until I hear it read and know what the bill is. I ask for the reading of the bill for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, the joint resolution regularly under consideration not yet having been laid aside.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILSON. There are some amendments reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not yet taken up. The question is on passing over the special order informally.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if that is an amendment that he has sent up?

Mr. WILSON. I say there are amendments reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will also be read, if desired.

Mr. WILSON. They were in the bill as reported.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before we decide this question I want to hear all that the Military Committee has to propose, because sometimes there is a little more in the subsequent proceedings than there is in the first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be read for information if there be no objection.

The amendments proposed to the bill by the Committee on Military Affairs were read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is proposed to pass by the special order informally for the purpose of taking up this bill. Is there any objection? None being made, this bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The question is on the amendments reported by the committee. They will be read again, if desired.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment is in section five, line three, to strike out "eight" and insert "ten;" so as to read: "that the corps of judge advocates of the Army be, and the same hereby is, fixed at ten members."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was in section eight, line three, to strike out the words "or the effects of the habitual use of," and in line five to strike out "or indiscretion," and in line six to strike out all after the word "duty" to the end of the section; as follows:

And all medical officers, in furnishing certificates of disability for officers or enlisted men, shall state fully whether the disability to which they certify was so incurred; and if so incurred, the same shall be reported through the Surgeon General for the information of the Paymaster General, who shall stop the pay of such officer or enlisted man for a period equal to the time of absence from duty for such cause.

So that the section will read:

That no officer or enlisted man who shall be unfit for duty by reason of the habitual use of any intoxicating liquors or drugs, or by reason of any disease incurred through his own immorality, shall receive any pay for the period during which he is so unfit for duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the number of appointments of second lieutenants to be made in the Army shall not hereafter exceed fifty, annually, until otherwise ordered by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That no person shall hereafter be appointed a regimental or post chaplain whose age exceeds forty years; nor shall any post chaplain remain longer than five years at any post; and when relieved from duty his place shall be supplied by a chaplain of a different Christian denomination.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as thus amended, reads as follows:

A bill to provide for the reduction of the military forces, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the grade of regimental commissary in the several cavalry regiments shall be, and it is hereby, abolished; and the lieutenants now holding the appointments of regimental commissary may be assigned for duty to companies of their regiments, and shall fill the first vacancies that may occur in their respective grades of first or second lieutenant in the regiments to which they now belong; and nothing herein contained shall affect their relative rank with other lieutenants of their grade.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the grades of regimental commissary sergeant, regimental hospital steward, and veterinary surgeon are hereby abolished; and the number of corporals in each company of cavalry, artillery, and infantry shall be reduced to four; and the said non-commissioned officers shall have the privilege of receiving an honorable discharge, with full pay and allowances to the actual date thereof, if they shall so elect, in preference to remaining in the service in such other grades as may be assigned to them by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That fourteen of the bands authorized by section seven of the act to increase and fix the military peace establishment, approved July 28, 1866, not to include the band at the Military Academy, shall be honorably discharged without delay, and their discharges shall take effect so as to entitle them to receive full pay and allowances to the actual date thereof.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the term of enlistment for all arms of the service shall hereafter be five years.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the corps of judge advocates of the Army be, and the same hereby is, fixed at ten members; and the President is hereby authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to fill all vacancies which have occurred or may hereafter occur therein.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That to insure a proper observance of the Sabbath it is hereby made the duty of all commanding officers of posts, regiments, and companies, under direction of the Commanding General of the Army, to dispense with all parades, drills, and reviews, other than inspections, on that day, except so far as may be needful for the preservation of proper military discipline; and the Commanding General of the Army shall, on the passage of this act, issue a general order prescribing the duty to be performed by the troops on the Sabbath, which order shall not, however, interfere with any duties which may be required in time of war or public danger.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of law now applicable to commissioned officers respecting confinement for offenses, charges of which have or have not been duly preferred, shall hereafter be applied to all enlisted men, and they shall not be confined or held in arrest without trial for a longer period than commissioned officers would be held under similar circumstances. No officer or enlisted man who shall be placed in arrest for any offense, for which he shall have been or may be duly convicted, shall receive any pay for the period during which he may have been or shall be in arrest or confinement either before or after trial on account of such offense.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That no officer or enlisted man who shall be unfit for duty by reason of the habitual use of any intoxicating liquors or drugs, or by reason of any disease incurred through his own immorality, shall receive any pay for the period during which he is so unfit for duty.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the number of appointments of second lieutenants to be made in the Army shall not hereafter exceed fifty annually until otherwise ordered by Congress.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That no person shall hereafter be appointed a regimental or post chaplain whose age exceeds forty years; nor shall any post chaplain remain longer than five years at any post; and when relieved from duty his place shall be supplied by a chaplain of a different Christian denomination.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out the last part of the seventh section. I make the motion in order to ascertain what is the purpose of the committee. I ask for the reading of the last clause.

The Chief Clerk read the clause proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

No officer or enlisted man who shall be placed in arrest for any offense, for which he shall have been or may be duly convicted, shall receive any pay for the period during which he may have been or shall be in arrest or confinement either before or after trial on account of such offense.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I supposed that the matter of forfeiture of pay was part of the judgment of the court-martial always, and I do not see why it cannot be left so, if it is proper that the soldier should lose his pay because of his conviction. He may be held under arrest upon some trifling matter, and the court-martial may not be willing to punish him with a forfeiture of pay, and may punish him in some other mode. I do not see why that cannot be left as it has been heretofore, to the discretion of the court-martial.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply say to the Senator from Indiana that it was believed this provision would have a tendency to preserve order and discipline in the Army; but I am anxious to get the general provisions of the bill passed into a law, and if this is all the Senator wants I shall not object to his amendment. It is not a vital matter; I should rather have the clause in; but I am willing to let it go out if we can get the bill through.

Mr. WARNER. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Indiana will prevail. It seems to me clearly unjust to deprive a soldier of pay simply because he is under arrest, perhaps on false charges.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will understand that he must be convicted before he loses his pay.

Mr. WARNER. I do not so understand it.

Mr. WILSON. I do, and I call for the reading of it.

The Chief Clerk again read the words proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. WARNER. I still think that the language is capable of the construction I put on it.

Mr. WILSON. I will not insist on keeping that clause in, if anybody objects to it; but I am sure it is a provision that would tend to good discipline.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that the provision will be retained. The Senator from Alabama certainly misunderstands its effect. It provides that when a person is arrested and convicted he shall be deprived of his pay both before conviction and after conviction, but he is not to be deprived of his pay unless he is convicted.

Mr. CONKLING. And not before the arrest, I suppose?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir.

Mr. WARNER. The effect there is to provide by law what the judgment of a court-martial shall be; that that shall be one of the points in the judgment against the soldier. I think, with the Senator from Indiana, that should be left entirely to the court-martial. We should not fix by law what shall be the penalty a court-martial may inflict for any given offense.

Mr. HENDRICKS. A man might be put under arrest for a very trifling offense and the court-martial might not hold its session for a considerable time, for months, perhaps; while in another case the offense might be very grave and the court-martial sit immediately. In the case of a grave offense the loss of pay would be but for a short time, while in the case of the small offense the loss of pay would be perhaps for months. It is better to leave it to the court to say how men shall be punished. I believe now they generally punish by putting them at labor, and perhaps that is the better mode of punishment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest that we insert the words "at the discretion of the court."

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to that amendment prevailing. I see there is opposition to the clause, and I am anxious to get the bill through; and I do not regard it as material because it is in the power of the court-martial to do that if they think proper. I therefore hope the proposition to strike out will prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to amend it before it is stricken out.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that that is not worth while, because the court has discretion now, and that will leave the law precisely as it is, and employ unnecessary words to do it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to strike out the words which have been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the reading of the first additional section that was proposed as an amendment by the committee.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the number of appointments of second lieutenants to be made in the Army shall not exceed fifty annually, until otherwise ordered by Congress.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee upon what principle that section is incorporated in the bill? I have supposed that second lieutenants were appointed from time to time merely to fill vacancies. Now, is it contemplated that there may be fifty appointments whether there be fifty vacancies or not; or, on the other hand, is it contemplated that vacancies shall not be filled if they exceed fifty?

Mr. WILSON. The object is to prevent appointments. We have to-day, in my opinion, at least three or four hundred officers more than we need. They are being worked out as fast as possible; but the best way to prevent an increase of officers is to declare that until Congress otherwise order, appointments shall be limited to a certain small number. Unquestionably for a year or two to come there will be a large number of vacancies, and by not making appointments to fill them we shall decrease the expenses largely. It is well known that whenever there is a vacancy, whether the office is needed or not, there is a great pressure to get persons into office.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Does that apply only to second lieutenants?

Mr. WILSON. The section relates only to second lieutenants.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The reasoning of the Senator would seem to apply to all officers.

Mr. WILSON. Our Army has been reduced largely, and we have now a disproportionate number of officers compared with the number of men in the rank and file. This section is put in the bill for the purpose of preventing the appointment of second lieutenants, or limiting them to a small number with a view of reducing the aggregate number of officers of the Army.

Mr. CONKLING. Are those the only officers whose number is to be reduced?

Mr. WILSON. We cannot do anything else in this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to know why you can do nothing in the reduction of officers in this bill except what may be aimed at second lieutenants?

Mr. WILSON. The section simply provides that vacancies shall not be filled.

Mr. CONKLING. In that particular grade?

Mr. WILSON. In that grade.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, my inquiry is, why can you not in this bill, and why ought you not in this bill, to reduce other grades of officers correspondingly?

Mr. WILSON. It is supposed that we shall be able pretty soon to have some measure covering the general subject. The committee of the House of Representatives are at the present time making examinations with a view to propose a large reduction. I understand that General Thomas was called before the House committee to-day to give his opinion, and a large number of other officers have been summoned before the committee with a view of hearing their suggestions as to the propriety of changes in the staff corps of the Army, and such other changes as may be necessary to make a considerable reduction. All the facts necessary to intelligent action, however, are not yet disclosed. This provision will simply tend, during the year to come until we can do something final on the subject, to prevent putting into the Army men whom we do not need. I tried the same thing before and failed, and it is my judgment that we have a hundred men more in the Army to-day than we should have if we had passed the provision which I offered a year and a half ago. We passed it in the Senate, but it was voted down in the other House.

Mr. CONKLING. To illustrate my meaning, let me state that there are now two vacant brigadierships. I should like to know from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether the question of dispensing with those two offices is not quite as simple as the question of dispensing with all second lieutenants greater than fifty in number. The honorable Senator seems to consider it a matter of very small moment, but I will express my opinion, for I have one very definite on this question, and that is, that the process of nibbling is not the true process of reformation in this case. I do not believe that the two vacant brigadier generalships ought to be filled. Whether they should be or not must be a very obvious question to those as familiar as he is with this subject.

Mr. WILSON. We do not intend to fill them.

Mr. CONKLING. We have lying on the table here, everybody knows, two nominations for those vacant places, and certainly they are liable in theory of law to be filled. I think they ought to be dispensed with by law. I have no doubt that other reductions of the Army ought to take place; and I confess my utter inability to see why it is that a committee can discern the propriety of dispensing with all the second lieutenants—the lowest commissioned officers, I believe—over fifty in number, and yet cannot see whether it is proper or not to dispense with brigadier generals or major generals. I do not know but that there is some very occult and complicated process of reasoning which pertains to one part of the subject from what pertains to the other. Should that be so, however, it would be a curious coincidence that the complicated part relates to the few and the simple part relates to the many and the minor officers.

I do not know but that the bill is all right; I do not mean to interpose any objection to it so far as it goes; but I regret very much that there should be any difficulty in bringing forward, and bringing forward now at least, the other obvious instances in which reduction would seem to be needed and to be proper.

Mr. WILEY. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether appointments above the grade of second lieutenant are made from civil life; whether the object of applying this limitation to second lieutenants was not to prevent the number of officers being increased from civil life? The grades of officers above that, I suppose, can only be increased by promotion; and when you cut off the source of supply of the promotions you in fact cut off the increase and multiplication of officers. If I am wrong I should like to be corrected.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Senator from West Virginia is substantially right. We educate a certain number of men at West Point. I suppose there will be perhaps forty of them during the year to come who will have to be commissioned as second lieutenants in the Army. We cannot very well cut them off after educating them. But the object is to have as few second lieutenants appointed as possible, in order to diminish the number of officers of the Army. If the Senator from

New York or any other Senator will move a provision on the bill, if that is the sentiment of the Senate—and I am sure it ought to be—that the vacancies in the grade of brigadier general shall not be filled, I have no objection, for I am opposed to their being filled. I certainly believe that this provision which we have in this bill will save us something and will prevent the appointment of officers in the Army; and had it been passed a year and a half ago we should probably to-day have had seventy-five or one hundred less officers in the Army than we now have.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, the bill presented by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs was intended as a beginning of reduction in the Army. It makes considerable reduction in the expenses, especially in the items of farriers, supernumerary sergeants, and corporals and musicians. According to a calculation which I have had made for myself in the War Department this bill saves over one million dollars a year in these items. Then it prevents the increase of the Army by prohibiting the appointment of second lieutenants who are not needed. We are bound in a great measure to commission every man who is educated at West Point who passes a proper examination there; but it is not necessary that we should take any more men from private life and put them into these lower grades.

I agree with the Senator from New York and others that we must make larger reductions in the Army; but we cannot do it now. The moment you begin with the top of the Army you will find a great many objections here, and it will take a long while to secure action. It was the object of the committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, to make these reforms to which we thought nobody would object, and thus save, as I believe, about a million and a half dollars by this little bill. Hereafter other bills will be introduced to make other improvements, as I hope.

Mr. CONKLING. I offer an amendment to the ninth section to come in at the end of the section:

Nor shall the two vacancies now existing in the grade of brigadier general be filled until this prohibition shall be repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I wish to suggest an amendment in the sixth section, which I presume the committee will accept when they understand it. I observed in that section the words "the Sabbath" twice introduced. I am not aware that there is any such day as the Sabbath known to the law of this country. Neither is it known in the constitutions, or whatever they may be called, of some of the leading denominations; in two of them, at least, the words "Lord's day" are used. Besides, there are sects in this country who observe another day than Sunday as their Sabbath. There is in my own State, near my residence, a considerable sect of what are called Seven Day Baptists; there are also a great many of them in the State of New York; and they are a sect of some consequence; they publish at least two newspapers. I therefore move, or suggest to the chairman of the committee, that the words "the Sabbath" be stricken out and "Sunday" substituted.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection. It is made accordingly.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL J. W. DAVIDSON.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to pass the bill that I spoke about this morning. It is a bill simply to refund to an Army officer a small sum of money which had been stolen from him and which he repaid to the Government. It is the bill reported this morning from the Committee on Military Affairs for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel Davidson. I move to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the regular order be postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill named by him.

Mr. STEWART. I object to that.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not wish the special order postponed. I supposed that the Senate would consent to put it aside informally long enough to pass this little bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is the bill?

Mr. DRAKE. Simply a bill to refund to an officer of the Army $218 25 that he paid in 1847 to replace public money that was stolen from him. It was reported this morning by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.]

Mr. STEWART. I am afraid it will cause debate.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not think that anybody will debate it.

Mr. STEWART. Very well; if it is a small matter I shall not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks the consent of the Senate to lay aside the regular order and take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 661) for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel John W. Davidson, of the United States Army.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Lieutenant Colonel John W. Davidson, of the United States Army, the sum of $218 25, being the amount of public money stolen from him while in his possession at Los Angeles, California, in August, 1847.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Is there a report?

Mr. DRAKE. There is a written report in favor of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none; and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to hear the report read. It does not follow because money was stolen that the man is entitled to have it refunded.

Mr. DRAKE. I can state the facts to the honorable Senator if he is willing to hear me do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. DRAKE. In 1847 Captain Davidson was at Los Angeles, California, acting as commissary of subsistence, and had $400 of Government money in his possession. He was ordered away to a point one hundred and fifty miles distant. He could not take the $400 with him. There was no public safe in which to keep it. He had to leave it in the quarters of a brother officer, Lieutenant Stoneman; and in the night time, while he was away, two soldiers broke into the quarters and stole the money—the whole $400. As soon as he came back he instituted proceedings to detect them, did detect them, had them both tried by court martial and convicted, and $181 75 of the money was recovered, being found upon their persons. He made good the loss to the Government of the remainder, $218 25. He asks now to have that $218 25 refunded to him because he was not in fault, and because he did everything he could to recover the money. In 1860 the claim was before the Senate and the Committee on Military Affairs made a report in favor of paying him the money; but the war broke out, the thing passed away, and it has only now been brought up before the Senate again. These are the facts of the case.

Mr. CONKLING. From which committee does the bill come?

Mr. DRAKE. From the Committee on Military Affairs, who reported it to-day. There is a report in writing, but I believe it is not in the Clerk's hands at this moment. These are the facts detailed in the report which I saw myself. The report has gone to be printed. I could not discover any infirmity in the case at all. It is a case such as we have legislated upon repeatedly before. Since I came into Congress a paymaster in my own State got relief in that way where $3,000 and more were stolen from his quarters by soldiers. This is just the same as has been done in repeated cases before, and it is evidently to my mind a perfectly meritorious case, and I hope the Senate will consent to pass the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri whether in this case there was any evidence of carelessness or gross neglect on the part of the officer?

Mr. DRAKE. I take pleasure in saying, in answer to the Senator from Vermont, and particularly for the vindication of this gallant officer, Colonel Davidson, that there was not the least evidence in the papers in the case presented of any negligence or carelessness on his part.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I recollect a similar case before the Committee on Claims, where an officer left his funds at the door of a tent and went off to get something to eat, and the funds were stolen, and the Committee on Claims rejected the claim on account of gross carelessness.

Mr. DRAKE. If the honorable Senator had heard the remarks I made in the first instance, he would have seen that this case was not like that at all; that the officer could not carry the money with him when he was ordered away from the post; he had to leave it in the quarters of a brother officer, and two soldiers burglariously entered the quarters in the night time and stole the money.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1627) to establish a police court for the District of Columbia.

TAKING OF THE CENSUS.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, yesterday I offered a resolution, which lies on the table, authorizing the Chair to appoint a select committee of five members to report whether any legislation is necessary in reference to taking the next census. Such a committee has been appointed in the House of Representatives, with how much necessity I do not know. But the suggestion was made to me that owing to the brevity of the session it might be well to harmonize the recommendations as to the form of a bill which should be reported to the two Houses if a bill should turn out to be necessary. I consented, without very much knowledge of it, to offer the resolution, and I ask the Senate to take it up if there is no objection, so that the committee may be appointed. I am not able to tell the Senate whether legislation is necessary or not.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the following resolution; and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed by the Chair to inquire and report to the Senate whether any, and if so what, legislation is necessary touching the taking of the ninth census as required by the Constitution.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1714) to close the land system in certain States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 1627) to establish a police court for the District of Columbia was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I should like to take up a bill which has been reported from the Committee on Commerce in relation to a telegraph company to lay a cable from New York to Newfoundland.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make a motion to take that up, or does he ask unanimous consent?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. ABOIT. I object, unless I can secure the consideration of a little bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, which will not take two minutes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This will not take longer than the Senator's bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion that I may submit a motion to be excused from service upon a committee.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well; I withdraw the motion for that.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to be excused from service upon the Committee on Education. I move that I be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I now move that the President of the Senate be authorized to fill that vacancy, and also an existing vacancy in the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. POMEROY. I hope we shall have a session to-morrow. I think we can finish the constitutional amendment then. We have had so many adjournments and done so little this session that I think we certainly ought to meet to-morrow.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations desires to put through at least four appropriation bills to-morrow.

Mr. POMEROY. Let us have a meeting to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DRAKE. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before taking the vote I wish to say a word. There is before the Committee on the Judiciary more business than we can possibly attend to and meet here every day. The committee was in session last night until ten o'clock. We have our regular meetings, and sometimes complaints are made that business is delayed. I do not know how it may be with other members of the Senate; but, for myself, to come here every day as we do and stay till this hour, and then go into committee every morning at ten o'clock, is wearing us out, and I think that we accomplish nothing by it; that we do not advance business by it. Senators become irritable and tired. We accomplish less than we should if we came here fresh on Monday morning. We must have time to dispose of business before the committees. I do not know how it may be with other committees, but on the one that I have the honor to be chairman of we find it impossible to dispose of the business before that committee and meet here every day at twelve o'clock and sit until this hour. I hope the motion to adjourn over will prevail.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope so, too, and for the same reason.

Mr. STEWART. I hope it will not prevail. Our time is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. The amount of business before the various committees of the Senate I am satisfied is such as to require attention for this small lapse of time. In one committee I know that such is the case. I am on several committees, and I find it next to impossible to perform the duties pertaining to me as a member of the several committees on which I am and attend properly here to my duties on the floor in the sittings of the Senate. I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust that the Senate will not adjourn over to-morrow. There is a pressure of business on our Calendar that I have never known at this period of the session. Not a single one of the appropriation bills has been considered. There are public measures now ready for action awaiting the action of the Senate that require a good deal of time and will consume a good deal of time. We have less than thirty working days from now until the 4th of March, including one or two which will be wasted by the ceremonies preceding the inauguration. I hope, therefore, the Senate will be in session to-morrow. Senators must be aware that we shall have to sit probably every day, and probably have night sessions very early next month.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not see the necessity of reporting bills if we are to adjourn and not pass them. This thing of having a pressure before committees in the forepart of the session does very well, but to have so much business before committees just as we are going to close the session seems to me not appropriate, because if we cannot pass the bills we have already got there is no need of reporting any more.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Craig, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, Ramsey, Robertson, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Welch, and Whyte—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Drake, Ferry, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Kellogg, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Pool, Rice, Ross, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Wade, Warner, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cattell, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Grimes, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Patterson of Tennessee, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Sprague, Tipton, and Yates—17.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 29, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the first business in order is the consideration of reports of committees of a private nature, and the House will resume the consideration of the bill in regard to the police court for the District of Columbia, which was pending at the expiration of the morning hour on Friday last.

McPHERSON MONUMENT.

Mr. BUCKLAND. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration and action at the present time a joint resolution donating condemned cannon and muskets for the McPherson monument.

Mr. MOORE. I object.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BEAMAN, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1808) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BEAMAN. I move that the bill be made the special order for Tuesday next, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I object to its being made a special order.

The question was put on Mr. BEAMAN'S motion, and there were—ayes 58, noes 26; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BEAMAN and MOORHEAD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 35.

So the motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted for four days to Mr. KITCHEN.

EXPENSES OF PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1809) making appropriations for the payment of salaries and contingent expenses of the Patent Office for January and February, 1869; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read for information. It proposes to appropriate the sum of $54,766 for the payment of salaries of the officers and employes of the Patent Office, and for the ordinary contingent expenses of said office for the months of January and February, 1869.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is a pretty large appropriation, and I think it had better be considered in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

COAL-OIL, CRUDE PETROLEUM, ETC.

Mr. MOORHEAD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1810) to provide for the better security of life and property from the dangers of coal-oil, crude petroleum, and their products; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

TITLE TO ROCK ISLAND.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 394, confirming the title to Rock Island in the Mississippi river.

No objection was made.

The amendment of the Senate was to add to the bill the following:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to deprive any other person of any right or title to said land acquired from the United States.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. PRICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LAND SYSTEM.

Mr. JULIAN. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Public Lands a bill to close the land system in certain States. It will save thousands of dollars to the Government, and I think no one will object to it.

The bill, which was read, provides that whenever the quantity of public lands remaining unsold in any State shall not exceed three thousand acres it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to order the land office or offices in such State to be closed, and the offices of register and receiver shall thereupon be discontinued; and the said Secretary shall cause the archives and records of such office or offices to be transferred to the General Land Office; and the Commissioner thereof shall thereupon be vested with all the powers of the said register and receiver in regard to the disposal of any fragmentary or other parcels or tracts that may be found to be vacant public land.

No objection was made.

The bill (H. R. No. 1714) to close the land system in certain States was reported back from the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. JULIAN. I am directed by the Committee on the Public Lands to move to amend this bill by extending the amount to five thousand acres, instead of leaving it three thousand acres, as it now is.

Mr. PRUYN. The maximum—perhaps it should be called the minimum—is fixed at five thousand acres. I think it should be fixed at twenty-five or fifty thousand acres.

Mr. JULIAN. The amount of five thousand acres is thought to be a reasonable limit, and the passage of this bill into a law will save thousands of dollars to the Treasury by the discontinuance of salaried officers.

Mr. PRUYN. If the gentleman will make the limit fifty thousand acres I think it will be much better. We do not want two officers to take care of five thousand acres of land.

Mr. JULIAN. We have considered that matter, and it seemed to us that the limit here fixed was the best under the circumstances. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment of the Committee on the Public Lands, to increase the amount named from three to five thousand acres, was then agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JULIAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HAYTI AND SAN DOMINGO.

Mr. CULLOM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the President be requested to furnish to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information which he may have, showing that the people of the Governments of Hayti and San Domingo are desirous that those Governments shall become a part of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to state that I shall not to-day ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill. But to-morrow I shall ask the House to devote the whole day to the consideration of that bill, and shall move to go into Committee of the Whole immediately after the reading of the Journal.

POLICE COURT FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House resumed the consideration of House bill No. 1627, to establish a police court for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The pending amendment will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:
Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That no expenses incurred by the organization of this court shall be paid by the Government of the United States.

Mr. WELKER. Have all the amendments reported from the committee been acted upon?

The SPEAKER. The amendments, being mostly verbal, were agreed to, according to the report in the Globe.

Mr. WELKER. I did not understand that they were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Journal Clerk states that the amendments are not recorded in the Journal as adopted. They will therefore be considered as pending.

Mr. WELKER. In addition to the amendments I have already reported I desire to offer several verbal amendments, and then action can be taken on all of them together. I send the amendments to the Clerk.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

In section one insert after the word "have," in line five, the words "original and exclusive;" so that the clause will read: "That there shall be established in the District of Columbia a court, to be called police court of the District of Columbia, which shall have original and exclusive jurisdiction of all offenses committed in the District of Columbia not deemed capital or infamous crimes," &c.

In section two insert the words "per annum" after the word "dollars," in line two, and after the same word in line four; so that the section will read as follows: "That the salary of said judge shall be $3,000 per annum. The said court shall have power to appoint a clerk at a salary of $2,000 per annum; said clerk shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations, and shall give bond with surety as prescribed by law for clerks of district courts of the United States, who shall hold his office for six years, unless sooner removed by said court for good cause."

In section four strike out the word "marshal" in line seven, and insert "chief of the Metropolitan police;" in same section, insert after the word "execute;" in line eight the words "or cause to be executed;" and after the word "same," in line eight, insert "and make return thereof," so that the clause will read as follows: "Such process may be directed to the chief of the Metropolitan police of the District of Columbia, who shall execute, or cause to be executed, the same, and make return thereof in like manner as in other cases."

In section seven strike out in line six the words "in the same manner," and insert "by the local jurisdiction in which the offense shall be committed;" so that the last clause of the section will read: "The marshal and witnesses shall receive the same fees as are allowed for similar service and attendance in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and be paid by the local jurisdiction in which the offense shall be committed."

In section ten, after the word "Columbia" in line four, insert "to be appointed as provided for in section fourteen;" so that the clause will read: "That said police court shall be provided with a suitable place for the holding of its sessions at the expense of the District of Columbia, to be apportioned as provided for in section fourteen."

In section fifteen insert after the word "penalties" in line two the words "and costs;" and add a proviso at the end of the section; so that the entire section will read: "That all fines and penalties and costs assessed and collected by said court shall be paid over by the clerk thereof to the proper authorities of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and said county of Washington, in the same proportion as said mayors and levy court shall apportion the salaries aforesaid; Provided, That such fines, penalties, and costs arising from the violation of the ordinances of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the acts of the levy court of the county of Washington, shall be respectively paid over to the proper authorities of said jurisdiction."

Strike out all of section sixteen after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That it shall be the duty of the attorneys of the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the levy court of the county of Washington, or their assistants, to attend to the prosecution in said court of all offenses arising out of the violation of any of the ordinances of said cities or the laws of said levy court respectively; and for their services they shall be paid by their respective authorities; and it shall be the duty of said cities of Washington and Georgetown and said levy court respectively, to levy and collect yearly the necessary tax to defray the expenses incurred under this act.

Strike out all of section seventeen after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That no justice of the peace in said District of Columbia shall hereafter exercise any jurisdiction over crimes and offenses the jurisdiction of which is given to the said police court, either for an examination to hold to bail or final judgment, except that said justice may, on complaint or actual view, issue warrants against persons accused of such offenses, which shall be made returnable to the said police court, of which he shall make a record in a book to be kept for that purpose.

Add the following as a new section:

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That this act shall go into effect on the first Monday of April, 1869, and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. WELKER. I call for the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. ROSS. Will my friend from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WELKER. After the previous question has been seconded I will yield to the gentleman for a few moments.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to offer an amendment. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] desires to offer an amendment, which cannot be done after the previous question has been seconded.

Mr. WELKER. I cannot consent to the gentleman's amendment; I know what it is.

Mr. HOPKINS. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that section seventeen should be modified by inserting after the word "by" the words "or in consequence thereof," so as to make the language a little more explicit.

Mr. WELKER. That amendment may interfere with the mode of paying for performing a part of the duties of the district attorney who is now paid out of the Government funds.

Mr. HOPKINS. I think the section will not be perfect without the addition of those words.

Mr. UPSON. I wish to inquire whether this bill, as amended, gives authority to the police court to take cognizance for the purpose of binding over of offenses higher than those which it has authority to try.

Mr. WELKER. The bill gives to this court exclusive and original jurisdiction as to all offenses less than penitentiary offenses. The power to hear and examine charges involving higher grades of crime is left just where it now is.

Mr. UPSON. It might sometimes be proper and necessary for this court to bind over for offenses of a higher grade than those which it is authorized to try.

Mr. WELKER. That is done by the magistrates of the District of Columbia upon consultation with the authorities of the city. It was thought best to let that matter remain as it is.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WELKER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Ross,] who wishes to make an explanation.

Mr. ROSS. I suggested to the gentleman who has charge of this bill that I desired to offer an amendment to make the judge, clerk, and bailiff elective by the people of the District. I was in hopes he would have permitted me to offer it so as to test the sense of the House in relation to the great fundamental principle of free government, permitting the people to elect their own officers. Mr. Speaker, I am astonished at the action of the majority of this House in reference to this great fundamental principle. They have declared that the elective franchise shall be granted to the people of this District without regard to race or color. But now it is proposed by this bill to deprive these people of the exercise of one of the highest prerogatives pertaining to free government, that of selecting officers who are to pass upon their dearest rights of life, liberty, and property. It is proposed to take away from the people this right and place the selection of their officers in the hands of the President of the United States and Senators of the United States, in the choice of none of whom have the people of this District any voice. I submit, therefore, to the good sense of the House that upon every principle of fair dealing toward the people of this District it is but right that this bill be recommitted to the committee, with instructions to report a bill making these officers elective by the people of the District, without, as suggested by my friend near me, distinction of race or color. Have the majority of this House forgotten that the colored troops fought bravely? Have they so soon forgotten the encomiums they have passed upon the gallant colored men of the District when they endowed them with the franchise? Now, with a majority of three fourths on this floor, it is proposed to deny to these colored men the right to elect the men who are to pass upon their rights. I hope the seconding of the previous question will be reconsidered, and that the bill will be recommitted with instructions to report a bill embodying the fundamental principle of allowing the people to elect their own officers.

Mr. WELKER. I move the previous question on the passage of this bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The time of the Committee for the District of Columbia is exhausted. The next committee in order under the call is the Committee on the Judiciary.

CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. KOONTZ. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee for the District of Columbia a bill (S. No. 102) providing for the formation of corporations and regulating the same in the District of Columbia, for the purpose of having it printed and recommended to the committee.

No objection was made; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BROOKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BLANTON DUNCAN.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1811) for the benefit of Blanton Duncan; which was read a first and second time.

The bill reinvests the petitioner with all the rights acquired and now held by the United States to his property under proceedings against him or his property in the district court of the United States for the district of Kentucky, with the right to all the rents and profits thereof which have not been placed in the Treasury of the United States, except such portion thereof as the officers of said court are entitled to as costs and fees.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This case arises out of the following state of facts: this petitioner was the owner of life estate in certain property in the city of Louisville, Kentucky, with remainder over to his children. At the commencement of the rebellion or soon thereafter he engaged in the rebel service. His property was libeled under the act of 1862 and condemned by a decree of the district court of the United States for the district of Kentucky; but the court, instead of entering a decree of condemnation and sale, directed that the rents should be forfeited to the United States, collected and used for the benefit of the Army and Navy of the United States. As the committee are informed, about ten or twelve thousand dollars of rents have been collected. Some six thousand dollars will be deducted from that amount, under the provisions of this bill, for the purpose of paying the costs attending the proceedings, leaving some five or six thousand dollars to go to this petitioner. I am satisfied myself that if this case should be carried from the circuit court of Kentucky to the Supreme Court of the United States the decree of the court below must be reversed; and the only question in my mind is whether this party shall have this relief without the cost attending the prosecution of his writ of error in the Supreme Court, or have it by the expenditure of the amount of money necessary to carry his case through that court. That is, in brief, a statement of the case. I will state one thing further, however, in connection with the conduct of the petitioner during the progress of the war. He left the service of the confederacy, having some difficulty with members of that government, and went out of the country. But there are papers on file in the case—letters from Governor Holden, of North Carolina, and from Governor Bullock, of Georgia—showing that during the time that he was in service at Wilmington, in North Carolina, he performed a great many acts of kindness to Union prisoners. The granting of this relief is recommended by the Governors of whom I have spoken, and also by Rev. Dr. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, and several other prominent Union men of the country. Unless further information is desired I propose to call the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. Supposing the case were carried up to the Supreme Court and the decision of the court below reversed, as the gentleman says, would it take away the right of a new trial?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, I think so, sir, for this reason: that in addition to that the case then would be met with the pardon in the court below. This petitioner was pardoned and presented his pardon in the court below, after, however, the rendition of the judgment, and the court held that the pardon therefore did not restore him to his rights of property.

Mr. MULLINS. I would like to make a few remarks.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If you want any information I have no objection to answering a question.

Mr. MULLINS. Well, the point that staggers me is why it becomes necessary for the Congress of the United States to take up these individual cases that the courts have had under adjudication and have in part decided. And now, for fear that a rebel will have a little justice done him in the way of taking out of his pocket what ought to have been taken long ago, weakening him so that he could not have fought, we are to supervene and take this money away from the court and give it back to this man to larrup us again if it becomes necessary in his judgment. [Laughter.] He will fight us again with double vengeance, and we are to pat him on the back and say, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." [Laughter.] You have killed Abraham Lincoln and a good many more and by your bad example—

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I must resume the floor.

Mr. McKEE. I did not catch the whole of the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I desire to ask him how much money, if any, that has already been collected this bill proposes to pay back?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As I stated, from the information the committee has it will be from five to six thousand dollars. The money is now, I understand, in the hands and under the control of the marshal, and has not been paid into the Treasury. All that may have been paid into the Treasury will be deducted, and also all expenses attending this proceeding.

Mr. McKEE. With the permission of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] I desire to say one or two words in regard to this case. Of course I know nothing about it except what has been stated. It strikes me that if the statement of the gentleman from Iowa is true—and I do not question his statement, and of course have no right to do so—he has his remedy in the Supreme Court, and by going there he may, as he probably would, obtain a reversion of the judgment of the court below. If so, I see no reason why we should come in here and pass a special bill in order to hasten the time when this man may get back this money, which it is possible the court may decide not to be justly due to him.

I supposed when the measure of confiscation was passed it was with the intent to carry it out in good faith. I believe that the chief fault to-day is that we have not rigidly enforced that confiscation act, and by that means have saved part of the expenses of the nation. I do not know what may have been the course of this man during the rebellion or since, except that I know that he was among the very first men to leave my own State to enter the rebellion, and furthermore, that he remained with that cause, or was connected with it, until he perhaps quarreled with some of the leaders, and then he left the country. But I have no reason to suppose that he has changed his sentiments in regard to the rebellion, and I do not believe he has. It strikes me that this bill is simply a proposition to pay back to one of the men who rebelled against the Government of the United States a certain amount which we have taken from him under our laws. If the law is in error, or any error has been committed under it, then let the court so decide. But I certainly think it is no part of wisdom for this House to come in and anticipate what may or may not be the decision of the court in this case.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The circumstances of this case, Mr. Speaker, which have been brought to my knowledge, are very peculiar. It is the only case of the kind; it is itself without parallel; there is no other case like it in the United States; and under our laws, as they now stand, there can be no other case like it. The question involved has been decided differently in different States. It seems that in this case there was a judgment of confiscation by the court which is appealed to the Supreme Court; and there it stands to-day to be determined at the end of one or two years. No general principle has been settled; the property has not passed into private hands, but is held by the United States marshal to answer the decision of the court. The question now is shall we confiscate a single lot of land under these circumstances, and permit every other lot of land to escape, and every other piece of property belonging to those who have been in rebellion? It seems to me that there should be some general policy. The policy of the country, the policy of the Government, the policy of this House, has been, and is at this day, to condone, to give up and return to the claimants all private property in the hands of the United States not used, or the proceeds of which have not been expended.

Here is a case where a man has been brought before the court, and while his property is before the court the property of every other man is released. As a matter of law I am inclined to think that the President's policy of amnesty has released this also; but of that I am not certain. I think if it has any power at all it does that. This claimant was undoubtedly an officer in the confederate service. Since the surrender he has loyally and properly accepted the situation. Having done that, he finds property belonging to his wife in the courts of the United States. For one, while, as everybody knows, I am not very much inclined to yield the rights of the United States, yet I do not see any reason for making an example of this man alone. In the courts of Delaware property situated precisely as this has been given up by the judgment of the court. In the courts of Kentucky the property was not given up, and the case is now pending before the Supreme Court. Under these circumstances I would ask my friend from Kentucky [Mr. McKEE] why he should seek for what there is in the character of this man that will justify his being punished beyond all others? Has he sinned any more than others?

Mr. McKEE. Allow me to reply to the gentleman. It is not that I would seek to make this man an example above any or all others who were engaged in the rebellion against the Government; because, while I regard his case as bad enough, it is certainly not worse than that of all those who have done the same thing that he has done. But in his case there exists a state of affairs which exists in no other; in his case there has been a judgment of a court taking away from him his property, which has not been restored to him. This circumstance does not exist in any other case. The point I make is simply this: I believe it is not wise or right for this House, by a private bill, passed for the benefit of one individual, to forestall or anticipate what may be the action of the court upon an appeal which has already been taken. In regard to the money involved in this case, which has not been turned over into the Treasury of the United States, but remains in the hands of the marshal or his officers, that money is certainly as safe in their custody as if it were turned over into the hands of the party from whom it has been taken.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I only yielded to the gentleman for a question, and I must resume the floor. The gentleman concedes that this man is in no different position, so far as his offense is concerned, from that occupied by any other man who has been engaged in the rebellion. The gentleman also agrees with me that there is no other case in the United States like this. Hence we are setting no precedent; we are making no improper departure from the general policy of Congress. Unfortunately, however, it happens that this single case pending before the courts is not determined. Now, why should we compel this party to await an adjudication by the Supreme Court some two or three years hence, a large portion of the fund in dispute being meanwhile consumed in the payment of fees and costs? Why should we thus punish him as we punish nobody else?

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. MULLINS. Is there any other case in which Congress has thus intervened for the relief of a single individual whose case was pending before the court?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will answer the gentleman. I have already stated that no other case like this has occurred in the United States, except a case in Delaware, where, by the judgment of the court, the property was turned over to the claimants. Hence, there can be no case in which Congress has intervened in the precise way proposed here. But this only differs from a thousand other cases in the fact that this case happens to be in court. We have given up thousands and thousands of dollars' worth of property to everybody else.

Mr. MULLINS. One other question. Where is the difference between this case and the Sue Murphey case?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will state the difference between this case and the Sue Murphey case. During the war we used the property of Sue Murphey for the Army, and having used that property in the war we have let the war settle itself. But the question in the present case is whether now, four years after the close of the war, when we have given up the property of everybody else, the property of Sue Murphey and all others, we should make this man's case an exception. There might be a parallel between this case and the Sue Murphey case provided we now proposed to go down and take possession of Sue Murphey's farm.

Mr. MULLINS. What is the difference between paying this man and paying Sue Murphey?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have already said that we do not propose to pay this man anything. We used his property during the war, and as far as regards such use he must be the loser. But now the war being over, the question is, Shall we take away from him the lands which we used simply because his case happens to be in court? I am willing that there shall be a uniform policy in reference to matters of this kind; and it is in accordance with the policy of Congress, the policy of the country, the policy of the Government in all its branches, that this property which has been used shall be restored. I think the whole power of this Government should not fall upon one individual.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether there is any peculiar reason in this case why this money should be refunded?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is not to be refunded.

Mr. MILLER. As I understand, the bill provides for paying out of the Treasury any profits which have been received.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Let me state once more the point in this case. This man's property was taken and sold under a process of the United States court and the money is held by the marshal, but the case is not yet decided. This bill does not propose to take any money out of the Treasury, but only to give this man the money for which his property was sold.

Mr. MILLER. Was not his property sold in consequence of his participation in the rebellion?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It was sold in order to answer a judgment of a court when that judgment should be rendered.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman from Massachusetts is in error. The property has not been sold at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I so understood.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have a statement of the district judge of Kentucky in reference to this case, and I find that the character of the decree rendered by the court is described in these words:

"The decree was in substance 'that the property seized, the rents then collected, and the rents to be collected be condemned as enemy's property and forfeited to the United States, the same after the payment of costs and charges to be to the use of the United States for the use of the Army and Navy of the same.'"

Now that is a most remarkable decree. This is not a condemnation of the property of Mr. Duncan in the life estate which he held, but it is a decree of condemnation to the use of the United States, not only of rents which had accrued but which were to accrue in the future, leaving in Mr. Duncan the life estate; not condemning that, not providing for the use of it, but simply declaring that the United States will go on and collect the rents as they become due, and that they shall inure to the benefit of the United States. Now, I do not believe that a decree of that kind would stand in the Supreme Court of the United States any longer than it would require to present it.

Mr. SPALDING. Is not that the best place to send it?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Committee on the Judiciary became satisfied, in view of all the circumstances of the case, after examination of the claimant as to his views concerning questions involved in the present condition of the country, that it was not just to make an exception of his case and require him to wait two or three years to get his remedy, putting him to the additional expense of carrying his case through the Supreme Court when we know what the judgment must be.

Mr. SPALDING. If the gentleman will allow me I am perfectly willing to play quits with this man. Let him take his property back, but do not let him take anything that has already gone into the United States Treasury.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We do not propose to let him take the money out of the Treasury. We propose to hold all the money which has been paid into the Treasury. The bill provides that so much as is necessary to pay the costs of the proceeding shall be deducted and he shall receive the balance.

Mr. McKEE. Will the gentleman allow me one minute?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not want to consume any more time.

Mr. McKEE. I desire to reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts. He says this is the only case that has been presented in regard to the confiscation law. I think it is, and we ought to adhere to the decision that has been made until it has been reversed, if for no other purpose than to vindicate our laws.

One word more. As I said before, I think the proper course is to let it go on to the Supreme Court. While I have great confidence in the Judiciary Committee, especially in the judgment of its chairman, I recognize the fact that the district judge of Kentucky is one of the ablest men in that part of the country, a clear-headed lawyer whose decisions have been very correct; but I am willing to allow this case to go on, and when his decision is reversed then it will be time to pay back the money.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman's argument has two lines. First, he wants a decision of the Supreme Court in order to vindicate the confiscation act of 1862. Now, he will get no such judgment in this case. In the next place, he wants to have this party deprived of his property because it is the only case where the law can reach it.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to ask the gentleman if this is the only instance in which the Government of the United States has appropriated the property of rebels under the confiscation act?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, sir; I do not make any such statement.

Mr. HARDING. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say this is the only case in which the power was to be exercised.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDING. Then I protest against the declaration, if I am allowed to say it, that it is the policy of the Government of the United States to condone and return to rebels all the property which we have taken from them. It is not the policy of the Government which I happen to be a part of; it may be the policy of Andrew Johnson and his colleagues, but it is not the policy of the Republican people of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I trust the gentleman from Iowa will allow me a word. I did not say that it was our policy to return all the property taken. I said expressly that everything that was taken during the war from enemies of the Government, to be used by the country, or put in the Treasury of the United States, should stay there. But the question is, after the war is over, after everything has been done, and it is the present policy of the country not to take any more private property during this time of peace from the insurgents, but to restore them their private property, whether in this single instance, which is the only instance in the United States where it is or can be done, we shall take this man's property?

Mr. HARDING. I understand that they have taken it already, and that it is in the marshal's hands.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not wish to consume the whole morning hour on this bill. There are other committees that desire to report, and I will simply say in conclusion that the case was carefully examined by the committee, and we came to the conclusion that the bill ought to pass. I now demand the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move to lay the bill on the table, unless the gentlemen will allow me to move to amend it so as to give every "reb" a pension.

The question was put on Mr. SCOFIELD's motion; and there were—ayes 56, noes 56.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the negative, and the bill is not laid on the table.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, and Mr. SCOFIELD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 80, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Baker, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Boies, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Callis, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Corley, Covode, Cullom, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eln, Ferriss, Fields, French, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hawkins, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Kootz, Hunter, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koonz, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, McKee, Miller, Moore, Loan, Mallory, Maynard, McKee, Miller, Norris, Morrell, Mullins, Newcomb, Newsham, Peters, Pierce, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Scofield, Plants, Polesley, Raum, Kootz, Sawyer, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Stokes, Stover, John Trimble, Van Aeram, Bart Van Horn, Van Wyck, Caldwell, C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Boydell, Brooks, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Cary, Chandler, Churchill, Cornell, Dawes, Deweese, Dockery, Dodge, Edwards, Thomas D. Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Gove, Grover, Haight, Haughey, Heaton, Hotchkiss, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Kitchen, Knott, Lash, Marshall, Marvin, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Moorhead, Mungen, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Pettis, Phelps, Spalding, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Robinson, Ross, Spalding, Stewart, Stone, Taber, Thomas, Upson, Van Auken, Van Trump, James F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, Woodward, and Young—80.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Blackburn, Blaine, Boyer, Broomall, Roderick B. Butler, Cake, Reader W. Clark, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Delano, Dickey, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, James T. Elliott, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Higby, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Lincoln, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, McCarthy, Mercut, Morrissey, Pike, Pile, Poland, Pomeroy, Price, Schenck, Sigreaves, Smith, Stevens, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Tift, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, and Ward—56.

So the bill was laid on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BENTON said: My colleague, Mr. STEVENS, is absent from the House in consequence of sickness. If here, I doubt not, he would vote "ay."

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. HARDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 781) for the relief of Alpheus C. Gallahue, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 394) confirming title to Little Rock Island in the Mississippi river; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BARNES obtained leave of absence until next Tuesday.

Mr. CORNELL obtained leave of absence for ten days from next Monday.

Mr. BUTLER, of Tennessee, obtained leave of absence for ten days.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 833) for the relief of Rufus M. Hollister, of Janesville, Wisconsin; and

An act (H. R. No. 1751) in relation to the appointment of midshipmen from the lately reconstructed States.

ALEXANDER DUNBAR.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of the 19th instant, a report by the Quartermaster General, relative to the employment of Alexander Dunbar to instruct veterinary surgeons of the United States Army.

Mr. WOOD. I ask that the report of the Quartermaster General be read.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it be printed.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to move its reference, with instructions, and for that purpose I desire it to be read that the House may understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair presents these matters in this way for reference only. If they give rise to debate, or their reading is insisted upon, thus consuming much of the time of the House, the Chair will withdraw them and let them come up in their regular order when the House is considering business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. WOOD. Very well; I will move that it be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY FORCE IN NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with House resolution of the 13th ultimo, relative to the number of civilians, commissioned officers, and enlisted men employed in the military service in and around New York city; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

UTE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting to Congress an estimate of the appropriation required to defray expenses incurred in negotiating a treaty with the Ute Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MAUMEE BAY SHIP-CANAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of the 6th instant, the report of General Cram, of the engineer corps, upon the proposed ship-canal through Maumee bay to Lake Erie.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that this communication be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RECUSANT WITNESS—HENRY JOHNSON.

The House resumed the consideration of the following resolution, pending at the close of the afternoon session of yesterday:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House be, and the same is hereby, directed to arrest and bring before this House Henry Johnson, to answer as for a contempt in refusing to appear before the committee of this House appointed to investigate alleged frauds in the late election in the State of New York in pursuance of a subpoena duly issued and served on said Johnson on the 13th of January, requiring him to appear and testify before said committee on that day; and that a warrant be issued by the Speaker of this House to the Sergeant-at-Arms, commanding him or his special messenger to arrest said Johnson and bring him before this House accordingly, and to abide the order and judgment of this House.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know who this Johnson is. I wish the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] would state to the House some reasons for this resolution.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I hold in my hand the original subpoena which was served upon Henry Johnson on the 13th of January, 1869, requiring him to appear before the committee charged with the investigation of alleged election frauds in the State and city of New York, at the rooms where they were sitting at the time in the city of New York. He failed and refused to attend. I am advised that he is a material witness; so material that the committee have deemed it proper to direct me to report this resolution, and in order that he may be brought before the House to answer for contempt in refusing to appear and testify before that committee.

Mr. BROOKS. Is the gentleman from Ohio sure that there is such a person as Henry Johnson?

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Yes, sir. The Sergeant-at-Arms has made a return that he served the subpoena upon that person.

Mr. BROOKS. There are so many "tricks upon travelers" perpetrated in New York that sometimes persons assume names to which they are not entitled.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The witness is well known in New York. He is not a myth or one of the political friends of the gentleman who vote under assumed names.

Mr. WOOD. I think the House ought to adopt this resolution unanimously, and grant the request of the committee.

Mr. ROSS. I would inquire of the gentleman why we should select this particular individual out of the great number who neglected to respond to the process of the committee? There were I think fifteen or twenty witnesses subpoenaed upon my motion who did not attend, and among them was a telegraph operator by whom I proposed to show that Colonel Wood had sent word to a man named Noble, living at Elmira, to come down and work up the case for the committee. But I was not able to procure the attendance of those witnesses; and I should be glad if the chairman would furnish us with some process by which we may be able to prove these frauds which were perpetrated and attempted to be perpetrated by the Republican party upon the elective franchise in the State of New York.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The inquiry of my colleague on the committee [Mr. ROSS] is perfectly proper. There were quite a number of witnesses who refused to obey the process issued requiring their attendance before the committee; and the House of course understands very well that the committee, as such, had no power to compel their attendance. We have selected this case and one or two others because the witnesses are deemed very material; and we propose that they shall be brought to the bar of the House not only that they may answer for their contempt, but that we may procure their testimony.

As to the particular case alluded to by my colleague on the committee, he ought, I think, in fairness to state that when this subject was before the committee I said to him, as did other members of the committee, that if he desired that the telegraph operator to whom he has referred should be brought before the House to answer for contempt the committee would make an order directing a resolution to be presented for that purpose. This operator who was served with process did not come before the committee, but made an answer that it was impossible for him to furnish the testimony desired by the gentleman from Illinois. We issued process for his attendance, and that was all the committee could do. If the gentleman from Illinois will say now that he regards that witness as material I will call the committee together, and I think I can assure him and the House that the committee will agree to report a resolution requiring that this witness shall be brought before the House. But the gentleman did not ask that any such resolution should be reported in that particular case, and the committee have selected for the action now proposed the cases of those witnesses only whom they deem the most material, because it would not be practicable during the brief period left for this Congress to deal with all the refractory witnesses—all the witnesses who refused to appear before the committee in answer to subpoenas sent out for them.

Mr. ROSS. I should be very glad if the chairman of the committee would insert in this resolution the name of that telegraph operator, and require him to produce the telegram from Colonel Wood to Mr. Noble, of Elmira, asking him to come down and engage in working up the case.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I have no authority to agree to any amendment, because this resolution comes from the committee; but I say to the gentleman now that I will call the committee together at any time he desires to take into consideration the case of any refractory witnesses whom he may wish to bring before us.

I ought, perhaps, to make a single additional remark. The gentleman has said, as I understood him, that he desired to take some proof as to Republican frauds in the city of New York. I am not surprised that he desires such proof. No such proof has yet been made before the committee. If there have been frauds of that character I should be glad to have them proved, because this committee was charged with the duty of investigating frauds irrespective of party; and the amplest opportunity has been given to the minority of the committee and to all interested to present proof of frauds of every description.

Mr. ROSS. I did not suppose my colleague on the committee would give a statement of all the testimony that we have had before us.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. No, sir; I state nothing as to the testimony before the committee.

Mr. ROSS. So far from it being the fact that no Republican frauds have been proved, my recollection is that such frauds have been proved very largely, and that there were twenty or thirty witnesses waiting to prove that they had "repeated" for the Republican party in

New York, when the committee decided to receive no more of that class of testimony.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KERR.]

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I think it my duty, after the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] my colleague on the committee, to say to the House that according to my recollection, in which I am as clear as it is possible for a man to be, the statement which he has just made in reference to there being no proof of fraud practiced in the late election in New York by the Republican party or any of their agents or friends is not true. The very contrary is true, most emphatically true. I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, to have heard such a statement from colleague; and I submit further that it was uncalled for by anything which has transpired in connection with his resolution.

I make no objection to that resolution, provided only that it has for its object the eliciting of some evidence which is material to the investigation intrusted to the committee. But if it is intended, as I believe it is, to develop some cumulative testimony on points upon which this committee have already spent weeks of investigation, but which will add no new material fact to anything already developed, then I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is uncalled for now; that it is unnecessary; that it is only creating additional expense by prolonging the examination; and that the House ought not to make this order. I understand—I believe I violate no rule of propriety when I say it—that it is the desire of the majority of the committee to send for this particular witness to testify on the subject of repeating at the late election. If I am wrong in that I hope my colleague will correct me.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. The gentleman is wrong.

Mr. KERR. Then I have to withdraw what I have said on that point. I must say, then, I think it becomes the duty of the chairman of the committee to state to the House on what material part of this investigation it is that this witness is expected to testify, in order that we may know whether it is our duty to consent to the adoption of this resolution or not. I ask my colleague whether the testimony expected to be elicited from this witness relates to the irregularities in the business of naturalization, or what is called repeating, in connection with this investigation.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will say to my colleague on the committee that this witness was not summoned to prove anything in relation to repeating at all. He was summoned, as I understand it, to prove that two Democratic poll clerks put upon a poll-list a large number of names as voters who never appeared and voted at all. This testimony therefore is not cumulative, but it is independent. It is to furnish evidence of a new species of fraud entirely.

I wish to say further that the remark which I made in relation to frauds by the Republican party was made in reply to my colleague on the committee, [Mr. ROSS.] Whether I am correct or my colleague from Indiana [Mr. KERR.] is correct is a matter that will be ascertained from the proof when it is printed. I do not desire now to go into a discussion of that subject.

Mr. KERR. I desire to say just one word in reply to what my colleague has said. I heartily concur in his last remark, that that matter should be properly submitted to the House after all the evidence is reported. It is not a proper subject of wrangling between us now.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Not at all.

Mr. KERR. But I want to say this: that the gentleman should do me the justice now to say that he has never hitherto stated to the minority of the committee why he desired to call this witness here at all, although on several occasions I asked him this very question in the committee-room. But now, since he has stated the reason why he wants to call the witness I make no objection at all to his being called. On the contrary, I shall vote that he be called here to testify upon that point.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. My colleague, I think, has forgotten what occurred in the committee-room. I do not remember precisely whether he was present or not at the particular time the case of this witness was considered, but I do know that the fact was stated in the committee that it was expected that he would prove precisely what I have stated. I apprehend my colleague from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] will remember that. I know that both the gentlemen composing the minority of the committee will do me the justice to say that I have never withheld from them any fact connected with any witness or with the investigation, as to which fact they have made any inquiry or which they could in any sense deem it proper for me to communicate to them.

Mr. KERR. I desire to say—

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that it is not regular to debate what occurred in the committee-room except when it is presented in the shape of a written report. Both sides have been heard, and the Chair doubts whether it is proper to continue the discussion.

Mr. KERR. I have no desire to do so, but we should be allowed to be heard on this side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was under the impression that both sides had been heard. If the gentleman thinks otherwise the Chair will not insist upon enforcing the rule.

Mr. KERR. I have been heard on all the points except the last one suggested by my colleague.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed till some member arrests him by a point of order.

Mr. KERR. I wish to say that I have not intended to impeach the personal conduct of the chairman of the committee toward the minority. He has certainly been kind. But I must also say, in justice to myself and to the truth, which this record will disclose when it comes to be published, that we have not had fair and equal opportunities to elicit evidence in this case in behalf of that party that has been most attacked by the conduct of the majority. Further than that I do not desire now to say.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Well, I am willing to stand upon the record. I now yield to my colleague on the committee from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. My colleagues upon the committee will pardon me if I say that I think the question before the House is not what this witness would testify to, or whether this or that has transpired in the committee or not, but it is simply whether a witness shall be made to obey the subpoena of this House; and there is nothing further in the question than that.

I regret exceedingly that this discussion has arisen about what has transpired in the committee, or what has been the testimony produced before the committee, and what is proposed to be proved by a witness. It is not for the witness to judge himself whether the testimony is material or not. It is for the House to say whether its subpoena shall be obeyed when properly served on him as a witness, and it seems to me there is nothing further in the case.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I now ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I have another privileged resolution which I desire to report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain it at this time, as the motion to reconsider, which is the unfinished business and doubly privileged, now comes up.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will take another opportunity to present it.

SUFFRAGE.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1667) to secure equal privileges and immunities to citizens of the United States, and to enforce the provisions of article fourteen of the amendments to the Constitution, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, were recommended to the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PAINE. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. I have undertaken to yield at the end of twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] and then I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will, then, arrest the remarks of the gentleman at the end of twenty minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary that I should address the House to inform gentlemen who were members of the Thirty-Eighth or Thirty-Ninth Congress what my views are on either of the questions now pending. I have advocated such an amendment of the Constitution and such a law from 1865, when I was first convinced that the Constitution vests in Congress the right to regulate the suffrage, and as an amendment to the bill which called forth the celebrated WADE and DAVIS manifesto, proposed a clause which would have invested with the right of suffrage those citizens of African descent who had served in the Army or the Navy or who could read the Constitution of the United States. The first provision was accepted by the committee and embodied in the bill, and the House rejected the other. The Republican party was then groping timidly in the dark. Whether it now sees its duty more clearly we are about to learn by the fate of the pending propositions. On the 27th of February, 1866, after several brief incidental discussions of the point, I laid before the House copious authorities in support of my theory, drawn from the debates in the Federal Convention for framing the Constitution and the several State conventions which accepted it, and closed my remarks with a prophecy which, I trust, is about to be fulfilled at this time. I said:

"In conclusion, I repeat that I hold that all the power this amendment will give is already in the Constitution. I admit that it has lain dormant. I admit that there has been raised over it a superincumbent mass of State and political usage and judicial decisions that is mountain high; but when I remember the mass of judicial decisions, of State and political usage, which was swept away by the decision of Judge Taney's court that the Missouri compromise was unconstitutional, I am persuaded that it will yet be quickened and called into action. The aroused people will demand that all the powers of the Constitution be exercised so that each State shall be guaranteed a republican government, and that the citizens of each State shall enjoy peaceably the privileges and immunities of citizenship in the respective States; but as some gentlemen question the existence of the power, and others the propriety of exercising it at this time, I hope we will submit this amendment to the people, that they may more explicitly empower Congress to enforce and maintain their rights throughout the limits of our wide-spread country."

Sir, I came upon this mass of historic evidence when seeking to relieve my mind from the doubts in which public opinion had been involved by the persistent assertions and fine-spun logic of the advocates of State sovereignty upon the question, is sovereignty in the States or the United States. In reading the Constitution I found that section two of article four provides that—

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

And yet I saw citizens leave the State of Maine or New Hampshire or Massachusetts, voters, jurors, and possible officeholders, and pass into the State of the gentleman who addressed the House so eloquently last night—Kentucky—[Mr. McKEE,] and be degraded by her laws to the position he so touchingly described, in which they might be robbed of property or life itself; and, though twenty persons with a slight infusion of African blood in their veins beheld the transaction, the court by excluding those witnesses from the witness-stand by reason of the taint in their blood would adjudge that no crime had been committed. I asked myself can it be possible that the framers of our Constitution had undertaken to secure the privileges and immunities of citizens in all the States to all the citizens of each State but had provided no means of securing them. I could not believe they had been guilty of so fatal an omission.

Proceeding in the study of the letter of the Constitution I found that article four of the same section says:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of Government."

How was this power to be exercised? How was the guarantee to be carried into effect? Accepting the political dogmas of the parties of those days—for on this point they did not differ—I could find no provision by which these high duties of the Government could be executed. Finding the political teachers of the day utterly at fault, I went back, as I have said, to consult those who framed the Constitution, and asked, what did they say to each other in the discussion of that august Convention, charged with a duty as grand as ever was confided to any deliberative body? I turned to the recorded views of James Madison, the leader of that Convention, and who is known to history as its father because of the influence he exercised in its counsels and in molding its conclusions. I found that on the 18th of June, 1788, in the Virginia convention, Mr. Madison, in response to Mr. Monroe, who appealed to him as the gentleman who had been in the Federal Convention for an explanation of section four of article one, explained that it provided for the execution of both these guarantees. And in my remarks of February 27, 1866, when I pressed upon the attention of the House all the authorities from this source which have yet been brought to the attention of the House, I quoted the following from his reply:

"Some States might regulate the elections on the principles of equality, and others might regulate them otherwise. This diversity would be obviously unjust. Elections are regulated now unequally in some States, particularly South Carolina, with respect to Charleston, which has a representation of thirty members. Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government."

Are not hundreds of thousands of the people of Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware deprived of the right of suffrage? Are not forty thousand people in Pennsylvania deprived of it? Do not Ohio and Indiana and other States withhold from citizens of African descent that essential right, and is it not the duty of Congress to invest them with it by executing that provision of the Constitution which James Madison pointed to as the means by which it could be secured to each and all?

Mr. WOODWARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLEY. Having but twenty minutes in which to discuss so grave a question I must decline to yield to any one at this time.

Thus the question of the power of Congress to enact the pending bill was brought distinctly before the Virginia convention, and this was the answer made by "the father of the Constitution."

"Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage it was judged proper that it should be remedied by the General Government."

If gentlemen ask why, if Congress possesses it, the States have been permitted to exercise this power, as was asked on the first day of the debate by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] I reply in the language of that same speech of Mr. Madison, as follows:

"It was found impossible to fix the time, place, and manner of the election of Representatives in the Constitution. It was found necessary to leave the regulation of this, in the first place, to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution."

But Madison was not the only statesman who so expounded the clause of the Constitution I refer to, nor was Virginia the only State that accepted the Constitution under that interpretation of the clause. In the North Carolina convention Mr. Bloodworth asked this question:

"Now, sir, does not this clause give an unlimited and unbounded power to Congress over the times, places, and manner of choosing Representatives?"

And answered his own question with another of great significance, as follows:

"May not their power over the manner of election enable them to exclude from voting every description of men they please?"

North Carolina was thus notified of the construction of the clause, yet, with Virginia, she adopted the Constitution. The same views were presented in New England. I quote from the debates of the Massachusetts convention the remarks of Theophilus Parsons, as follows:

"But a State Legislature, under the influence of their Senators, who would have their fullest confidence, or under the influence of ambitious or popular characters, or in time of popular commotion, and when faction and party spirit run high, would introduce such regulations as would render the right of the people insecure and of little value. They might make an unequal and partial division of the State into districts for the election of Representatives, or they might even disqualify one third of the electors. Without these powers in Congress, the people can have no remedy; but the fourth section provides a remedy, a controlling power in the Legislature, composed of Senators and Representatives of twelve States, without the influence of our commotions and factions, who will hear impartially, and preserve and restore to the people their equal and sacred rights of election."

Mr. Speaker, as early as 1807, but seventeen years after the adoption of the Constitution, the Democratic party in this House, through its leading orator, John Randolph, of Virginia, could find no answer to the proposition other than that it had lapsed by non-user. They contended that a correlative power, residing, as Madison had said, primarily in the State, but subject to the supervision of Congress, had lapsed, had become a dead-letter in seventeen years, before it had been fairly tested whether the States would regulate the suffrage upon principles of justice!

If gentlemen will refer to the annals of Congress, Tenth Congress, first session, page 887, they will find that in the discussion of the contested-election case of Barney vs. Creery Mr. Fisk, of Vermont, announced the theory I am now advocating. The report reads as follows:

"There was one part of the Constitution applicable in the present discussion which had not been noticed. He alluded to the fourth section of the first article. 'The times, places, and manner,' &c. Mr. Fisk would only ask the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Randolph,) who had so ably defended the right of the States, if the power of Congress was not equal and coextensive with that of the States. Congress might alter and prescribe the rule of elections so far as respected the time, manner, and place. [The word 'manner' is italicized in the report.] If the gentleman contended that the States had a right to fix qualifications, he must also admit that Congress had the same right."

John Randolph, of Roanoke, had no other reply to make to the suggestion than this:

"The gentleman from Vermont has quoted a part of the Constitution which had nothing to do with this subject—which, in fact, in this day is nothing better than a dead-letter. Would the gentleman from Vermont move for a bill to regulate the time, place, and manner of holding elections in the several States for members to that House? After all that could be said, practice, long-established practice under the Constitution, was the best evidence what the Constitution was. Powers indisputably exercised by the States ever since its adoption were as much departed from the General Government and imparted to the States as if especially delegated by the Constitution itself."

John Randolph was on that day surrounded in the two Houses of Congress by members of the Federal Convention and of the several State conventions, and in their presence did not dare to deny that the power asserted by Mr. Fisk, and which the friends of the pending bill propose to exercise, had been embodied in the Constitution; but, evading the issue, he claimed that because in the brief period of seventeen years it had not been exercised by Congress it had lapsed or become a dead-letter. I would like some of the lawyers of this House to show me how the powers expressly conferred on a Government by a written Constitution can lapse because no emergency requiring their exercise has arisen. So preposterous a suggestion required the genius and fame of John Randolph to secure it a respectful hearing.

This power is not, I freely admit, one to be exercised by Congress in the first instance. The regulation of the suffrage is left primarily to the States. If they regulate it according to the principles of justice then their action stands; but if not, Congress is required to exercise its supervisory power. And, gentlemen, has not the time arrived for the exercise of this power? Do not two hundred and fifty thousand citizens of the United States in the single State of Kentucky, whose homes and persons are ravaged with legal impunity, whose property is insecure, who have no voice in the Government, whose appeals for justice may not be heard in the courts of that State, proclaim to you and to the country that the time has come when a Republican Congress should call into operation this latent power, and give them and the people similarly situated in other States the power to protect themselves by the peaceful exercise of the right of suffrage in the choice of legislators and other officers? This duty is before us, and we cannot with honor shrink from or evade it. Sound policy and justice with equal voice demand its performance.

How, sir, by means other than the passage of this bill, can we do justice to the citizens of those States who recognize, as all ought to, the citizenship of every man? How otherwise will you carry out as to them the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, and secure them "in each State all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States?" By no other means can that clause of your Constitution be executed. By what other means can you guaranty to each State "a republican form of government?" Gentlemen may answer that it may be done by a constitutional amendment. To secure the adoption of such an amendment may require several years, and this duty is already laid upon Congress, and ought to be performed by the immediate passage of a law, and we may then endeavor to make it a part of the Constitution also. It should be embodied in distinct language in the fundamental law of the land. But gentlemen cannot avoid their responsibility in the premises by shrinking from the performance of plain duty or attempting to cast it upon the Legislatures of the several States. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHELLABARGER next addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Leave was granted to Mr. BOWEN and Mr. LOUGHRIDGE to print speeches. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I fully concur with my colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] in all that he has said touching the objectionable features of the amendment as presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] The House, I have no doubt, will concur with me in saying that the only limitation that the amendment imposes upon the original powers now in the several States of this Union is the limitation that they shall not restrict the elective franchise in the persons of citizens by reason of race, color, or previous condition of slavery. Those three terms are the only terms of limitation in it, and hence it is manifestly true that this power remaining in the States, in no other manner fettered by the proposed amendment, may be exercised to the end that an aristocracy of property may be established, an aristocracy of intellect may be established, an aristocracy of sect may be established; in short, what has been done in New Hampshire in regard to official qualifications may be done in every State in this Union in regard both to the qualifications of electors and the qualifications of officers; that is to say, the States may set up a religious test, and pronounce at once that all who are not of the Protestant faith shall be disqualified either to vote or to hold office, and add thereto a property qualification and an educational qualification.

Hence, I believe, if we are going to touch

this question by amendment we ought so to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL.] that the amendment presented to the people for their approval will inform them that upon its adoption these abuses by States will hereafter be impossible. To that end I have offered an amendment which, in substance, is the same as that proposed by my colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] with a single exception. I propose to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL.] so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 1. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge or deny to any male citizen of the United States of sound mind and twenty-one years of age or upward the equal exercise of the elective franchise, subject to such registration laws as the State may establish, at all elections in the State wherein he shall have actually resided for a period of one year next preceding such election, except such of said citizens as shall hereafter engage in rebellion or insurrection, or who may have been or shall be duly convicted of treason or other infamous crime.

I desire to give in passing one reason that controls me in presenting this amendment in this form, as to the term of residence required—one year next preceding the election in the State in which he shall offer to vote—that reason is this: each year there are landed upon our shores hundreds of thousands of adult persons who are aliens of—by the modern invention of forged naturalization papers, the Government of the United States is not protected against the pollution of the ballot-box by thousands who are not entitled to vote, and yet control the elections of the people.

I have something further to say of the additional limitations proposed in the short time within which this debate is limited, and then I shall have done. My colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] I regret to say, has deemed it his duty, in addition to what I have offered here, to offer a further exception; allowing the several States of this Union to exclude from the ballot, for all time to come, all who may have participated in the late rebellion. The gentleman—in addition to the provision that all who may hereafter participate in any rebellion, which is my own amendment, and is intended to protect the Government in the future—would make this constitutional provision have a retrospective operation, thus presenting, by our consent, to the eyes of the civilized world a constitutional provision for disenfranchising in some of the States a majority of its male adults because they have participated in the rebellion, while you enfranchise by name the whole body of male adult citizens of sound mind, without distinction of race or color, who heretofore have been deprived of suffrage. The proposition of my colleague to except "all who have engaged in rebellion" would include all the victims of a cruel conscription, a conscription which entered the homes of hundreds and thousands of people of the southern States and forced them to bear arms in the rebellion against the Constitution and laws of their country.

Sir, it is the common law of the civilized world that no man is criminal in that which he does by coercion; and for myself, while reason holds a place in my brain, I never will support a proposition which holds such persons criminal because, in my judgment, it outrages the enlightened conscience and common sense of mankind. I know the answer is that we do not by this amendment say the States shall do this. My reply is that if we so amend the proposition the States may do this. I submit, sir, that it is not right to affirm to the States the power to do it. We have no more right to disqualify from the ballot the male citizen of sound mind, who by force of conscription bore arms in support of the rebellion, than we have to disqualify you, Mr. Speaker, or to disqualify my honorable colleague.

I wish to remark further, when we were exercising the transcendent powers of this nation, the power of self-defense in presence of the late rebellion, when all the limitations of the Constitution were silent, we never dared to put upon the statute-book any such provision as the amendment of my colleague contemplates; that the great mass of the men who participated in the rebellion should not vote in the preliminary work of reorganization. On the contrary, by our statutes we did not disqualify one out of twenty of the adult males of the South who participated in the rebellion. Why? Because the Congress of the United States had no thought of setting up in any of the States an oligarchy by operation of statute law. The Congress while providing by the thirteenth and fourteenth articles of amendment to make all men free avoided any proposition by way of amendment to deny the ballot to any citizen. Let it not be forgotten that when it was proposed to insert in the fourteenth article of amendment the provision that until 1870 those who had participated in rebellion should not vote for members of Congress or for Presidential electors it was struck out by every vote of the Senate save one. Now we are to ask the Senators who thus voted, and whose votes stand thus recorded to so amend the Constitution as to allow the ballot to be denied to all who have participated in rebellion not for a limited period of a year, but for life.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed for another reason to this proposition of my colleague. The interests of this great country demand that we shall so frame the fundamental law of the country that we will take not vengeance for the past, but security for the future. We should so amend our Constitution as to summon back to the standard of the country and to the support of its Government the whole multitude of men who but yesterday were in arms against us. We should so amend the Constitution as that by this work of generous deliverance, by the will of a brave and victorious people, we shall hasten that hour for which all good men pray, when we shall again be one people, with one Constitution and one country. We should frame this amendment so as to carry out the humble petition of the great man whom but yesterday the people lifted by their ballot to the highest office in their gift. "Let us have peace," says Grant. "Let us have peace!" We shall have it when we so amend the Constitution as to clothe the whole body of the people with the elective franchise, and say that no State shall deprive them of it, leaving the disabilities as to the holding of office standing as they stand in the text of the Constitution to-day. Was it not the people's judgment solemnly recorded by the ratification of the fourteenth article of amendment that the only political disability which they would sanction in organized States by reason of and for participation in the late rebellion was that those who violated an official oath to support the Constitution by engaging in the rebellion, or giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the Constitution, should be disqualified for office, civil and military, State and national, until Congress should remove the disability. That was their judgment, and by that judgment we should abide. They intended that there should be neither political nor servile slaves in any State. Let us stand by that judgment and not consent that any of the several States may disfranchise a majority of the male citizens resident therein by reason of the late rebellion.

Having done that, sir, our action will be consistent with our past record. Having done that we shall hasten the time when we shall have peace. Those words, "Let us have peace!" ought to be written in the heart and mind of every one of us when we come to deliberate upon this question. "Let us have peace!" ought to be written on the archways of your Capitol, and, if it were possible, ought to be written upon the azure arch which bends above us like the arms of beneficence to which weary men look up for hope and consolation. "Let us have peace" by an act of peace, that we may restore the broken fabric of American empire. "Let us have peace" by the works of peace and the arts of peace, that the land which but yesterday was stained with fraternal blood may grow green and beautiful under the hand of honest toil. "Let us have peace" that we may perfect the holy temple of our liberties until it shall lift its headstone of beauty above the towers of watch and war, filling the whole earth with its glory, and drawing all nations unto it. "Let us have peace," that by our sublime example we may teach the whole world "how good and how pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

Mr. BOUFWELL obtained the floor, and yielded ten minutes to Mr. JONES, of Kentucky.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make an argument upon the important questions involved in this bill, not being allowed time for any such purpose, but merely to indicate the reasons which will control my vote upon it. While the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUFWELL] was addressing the House the other day in defense of this bill, I asked him the question if he contended that the power to regulate suffrage within the States was delegated by the Constitution to the United States or prohibited by it to the States; if not, how he construed the tenth article of the amendments to the Constitution, which reads as follows:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people?"

The gentleman made no satisfactory reply, but said that the tenth article had nothing to do with the question. Sir, it has everything to do with the question. Such a reply comes with bad grace from any man who assumes to represent the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, supposing indeed that Massachusetts bears any resemblance to her former self. Sir, does the gentleman know that it was the people of that State who were the first or among the first to require this very amendment? No State was so tenacious of the rights of the people or so jealous of Federal power at the dawn of our national existence as was Massachusetts. When her delegates assembled in convention to ratify the Constitution of the United States they solemnly declared thus:

"And as it is the opinion of this convention that certain amendments and alterations in the said Constitution would remove the fears and quiet the apprehensions of many of the good people of this Commonwealth, and more effectually guard against an undue administration of the Federal Government, the convention do therefore recommend that the following alterations and provisions be introduced into the said Constitution: first, that it be explicitly declared that all powers not expressly delegated by the aforesaid Constitution are reserved to the several States, to be by them exercised."

And to show, sir, that when they made this declaration and express reservation they were considering the very question of suffrage and regulating elections, they also declared:

"That Congress do not exercise the power vested in them by the fourth section of the first article, but in cases where a State shall neglect or refuse to make the regulations therein mentioned, or shall make regulations subversive of the rights of the people to a free and equal representation in Congress, agreeably to the Constitution."

Now, what says the fourth section of the first article alluded to?

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

This section gives to Congress the power simply to make or alter the regulations as to the times and manner of such elections, and for obvious reasons to meet other requirements in the Constitution as to Senators and Representatives, but not affecting in the least the power of the States to make and fix the qualifications of its own electors. But so jealous were the delegates of the Massachusetts convention even of this little power in the Congress that they declared against its exercise except in cases which were never likely to occur. The people of a State would not be apt to subvert their own rights or to deny themselves free and equal representation. Well, sir, after suggesting some other restrictions upon Federal power, to make their opinions more emphatic the delegates in the Massachusetts convention concluded thus:

"And the convention do, in the name and in behalf of the people of this Commonwealth, enjoin it upon the representatives in Congress at all times, until the alterations and provisions aforesaid have been considered agreeably to the fifth article of the said Constitution, to exert all their influence and use all reasonable and legal methods to obtain a ratification of the said alterations and provisions in such manner as is provided in the said article."

Thus spoke John Hancock, Samuel Adams, James Bowdoin, Francis Dana, and others of her first-born sons, and thus spoke Massachusetts herself, lately emerged from the baptismal fires of the Revolution, with her robes of sovereignty fresh and bright upon her, a bride at the altar celebrating the nuptials of the Union. Alas! alas! Mr. Speaker, her injunctions are buried with her great men, and her degenerate sons would barter away her sovereignty to pamper this Federal power which she so much dreaded, this political mastodon which is gormandizing on the vitals of constitutional liberty.

And now, sir, what does this bill and this constitutional amendment propose to do? I cannot go into a discussion of the provisions of either, as there is no time for it, and as they have been amply discussed by others in this debate. The proposition is simply to divest the States or the people of the right to regulate suffrage and elections within their own borders and vest it in the Congress of the United States.

I might, if time were allowed, go into an examination of the opinions of the framers of the Constitution, and quote, as is too often done without effect in this House, the authority of Madison and Hamilton, of Franklin, Rutledge, and Pinckney, and cite from the decisions of Marshall and Story and Kent and Taney, or refer to the lucid expositions of Webster and Calhoun, to show that the regulation of suffrage was intended to be confined to the States, to be exercised exclusively by them, and to be maintained as the chief element in their liberties. It was not only a reserved right, but vested in the States by the Constitution itself; and it is only necessary to glance at its provisions on that subject to settle the question in the mind of any sensible man, however captious he may be. "He who runs may read" and understand if he will.

The second section of article one provides:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

The same section then goes on to prescribe certain qualifications for members of Congress, but never in the remotest degree assuming the right to fix the qualification of electors. That right was inherent in the people, as expressed in the Declaration of Independence, "That governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." Section three of the same article carries out the same principle:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote."

This is the power of the people one degree removed. They elect the Legislature; the Legislature elects the Senators; the source of power being with the people, to be regulated and administered by its own chosen agents. Had not this been intended and understood the Government would have been anti-republican at its inception and a monarchy or oligarchy established as the result of our revolutionary struggle, or, indeed, Mr. Speaker, our fathers would have instituted a delusive phantom to deceive and cheat mankind.

Another provision of the Constitution distinctly fixes the right of choosing electors for President; even with the States.

"Each State shall appoint in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in Congress," &c.

Can any honest man doubt for a moment the meaning and intent of these provisions? And strange to say, sir, these startling changes are to be made in our system of government under the specious plea of section four of article four of the Constitution, namely:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," &c.

Shame, sir, that these revolutionists should seize that as their shibboleth in this contest. It, sir, is the most potent argument and shield against them. That clause was inserted in the great instrument as a protection of the States, and against the very power and despotism they would now impose upon them. Erase that from the Constitution and you strike down one of the firmest bastions in our republican form of government; indeed, you destroy the Government itself. Let us beware, fellow-Representatives, of these monstrous innovations, and while we, in fidelity to our oaths, cherish the Union and maintain the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor, let us also, I pray you, guard with unceasing vigilance as the vestal flame of our liberties the reserved rights of the States and of the people.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WARD.]

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, the course of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who has the charge of this subject, in asking that there be no action at present upon the bill which has been reported by him from the Committee on the Judiciary, with reference to this all-important question of suffrage renders it unnecessary for me to say at this time what I desired to say upon that bill. In the short time allotted to me I will endeavor to speak briefly upon the various projects now before the House for the amendment of the Constitution.

It will be observed that the Committee on the Judiciary have reported an amendment which, in substance, prohibits the States from discriminating in regard to the elective franchise against any man of the age of twenty-one years on account of color or race. An amendment has been proposed by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] and while it does not come from a committee it comes almost with as much authority as if it emanated from a committee. That amendment proposes to secure this franchise of suffrage to every man in the Republic, no matter whether he has been loyal and faithful to it or not. There is a further amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] and this comes nearer to my judgment of what the House should pass. It in substance secures suffrage to every male citizen of the age of twenty-one years, unconvicted of crime and of sound mind and memory, provided he has not been or may not be disfranchised for participation in rebellion. The amendment which I have had the honor to submit is similar in substance to that to which I have just referred, and further provides that no man shall vote unless he has been a citizen for three months, and that nothing in this amendment shall be construed to prevent the States from passing such naturalization and registration laws as the interests of the country or the proper protection of the elective franchise may demand.

Now, I have no question about our power to pass any amendment which comes within the range of a republican Government or free institutions. The fathers of the Republic left a great power in the hands of Congress and three fourths of the States when they said, "You can amend the Federal Constitution in any respect whenever Congress by a two-thirds vote and three fourths of the States insist on such amendment." Has the time come when further amendment to the Constitution is demanded? Sir, we have four million people who have become free by the act of war, who are now citizens of the Republic, who now pay taxes, and from whom we demand military service. In several of the States those citizens are guaranteed the right of suffrage, and the representative portion of these people, under the reconstruction acts, in many of the States exercise the right of suffrage.

But to-day in the border States, in Maryland, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Delaware, and in many of the northern States, there are two hundred and fifty thousand loyal male citizens, unconvicted of crime, untainted with treason, who are paying taxes, and who are subject to military duty, who are deprived now of any voice in the Government which they seek to uphold, deprived of all right of suffrage. There are in other States of the Union six hundred thousand male citizens whose right to that depends upon the volition of the States; and whenever rebel legislators, and whenever rebel instrumentalities, get the control of those State organizations, you will find that those men will be deprived of that right of suffrage. So that the question involved in this constitutional amendment is this: will you secure in your fundamental law the right to one million men nearly in this country to vote in future, men who are loyal citizens, and who are willing to discharge their duties to the Government?

Mr. Speaker, I think that nothing is more apparent than that this Congress should hand over to the people this proposition to amend the Constitution. It will be the capstone in the great temple of American freedom. It will be the consummation of our great work. It will secure to us the fruits of the war. It will settle the controversies between the races. It will stop the contests between white men and black men. It will stop the controversies of the North and the South on that subject. It will bring the country back to peace, which all the interests of the country demand. I hope, therefore, the House will not hesitate about passing this amendment.

But the gentleman from Ohio tells us that we should extend universal amnesty. He tells us, in substance, that we shall hand suffrage over to every rebel and every traitor disqualified by the laws of those States from the right of suffrage. I am opposed to that. I am willing to be merciful; I am willing to be just; I am willing to give these men in the South their lives, liberty, and property; but I am not willing to banish from the statute-book the last punishment for treason; for the moment you admit them to suffrage you must admit them to office, and when you admit them to office Mr. Breckinridge comes in triumph from Kentucky and takes his seat in the Senate, Mr. Toombs comes in triumph from Georgia and takes the seat in the Senate which he dishonored, Jefferson Davis returns from his triumphal tour in Europe and takes his seat, and we shall have those spirits back here who defiled these Halls with treason, who went into rebellion and brought all the blood and sacrifice of the rebellion upon the country. It has occurred to me that the quality of mercy might be strained; that we might be too magnanimous. We have been too magnanimous already. There is now a member of this House who was a brigadier general of the confederate army, who was educated at West Point, and who has come here booted and spurred, from the rebel service to make laws for the widows and orphans he has helped to make. He was not admitted, however, with my consent.

Let us see how much the recent conduct of the rebels entitles them to "universal amnesty." Look at the violent overthrow of the loyal Legislature of Georgia under the leadership of Robert Toombs. It was but the other day that we performed our last sad duty to a member of this House from Arkansas who was murdered in cold blood by rebels of that State, with twenty other prominent Union men.

I hold in my hand what is called the "final summary" of the report of the committee of the Legislature of Louisiana on the conduct of the late elections in that State. The "summary" shows that the following number of Union men in that State were killed, wounded, and maltreated: eighteen hundred and eighty-seven, of which more than a thousand were killed outright. This is the fruit of the "loyalty" of these former rebels in a single State. Clemency to such men is crime; it is unjust to the dead who fell in our cause, and to the living who survive the contest, bearing its marks upon them, and it will be dangerous as a precedent in the future. I hope we shall not insult the loyal sense of this nation by restoring all these murderous villains to political power. I am weary of this sickly sentimentalism which strikes hands with traitors and criminals at the expense of justice and the public safety.

I have no fears, Mr. Speaker, of giving suffrage to the black man. The nation in its march of greatness and to the accomplishment of its high destiny will confer it upon him. Let us have no timidity, no faltering. Let us shake not at the counsels of the weak, but go on and do justice, and from that will come safety, security, and peace.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now yield for five minutes to my colleague.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suppose, sir, I need not say that I am in favor of the principle of the amendment as reported by the committee of equal rights to all men. I wish, however, to call the attention of the House for a few moments to the two amendments which have been proposed by the gentlemen from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. SHELLABARGER,] and to see whether they do not accomplish more than and different from what it is desired they should do. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] means apparently to supplement the proposed constitutional amendment of the committee by allowing any who have been heretofore engaged in the rebellion to have the right of suffrage unrestrained by any State law. His colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] to this adds an amendment which provides that no man who has heretofore engaged in rebellion shall have the right of suffrage. The amendment of the former [Mr. BINGHAM] proposes to prevent any State from denying the right of suffrage to any man for past rebellion, while his colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] proposes that the right of suffrage shall be denied to those who have heretofore engaged in the rebellion.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. My proposition is not that that amendment shall deprive any person engaged in the past rebellion from being disfranchised, but in favor of refusing to wrest from a State the power of disfranchisement, thus leaving that matter where it is now, in the hands of the States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I so understand it, and I think I have so stated. Notwithstanding that, I propose to call attention to the fact that both these amendments go further than that. Both amendments provide that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall deny or abridge to any male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years or over, and who is of sound mind, an equal vote at all elections in the State in which he shall have such actual residence as shall be prescribed by law. Now I wish to call the attention of both of these gentlemen, and the attention of the House, to the fact that these amendments propose to take away—at least that the effect will be, in my judgment, to take away from the State any power whatever to make any educational or other test. In addition, the proposition, whether intended or not, is to take away the power in a State of making any registration law.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir. I hope the gentleman will allow me to explain.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have only five minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The words "the equal exercise of the elective franchise at all elections in the State" is perfectly consistent with the registration law.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is exactly what I am coming to. You must take it one way or the other. If you provide that you shall not abridge or deny to any male citizen of the United States the equal exercise of the elective franchise, you cannot put on any educational test, for that would be abridging the equal exercise of the elective franchise, and so the State cannot adopt any registration laws, because that would abridge the right of suffrage to whoever was deprived of his vote by non-registration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's five minutes have expired.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield three minutes more to my colleague.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is what I desire to call to the attention of the House. If the meaning of the amendment is to confer the equal exercise of the right of suffrage to all men beyond the power of the States to make equal prohibition upon that right, that is, one applying to all men, then they may not put on a registry qualification applicable to all men, but denying the right to the men registered or any educational tests. If the amendment does mean that there shall be an equal prohibition under any form, then they cannot adopt any registry law. There is the difficulty. Suppose, for instance, a State should say that no man who does not reside in the town six months shall vote, or in the country for one year, or in the ward five months, or anything that would operate to restrain some man from voting, that would be to put on an equal restriction. So when it is provided that no man shall vote who is not registered, is not that prohibiting men from voting who are free and twenty-one years of age, and would not a registry law under this amendment be unconstitutional?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we had better stand by the proposition of the committee, and apply the amendment precisely where the great trouble and the great disgrace of the country is at present; and that is, that we shall remove the disfranchisement of every man who is deprived of his right because he has not a skin of the color of our own. Let us take away that power of disfranchisement by the States by constitutional amendment; and when every man, white or black, all the country shall have and exercise the full privilege of expressing any sentiment he pleases, and acting as he pleases, when within the bounds of propriety; when we shall have that peace, security, and safety, I shall be ready to relieve everybody from all disabilities because of rebellion, but not until then.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. PILE. I had intended, sir, to say something in reference to the bill before the House, and mainly to argue this proposition, namely: that primarily, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it was intended by the framers of the Constitution to leave with the States the right to control the question of suffrage and fix the time and manner of holding election; but they also intended, and thought that they did, at the same time reserve to the Congress of the United States the right to exercise a supervisory power over the whole of this question. That is to say, that so long as in the judgment of Congress the States prescribed just and equal limitations, restrictions, and regulations upon suffrage within their several territories there was no necessity for the intervention of the General Government; but that whenever in the judgment and conscience of Congress any State imposed any unequal, unjust, tyrannical, or oppressive conditions or limitations it was the right and duty of Congress to intervene and apply the corrective. But, sir, I have not the time to enter at any length into an argument on that position.

I desire to say a word in regard to the proposed constitutional amendment, and first in reference to its form. It is difficult by any language to provide against every imaginary wrong or evil which may arise in the administration of the law of suffrage in the several States. What we desire to reach substantially, as I understand it, is first to countervene and deny the principle that the States have the right absolutely to control the question of suffrage; and secondly to insure by constitutional enactment, embodied in the fundamental law of the land, the right of suffrage to that race of people who have suffered so many wrongs at our hands, and to whom we owe a debt of gratitude for their fidelity in our hour of strife and difficulty. Whatever secures substantially this result is satisfactory to me. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] differs from all the others, in that it proposes to restore suffrage to those disfranchised for participation in the rebellion.

Now, sir, while I would hesitate to support such a measure if it applied only to my own State, and while I have some doubt as to whether the time has come for the enfranchisement of all the rebels, yet it is well to remember that this condition of things cannot be perpetual. The disfranchisement of any class of men must lead to friction and agitation, must keep up strife and contention.

It is well to bear in mind also that the large mass of those who were engaged in the rebellion have been enfranchised in the States of the South, and that only a small number, some thirty or forty thousand, have been disfranchised under our reconstruction laws. I do not think there is the danger apprehended by many in restoring this thirty or forty thousand to suffrage when the million and more who waged war against the Government already vote. I believe that we will secure that political rest and quiet and peace and restoration to business so much desired only when we shall have given the ballot to the emancipated slave and to the subdued and conquered rebel. It may be wisest to give it to the negro first. It may be that we cannot now extend it to all rebels, but to that we must come at last, and every consideration of interest and enlightened statesmanship prompt us to reach that result as speedily as we can with safety. And, sir, I am not certain but it would be wise to let the disfranchisement of slavery and treason sleep in one common grave, and that justice to the colored man and mercy to the remaining disfranchised rebels would not be now the safest and speediest road to absolute peace.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri, and Mr. HAMILTON, by unanimous consent, were granted leave to print their remarks as part of the debate. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, this debate has demonstrated two facts: one is, there is a very general agreement that it is desirable to submit an amendment to the Constitution, and the other is, that there is a very great difference of opinion as to the details of the amendment.

I have promised my friend from Pennsylvania to yield to him, and I now do so.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, whether the five million colored population of the United States should be excluded from all participation in the elective franchise is not, in my opinion, an open question. It has been debated in these halls and before the country for four or five years. In different ways, directly or indirectly, it has been carried into all the recent elections, and the "white man's Government" dogma has always been rejected. The time of enfranchisement and the manner of enfranchisement, I will admit, are unsettled questions, but the underlying principle of universal suffrage has been approved over and over again. How stands the question practically to-day? Why, colored men vote in twenty-two States of the Union, in the District of Columbia, and in all the Territories. In Nebraska, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, in five of the New England States, and in all the late confederate States, eleven in number, there is no restriction. In New York they vote upon a property qualification, and in Ohio, by the decision of a Democratic court, upon admixture of blood.

Mr. MUNGEN. I want to say that this is not a Democratic decision.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understand the decision was originally made by a Democratic bench.

There are now left only fifteen States where the ballot is still withheld from men of color.

It is not withheld there, because a majority of the people condemn the principle, but because they did not consider that the opportune time for action had arrived, or because they had not yet agreed upon the extent and mode of enfranchisement. Enfranchisement has been coming along piecemeal very much as emancipation came. Slavery was first abolished in the District, then in portions of the insurrectionary States, by Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, then in Missouri, West Virginia, Maryland, and Tennessee, and finally, by the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution, the institution itself, with all its cruelties, crimes, and blood, was buried out of sight of the Christian world forever. Enfranchisement has followed slowly but steadily. State after State, as time and opportunity and public sentiment would admit, has given its assent to the doctrine of universal suffrage, until, as I said, in twenty States, in the District of Columbia, and all the Territories, there is no exclusion on account of color. We propose now to give the people an opportunity to consider whether the time has not at last arrived when it is safe to put the great words of the Declaration of Independence in the Constitution itself. We are told that some of the States are not yet ready; that Connecticut, Ohio, Michigan, Missouri, and Kansas have so declared. That is not conclusive; Connecticut acted several years ago, and the majority was not large. The State would not have given its consent to emancipation a few years prior to that. In Ohio the question was coupled with the disfranchisement of deserters, and could not be decided upon its own merits. In Michigan it was buried beneath the weight of an unpopular constitution, of which it was only a single section. In Kansas it was submitted with another question not yet ripe for action. It was voted down in all of these States, not, as I believe, because the people condemned it in the abstract, but because they thought it premature, or because they found it allied with some other undesirable measure. I believe they would all approve it next year in the form we propose to present it; at least they could not take offense because they are asked for "the sober second thought."

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] proposes to attach to this proposition which has been debated and considered, and as I believe substantially approved by the people, an undeserved and almost unsolicited act of grace to the cruel men, who for four years drenched the land with blood, and whose implacable hate still pursues the unforgiven Unionist with persecution, banishment, and murder. If we cannot send out for the people's consideration this little boon, I should rather say this act of justice, too long withheld for the faithful but humble friends of the Union, without again putting the elective power of the country in the hands of men who so lately foreswore and betrayed it, we had better not act at all. Both propositions would thus be defeated. If the gentleman thinks his proposition is so popular, let him try it by itself. There is no gentleman in the House to whom I listen with more pleasure than to my valued friend. He illustrates whatever he discusses. But even he cannot persuade the people to again confide in men who broke both fealty and oath in order to betray and destroy the country. Their forfeited lives and estates have been restored. Let them enjoy them. I shall not trouble myself to give back to them their old mastery at the polls.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to state to the House the condition of the question and what I propose to submit to the House in the way of changing the amendment as reported by the committee. The discussion in the House on the amendment submitted by the two gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. SHELLEBARGER] has led me to suppose that some amendment to the report of the committee may be expedient, and I will state the amendment that I shall submit for the action of the House when the time arrives.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider may be considered as agreed to, and the motion to recommit as having been voted down, which will bring the joint resolution before the House.

Mr. SPALDING. Will it be in order to move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table after the gentleman gets through?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. SPALDING. Whenever he does yield the floor I give notice that I shall move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The effect of that will be to leave the joint resolution with the committee unreported.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I propose to strike out the word "the" before the word "race," in the eleventh line, and to add after the word "vote" in the tenth line the words, "at any election in the State in which he shall have actually resided for a period of one year next preceding said election." I think that will accomplish what the gentleman from Ohio desires. Then, in order to meet objections which have been made to the report of the committee, I shall move to add to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio the words, "nor on account of his want of property or education;" so that it will read:

The right of any citizen of the United States to vote at any election in the State in which he shall have actually resided for a period of one year next preceding said election shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of race, color, or previous condition of slavery of any citizen or class of citizens in the United States, nor on account of his want of property or education.

I wish now to call the attention of the House to the substantive qualities of these various propositions. The Committee on the Judiciary directed their attention principally to the evil which was complained of—that in some States men were deprived of the privilege of voting on account of their race, color, or previous condition. So far as the amendment of the gentleman from the seventh district of Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] is concerned, I think there are practical objections to offering that amendment precisely as it stands. And one of the chief objections is that I believe it will cut under all qualifications. I am not sure that it will not go so far as to put it out of the power of the States to establish a registration law. It certainly does abolish those qualifications in some States which require the voter to pay a small capitation tax, which shall have been assessed, perhaps, within two years preceding the election. I think that by arraying against this proposition all the peculiarities of the different States we put the proposition itself in danger. I think it better, therefore, as a matter of practical wisdom, to address ourselves exclusively to those great evils which have existed in the Government and the country, to those which are now practically of a serious character or which may reasonably be apprehended. But I think we ought not to go beyond the lines of what I have indicated.

Another objection which I have is, that it recognizes the right in the States to exclude men from the exercise of the elective franchise who participated in the rebellion. A right I will admit exists, but I prefer that it should not be incorporated in the Constitution of the United States. While for the time being I am set as firmly against universal enfranchisement of these people as I can possibly be set against any project, I still look forward to the time, which I trust is not far distant, when all these restrictions will be wiped out, not primarily by legislative action, but by that concord of opinion among the people of the States recently in rebellion by which there will be no substantial difference of opinion among them as to the Government under which they live. And when that time arrives I trust I shall be among the first to welcome all these men. Therefore I prefer not to be put into the Constitution any suggestion, as there is in the language of the amendment, that they may be excluded.

In these particulars I think the amendment proposed by the committee preferable to that proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.] But I have a stronger objection against the amendment of the gentleman's colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM.] He proposes to remove all distinction in all the rebel States and allow men who have been in armed rebellion to enjoy the franchise at once. Sir, having been engaged for two years as a member of a committee of this House in a most careful examination in reference to these States, and I do not hesitate to say that it is not safe by one swoop, either by statute or by constitutional authority, to relieve these men of their disabilities.

But there is an inconsistency in the amendment which shocks my sensibilities, and that is, that while the men who have been engaged in the rebellion recently suppressed, who have brought upon us intolerable woes, are to be relieved, the men who may engage in some future rebellion—as though the gentleman from Ohio could conceive of any future rebellion more infamous than that from which we have just escaped—are to be disfranchised by his constitutional amendment. Sir, if we are prepared to enfranchise the men who have just come out of rebellion, let us not higgie about any subsequent rebellion. It does not require the spirit of prophecy to foretell that none of these men can more deserve to be put out of the pale of the Government than those whom we propose to disfranchise for participation in the recent rebellion.

Mr. BLDRIDGE. I would inquire of the gentleman if there is not a distinction; if we are not now disfranchising men and inflicting penalties upon them ex post facto; and whether we might not establish a rule in regard to a future rebellion which would not be applicable to the past one.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no doubt the gentleman has anathemas to bestow upon some future rebellion which he did not feel willing to bestow upon the past.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment on that point?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have not time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining of his hour.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then I demand the previous question on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The previous question will exhaust itself on the motion to reconsider.

The question was put upon seconding the previous question; and there were—ayes one hundred and four, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. Then the joint resolution is before the House for consideration.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be held as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE —

SECTION 1. The right of any citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of the race, color, or previous condition of slavery of any citizen or class of citizens of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce by proper legislation the provisions of this article.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend section one by striking out the word "the" before "race."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARD. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts. There are a number of amendments before the House, and this is an exceedingly important matter; it is a matter that the House has considered comparatively but little. I suggest to the gentleman that he permit the subject to be recom-mitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. They will have power to report on Monday, or can move to suspend the rules, if they desire, for that purpose. Let them take all these projects and consider them, and digest such an amendment as the House can adopt. I do not think we will lose anything by it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot accede to any such proposition.

Mr. WARD. Then I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry, and it is whether if the previous question is voted down it will not be in order to move to recommit the joint resolution, with all the amendments, to the Committee on the Judiciary?

A MEMBER. What for?

Mr. WARD. In order that they may perfect the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It will be in order if the previous question is not sustained.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am of opinion, upon the whole, that the amendment as it came from the committee, which says that "the right of any citizen of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged," is a comprehensive and explicit declaration. I thought so when it was drawn, and on the whole I think it best for the amendment that I should not undertake to incorporate into it the language used by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER;] but in order that the sense of the House may be tested upon the question—not that I am myself of the opinion that it will add anything substantial to the value of the amendment—I will propose to add to section one the words "nor shall educational attainments or the possession or ownership of property ever be made a test of the right of any citizen to vote," and on that amendment I will ask the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the previous question will not be seconded.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I only call it on this amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the previous question will not be seconded. I want to carry the amendment beyond educational tests. There are religious tests involved in this question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am entitled to the floor for an hour, am I not?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to the floor for an hour.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and yield to the gentleman from Ohio for ten minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. It must occur to the gentleman from Massachusetts on a moment's reflection that the designation of property and educational qualifications recognizes the right in every State of establishing a religious test; and I ask the gentleman why he will insist on the previous question upon a proposition which, as it stands by a well-known rule of construction, commits this House to the monstrous proposition that every State in the Union may establish a religious test as a qualification of the elective franchise. The exceptions made by the gentlemen are, I believe, a property qualification and an educational qualification, and the result is, in the words of one of the foremost jurists of America, that every other thing not included in this exception may be made a test, and that is the reason I object to it.

I have no idea of amending the Constitution of my country by piecemeal in this way. When I am asked to vote I wish to vote intelligently. I desire to see and understand the entire proposition; and, for one, I shall oppose the seconding of the previous question, which is called for the purpose of preventing any one from presenting an entire provision in lieu of the first section of the gentleman's amendment. If the majority of the House are with him I will bow with submission, as all good citizens should, to the expression of their will. If they are against him then he ought to allow that majority to have an opportunity to speak without undertaking, by the operation of a mere parliamentary contrivance, to cut them off from that opportunity, and then telling them that they are opposed to enlarging the elective franchise if they do not vote for his proposition.

Sir, I have stood here the advocate of impartial suffrage when gentlemen who now put themselves forward as its special friends were on the other side of the question. It has been the rule of my political life. I never could see the propriety, under the Constitution of the United States, of any State disfranchising any free citizen of the Republic by reason of his color from exercising this great privilege of freemen, out of which come constitutions, out of which come legislative assemblies, out of which come laws, out of which comes the establishment of tribunals of justice, and out of which comes the administration of justice itself between man and man. I am for the largest liberty and for the greatest good of the greatest number, and I stand here opposed to a proposition which on its face, in the words of Marshall, necessarily implies the consent of the House and of the country, if we adopt the amendment, that religious tests may be established as a condition of the exercise of the elective franchise.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask the gentleman if, in the view he has taken of the proposed amendment to the Constitution, there may not be established by the States any and every other test but the two only that are excepted?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is exactly what I have said touching the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Not only a religious test, but every test that the mind of man can conceive that does not come under the head of property or of education?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly. And now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will indulge me, I wish to say this: that years ago, in my place, I deemed it my duty as a Representative of the people to say that while the original power of exercising this right of the elective franchise was in the States I denied that the majority of the people—that is, the male citizens, for that is the meaning of the term “the people” as used in the Constitution of the country—ever had the right under the Constitution, though they had the power, to deprive the minority of the equal exercise of the elective franchise, the minority being of like lawful age, sex, and residence, and of sound mind. And I stand by that proposition to-day. All I desire touching this proposed amendment to the Constitution is so to reform it that it will be acceptable to the great majority of the people of this country, North and South, East and West, to the end that it may be a success, so that you will establish impartial suffrage; in short, so that you will not lose all by grasping for the unattainable and, I might add, the undesirable.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask the gentleman if his objection will not apply equally to every form of amendment we may adopt, unless we undertake to declare affirmatively what shall be the qualifications of a voter? This proposed amendment speaks only negatively when it speaks of the qualifications of a voter, stating that certain matters shall not be a test against a voter, leaving everything else open.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am glad to have an opportunity to answer the question of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] If there were nothing at all here except the first section I might see a great deal of weight in the gentleman's suggestion. But there happens to be added to that a second section, giving to Congress the express power to enforce the prohibition. The result of the whole matter is that if we amend this first section, as suggested by my honorable colleague as well as by myself, by the second section Congress is invested with express authority to enforce the limitation.

Mr. JENCKES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well; what is it?

Mr. JENCKES. Does the gentleman understand that this second section gives to Congress the power to prescribe affirmatively the qualifications of electors in these elections; or does it simply give the power to enforce the prohibition upon the States; in other words, can that power be exercised by Congress so as to secure uniformity of qualification of electors in all the States of the Union?

Mr. BINGHAM. I answer the gentleman that I have not the least doubt on the question as a question of law. There are other negative provisions in the Constitution of the United States; for example, the express negative provision that “no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.” By virtue of your judiciary act, as it has been in force from the foundation of the Government to this day, that limitation upon the power of the States is uniform, and whenever or where ever any State has undertaken by legislative enactment or by constitutional provision, if you please—I care not which—to impair the obligation of contracts, that wrong has, by the operation of your law, been righted; so that the provision of the Constitution has operated uniformly. Whenever Congress has the power under the Constitution to enforce the limitations of that instrument, even upon States, the exercise of the power will be as uniform as the exercise of any affirmative power can possibly be. It must be so; it cannot be otherwise.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not see that the argument made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] changes the condition of the question at all. If it be true, as he argues, that under this amendment the States would have the right to impose a religious test, it is equally true that they can do so now. What he has said only adds force to the suggestion I made, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, if referred to the State Legislatures, will be met by all these difficulties; and although I should be willing to strike down all educational or property tests, and all possibility of their being established anywhere, the probability is that the amendment which we are discussing, if submitted substantially as it came from the committee, will be stronger before the people, and that if we should attempt to grasp at too much we shall lose the whole. I believe that if we adhere to the proposition to protect the people of this country against destitution on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery we undertake all that it is probably safe for us to undertake now.

But I learned from the gentleman from Ohio that the delegation from that State were anxious that there should be a provision in this constitutional amendment against any property or educational qualification. My own conviction is that no such qualification will ever be imposed. I do not think that such a restriction would be a serious obstacle in the way of the ratification of this amendment, and I am therefore willing to submit the question to the House, my own opinion being that it is not very material which way it be decided; but the longer this discussion continues the better satisfied I am that it is dangerous to undertake to wipe out every minute test or distinction which may have been established in the several States, and that where these distinctions are not serious in their consequences, not calculated to endanger the rights or liberties of individual citizens or the public welfare, it is wisest, under the circumstances in which we find ourselves, not to strike at those distinctions.

I was about to demand the previous question, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] desires to say a few words, and I yield to him.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to say, in the first place, that the proposition which I submit is not amenable to the objection urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that by it the States would be deprived of the power of passing registration or election laws. Plainly that cannot be so. The Constitution itself in express terms provides that—

“The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.”

Hence it follows that the power of regulating elections not being prohibited to the States by the Constitution as it stands, resides now either with the States or with the people. If this is so, if the power to regulate elections or registrations resides with the States under the Constitution in its present form, then my proposition will not take it away. It simply provides that the right to vote shall be exercised by all male citizens of a certain age. Every power now residing with the States under the Constitution, except so far as this amendment takes away their power, will remain with them still. The power of regulating elections and of passing registration laws being with the States now is not taken away by my proposed amendment.

Now, let me state another point. The form in which this proposition is drawn, that all male citizens of a prescribed age and who have not been guilty of certain crimes shall have an equal right to vote, excludes every possible ambiguity and doubt in regard to who at least shall be permitted to vote. In other words, the provisions of my amendment, as applied to the proposed constitutional amendment reported by the committee, will have the effect of making it more explicit and distinct.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The difficulty, in one word, is that the gentleman's amendment, if made a part of the Constitution, vests the right of suffrage absolutely in every person covered by the amendment; and if any State should provide that the voters shall be registered ten days before the election it will be in the teeth of the provisions of the gentleman's amendment as I understand it. His amendment sweeps out of existence at once every condition or qualification or consideration which may be imposed by any State Legislature on the absolute and unrestricted right of suffrage. If the man is covered by the provision of the gentleman's amendment he can go up to the polls and vote, notwithstanding the restrictions of any State law.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I may suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that that is a proposition in reference to which we differ toto caelo. Nothing can be plainer to me, it seems, than that every one of the States is left to the responsibility which it now has, and which my proposed amendment does not take away. It does not take away the right of the State to control the election. The Constitution itself provides that powers not expressly granted are reserved to the States and the people, and that is an answer to all the gentleman has said.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the pending amendment upon which we are to vote declares that the States shall not impose any property or educational test as a condition to the exercise of the right of suffrage. Now, it seems to me, if the doctrine of my colleague on the committee, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] as stated to the House the other day, is correct, we need no such amendment. He quoted from a case decided by the supreme court of Kentucky these words:

“No one can, therefore, in the correct sense of the term, be a citizen of a State who is not entitled, upon the terms prescribed by the institutions of the State, to all the rights and privileges conferred by those institutions upon the highest class of society.”

He continued, after reading from that decision, as follows:

“Here is a full, and I believe a fair, statement of what constitutes a citizen. He must be in the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges of any other citizen.”

Further on he says:

"It is in harmony with the declaration made by the supreme court of the State of Kentucky, in the opinion from which I have just read, that it is an essential quality of citizenship that the citizen should enjoy the highest privileges that appertain to citizenship in the State or city of which he is a citizen. Therefore, when you prove to me that one man in the State of Kentucky votes for President, or for a Representative in Congress, or for members of the State Legislature, you have proved that every man having like qualifications of education or property has the same right. If you deny it to him you deny that to which by the Constitution he is entitled: the enjoyment of equal privileges and immunities as a citizen of the United States, and as a citizen of Kentucky in the State of Kentucky."

The result of this doctrine is that it is held that the right to vote is a question of citizenship; and if that be correct then I wish to know, after we have declared that every person born within the jurisdiction of the United States is a citizen of the United States, how you can interpose even the qualification which the gentleman from Ohio proposes: "except to such as have engaged in rebellion in the past." If this doctrine be correct, that person who is a citizen must be entitled to all the rights enjoyed by the highest and most favored citizen in the land. Then, as a matter of course, if one citizen enjoys the right to vote on reaching twenty-one years of age, you cannot impose on another a property qualification or an educational test or this test of the committee of having been engaged in the rebellion. Therefore, if I am to follow this doctrine, I must be led into the position of the other gentleman from Ohio; that is to say, that all citizens of the United States of twenty-one years of age, of sound mind, and who have not been convicted of any offense or felony under the law, must be entitled to vote; for if the right of suffrage is an incident of citizenship then no State has a right to deprive any citizen of that incident.

Mr. BOUTWELL. In answer to what my colleague has said, I will say to the House that I do not discover anything in the quotation made by him or in the speech I made in the House the other day that is in any way inconsistent with itself or with the position I now occupy. I stated then, and I stated in what he has read, that when you have established the fact that a person is a citizen you have also established the fact that he has a right to all the privileges of any other citizen. That is unquestionably true; and if in any State an educational test were made for some people, or a property test for some people, and not for others, that provision would be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. But it is undoubtedly true in the practice of the country that certain qualifications are prescribed—and the word "qualification" in the Constitution is used in a proper and legitimate sense, such quality of the man as may be attained by men generally—and when those qualities are imposed upon all men alike there is no discrimination, there is no injustice, as between man and man. That is all I said, I think, on the former occasion, and it is all I contend for to-day.

Nor does the doctrine which I held the other day lead to the conclusion embodied in the proposition offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM], that all rebels should be enfranchised. Is it not known that rebellion in contemplation of law and in the presence of all that we have ever done on the subject of the rebellion is regarded as a crime, and for that reason these men are excluded from the elective franchise the same as if they had committed murder or treason or had been guilty of bribery? There is no reason or logic in the suggestion that because I have said that a citizen is entitled to all the rights of a citizen that there can be no exclusion for crime, no exclusion for unsoundness of mind, no qualification which is attainable by all men imposed upon the exercise of his right. Those qualifications may be unwise. I think generally they are.

But I have been diverted. I do not know that it is necessary to prolong this debate. I suppose the House desires to come to a conclusion. I submit the amendment and demand the previous question upon it.

Mr. JENCKES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman is entitled to a few minutes, and I yield him five minutes.

Mr. JENCKES. The reasons for my opposition to this amendment of the committee will reach beyond the amendment itself and bear with some weight against the original proposition. In order to ascertain the purpose of a constitutional amendment we should look first to see how the Constitution now stands. By the original Constitution the citizens of each State are entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. By the fourteenth amendment the States are prevented from passing any laws abridging the right of citizens to these privileges and immunities. Now, it is said that they are abridged in some States by citizens not being permitted to exercise the right to vote and hold office, and it is proposed to cover this omission and secure these privileges by this new constitutional amendment. It is proposed to do this, not by an affirmative proposition, but by a negative. A constitutional amendment should be so framed as to settle doubtful questions; but instead of settling any question, this amendment, if adopted with the addition now proposed, would raise just as many new constitutional questions as there are States, because the conditions of suffrage in the proposed amendment are not identical with the conditions of suffrage in any State of the Union. Hence there must be a conflict in every State, and new questions will arise which must be settled by some adjudication.

Nor is the reply of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] sufficient upon this point. He says there are negative clauses in the Constitution which are construed in a certain sense affirmatively, and he instances that in regard to the restraint upon the States from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But although no affirmation concerning the obligation of contracts is to be found either in the State constitutions or in the Constitution of the United States, yet that obligation is part of the common law recognized by the Constitution of the United States, and which underlies all the laws of all the States. But the right of suffrage is not a right under the common law; nor is it affirmed as a right under definite qualifications by the Constitution of the United States; nor is it uniformly declared by the constitutions of the several States, with conditions and limitations identical in all. Hence this amendment settles nothing; it simply increases the difficulty by its negative character; and upon principle I am opposed to inserting any more negative clauses in the Constitution, unless, like the one read by the gentleman from Massachusetts, it can operate upon another negative clause, and thus become affirmative. The idea of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] is that it may become affirmative by the second clause of this proposed amendment. Well, if being affirmative it gives power to Congress to settle the qualifications of suffrage within the limits imposed by this amendment, it simply adds to the difficulty and makes the condition of suffrage primarily the subject of legislation in the Legislatures or in the conventions of the States, and then throws the residuum which is declared beyond their power into Congress for settlement. It seems to me that it is far better to undertake to settle it all at once by an affirmative proposition declaring what shall be the qualifications of every elector for President and Vice President and Representatives in Congress and members of the State Legislatures. If an amendment of that kind be proposed I am willing to be as liberal as any one in declaring what the qualifications shall be, although it may interfere with the institutions of the State which I in part represent and the institutions of many other States. Let these qualifications be uniform throughout the land and defined in clear and positive terms, and then there can be no two constructions placed upon the amendment which cannot be settled by the tribunal of ultimate resort, whether it be the House of Representatives in judging of the election of its members or the Supreme Court of the United States in testing the qualifications of a citizen in a case properly made; but so long as it stands as a mere negative I feel bound to oppose it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think now the House will be better satisfied to have the vote taken on the amendment, and I ask the previous question upon it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would ask the gentleman whether he thinks it wise for us to put it into the Constitution of the United States that never under any conceivable circumstances shall any State of the Union require an educational test for suffrage?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should be sorry to see such a prohibition placed in the Constitution.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 104, noes 46.

The main question was then ordered to be put, being upon agreeing to Mr. BOUTWELL's amendment, to add to section one of the proposed article of amendment the following words: "nor shall educational attainments or the possession or ownership of property ever be made a test of the right of any citizen to vote."

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the House do now adjourn. It is quite evident that we cannot reach a vote to-night, and we had better adjourn.

The question was put, and the House refused to adjourn.

The question was then put on Mr. BOUTWELL's amendment; and there were—ayes 45, noes 95.

Mr. BROMWELL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose, under the circumstances in which we are placed, that the wiser way is to allow the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio on my left [Mr. BINGHAM] to be submitted, and also the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio on my right, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.] I will yield first to the gentleman from Ohio on my left to offer his amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend section one of the proposed article of amendment by striking out all but the words "citizens of the United States" and inserting so that it shall read as follows:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge or deny to any male citizen of the United States of sound mind and twenty-one years of age or upward the equal exercise, subject to such registration laws as the State may establish, of the elective franchise at all elections in the State wherein he shall have actually resided for a period of one year next preceding such election, except such of said citizens as shall engage in rebellion or insurrection, or who may have been, or shall be, duly convicted of treason or other infamous crime.

Mr. BOUTWELL. As I understand that the gentleman from Ohio on my right [Mr. SHELLABARGER] can move his proposition as a substitute for that amendment I now yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I move as a substitute for the amendment of my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] that which I send to the Chair, being a modification of the amendment of which I gave notice a day or two since.

The Clerk read as follows:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall deny or abridge to any male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years or over, and who is of sound mind, an equal vote at all elections in the State in which he shall have his actual residence, such right to vote to be under such regulations as shall be prescribed by law, except to such as have engaged, or may hereafter engage, in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and to such as shall be duly convicted of infamous crime.

The question was upon the substitute offered by Mr. SHELLABARGER to the amendment offered by Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] is new to me. The first impression upon my mind is that it is in such form as to defeat just exactly what we are aiming at.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. The regulations are simply in regard to the exercise of the right. But the right to vote is secured by the substantial part of the section.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now call the previous question upon the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The question was upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BURR. Is it in order to move that this joint resolution and the pending amendments be laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. BURR. Then I make that motion; and upon it I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the motion to adjourn shall be now agreed to this subject will come up as unfinished business immediately after the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Let the previous question be seconded now; otherwise we will have a long debate on this proposition to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The first question to-morrow when the consideration of this subject is resumed, if the motion to adjourn is now agreed to, will be upon the motion of the gentlemen from Illinois, [Mr. BURR,] that the resolution and pending amendments be laid upon the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that this joint resolution, with the amendments pending thereto, be printed for the use of the House.

No objection was made, and the order to print was accordingly made.

The question was then taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes one hundred and nineteen, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. BANKS: The petition of Catharine Walsh, for a private bill granting her a pension.

By Mr. BLAIR: The petition of M. Wake-man and 200 others, citizens of Jackson county, Michigan, in favor of granting pension to soldiers of the war of 1812.

By Mr. HALSEY: The petition of Alexander Donnan, of Petersburg, Virginia, asking Congress to remove his disabilities.

Also, the petition of John C. Armistead, of Petersburg, Virginia, asking Congress to remove his disabilities.

By Mr. JONES, of Kentucky: The memorial and petition of Peck, Vanhask & Co., and others, merchants, distillers, and dealers in distilled spirits, in the sixth district of Kentucky, for certain changes and amendments to the internal revenue laws.

By Mr. KERR: The claim and evidences of S. M. Stockslager, for payment by the United States of $141 for special service during the late war.

By Mr. KITCHEN: The petition of N. K. Trout, of Virginia, for removal of political disabilities.

Also, the petition of Samuel Gold, and others, for the removal of the political disabilities of Gilbert M. de Lafayette Smith, of West Virginia.

By Mr. MAYNARD: The petition of James D. Murray, of Knox county, Tennessee, praying compensation for supplies furnished during the war.

By Mr. PLANTS: The petition of Hon. A. G. Brown and 52 others, citizens of Athens, Ohio, praying for the passage of the bill now pending dividing the State of Ohio into three judicial districts.

By Mr. POLSLEY: A petition of the members of the bar of Monroe county, West Virginia, against the removal of the circuit court of the United States from Parkersburg to Wheeling.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: The petition of John Demorest and others, citizens of southern New York, for an appropriation for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate.

By Mr. SPALDING: The petition of citizens of Ohio, for the enlargement of the Sault Ste. Marie ship-canal.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 30, 1869.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I rise to a question of privilege. I ask the Clerk to read a paragraph from the Washington correspondence of the New York World, which I send to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the following article from the New York World of yesterday:

"The McGarrahan Claim.—The McGarrahan claim, of which much has been made in the Senate for several days past, came to a head at two o'clock, when, by a vote of 27 to 18, it was ordered to request the House for the papers in the case, and to-morrow they will be referred to the Judiciary Committee to re-examine the whole question. Though this is by construction a private claim, the interests involved amount to at least $5,000,000, and comprise a litigation for ten years. It is practically McGarrahan against the Iberia Mining Company, and he claims to have bought the fee of the Spanish company who used to work the mines. The claim of McGarrahan has been affirmed by six judgments and denied by one rendered by Judge Clifford, of the Supreme Court of the United States. The claim was also endorsed by Abraham Lincoln and Caleb Smith and Judge Usher, Secretaries of the Interior; also by Mr. Browning, the present Secretary. The Commissioner of the Land Office has, however, not allowed the claim, and the Public Land Committee of the Senate reported adversely the last night of last session; and without reading their report the claim was indefinitely postponed at Mr. STEWART's instance. It was at that time promised by Senator WILLIAMS, chairman of the committee, that McGarrahan should have a chance to put in more testimony before the report was presented. STEWART, however, sprung the report and its indefinite postponement upon the Senate, though the Judiciary Committee of the House, through Hon. JAMES WILSON, made at the same time a favorable report. When the Senate learned of the summary disposition of the report, and also that the Senators most active in its presentation were counsel of the mining company in question, and that it was alleged they had received $10,000 in gold as counsel fees, then Messrs. FESSENDEN, HENDRICKS, MORTON, SHERMAN, and the best of the Senators, determined to have the case re-examined by a committee not in interest, and accordingly after a very personal and bitter debate have carried their point. The case will now go before the Senate Judiciary Committee, of which STEWART is also a member, but in which he has no influence to speak of. The vote of eighteen against calling up the measure again was, at least half of it, cast by Senators really desirous of a fair and a new investigation, but they hesitated to revive in the same Congress a matter which had been indefinitely postponed. The Senate, however, largely concludes to waive the technicality and to go into the business again, which in its prior phases has involved directly some, and impliedly the whole Senate, in a decided scandal. The end is not yet."

Mr. STEWART. It is stated in this article that there have been six judgments affirming this claim. The fact is, there was but one, and that was fraudulently obtained. The land commissioners rejected it. It was then taken before the district court, and the district attorney took one half of the claim and allowed judgment to be entered against the United States. It is here stated that the Secretaries of the Interior and Mr. Lincoln passed upon it favorably.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. STEWART. Only a word more.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to raise a question of order. The Senator has called the attention of the Senate to what he says is a question of privilege. It certainly is no question of privilege to correct the misstatements made about a claim in the Senate. If we do that the whole time of the Senate will be occupied in correcting the mistakes made with reference to the business of this body. This does not reflect upon the Senator from Nevada, certainly.

Mr. STEWART. It does. It accuses me of having received a fee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator is not commenting upon that, but he is commenting upon the statement that half a dozen decisions had been made, and that Mr. Lincoln and the Secretaries of the Interior had done something. If we consume the morning hour in controverting these matters we shall do very little business.

Mr. STEWART. I should have been through by this time if I had not been interrupted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When a Senator rises to make a personal explanation, the usage has been to allow him to state what he deems to be proper.

Mr. STEWART. It is stated that the Secretaries of the Interior and Mr. Lincoln passed upon this claim favorably. If so, their action was predicated upon this one judgment, which the highest tribunal in the country has pronounced fraudulent. While these proceedings were pending in the Department, the Attorney General took an appeal to the United States Supreme Court in the original case. The claimants moved to docket and dismiss the appeal, whereupon the question arose and Mr. Justice Wayne delivered the opinion of the court. I will read one sentence from that opinion of his:

"It is a most delicate and unwelcome task which we are performing, but it must be done in order that violated justice may be vindicated, and that official purity of conduct in our courts may be preserved and be unsuspected."

He then goes on to comment upon the facts of the case. When the claim was finally reached upon its merits, the opinion of the Supreme Court was delivered by Mr. Justice Clifford. After reciting the circumstances, which it is improper for me to go into at length here, he sums up, saying:

"Comment upon these circumstances is unnecessary, except to say the confirmation was fraudulently obtained."

Then of the six judgments which are paraded here, there is only one, and that charge is disposed of.

Then the charge of my having been attorney for the New Idria Company or any party in interest adverse to Mr. McGarrahan is utterly false. I would be incapable of appearing in this Senate to advocate a claim of which I was the attorney, and the parties in interest in the New Idria mine would be incapable of employing attorneys to appear in this Senate. It is utterly false in every intent and every insinuation. I regret that I should be called upon, as I am now for the first time in my life, to vindicate my honor against a charge of this kind; but I felt it to be due to me and to the Senate that the matter should be understood.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the proposed extension of the fifty per cent. provision of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in relation to the improvement of the navigation of the Fox and Wisconsin rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, urging the ratification of the Shawnee Indian treaty now pending before the Senate, and the protection of settlers on the Shawnee lands; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Yankton, Dakota Territory, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to abolish the political organization of that Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented the petition of Charles R. Pate, of Georgia, praying that protection may be extended to the Union men of that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the proposed extension of the fifty per cent. provision of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, praying the passage of the bill to incorporate the Industrial Home School Association of the District; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to present a memorial from the Legislature of Wisconsin, in aid of another memorial which has already been presented from the convention held at Prairie du Chien, in Wisconsin, in aid of the improvement of the Wisconsin river. I move that this memorial be printed, together with the memorial of that convention, and that these memorials be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred and the order to print will be entered, if there be no objection.

Mr. DRAKE presented resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, in favor of a continuance of the aid originally granted for the construction of the central branch of the Union Pacific railroad; which were referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of citizens and merchants of Boston, praying that a reciprocity treaty may be made between the United States and the Dominion of Canada and the British Provinces in North America; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the proceedings of the Republican executive committee of Fredericksburg, Virginia, being in the nature of a petition addressed to Congress, in which they represent that the Union people of that city, county, and State look with great alarm upon the efforts of the rebel element of the State of Virginia to induce Congress to strike out the disfranchising clause in the proposed constitution of the State to remove the disabilities of the present State, city, and county officers; and they proceed to assign their reasons against any such action, and protest against it. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I have been requested to present resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, on the subject of the national finances, in which they resolve—

"That the following plan be recommended to Congress as a basis of action for the permanent settlement of our national finances:

"1. Declare that when the debt is paid it shall be paid in coin.

"2. Legalize gold contracts.

"3. Introduce the strictest economy in every department of the Government.

"4. Refuse all subsidies and unnecessary appropriations.

"5. See that the revenues are economically, energetically, and honestly collected.

"6. Use all the surplus revenue in reducing the debt.

"7. Take away all the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to make money plentiful or scarce.

"8. Let the people understand that while they need not fear rapid contraction, it will be dangerous to rely upon indefinite suspension.

"9. Contract the currency moderately the first year; next year determine whether the country will bear a more rapid contraction.

"10. Reduce the taxes so as to leave only surplus revenue sufficient to pay off annually a reasonable amount of the debt.

"11. Resume specie payments as soon as a rigid adherence to the above policy makes it safe to do so."

I move the reference of these resolutions to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN also presented the petition of Matthew Callaghan, praying for compensation for special services rendered the Post Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask leave to present several petitions which I have received from citizens of the State of Maine, earnestly requesting that in any change or amendment of the Constitution that may be proposed to extend or regulate suffrage there may be no distinction between citizens of the United States whether male or female.

I also present several other petitions from Wisconsin; Wayne county, New York; Massachusetts; Illinois; Grand Rapids, Michigan, all in the same language, or nearly so; certainly of the same import. I move that they all lie on the table, as this question is now before the Senate. The Committee on the Judiciary having reported, I see no reason why they should be referred.

The petitions were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLE. I am charged with a petition signed by Joel N. Turner, mayor of the city of Los Angeles, California, and many other influential citizens of that portion of the State, asking for the reorganization of the southern district court for that State, which, it will be remembered, was abolished a few years ago on the occasion of the death of the judge of that court. They set forth that the administration of the laws is very much impeded by the difficulty they find in reaching the place where the United States court is now held, to wit, San Francisco, and they earnestly appeal to Congress for the reorganization of that court. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VICKERS presented a memorial of citizens of the District of Columbia, remonstrating against the passage of the bill conferring additional powers on the Metropolitan Police Board relative to the granting or refusing of licenses; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the petition of John L. Andrews, of Virginia, praying to be relieved from political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRAGIN. I wish to call up a motion I entered some time ago to reconsider the vote by which the House concurrent resolution giving the use of portions of the Capitol for the inauguration reception was rejected.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator any objection to letting us finish the morning business?

Mr. CRAGIN. Not at all.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to present a petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be received.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a memorial of the New York and Antwerp Mail Steamship Company, which recites the organization of the company under the laws of the United States to ply with ocean steamships between the port of New York and the port of Antwerp, in the kingdom of Belgium; recites that they have mail contracts with Belgium and an equipment and appointment which will enable them to carry the ocean mails of the United States for simply the postage, without guarantee or inducement for doing it, and praying that they may be permitted to take the ocean-going letters and mail matter of the United States, receiving simply the postage for carrying the same. The memorial is carefully drawn, setting forth in a logical and intelligible way the facts, and praying for the contract which I have stated, and other matters of legislation provided for in a bill which I desire to introduce.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. HENDERSON. I present concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of Missouri, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives of that State in Congress to vote for a grant of aid to the central branch of the Union Pacific railroad. I will state that previous to the reception of these resolutions I had voted against the bill to grant the aid referred to. It is due to the members of the Legislature that I should say that I had taken my action on the subject before I was aware of those resolutions. I move that they lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CONNESS. The Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 770) to incorporate the National Gold and Silver Mining Company of Washington, District of Columbia, have instructed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill. The bill proposes, I will state in brief, to establish a corporation by a congressional act for the purposes of mining in the Territory of Montana, which Territory has an act of general incorporation of its own, under which companies for those purposes may be organized; and the committee deem it, therefore, improper to recommend the passage of an act for that purpose by Congress.

The committee were discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 284) for the relief of N. A. Shuttleworth, of Harrison county, West Virginia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VICKERS, from the Committee on Railroads in the States, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 849) to incorporate the National Railway Loan and Trust Company, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

GEORGE W. LANE.

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 219) for the relief of George W. Lane, superintendent of the branch mint at Denver, Colorado, and Assistant Treasurer of the United States, have had it under consideration and directed me to report it back with a recommendation that it pass; and as it is a bill of very great and strong justice I should like to have it considered now. It will take but a few moments, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. DAVIS. Allow me to say a word in explanation of the joint resolution. The petitioner was the Assistant Treasurer and superintendent of the mint at Colorado. His principal clerk stole something over thirty six thousand dollars from the safe of the mint. Mr. Lane went in pursuit of him to New Mexico, and made a most remarkable, energetic, and successful pursuit. He overtook him and reclaimed, of the $36,000 over thirty-two thousand dollars, and had the culprit brought back, tried, convicted, and sentenced to the penitentiary. He now asks that he be exonerated from the payment of so much of the money as was not reclaimed—$4,419 90. A special agent was sent by the Treasury Department to examine into the matter, and he recommends the passage of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to credit and allow to George W. Lane, superintendent of the United States branch mint at Denver, Colorado Territory, in the settlement of his accounts, the sum of $4,419 90, public money, which was stolen from the mint without fault or neglect his part, and which has not been recovered.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there a report in connection with that joint resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no report.

Mr. DAVIS. The facts are all as I have stated them. It is a very strong and obviously just case, as strong a case as I have ever heard of.

The bill was passed.

REV. D. HILLHOUSE BUEL.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 760) for the relief of Rev. D. Hillhouse Buel, have directed me to report it back without amendment, with a recommendation that it pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up and pass that bill now. It is to relieve, for some lost registered bonds, a poor clergyman in the State of New York. The case on the evidence is made perfectly plain, and all he had in the world, a few thousand dollars, is tied up. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put it on its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be issued to Rev. D. Hillhouse Buel, of Cooperstown, New York, proper certificates of the registered stock of the United States of the consolidated debt under the act of March 3, 1865, to the amount of $7,000, in lieu and stead of certificates of the debt Nos. 16,381 and 16,382 for $1,000 each, and certificate No. 4,987 for $5,000, belonging to him and lost while passing through the mails; but he is to give bond with surety to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, conditioned to indemnify the United States against all claim upon or in respect to the first-mentioned certificates.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can explain it, as I presented the papers and knew this gentleman, and know from the affidavits and evidence all the facts. This gentleman is a clergyman of the Episcopalian persuasion at Cooperstown, New York, whose character is above all reproach.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Were these registered bonds.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then what is the difficulty?

Mr. EDMUNDS. None, except that the Treasury say that without an act of Congress they will not issue them. That is the only difficulty. I think, as the law is, they may do it; but they say they will not. He exchanged $7,000 in coupon bonds for $7,000 of registered stock, which was entered up to him in the Treasury books, and sent to the cashier of his bank in Troy to be forwarded to him. The cashier forwarded it to him by mail, and it has never been heard of since. That was at a time when the mails were being somewhat interfered with in that region. The truth undoubtedly is that somebody stole these and other bonds out of the mail, and the thieves (as they always do with registered bonds) destroyed them, because they would not be of any use to them without an indorsement. This bill provides that duplicates shall be issued to this clergyman upon his giving security with sureties satisfactory to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify against these bonds. The only possible danger is that this clergyman may have fraudulently indorsed them to somebody who does not bring them forward, and if he should he would not be entitled to have new certificates. It seems to me there can be no danger in it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I shall object to this particular proceeding; but I wish to suggest to the Senate that this matter of giving bonds to secure and indemnify the Government in cases where long bonds are issued, registered or coupon, amounts to nothing at all by way of security. The Senate will observe that these registered or coupon bonds run for quite a long series of years. The security that is given to indemnify the Government may be good at the time it is given; but we all know that so many years may elapse before the missing bonds turn up, if they should ever turn up, that the security may in the meantime become good for nothing. In considering this matter I have come to the conclusion that although it has been the habit to require that security should be given in the way of a bond to make good any loss, this formal proceeding amounts to nothing at all; and that, therefore, it is extremely dangerous for Congress to order the issue of duplicates unless in a case where it has been proved to their entire satisfaction that the original bonds are destroyed, or that there is no chance, so to speak, of their again coming up. Otherwise there are securities out in the hands of other persons issued by the Government, and it must meet both, and the bond of indemnity in all probability is good for nothing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be perfectly true in the case of coupon bonds; but, as my friend knows, by the course of business at the Treasury, on every transfer of a registered bond the registered bond is immediately returned to the Treasury and a new certificate, as it is called—what we call a bond—issued. These certificates being payable to order and transferable only on the books of the Treasury, they stand almost exactly in the same position as stock in an incorporated company. The consequence is that it always happens when there is any difficulty between the indorser and indorsee as to the fact of indorsement, or if there is a loss of the bond and it is brought forward by anybody whose name does not appear in the books, the Treasury say, "We do not accept the bond which you bring here as indorsee without your proving the genuineness of the indorsement." That is to say, the course of commercial business which binds the Government, just as it does other parties in such matters, requires that registered stock shall be brought forward and transferred on the books of the Treasury.

Mr. FESSENDEN. At no specific time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. At no specific time, but within a reasonable time, of course; and we all know that in commercial transactions a reasonable time is really a very short one. Therefore, in the case of stock of this kind that requires to be transferred on the books of the Treasury and to be indorsed, if the stock was not brought forward, supposing that this clergyman had fraudulently indorsed it and then had stolen it out of the mail—if it were not brought forward within a few months the Treasury would be under no obligation, legal or equitable, to pay the holder because he did not use due diligence. I hope, therefore, as this has been done very frequently when occasion has required, the danger, whatever there is, may not be visited upon this clergyman.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I stated that I did not know that I should object in this particular case. It is very true, as my friend says, that the danger is comparatively slight in the case of registered bonds. What I rose to say was that the Senate, in my judgment, must be very careful in issuing duplicates on the strength of any security given by the parties to make good any loss to the Government. I should vote for this bill just as readily without the last clause that security shall be given, as with it, because I cannot see any benefit that that clause will be as a matter of practice.

Mr. CORBETT. I desire to inquire how long it is since these bonds were lost?

Mr. EDMUNDS. More than a year now. The affidavits of this gentleman and of the cashier of the bank show the precise date. I have forgotten it, but I believe it is something more than a year.

Mr. HOWE. They were lost in November, 1867.

Mr. CORBETT. I understand that if these bonds had been lost, or if they were not lost, but had been indorsed to any one, the person to whom they were indorsed could not draw the interest upon them unless he presented them to the Treasury and had them registered in his own name, and new certificates issued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it exactly.

Mr. CORBETT. That is the position of affairs; and therefore there is a safety in this case which there is not in the case of coupon bonds.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 856) to promote the building of steamships in the United States and to provide for the transportation of the United States mails between New York and Europe by steamships built in the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 857) to enable the people of Montana to form a constitution and State government; and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 211) for setting apart a portion of the Fort Snelling military reservation for a permanent military post, and the settlement of all claims in relation thereto; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 212) relating to home-steads for soldiers; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

LAND GRANTS FOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. HARLAN. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the Senate the quantity of public lands certified and patented to States and Territories and corporations to aid in the construction of railroads, wagon-roads, and canals, and the improvement of rivers and harbors, indicating the quantity thus certified and conveyed within the limits of each State and Territory, naming the corporations to be benefited thereby and the quantity of land received by each of such corporations.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that will appear in the report of the Commissioner. The Senator will find that a summary of all that usually accompanies the annual report.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the bill (S. No. 697) granting lands to the States of Wisconsin and Michigan to aid in the construction of the Wisconsin and Lake Superior railroad and its branch be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands. I make this motion with the assent of the chairman of that committee. The motion was agreed to.

DOCKS AT PENSACOLA.

Mr. OSBORN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to this House whether the docks at the Pensacola navy-yard are sufficient for the accommodation and necessities of the Navy in the Gulf of Mexico, and whether further legislation is requisite before the docks can be made sufficient; and if so, what legislation is necessary.

PACIFIC BRANCH OF SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate a plan for the establishment of a branch of the Soldiers' Home on the Pacific coast.

INAUGURATION BALL.

Mr. CRAGIN. Some time ago I made a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate rejected the concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives granting to the committee of control to conduct the inaugural proceedings other than official of the President and Vice President certain portions of the Capitol. I now move to take up that motion, and I will state that I have here a letter from the committee in which they say that they have voted to dispense entirely with dancing, and ask that they may have the use of the parts of the Capitol named in the House resolution for a reception simply. I hope the Senate will at least act upon the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the motion to reconsider. The motion to take up was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on reconsidering the vote rejecting the resolution.

Mr. CRAGIN. I send to the desk a letter which I have received. I ask that it be read. The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January, 27, 1869.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the general committee on official inaugural ceremonies, held this day, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That Senator CRAGIN be requested to ask a reconsideration of the vote on House concurrent resolution, and that he be authorized to inform the Senate that in deference to the expressed views of several of its members this committee has decided to withdraw dancing from the programme of the proposed inauguration reception if the use of the Capitol is granted.

Respectfully,
THOMAS L. TULLOCK,
Secretary.

Hon. AARON H. CRAGIN, United States Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us have the yeas and nays on the reconsideration, and settle it. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRAGIN. I ask leave simply to say a word. I am informed that unless this privilege is granted it is almost certain that there will be some sort of an inauguration ball in this city under influences which will not be agreeable to a majority of the Senate. If this is done it will accommodate the great mass of the people that come here, especially the soldiers, and give them an opportunity to come here in the evening to see General Grant and go away satisfied. For that reason and for others I hope this reconsideration may take place.

Mr. CONKLING. Under what auspices will the ball take place? Will not the same committee have charge of it?

Mr. CRAGIN. Not at all.

Mr. CONKLING. Who will have charge?

Mr. CRAGIN. A committee of citizens of the city of Washington.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I was in hopes this matter would not again be brought to the attention of the Senate; that we were through with it. I see by the morning papers that an inauguration ball is to be given somewhere else, in some other part of the city; and it seems to me that for Congress to undertake to enter into an arrangement with some committee, unofficial it seems—I do not know who the committee are—that there shall be an inauguration ceremony in the Capitol, is out of place. I trust the vote of the Senate will not be reconsidered, and that we shall be done with this thing. I will take no time about it.

Mr. WARNER. I understand the proposition, as modified, is simply to provide that the President-elect may hold a reception in the Rotunda of the Capitol. That seems to be all that is left of the proposition. If that be so he may certainly do that without any action of Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope we are not to vote upon this question as if it stood precisely as put by the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat, whether the President-elect should be permitted to hold a reception in the Capitol. The President-elect does not seem to part for any such opportunity as that, and I think it would be assuming a good deal for us to take jurisdiction of any such question. If the President-elect felt the need of occupying this building and we had knowledge of that it would present a question so unlike the one before us that it could hardly be raised by reconsidering this resolution.

I believe it is a matter of public history—I think I saw in some newspaper a letter conveying that information—that the President-elect has what I will call the good sense to wish very much to bow himself out of this whole proceeding. He has said that in very explicit terms, and therefore the question is still as it was before, whether somebody who has not yet been elected President of the United States and will not be for at least four years—whether somebody other than the President-elect, who has conceived the idea of occupying this building for a ball or a reception or an exercise of that kind of some name or description, shall be permitted by the Senate to do it.

That is the question, and the only question. I saw, as the honorable Senator from Illinois did, in the paper this morning—and, on inquiry, I understand it is true—that an arrangement has been made to obtain the occupation of a large and newly-finished room in the Treasury building, which contains no furniture and no pictures and no appointments to be injured. That is a matter with which we have nothing to do, and therefore there is no need of our taking any jurisdiction; so that it turns out that those who wish a parade of that sort are in a fair way to have it. They have secured a room which, as described in the newspapers this morning, must be a room abundant in its height and depth and dimensions and grandeur for anybody who proposes to receive or be received on that occasion.

It seems to me there are all the reasons there were before, and some reasons in addition, why we should leave this subject alone. Let it stand where it is; and if the President-elect, in spite of his expressed wish, can be dragooned into going and submitting to the ordeal of a ball or a reception, or whatever it is to be called, so be it. That is a question for him. I have no doubt that he is abundantly able to take care of himself. But why we should reverse our action I cannot see, when we know that in the meantime another place and a fitter place has been obtained, and also that the gentleman in whose honor professedly this is conceived has pointedly disclaimed any wish to become the recipient of that honor.

Mr. CRAGIN. Mr. President, I do not know what the wish of General Grant is in this matter. I do not propose to intimate it. In the letter which he wrote to the secretary of this committee he intimated that it would be agreeable to him if the inauguration ball should be dispensed with. As now arranged, it is proposed to dispense with it. The only question is whether the Senate will concur with the House in granting the use, not of the Senate Chamber, not of the Hall of the House of Representatives, not of any of the committee-rooms of this Capitol, not of any of the rooms where there is furniture, but simply the corridors, the Rotunda, and the old Hall of the House of Representatives, where the people who come here to attend this inauguration ceremony may meet and pass around and see their friends, and see General Grant if he chooses to come. There is no danger of any injury to any part of the building.

The Senator from New York alludes to the fact that a ball is to take place at another place. I say to him that if it takes place there it will be under the direction of a different committee and under different auspices from the one which is seeking the use of this Capitol, or a portion of it, for the purpose of a reception or social gathering, whatever it may be. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, I am opposed to the reconsideration of this resolution, but if it shall come up there is a proposition which I wish to make with regard to it which I will mention now, and that is that no lady shall be admitted into the Rotunda in party dress. [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. I should like to have the Senator explain what that means. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRAKE. It is a very considerable undress, if the gentleman can understand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the Senator from Missouri if he will not also accept an amendment from me that all ladies shall be admitted without regard to color? [Laughter.]

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly; anything of that kind that will accommodate my friend from Vermont I will agree to with great pleasure. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, here is a trap for the injury of the health and perhaps the destruction of the lives of numbers of ladies. You cannot heat that Rotunda on the 4th of March in such a way that if ladies attend there in ordinary party dress multitudes of them may not take serious colds, and perhaps lives be lost in consequence of it. It is impossible, sir; you cannot do it. If you were to put stoves in there by the dozen you could not do it, because the height of the Dome is so great that the heated air ascends immediately and passes out through the windows and crannies and crevices there. The consequence is that those on the floor are in the coldest atmosphere that can be in a room at all. I am against this proposition in any form in which it can be put, but most especially against it when the ladies who are to attend there in the ordinary party dress, which is, as I said before, a very considerable undress, are to suffer such exceeding injury as they will if they go there.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to make one remark only in reply to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. I do not like, because I do not approve this resolution, to be set down as wishing churlishly to exclude anybody from the Capitol. For some reason, or by some accident, this has been several times put as if it was a question between the Senate and the public or the citizens of this country who might wish to see and to occupy the inside of the Capitol. I object to that, Mr. President. On inauguration day and every other day it is not the privilege but the right of all the citizens of this country, without regard to sex or age, to visit the Rotunda of the Capitol to look at the pictures, and to do everything that an opportunity can be afforded anybody to do by way of inspection and occupation; and when they do it, unless the Senate should pass this resolution, they will not have to pay to any committee ten dollars or any other admission fee for the privilege of visiting that Rotunda. I have only to say, in answer to the honorable Senator, that I propose to allow all the people of the country to visit the Rotunda on that day and on every other without authorizing a committee to place janissaries at the door to exact a fee of ten dollars for that privilege.

One other suggestion, and I have done. The honorable Senator says that this resolution applies to a part of the building in which there is no furniture. I beg to remind him that in the Rotunda are pictures, all of which, perhaps, are not very precious, but some of which are very valuable; and if there be anything which could well be placed as furniture or appointment in an apartment likely to suffer detriment on such an occasion, I think pictures hanging as low as those would fall within that description of appointment. That is all I meant by my reference to that.

Now, I hope we shall say that everybody will be permitted on that day and on that night, like every other day and every other night, to go without let or hindrance all over the open and unoccupied parts of the Capitol.

Mr. WARNER. I desire to say that the Senator from New York expresses my views in reference to this matter, and that any action necessary to accomplish what he states I am ready to take.

Mr. CRAGIN. One remark in reply to the Senator from New York. He says that on inauguration day every person who comes here and wishes to go into the Rotunda has the right to do so, and can do so. He must be aware, I presume, that on that day the doors of the Capitol are closed against the great public, and only those are admitted in here who have tickets; and it is for the purpose of letting in those who cannot get tickets in the evening that this proposition is offered.

MR. CONKLING. Are the doors closed at any hour during which this resolution proposes to open them? If not, then there is no pertinency in the suggestion of the Senator. Of course, I am aware that during the time when the members of the two Houses and the other persons taking part in the inauguration ceremonies are traversing the building in procession, as I believe they do, for the reason that two solid bodies cannot occupy the same space at the same time, other persons are excluded. That is a philosophical proposition, I believe, which the Senator cannot very well obviate by a resolution. But the point is, that during that time this resolution would not open the doors any wider or amplify the space any more. On the contrary, without the resolution the time to which it applies will be a time when the building can and will be open to everybody.

MR. CORBETT. When this resolution was up before I did not state my reason for voting against it, but it is substantially the reason offered by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE,] who states that the Rotunda is an unsuitable and improper place for such a reception or ball. Every one who has passed through the Rotunda and gone from the Rotunda to the Senate wing or House wing of the building must know that the drafts through that portion of the building are so cold that it is impossible for persons to pass through there without taking cold unless they have on overcoats, cloaks, or shawls. For that reason I voted against the resolution before, and shall feel constrained to do so now. I think some other place in the city could be obtained that would be much more acceptable to the people generally, and much more healthy for the ladies who may visit the reception or ball.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of yesterday, being the joint resolution (S. R. No. 8) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, is before the Senate.

Several SENATORS. Let us vote on this question.

MR. CRAGIN. I hope the Senator from Nevada will not object to our taking a vote on this motion. There will be no further debate.

MR. STEWART. I cannot give way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to pass over the order of the day informally for the purpose of taking a vote on this subject.

MR. STEWART. I object.

MR. EDMUNDS and others. Let us settle it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, Senate joint resolution No. 8 is before the Senate, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. DIXON,] upon which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] is entitled to the floor.

MR. STEWART. If the debate on the other subject is concluded, and the Senator from Connecticut is willing to yield the floor long enough to allow the vote to be taken, I will consent that that shall be done.

MR. FERRY. I am willing to yield to allow a vote to be taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut yields for that purpose; and the question is on the motion to reconsider the vote rejecting the concurrent resolution, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Connors, Cragin, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Harlan, Kellogg, McDonald, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Rice, Stewart, Thayer, Welch, and Williams—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conkling, Corbett, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Grimes, Harris, Hendricks, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Ramsey, Robertson, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Vickers, Wade, Warner, Wiley, and Wilson—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morton, Ross, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Whyte, and Yates—16.

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator from Connecticut takes the floor the Chair will announce the appointment of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon, as a member of the Committee on Education in place of Mr. HARRIS, who was excused.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator from Connecticut will excuse me, I desire to make a motion to postpone the special order, with a view of taking up an appropriation bill of which I gave notice yesterday, provided it does not discommode the honorable Senator from Connecticut. If it is agreeable to him to go on on Monday I will make the motion.

MR. FERRY. It is entirely immaterial to me whether I go on to-day or Monday. I cannot, however, yield the floor without the consent of the Senator from Nevada, who has in charge the resolution upon which I am to speak; but I will say, so far as I am myself concerned, that I am entirely indifferent whether I go on to-day or Monday. I refer the Senator from Maine to the Senator from Nevada.

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. I submit the motion to postpone.

MR. STEWART. I object to the motion.

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to submit it. I have the floor. I do not yield to the Senator.

MR. STEWART. The Senator from Connecticut has not yielded the floor.

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. I think I have the floor. I move to postpone the special order and all other orders and proceed to the consideration of—

MR. STEWART. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield for that motion?

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not yield to the Senator from Nevada at present.

MR. STEWART. I rise to a point of order.

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. I call the Senator from Nevada to order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine must not be interrupted until he can make his motion.

MR. STEWART. I rise to a point of order, that he is not in order in making the motion.

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. I believe the Chair recognized me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine had the floor, and the Chair supposes that it is in order for him to make a motion or to state what the motion is.

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to postpone the special order and take up the bill (H. R. No. 1564) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1870.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the special order and all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill indicated by him.

MR. STEWART. I believe that motion opens the merits of the resolution, because if it is postponed it is perfectly obvious that it cannot be passed at this session, and there will be no use in trying to call it up again. The speeches upon it will soon conclude now; but if it is passed over it will be rediscussed and it will be the end of the whole proposition for the session. I should so regard it. If the appropriation bills are now to come in, and then the Committee on Finance are allowed to present their business and we cannot reach a vote now when we have the resolution under consideration, it will be impossible to pass this constitutional amendment at the present session. Upon this motion, to see whether the Senate will consider it at all, I call for the yeas and nays.

MR. FERRY. As I stated, it is entirely immaterial to me whether I go on to-day or on Monday with my remarks upon the constitutional amendment. I do, however, feel that that amendment is so important, and the necessity for the action of the Senate upon it is so great, that I should very much dislike that any action of mine should displace the consideration of that amendment and allow other business to come in and take the place of it. I supposed that the Senator from Maine would merely ask to have the pending order laid aside informally, not absolutely to displace it. I should be unwilling, not on account of my own convenience but on account of public interests, to have the special order absolutely displaced.

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. I did not make that motion, because I was advised by the honorable Senator from Nevada that he would oppose the proposition. So I made the only motion I could make. Of course I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Connecticut; and I first ascertained before making the motion that it would not be disagreeable to his wishes. It is now a question for the Senate, and I address myself to the Senate. I have here four appropriation bills of a character which I think can all be disposed of to-day. They are all that have been sent to the Senate from the House of Representatives.

MR. SUMNER. Will the Senator mention the names of the bills?

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. They are the bills making appropriations for pensions, the Military Academy, the naval service, and for consular and diplomatic expenses. I am sure they can all be disposed of to-day, and we can make that progress toward the completion of the appropriation bills. I need not say that at this late day in the session it seems to be quite indispensable that we should make that much progress. On Monday we are to have the Indian appropriation bill, and very soon after that the Army appropriation bill, and a little later the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which the Senate well knows will very likely occupy their time exclusively for several days. Therefore, if the Senate intend to hold me or the Committee on Appropriations responsible for due progress in these bills, I feel it my bounden duty to urge their consideration on the Senate at the present time.

I wish to suggest another consideration to the honorable Senator from Nevada, who has charge of the measure which is the special order. To-day, I am told, the House of Representatives will send to the Senate a similar proposition for the amendment of the Constitution; I do not know but one precisely identical with this. If the Senate shall be able to adopt the proposition which may come from the other House, that will end the whole matter. I suggest, therefore, to the Senator from Nevada whether he will not, with the Senator from Connecticut, concur in my proposition, and allow the constitutional amendment to pass over until Monday. By that time we shall probably have an amendment from the other House, and then the Senate will have the whole subject before it. I hope, therefore, that there will be no objection to my proposition, and if the Senator from Nevada chooses, I am quite willing that the special order shall go by informally so as not to lose its place, and be in order on Monday, and I will endeavor to make such progress in the appropriation bills to-day as to be out of the way of it.

MR. STEWART. I am very fearful that if the constitutional amendment is postponed it is the end of it for the session.

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. Oh, no.

MR. STEWART. The chairman of the Committee on Finance is pressing his financial measures, and he will soon call on the Senate to act upon them. The Indian appropriation bill will be here on Monday.

MR. MORRILL, of Maine. It has to go to the committee.

MR. STEWART. As to the proposition pending in the other House, if it comes in here to-day it can just as well be considered in connection with this. There are several gentlemen who wish to speak, and their speeches will be made in any event whenever the question is taken up. If we postpone it, it will cause more speeches to be made. I shall regard it as a loss of the measure if it is now laid aside. The appropriation bills will go through anyhow, but if this amendment is laid over now it will be postponed so late that I fear it will be impossible to pass it at this session. I shall insist upon the yeas and nays. I want to take the sense of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Oh, no; you had better let it go over informally.

Mr. STEWART. No; I insist upon the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to postpone the unfinished business of yesterday and all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill named by him, and upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cole, Corbett, Davis, Dozelle, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Hendricks, Hewo, Kellogg, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Whyte, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Conkling, Conness, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Stewart, Thayer, Wade, Warner, and Welch—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Chandler, Cragin, Howard, McDonald, Morton, Norton, Robertson, Salisbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Tipton, and Yates—14.

So the motion was agreed to.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is postponed, and the question now is on taking up the bill indicated by the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1564) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1870, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Two amendments were reported by the Committee on Appropriations. The first was in line seven to strike out "ten" before "million" and insert "nine;" so as to make the clause read "for invalid pensions under various acts, $9,000,000."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will state briefly to the Senate what this bill is, and the amendments that are proposed. The bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, appropriated $10,000,000 for invalid pensions and $13,000,000 for pensions to widows, children, mothers, fathers, brothers, and sisters of soldiers. The bill, as reported by our committee, appropriates $9,000,000 for invalid pensions and $10,000,000 for the other class; and these two sums are considered by the committee to be ample. I will make a statement in regard to the number of pensioners to show that we are not mistaken.

The number of persons actually on the rolls as invalid pensioners on the 30th of June, 1863, was seventy-four thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, requiring an expenditure of $6,828,000. The number on the rolls on the 30th of June, 1867, was seventy thousand, and the estimated increase for that year was ten thousand, while as matter of fact the increase was only four thousand seven hundred and eighty-two. Making a proportionate estimate for this year, the committee are satisfied that $9,000,000 will be abundant to meet all the expenditures that may be required for that purpose, and accordingly we reduced the appropriation from $10,000,000 to $9,000,000.

The same may be said of the other item of the bill for pensions to widows, children, &c. There were on the rolls on the 30th of June, 1867, eighty-eight thousand of that class of pensioners, and the estimated increase for the year ending June 30, 1868, was twenty thousand, but as matter of fact only four thousand were added. Making the same estimate for the present year, we are satisfied that the appropriation of the House is at least $3,000,000 more than is absolutely necessary. For these reasons the committee have reported these amendments.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twenty-three to strike out "thirteen" before "million" and insert "ten."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1596.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1596) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line fifteen after the word "expenses" to strike out "$57,000" and insert "$61,930;" so that the clause will read, "for current and ordinary expenses, $61,930."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-five to strike out "for addition to soldiers' hospital, $2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1599.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1599) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1870, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was on page 2, line twenty-seven, to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$50,000;" so that the clause will read:

Navy-yard at Boston:
For repairs of buildings and repairs of all kinds, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line thirty-four, to strike out "$80,000" and insert "$50,000;" so as to read:

Navy-yard at Washington:
For repairs of all kinds, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines forty-eight and forty-nine to strike out:

Naval Asylum at Key West:
For necessary repairs of wharves and buildings, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line sixty-one to insert:

Provided, That this appropriation, and all amounts hereafter appropriated for the support of the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, the beneficiaries therein, the pay of officers, repairs, contingent and other expenses shall be charged to and paid from the income of the naval pension fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines one hundred and one and one hundred and two in the following words:

For compass stations, and for repairs and care of same, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 6 to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$3,000;" so as to read:

For bunting and other material for flags, and for making and repairing flags of all kinds for the Navy, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and forty-three to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$8,000;" so as to read:

For freight and transportation of navigation materials, instruments, books, and stores, postage on public letters, telegraphing on public business, advertising for proposals, packing-boxes and material, blank books, forms, and stationery at navigation offices, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines one hundred and forty-eight to one hundred and sixty-four inclusive, as follows:

For one professor of the French language, $1,800; for five assistant professors of the French language, $7,000; one professor of the Spanish language, $1,800; two assistant professors of the Spanish language, $2,800; one professor of drawing and draughting, $1,800; three assistant professors of drawing and draughting, $4,200; one sword master, $1,200; two assistant sword masters, $1,600; one boxing master and gymnast, $1,200; making in all $23,400; and all professors, assistant professors, and others on duty or employed in the Naval Academy, excepting those herewith designated, shall be detailed from the officers, petty officers, and men of the Navy, and shall receive no pay or allowances except their pay as such officers or men.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

For pay of professors and others, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and sixty-nine to reduce the appropriation "for contingent expenses of the Naval Academy from $63,450 to $61,450."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line one hundred and seventy-one to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$8,680;" so as to read: "for necessary repairs of quarters, &c., $8,680," [at the Naval Academy.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to strike out the words "and so forth."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be considered as agreed to unless objected to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out line one hundred and eighty-three under the head of "Naval Observatory," as follows:

For salary of three aids, $4,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For salary of first assistant astronomer, $1,800.
For salary of second assistant astronomer, $1,600.
For salary of third assistant astronomer, $1,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out in line one hundred and ninety-one "$20,500" and insert "$16,200;" so as to read:

For preparing for publication the American Nautical Almanac, namely, for pay of computers and clerk, $16,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line one hundred and ninety three, to insert:

For erecting suitable frame building and mounting transit circle in it, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and fourteen, to strike out "$2,000,000;" and insert "$3,000,000;" so that the clause will read:

Bureau of Construction and Repairs:
For preservation of wood and iron vessels and ships in ordinary, and for those that are on the stocks; vessels for the Naval Academy; for purchase of material and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yard; transportation of material, repair of vessels, and maintenance of the Navy afloat, $3,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line two hundred and forty-five, after the word "work" to insert the word "and," and in line two hundred and forty-six after the word "furniture" to strike out the words "and so forth;" so that the clause will read:

Bureau of Medicine and Surgery:
For necessary repairs and improvements of hospitals and appendages, including roads, wharves, walls, outhouses, sidewalks, fences, gardens, farms, painting, glazing, blacksmiths', plumbers', and masons' work, and for furniture, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the third section of the bill in the following words:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no accounting officer of the Treasury shall pass or allow any account for payment whatever in excess or beyond the appropriation herein made for or during the fiscal year.

Mr. BUCKALEW. There is some question made about this. It is obvious that although the object may be proper the effect of this section of the bill would work very improperly and produce no reform. There is no reason for rejecting at the Treasury items of expenditure that have been lawfully incurred. You cannot get reform in that manner. You must strike at a higher point than the point of payment. You must strike at the authority to make expenditures in some way and curb and limit that. Where you have outstanding laws authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury or any officer under him to incur an obligation the Government must meet it. Merely stopping payment at the Treasury would produce no reform at all. It seems a very absurd provision, and therefore I agree with the members of the committee to strike it out. It will only produce the necessity of appropriating money hereafter.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire simply to say that if this is enacted into a law the Navy Department or any other Department cannot be run thirty days after the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That there ought to be a correction in this direction is beyond all question. I think that the check ought to be upon Congress rather than the executive officers. With a full knowledge last year that the appropriations would not supply the demands of the public service as those demands were provided for by existing laws, Congress deliberately, with a view to a coming election, made appropriations knowing that they were not sufficient to carry on the Government. Now, the question simply was at the Departments whether they should stop the machinery of the Government so far as it was not provided for.

If the purpose of this amendment is to impose upon Congress the necessity of making the appropriations exactly according to the requirements of law, then it will do some good, perhaps, and I am in favor of the provision. I do not quite agree with the Senator from Iowa, who thinks the Navy Department cannot be carried on two months. I think his statement amounts to just this: that here is an appropriation bill under pretense of supplying the Department, as that Department is now organized under the law, and there is not an appropriation sufficient to carry it on for two months. That is the statement of the distinguished chairman of the Naval Committee. Then here, under pretense of providing for the service, as the law requires the service to be carried on, you do not provide except for one sixth of the year; and what is the policy, then, with that statement plainly made? The policy is that the lack, that which is not provided for now, shall be provided for in a deficiency bill. I think deficiency bills have grown to be a great evil. They used to be complained of when they were but for a few thousand dollars; now that they have gone up to very many millions of dollars we become accustomed to them. I think they should be stopped. Therefore I think this provision ought to be left in the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Indiana entirely misapprehended what I said. I am not objecting to the fact that some of these appropriations are below what I think they ought to be; but if he will notice the phraseology of this section he will observe that it reads thus: "No accounting officer of the Treasury shall pass or allow any account for payment." They are not only not authorized to pay, but they are not authorized to allow or adjust for payment. Here is an appropriation perhaps of several hundred thousand dollars that has not yet lapsed, which was made last year to carry out some specific purpose. We have made the appropriations in this bill with the knowledge on the part of the Appropriation Committee that there is such an amount still standing to the credit of that particular appropriation or that particular bureau, and yet the auditing officers are not to be allowed to audit and adjust an account to be paid out of that balance which exceeds the specific sum appropriated in this bill to that purpose.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know that I understand the Senator. Does he mean that the appropriations already made, which do not go back into the Treasury again for two years from the date of their enactment, cannot be used if this section passes?

Mr. GRIMES. I understand so.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think that will be the construction put upon it. I think that is a forced construction. I want the officers who disburse the public moneys to know that if they pay out money without authority of law their accounts cannot be settled. Then you will stop the evil and strike at the root, as I think.

Mr. GRIMES. The provision is that "no accounting officer of the Treasury shall pass or allow"—not that he shall not pay, but that he shall not pass or allow—"any account of a payment whatever in excess or beyond the appropriation herein made." Take a case; there may be $100,000 lying over in the hands of the Treasury to the credit of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, made for the purpose of purchasing coal, which was not all expended last year. We know that there is that amount of money in the Treasury to the credit of that fund, and therefore we do not appropriate in this bill as much to that fund for the next fiscal year as we should appropriate if we did not know that there was that amount to the credit of the fund. Under this provision the officer having the disbursement of that fund would not be permitted to have his accounts audited and adjusted if it became necessary to use that $100,000 still lying to his credit in the Treasury in excess of the amount we herein appropriate for that specific purpose.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That trouble is easily remedied by striking out in the fourth line the words "herein made for or during the fiscal year" and insert "authorizing such payment." I move that amendment so as to make the section read:

That no accounting officer of the Treasury shall pass or allow any account for payment whatever in excess or beyond the appropriation authorizing such payment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator will get exactly to where the law is now. Of course, as far as any beneficial object is concerned, at worst the Treasury cannot make payment after an appropriation is exhausted, nor can they make any payment where the object is not covered by some existing appropriation. Now, observe, the absurdity of this section is this, that it does not interpose any difficulty in the way of a claimant as to receiving his money; it is striking merely at the settlement of an account, at the ascertainment of a demand on the Treasury. It can therefore produce no reform. My objection to the section is not that it may tend to decrease the expenses of the Government, but that it strikes at a point where it can by no possibility produce any reform whatever.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the amendment that I desire will be secured by simply striking out the words heretofore mentioned in the fourth line and inserting merely the word "therefor," so as to make the section read:

That no accounting officer of the Treasury shall pass or allow any account for payment whatever in excess or beyond the appropriation therefor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think the honorable Senator from Indiana will find it very difficult to tell precisely what the effect of this proposition would be upon the general service, if it were passed. It will be remembered that last year, on a similar bill, an attempt was made to regulate this matter, and the committee were rather of opinion that, so far as they could see, it was properly arranged last year. We could not tell precisely the effect of such a proposition as this upon this branch of the service, and it was for that reason rather than any other that the committee came to the conclusion that it was safer on the whole to strike it out; because it is not our particular function to ascertain precisely the effect of general legislation on the service, but rather to provide the means necessary to carry it on. If we could know precisely what the effect of this would be, I might be quite willing to let it go on this bill. But it was the uncertainty of its effect which led the committee to propose to strike it off. If the House of Representatives do not agree to striking out the proposition, and have better light on the subject than we have, a committee of conference can make an arrangement, and we may agree perhaps upon a proposition which will be safe. I suggest, therefore, to the Senator from Indiana, whether he had not better, on the whole, allow the Senate to concur in the amendment of the committee to strike out the section, and let us act in some way, under some circumstances, when we can know what the effect will be on the public service. I am not clear that the amendment which he proposes would obviate the difficulty.

Mr. SHERMAN. My attention is just called to this third section, and I think the Senator from Indiana, on a moment's reflection, must perceive that it will be utterly impracticable. The provision is that "no accounting officer of the Treasury shall pass or allow any account for payment whatever in excess or beyond the appropriation herein made for or during the fiscal year." The accounting officers of the Treasury have nothing to do with the appropriations. The money goes into the hands of the disbursing officers, and the only question with the accounting officers is whether it has been paid out in pursuance of law for a purpose provided by law. The accounting and disbursing officers are different sets of officers entirely. The Treasurer of the United States pays no money; he dare pay no money except in pursuance of an appropriation. If he does he violates the Constitution. But the accounting officers are officers of entirely distinct functions. The Third Auditor passes upon the accounts of the paymasters. The Third Auditor does not know where the paymaster gets his money, who paid it to him, out of what fund it comes, or anything about it. He only requires the paymaster to account for the money in his hands by proper vouchers made out according to law and in pursuance of law. It seems to me, then, that if the House of Representatives intended to correct any abuses by this section they do not accomplish it. In my judgment, the section which the Senate passed at the last session of Congress would accomplish it and prevent money being paid out of the Treasury except in pursuance of an appropriation, because we forbade the transfer of appropriations except in particular cases. That is the only way in which we can prevent it.

Mr. GRIMES. This will accomplish a great deal; it will tie up all the accounts of the Navy Department without being audited.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; but this will not accomplish the purpose the House of Representatives evidently designed.

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly not.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will simply embarrass the accounting officers. When they are looking over a paymaster's accounts they will have to stop and see whether the money has been appropriated. Now, they have nothing in the world to do with that. Many paymasters' accounts are yet to be settled. The accounts of a paymaster who paid out money a year ago may be settled, while those of one who paid out money three years ago may not yet be settled. It strikes me that this section is clearly wrong, and whatever may have been the intention of it it will not accomplish the purpose the House designed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not have sufficient knowledge of the complicated machinery of the Treasury Department to answer the suggestions of the Senator from Ohio; but I had supposed that when an accounting officer passed upon the accounts of a disbursing officer he could go one step further than the mere inquiry whether a payment was provided for by law, and ascertain also whether the disbursing officer had gone beyond the appropriation. I supposed that was an inquiry that was possible by the accounting officers, the Auditor and the Comptroller. I think that the House of Representatives by this proposition is aiming at a very important reform. It is not right that Congress shall provide for a certain public service and then make a partial appropriation to carry on that service, and the administrative officer go beyond that appropriation, with the hope of having the matter settled in a deficiency bill. That whole system is an evil, and it is an evil of long standing, not of this administration or of the one before it; but for twenty years I believe this evil has been complained of. I suppose the House of Representatives thought it could be corrected in this way; but if gentlemen who are so familiar with the machinery of the Treasury say that this particular proposition is not practicable or is of doubtful propriety I shall not insist; and therefore, at the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Finance and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I for the present withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the section.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the vote is taken I desire simply to state that the Senator from Indiana must be aware that the ordinary mode of getting money is by requisition drawn by an executive officer upon the Secretary of the Treasury. It is the business of the Secretary to examine first and see whether an appropriation has been made by Congress, without which the money cannot be paid. Upon receiving his sanction, a proper draft is drawn on the Treasurer, and that is signed and countersigned. The Auditor has nothing to do with the requisition and nothing to do with the appropriations. That has always been the way from the foundation of the Government.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Ohio, as a matter of fact, if every year payments are not made for carrying on the public service in excess of appropriations, and if it has not gone up to hundreds of millions of dollars a year? It is an evil that ought to be corrected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that at the last session the evil of transferring appropriations under authority given to heads of Departments to transfer appropriations from one head to another had grown to be such a fearful abuse that the Committee on Finance undertook by a radical change to correct it; but for some reason or other our proposition was very much modified before it was finally enacted in one of the appropriation bills. As it now stands, all transfers are prohibited except of certain classes of appropriations in the Navy and War Departments. The accounting officers have nothing to do with questions of appropriation. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have an amendment to propose from the Committee on Appropriations to come in after line two hundred and eight:

That the officer in charge of ordnance and gunnery experiments at the Washington navy-yard shall receive the same pay, and no greater pay, than the officers of the same grade performing other shore duty.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the eighth section of an "Act entitled an act to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy," approved March 2, 1867, as authorized the annual selection of ten enlisted apprentices for appointment as midshipmen to the Naval Academy be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know what the effect of that is.

Mr. GRIMES. It takes away the appointment of ten midshipmen from the enlisted apprentices of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRAKE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the first section of the act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1853, as declares that the salary of the secretary of the Naval Academy shall be $1,250 per annum be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the salary of said secretary from and after the 30th day of June, 1868, shall be at the rate of $1,600 per annum.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to have the Senator explain that amendment.

Mr. DRAKE. I will explain it. In the act referred to in the amendment, passed in 1852, the salary of this officer was fixed at $1,250. In 1862 the estimate of the Department was, and every year since has been, for an appropriation of $1,600 for this office; but the secretary has never been able to get of that any more than the $1,250, because of an omission to repeal the previous limitation on the salary, though the appropriation has been made on the basis of $1,600 now ever since the year 1861. Last year an act was passed requiring unexpended appropriations to the credit of the Navy Department standing on the 30th of June, 1868, to be passed into the Treasury, and, therefore, there is no unexpended appropriation on this account which could be given to that office for a period anterior to that date.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This amendment, then, is to put the law in harmony with the appropriations?

Mr. DRAKE. Entirely so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does it cover past arrearages?

Mr. DRAKE. It covers only from the 1st day of July, 1868. All the unexpended arrearages prior to that time have gone back into the Treasury again, and he can get nothing in the past beyond the 1st of July, 1868.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer the following amendment:

For observation of the eclipse of the sun in August, under the direction of the superintendent of the Nautical Almanac, $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer, in accordance with the notice I gave a day or two ago, the following amendment:

For improving the mouth of the harbor at the Midway Islands, in the Pacific ocean, $50,000.

I should like to have the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs on this subject read. The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

"The Committee on Naval Affairs having, by resolution of the Senate, passed December 16, 1868, been directed to inquire into the practicability, expediency, and probable cost of deepening the entrance to the harbor of Midway Islands, in the Pacific ocean, so as to afford a safe rendezvous and port of refuge and resort for the naval and merchant vessels of the United States," beg leave to report:

"The Midway Islands, so called from their position nearly midway between California and Japan, are situated in latitude 28° 12' north, longitude 170° 22' west, and distant from San Francisco twenty-eight hundred nautical miles, from the coast of Japan twenty-two hundred miles, and from Honolulu twelve hundred miles. They were discovered on the 5th of July, 1869, by Captain N. C. Brooks, an American ship-master, commanding the bark Gambia, owned by American citizens, though sailed under the Hawaiian flag; were first occupied by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company in July, 1867, and on the 28th of the following month were formally taken possession of in the name of the United States by Captain William Reynolds, commanding the United States steamer Lackawanna, by order of the Secretary of the Navy.

"The group consists of two islands of coralline formation, the most important being a mile and a half long, three-quarters of a mile broad, and fifty-seven feet high, inclosed in an encircling coral reef open on the west so as to form an entrance eight hundred feet wide to a roomy, deep, and safe harbor, sheltered against the prevailing winds. There is not sufficient water in the bar, however, to admit vessels drawing over eighteen feet. There is no vegetation of any consequence on either island, but a plentiful supply of good fresh water is found there. The climate is mild and healthful at all seasons.

"Practicability of deepening the entrance.—The reports and charts accompanying show that the bar is quite narrow and has an uneven bottom of coral rock and small sand holes, its depth changing instantly and often from three and a half to three fathoms, the least depth found at low water being eighteen feet. The tide rises eighteen inches at neap, and spring tides three feet." (Report of Captain Reynolds.)

"Your committee are of opinion, after considering the reports of the Secretary of the Navy, of Rear Admiral Thatcher, under whose orders the surveys were made, of Commodore Jenkins, chief of the Bureau of Navigation, and of Captain Reynolds, who personally examined and surveyed the locality, that there can be no doubt of the entire practicability of removing the obstructions by simple methods so as to give a uniform depth of twenty-four feet at low water, sufficient to admit our largest ships of war. All the officers named concur in this view.

"Expediency.—Your committee consider it most important, in every point of view, that this work be undertaken immediately. By it access will be given to one of the finest harbors in the world, safe and roomy, and the naval and merchant vessels of America will find under their own flag, just at the point where the growth and development of our national interests and commerce indicate the need, a rendezvous and port of refuge and resort. The Navy will be enabled to procure coals and supplies there conveniently and economically. In concerted operations between the Asiatic and North Pacific squadrons, especially in the event of a foreign war, this station would play a most important part, and besides lending increased efficiency thereto would render a smaller number of vessels necessary for the protection of our commerce on the Pacific ocean. The large steamers of the California and China mail line will be able to coal there regularly, thus greatly reducing their heavy loads and increasing their speed, while at the same time giving frequent and regular communication. Our large whaling fleet in the North Pacific, now driven to winter in Japan or the Sandwich Islands, will find at the Midway Islands a national port with superior advantages, where they can send and receive letters and send home their products in fortunate seasons. Nor should it be forgotten that if we neglect the prize other nations will not be slow to grasp it, and we may find in some future war another Nassau shielding with its neutral flag other Alabamas and Floridas, the destroyers of our commerce on the Pacific, and enabling them to carry on their piratical attacks with convenience and safety.

"There is no other port available for our naval and merchant vessels between California and Japan.

"Cost.—In the absence of surveys and examinations specially undertaken by experts for the particular purpose of determining the exact areas of rock to be removed, and by a series of experiments on the spot, the exact cost of removing a given quantity, no estimate can be formed with accuracy. But in view of the manifest importance of the work, and its great value, and believing that the expense of an expedition to make such preliminary examinations and experiments would go far towards accomplishing the substantial result sought, your committee beg leave to recommend that a liberal provision be at once made for the work by inserting in the naval appropriation bill an appropriation of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for deepening the entrance to the harbor of Midway Islands, in the Pacific Ocean so as to afford a safe rendezvous and port of refuge and resort for the naval and merchant vessels of the United States, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, if in his judgment expedient, after preliminary examination of the situation of the Islands."

Mr. NYE. I see that there is a mistake of a thousand miles in the distance stated in the report.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the character of this proposition. I thought at first that perhaps it ought to go to the Committee on Commerce, having charge of the river and harbor bill; but it is obvious enough that I was mistaken about that, because this is not a harbor belonging to the United States. It occurs to me that there may be another question which the Senate ought to be apprized of. This is an appropriation of $50,000 to improve a harbor midway between this country and China and Japan. Will the Senator from Nevada who offers the amendment tell us whose island that is?

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir. The island was discovered about three years ago by an American citizen by the name of Brooks, and taken possession of in the name of the United States and by hoisting the flag of the United States. Since that time it has been formally taken possession of by Commodore Thatcher, acting under the orders of the Government. It is the first island ever taken possession of by the United States since it was a Government.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But there is no information before the Senate in the communication which has been read that it belongs to the Government of the United States. I do not raise that question if the honorable Senator understands that to be the fact, that the Government has taken formal possession of it and there is no adverse claim.

Mr. NYE. None whatever, as the papers show.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I suggest to the Senate and to the honorable Senator that it is not customary to make appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors upon an estimate previously made. As this communication suggests that it is impossible even to make an approximate estimate of the expenditures necessary to make the contemplated improvement, I submit whether it is not advisable upon the whole to have a preliminary survey antecedent to the appropriation, whether it is safe to make this appropriation of $50,000 with any other view at least than to require such preliminary survey. It may turn out on a survey and examination by experts that it is not advisable to make any appropriation at all.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I regret very much that the documents upon which this appropriation is asked have not returned from the printer. They are full of interest, and to me were very instructive.

This island was discovered by Captain Brooks, and the discovery being made known to the Government the Navy Department at once ordered one or two men of war to go and ascertain the whereabouts and the exact position of things at that island. The Lackawanna was one of the ships sent on that expedition. There is in the papers a full description of the surveys they made. I have lying before me the maps that show their exact locality and exhibit at once the attitude which these islands present—that preliminary survey which the honorable Senator suggests has been made, but not with that particularity upon which an exact estimate could be made of the cost of the work. The officers who made the soundings, however, report that they find that the mouth of this harbor is of a broken coral intermixed with sand, which can easily be removed by a dredging-machine. The papers to which I have referred give the cost of the dredging-machine, the cost of operating it per day, and the probable cost of getting it there. The officers ask for an appropriation of $100,000; but the committee deemed it prudent to recommend an appropriation of $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the Navy Department, or so much thereof as may be necessary to remove the obstacles, or if that is not done, to ascertain exactly what it will cost.

The importance of immediate action upon this subject perhaps cannot be overestimated. It is a long, weary passage of six thousand miles and more from the Pacific coast to China and Japan. Heretofore, upon that long and somewhat dangerous passage, where the typhoons play the mischief with shipping, there has not been a resting-place nor a harbor of refuge in the whole distance. A crippled ship must remain crippled, perfectly at the mercy of winds and waves, for that long distance, unless she can reach Honolulu—twelve hundred miles southeast of this, I think—or she must wait the chances of being picked up.

It is perhaps proper for me to say that the pathway of these ocean steamers is entirely out of the direction in which most of the sailing crafts go. They go that way when they are going down from the north to winter at Honolulu. Our whalers, who are now whaling in the northern seas of the Pacific, have to go to Honolulu every year to winter. But if this improvement is made they can winter at these islands, where there is plenty of fresh water, and save some twenty-four hundred miles of somewhat dangerous navigation.

I remarked to the honorable Senator that this was the first island that had ever been taken possession of by this Government. Right here under our very noses, within two hundred miles of our coast, is a series of islands which have cost this nation more than it would have done to purchase them, by furnishing harbors to piratical crafts and the depredations they were enabled to commit upon us during the late struggle.

I desire also to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Pacific ocean is fast becoming the great commercial thoroughfare of the world. It is growing in importance every day; and these islands seem to have been providentially thrown up in the mid-ocean and the coral reefs formed on purpose to give a resting place for the wearied sailor in distress. It will be remembered by the Senate that the rebel steamer Florida found her way into the Pacific ocean and committed a series of depredations entirely destructive to the great whaling interests of the East and of the West—a series of depredations that were seriously offensive in every way. If the harbor at one of these islands, taken possession of as they have been by the United States can be made available, as all the reports from scientific naval men say that it can, then we have the key to the navigation of the Pacific, and no marauders can find rest there. If we go twelve hundred miles south to Honolulu we are there under a flag that is unable to protect us, and we are prohibited by law from protecting ourselves within certain limits of its territory. I think, therefore, it will be the sense of the Senate that this is an opportune discovery, and that this is an opportune moment for us to do so much, at least, as to show that we are going to make there a harbor not only for our own but for the shipping of other nations. To me it seems very important to the whole commercial world.

One other suggestion and I will close what I have to say on this subject. The steamers on these long voyages of six thousand miles have to take a very large proportion of their carrying capacity to carry fuel. It will be remembered by the Senate that these ships are in the habit of doing their business in this way: they take coal, for instance, by sailing vessels to their depot, from Panama to Acapulco; there they have a coaling station between Panama and San Francisco, where the coal is taken by sailing vessels; and there the steamers always have a large and ample supply of coal. By that process they are enabled to carry a much larger amount of freight. The Senate will see that for a voyage of six thousand miles, where they burn seventy tons of coal a day and the passage takes twenty-two days, it requires a ship of enormous size to carry large quantities of freight aside from this coal.

There will be another advantage incident to this improvement, and I speak of it now in a governmental sense, aside from the merchant marine. I say it is a necessity in a time of war and a necessity in time of peace. It will not be forgotten by the Senate that we are sending every year a fleet of ships to the eastern coast, to China and Japan, from the Pacific coast. They go there and cruise and then are ordered back every two or three years, and other ships ordered to take their places. If this improvement is made those ships will not be obliged to load themselves down with coal at San Francisco or at Panama, or Acapulco, but they can run off to these Midway Islands, and there supply themselves. In time of peace this will be very useful; in time of war it will be indispensable. I therefore ask the favorable consideration of the Senate, in a national point of view, to this small expenditure for the improvement of this almost accidental island that seems to have sprung up just in the right time to give our growing commerce a resting place between the Pacific coast and the Indies.

Mr. COLE. I can add but little to what has been said by the Senator from Nevada upon this subject; but it strikes me that this is one of the most becoming applications for an appropriation that can be considered by the Senate. We have now a line of steamers plying between our Pacific coast and the coast of China and Japan, which need precisely the accommodation which this harbor on the Midway Islands will afford them if the harbor is made available by being improved in the way suggested by the Senator from Nevada. It appears to me that this appropriation is asked for with propriety upon the ground of economy and revenue. It is well understood that the steamships that traverse the Pacific are required in order to make the complete voyage to take a very large amount of fuel, and in fact small steamships cannot make the trip across the Pacific at all. If a coal depot can be established midway on this passage they will be enabled to make the passage across the Pacific ocean with a much less amount of fuel, half the amount perhaps, and the rest of the capacity of the ship may be devoted to freight and passengers.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I should like to ask the Senator the size of this island—the number of acres it contains?

Mr. DRAKE. Thirteen miles.

Mr. COLE. It is several miles in circumference—not thirteen miles, I take it, in length, but in circumference—and is in the form of a crater of a volcano, which probably it may have been at some time in the history of the world, geologically speaking. The commerce that is carried on across the Pacific in these steamships must, of course, be greatly increased if this depot is established midway on the passage, and in that way it must be an advantage to the Government of the United States to an amount severalfold greater than the amount that is now asked in the form of an appropriation, and this benefit will be yielded each year. I hope, therefore, that this appropriation will be granted at this time, for the reason that if it is put off from year to year the commerce of the Pacific will only be retarded in a greater degree by the delay.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, this proposition is not only a new one, but a peculiar one. I do not know why the amendment pertains to this bill necessarily rather than to the miscellaneous appropriation bill. The Committee on Appropriations had no knowledge of this amendment. They have had no opportunity of knowing about it; for although doubtless the rule was satisfied in the ordinary way by proposing the amendment in writing, it must have been done after the bill was reported to the Senate, so that no consideration of this amendment has been had.

Mr. NYE. After what bill was reported?

Mr. CONKLING. This bill. The appropriation bill.

Mr. NYE. I beg your pardon; it was reported before.

Mr. CONKLING. When was this amendment introduced?

Mr. NYE. Some days ago; I gave notice of it to the Chair.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Maine, how it was that this amendment never reached that committee? The Senator from Nevada thinks it was introduced before the bill was reported.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No. My recollection is that it did not reach the committee until after the bill was reported; but the rule does not require that it should.

Mr. CONKLING. No, Mr. President, I did not mean to intimate, I was careful, indeed, not to say that the rule required it should reach the committee before; but of course the spirit of the rule requiring notice to be given of an amendment is, that the committee having charge of the bill to which it is proposed may consider it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will allow me, I find that the amendment was referred yesterday.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I was right in my statement. Not only was it referred after the bill was reported, but it was not referred until yesterday, as the chairman of the committee now states. Mr. President, the obvious purpose of the rule is to add to the security of the general consideration of these amendments the consideration of the committee responsible for the bill. In this case, in fact, of course I did not mean to impute any blame to anybody about it, but by the action of time this amendment never has reached the committee, never has been considered by them. Therefore, as one member of the committee, I have no knowledge in regard to it; and that alone ought to prevent my objecting to it upon the merits because from want of information I should not be warranted in doing that.

This suggestion, however, occurs to me: no Senator seems to know that $50,000 will answer the purpose, and by consequence no Senator can know how much more than $50,000 will be needed. It seems to me that as there are papers relating to this subject which have not been before the Senate, and which certainly have not been before the Committee on Appropriations, it might be well, and perhaps be entirely satisfactory to Senators supporting the amendment, to allow it to stand and be considered in connection with the miscellaneous appropriation bill or any other bill to which perhaps just as appropriately as to this it might be annexed.

I suppose from the statement made that we may safely assume that the United States does own and will own these islands; but even that question is to be determined upon facts which only in a very general way now can be conveyed to the Senate. Without, therefore, meaning to interpose against this amendment upon its merits, which I have no information to warrant my doing, I suggest that it is of importance in itself and in future appropriations to which it may possibly point; and therefore, inasmuch as the Committee on Appropriations has not considered it, and has had no opportunity to consider it, there being other bills behind which must come here presently, it possibly may be the pleasure of the Senate, and not objectionable to the Senators supporting it, to allow it to stand, that it may be considered and annexed to another bill, if it is to be adopted at all.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I think I can answer the inquiry as to how this question comes before the Senate from the Committee on Naval Affairs. It was simply because the Senate, in the exercise of its own judgment, saw fit to intrust the examination of this subject to the Naval Committee. A proposition was introduced by some Senator, I do not know who, referring this subject to the Naval Committee, and instructing them to make such inquiries as they could as to the feasibility, the necessity, and the propriety of such an improvement, and of what value it would probably be to the Government. I suppose the reason why that resolution was introduced and thus referred was because Admiral Thatcher, who recently was in command of the North Pacific squadron, had a particular survey made of these islands and the harbor completely platted out, returned to the Navy Department with his recommendation that an appropriation should be made for the purpose of removing the obstructions just at the mouth of it. As has been said by my colleague on the committee, [Mr. NYE,] these Midway Islands are just about midway in the Pacific ocean, three thousand and some hundred miles from the Pacific coast of the United States and three thousand and some hundred miles from Japan. They have been recently discovered by United States sea captains, and have been taken possession of by us. They are reported by our naval officers to furnish an admirable harbor. On the bar, entering the harbor, there are eight feet of water at low tide, and perhaps twenty or twenty-one feet of water at high tide.

The committee, in the prosecution of their inquiries, addressed a note to the engineer officer in charge of the engineer department of the Army to get information from him as to what would be the probable expense of the removal of these obstructions. He answered us to the effect that he was not able to give us any very satisfactory information on the subject. Thereupon, the committee were compelled to rely upon such data as they could obtain from naval officers who were familiar with these coral reefs; and the committee were satisfied—I was satisfied, at any rate; I am not authorized to speak for the other members of the committee—that $50,000 would not be required to make the proper improvements at this harbor and remove this obstruction.

Now, the Senator from New York proposes that we allow this proposition to lie over and put it upon another appropriation bill. The objection to that is, that then it probably would not be intrusted to the same parties to make the improvement that it would be if it was incorporated into this bill. Allowing the Navy to make the improvement, authorizing it to be done under the Secretary of the Navy, who has the ships and the men already in the public employment, to go out and make the proper surveys and examinations and carry on the improvement it probably would not cost one tenth of what it would if you made the appropriation upon your ordinary river and harbor bill and authorized it to be done under the direction of the Secretary of War; because in that case vessels would have to be chartered or purchased, scows would have to be made, dredging-machines of a new construction would have to be made; whereas you now can take all the implements we have at the Mare Island navy-yard to be used for this purpose, and thereby save a very large amount of money.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the honorable Senator allow me to remark that I made no such suggestion as that which he is now considering. It never occurred to me, if this is to be done, that it should be done by any Department except the Navy Department; but why is it, if he will tell us, that on miscellaneous appropriation bills, for example, this very amendment cannot be attached with the direction in a word that it is to be done by the Navy Department?

Mr. GRIMES. Why is it that it should not be put on this naval appropriation bill? Is not the Senator willing to trust to the examination that the Naval Committee has been able to give to this subject? Is it vastly important that the Committee on Appropriations, of which he and I have the honor to be members, should consider it? Is that committee any more entitled to examine this subject, or entitled to greater credit for any examination they may make on a question of this kind, than the Naval Committee?

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me, I did not interrupt him for the purpose of making that suggestion. If the Senate is sufficiently informed on this subject—and the information which the Senator is now giving certainly goes far to that end—so be it; but if, in truth, any further investigation is desirable there can be no objection to putting the amendment on another bill rather than upon this. That is my point. Now, if the Senator thinks we know enough about it to put it on this bill, very good; if we do not, I submit to him, there is no objection whatever to selecting another bill rather than this on which to put it.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know what may be the condition of information of other members. All I can say is that I think the Senate has all the light on the subject they are able to obtain. I think that no question ever came before the Naval Committee where there was a greater effort to procure accurate information on a subject than there was on this. I regret extremely that the papers that accompanied the report of the committee have been sent for publication to the printer, and are not within the reach of the Senate at this time. This is a subject, I desire to state, in which I have no particular direct interest. The gentlemen representing the Pacific coast are very deeply interested in it. It is a question that certainly must address itself to the good judgment of every man who is largely interested in the commerce of the country, and it will be a great aid to the Navy of the United States and to our national defenses in the future. That is the reason I support it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I propose an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the Clerk's table and ask to have read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment so that it will read:

For deepening the entrance to the harbor of Midway Islands, in the Pacific ocean, so as to afford a safe rendezvous and port of refuge and resort for the naval and merchant vessels of the United States, $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, in his judgement, after a preliminary examination; he shall deem such expenditure expedient.

Mr. NYE. That is all right.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If that is acceptable perhaps it will obviate the difficulty.

Mr. NYE. I think that is right.

Mr. COLE. I understand the preliminary examination has already been had, and that this will result in the delay requisite to make another examination.

Mr. NYE. If they have a satisfactory survey now, of course they will not make another, but will act upon the survey already made.

Mr. COLE. If they have light enough on the subject now I do not see why there should be another examination or survey.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It will throw the responsibility upon the Secretary.

Mr. COLE. It seems to me the amendment would require another examination before the expenditure could be made.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is not the language of it.

Mr. NYE. The Navy Department are fully possessed of all the facts. It might be better to insert the words "if another examination is deemed necessary," but I guess it is well enough as it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as modified by the Senator from Maine.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer the following amendment as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the office of Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate General be, and the same is hereby, continued and established, and $8,000 are appropriated for the salary of said Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate General.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That office was created during the exigencies of the late civil war, and with an express provision that it should terminate with the war. We had this question up here last year and it was pretty largely discussed, and the inclination of the Senate seemed to be that it would not authorize the continuance of the office beyond the present year. I therefore wish the Senate to understand that this is for the establishment now of what I must regard as a new office in the Navy Department, and should like the Senate to vote upon the subject understandingly. That is the only purpose I had.

Mr. CRAGIN. It is true, as the Senator from Maine says, that this office was created during the rebellion. It was created in 1865, and was to continue during the war and one year thereafter; but Congress has annually, by appropriations, kept the office alive up to this time. The Committee on Naval Affairs, or those of us who have given the subject attention, are satisfied that this is an important office. The Secretary of the Navy states that there are very many important questions that arise requiring legal investigation, and that the salary paid to the Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate General is less than would be paid to special counsel if no such office as this existed. It appears that there is an intimate connection in some way between this office and the War Department, for I find here a letter from the Secretary of War, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, urging the continuance of this office.

Mr. GRIMES. Read it.

Mr. CRAGIN. It is dated—

JANUARY 16, 1890.

SIR: I desire to call your attention to a letter addressed by me to you during the last session of Congress relative to General Bowles, and reiterate what I then expressed, that I concur with the Secretary of the Navy and General Grant in the opinion that the public service will be promoted by continuing the office of Naval Solicitor and Judge Advocate General.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. M. SCOFIELD, Secretary of War.
Hon. J. W. GRIMES,
Chairman Senate Committee on Naval Affairs.

For these reasons and others the committee instructed me to offer this amendment. Of course I have no interest in it. My own private opinion is that it will be good policy and good economy to adopt it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I was not able to concur with the majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs in favor of this amendment. It is, perhaps, not a matter of great consequence. Possibly I ought not to occupy any of the time of the Senate about so small a matter. It only involves the expenditure of a few thousand dollars from the Treasury and the continuance in office of an officer who is not required by the public service. Such matters seem to be regarded as so trivial that it is hardly worth while to ask the attention of the Senate to them perhaps.

This office was created during the war, and by the law of its creation it was only to continue during the war. It was supposed that during the war there would be questions come before the Navy Department which for their examination would require a legal mind, and therefore the office of Judge Advocate General was created for that Department to continue during the war. At the close of the war it was found that there was still of that class of business a large amount undisposed of, and the office was continued for a year. Another year rolled around, and it was continued for another year upon the pretense that it was necessary to close up the business.

Now, Mr. President, it is proposed to make it a permanent office of the Navy Department. I do not believe it is required. The investigations of courts-martial that are held in the Navy Department do not require a court of justice for that Department. It is not as it is in the Army. There was no such officer as this known to the Department prior to the war. The proposition is now presented for the first time to the Senate, and I ask the attention of Senators to the fact, to make the office of Judge Advocate General a permanent office in the Navy Department. It is against the express judgment of the Senate and of Congress every time an opinion has been expressed upon it.

I was in the committee and heard the statement of the gentleman who holds the office. I heard him explain what he has to do; the class and extent of business that comes before him; and I do not believe that he ought to be continued as a permanent officer of the Department. We can as well relieve the Treasury of the expense connected with continuing this office as not; at least that is my judgment, and it is a judgment formed upon his own statement of the amount of business that calls for his continuance in office. I shall not care very much if the Senate determine to continue it, as there are so many offices being continued now; but I should like to see a discontinuance of an office that is not necessary.

Mr. DRAKE. I desire to say a word in reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Indiana concerning this office. After a full examination of the subject the majority of the Naval Committee came to the conclusion that it was better to establish the office permanently.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to make one other statement which I intended to make, and then he can answer the whole?

Mr. DRAKE. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This amendment proposes to reverse the judgment of Congress at the last session. Congress decided then that the office should be discontinued unless expressly continued, expressing their purpose at the last session to discontinue the office.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not see exactly that the action of Congress at the last session is to be regarded as precisely in the light in which the honorable Senator from Indiana states it. My recollection is, that the appropriation for the office was continued only until the 4th of March, and that if Congress did not in the mean time continue the office beyond the 4th of March then it should cease. They did not decide in that that the office should be discontinued, but left it for the decision of the Congress at this session whether it should be discontinued.

Now, Mr. President, this office is desired very much by the Navy Department. The Secretary of the Navy has written a letter to the Committee on Naval Affairs, urging the permanency of the office; and the very ground that he puts it upon is one which, if true, as I doubt not it is, completely overthrows the principal position taken by the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Indiana says we can save the expense of this office to the Government. To that I reply, upon the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, that if this office is dispensed with the Navy Department will have to pay more money for special counsel than the salary of the office amounts to; so that the refusal to establish the office will be unquestionably an expense to the Government instead of a saving of money.

I have examined this matter, Mr. President, with as much skill and care as I could. Here is an officer who is not only to be the Judge Advocate General of the Navy Department, but the Solicitor of the Navy Department as well—two functions combined in the same office. I have examined the ground as well as I could, as thoroughly as I could, and the conclusion that I have come to is just the reverse of that which the honorable Senator from Indiana has expressed. I really believe that the interests of the service and the interests of the Treasury will be subserved by making this a permanent office. You have a Judge Advocate General, an Assistant Judge Advocate General, and a corps of ten or a dozen judge advocates in the Army; and here for the whole naval service a single solicitor and judge advocate is begrudged. I think it would be unwise and impolitic and expensive to the Government to refuse to provide for this office.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not know whether it would be wise or not to make this a permanent office; but I am satisfied it ought not to be discontinued this year. The office is now filled by a gentleman who is well read and thoroughly furnished at all points in the law, and I have no question but that he has saved the Government ten times over his salary for all the time he has been employed therein. I trust we shall at least provide that he may be continued for a year longer.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not wish to occupy more than a moment upon this proposition. The statements made by the Senator from Indiana in connection with this office are strictly correct. The Senate has said time and again that it was a provisional office. It was created during the war because of the excess of public business connected with that Department; and now, with not a speck of war or a speck of the war left remaining, it is proposed to erect it into a permanent office. I hope it will not be done.

I regret that my friend from Vermont, always economical, mostly too much so, advocates its provisional retention upon the ground that it is filled by a particular person, or a person perhaps, more correctly stated, of particular qualities. Why, sir, when a man gets into office he always has those qualities; he is always a good man; you cannot do without him; there is not in the country his like; and the wonder is that when officeholders die, as they rarely do, their like can ever be found again. [Laughter.]

I hope that no permanent office of this sort will be created. I hope that it will not be kept existing any longer as a temporary institution either, but will be abolished, as I believe it stands abolished now, if I am not misinformed, by its termination. I trust, I will say in conclusion, that at the outgoing of the venerable and distinguished officer who has graced the position of the head of naval affairs in this country so long we will hardly continue this office at his advice. Let us wait until we can get some not uncommon sense and ability, but common sense at the head of that Department—some vigor, some spirit, some perception. Let us wait until jobbery has closed, and integrity and vigor shall characterize that as well as every other Department of the Government under the new order of things, and then take the advice of the head of that Department, if we are to be advised by the head of a Department.

Mr. GRIMES. I simply desire to inquire of the Senator from Vermont under what particular head this large amount of money that has been saved by this officer has been placed in the Treasury Department? [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Iowa does not inquire for information, but he puts the inquiry because he supposes it would embarrass me to answer it, but it will not in the least. I answer that if this officer had not been employed the services of distinguished attorneys like the Senator, who charge large fees for very trifling performances, [laughter,] would have been inevitable in the Navy Department.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not going to oppose the adoption of this amendment. I did not agree with the majority of the committee in regard to it; but I wish the Senate to understand this thing. Those gentlemen who suppose that this is going to save any money most egregiously err. The idea seems to be, from what I hear, that this Judge Advocate General is to go to the different navy-yards, whenever a court-martial or a court of inquiry is ordered, and there act as the judge advocate of that court of inquiry. It is not proposed that he shall do anything of the kind, and the Navy Department will be compelled to employ a man to do that, just as they always have employed one, both during the time this gentleman has been at the head of that bureau and before. This simply creates a kind of bureau officer, whose business it is to examine the records of courts-martial that are held on board of ships of war in different stations and at different yards; and after making that examination report to the Secretary of War the same thing that has been done by a clerk in the Navy Department.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa—as he is very familiar with all such questions—whether the Navy now, in regard to the number of men employed, is larger than it was before the war, when there was no Judge Advocate General at all; and if so, to what extent?

Mr. GRIMES. The Navy, as to its men, is no larger. The Navy, as to its line officers, has about one hundred more than at the beginning of the war, but no more than was allowed at the beginning of the war. The staff officers in the Navy are considerably increased, perhaps fifty per cent., and I do not know but more; that is to say, the surgeons and paymasters and engineers are increased. I suppose there are perhaps three or four hundred more officers than there were at the beginning of the war.

I am not opposing this amendment. I simply desire the Senate to know that it is not going to save money by having this officer perform the duties of judge advocate of these courts-martial. He is to do precisely the same duties as the Judge Advocate General of the Army, and that office shows how things progress in this country. Before the war we had an army of twelve thousand men, and it was authorized to be increased, whenever the President saw fit to increase it, to nineteen thousand and something. At that time we had one officer of the ordnance corps, Captain Lee, detailed to act as Judge Advocate General. He had an office in the War Department, and performed all the duties of Judge Advocate General to the satisfaction of the Army and of the public so far as I know, and was still an officer and captain in the ordnance corps. Now, with an increase of the Army of about three hundred per cent., I believe, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] passed a bill here yesterday creating ten permanent judge advocates, beginning with a brigadier general, and I do not know how many colonels, but I will guaranty with not an officer below the rank of major.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I believe the amendment is divisible, and I move to strike out the first clause of the proposition.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the reading of that clause.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment so that it will read:

Three thousand dollars are hereby appropriated for the salary of the Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate General.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now read the part to be stricken out.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out the following words:

That the office of Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate General be, and the same is hereby, continued and established.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the first clause of the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At the last session it was determined to discontinue this office unless Congress continued it. That was the language used at the last session. We are just as ready to discontinue it now as we shall be a year from this time; and if it is continued by a yearly appropriation it simply brings the question up next year again. I do not believe the office is needed, and therefore I feel it to be my duty to oppose the amendment.

Mr. CRAGIN. I really hope that this amendment will be adopted. There is no doubt in my mind, and the Secretary of the Navy, in a letter which I have before me, expresses the same opinion, that it is economy to continue for the present, at least, this office. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As this question is really to decide whether this office is to be continued or not I think we might as well decide it upon the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. Before the yeas and nays are called I wish to give notice that I shall be compelled to rise to a privileged question unless we can dispose of this bill at once. I have been waiting for half an hour in the hope that we should get through with this bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think we can dispose of it now.

Mr. CAMERON. If we can get through with it after this vote I will waive the privileged question—the announcement of the death of one of my colleagues in the House of Representatives; if not, I shall be compelled to announce it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think we can dispose of the bill in a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, as amended.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 12, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cattell, Cragin, Drake, Kellogg, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Sumner, and Wilson—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Conkling, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Ferry, Fowler, Hendricks, McGreevy, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Sherman, Trumbull, Vickers, Wade, Warner, Whyte, Wiley, and Williams—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, McDonald, Morton, Norton, Pomeroy, Peol, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Welch, and Yates—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to say a few words before this bill passes, as I was a member of the committee which reported it, and shall vote for it.

I think in some way the expenditures of the Navy Department should be largely reduced. If I remember correctly, the amount expended by that Department for the last fiscal year was $25,000,000, and for the year previous to that $31,000,000. We have at the end of this bill as it was sent from the House of Representatives a very singular feature, a sort of speech on the subject of naval expenditures. We are informed by a note at the end of the bill that the total sum appropriated by the bill is $15,280,466; and we are further informed that this is $2,840,784 less than was required for the same service for the previous year.

Two facts are to be taken into account when we consider these appropriation bills, for they do not represent the whole amount of money to be expended for the year for which they are appropriated. Unexpended appropriations from former years are to be taken into account, and then we are to consider that under the practice of the Government—and particularly its recent practice—we are ordinarily to expect deficiency bills. It follows, therefore, that the aggregate amount of this naval appropriation bill will not indicate the total amount of expenditure for the year ending June 30, 1870.

Before the war I believe the highest expenditure in any one year for the Navy Department was $18,000,000, and that under what were alleged to be very exceptional circumstances; and yet we find that three years after the conclusion of the war the expenditures of that Department were $25,000,000 per annum. That is the last year for which we have any official and certain data, any full information. We do not know how much the amount will be for the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June next. According to the representation at the end of this bill from the House the ordinary appropriations are some two or three million dollars less than they were last year; but I have no information which leads me to believe that the expenses of the Navy Department will be very greatly reduced. And in voting this money as we are obliged to do in the form in which we have this bill before us, I, for one, desire to protest against the rate of expenditure in that Department, and to insist that at an early day Congress shall interpose with a stern hand and curb and reduce them to a moderate level, such as is suited to a time of peace, when there are no national exigencies either at home or abroad demanding large expenditures for that Department.

I do not believe that it is necessary that we should have large numbers of vessels in foreign waters or in commission in our own; that a large force of officers should be kept in commission and a large body of men in the service either at home or abroad with reference to any immediate necessities of the Government or any prospective necessities for the exertion of public authority upon the ocean. Nor do I think that it is necessary to keep up a large number of vessels for the purpose of national display, whether they are to go upon a cruise dancing up the Mediterranean, or looking into obscure ports in the Asiatic seas, or to be stationed in some of the southern ports in the New World, where the necessity for their presence has never manifested itself to me, although I have been in that quarter and know somewhat of the organization of Governments there and of the degree of necessity that exists for our being represented in that part of the world.

Now, sir, take the case of the southern fleet ordinarily stationed at Rio; a force of steamers now, formerly of sailing vessels. The United States minister to Brazil, in a letter of his recently published, informs us that within three years past our Government has expended for the support of our fleet in the waters of Brazil the sum of $5,000,000. That is the expenditure upon that one fleet, according to General Webb, being an amount exceeding $1,500,000 per annum. The number of vessels kept there is unnecessarily large. He proceeds to inform us what has been the amount of service we have obtained from that fleet, incurring, as we do for it, according to his statement, an amount exceeding $1,500,000 per annum. What has that fleet done for us? What service have we obtained from it? In the first place, one of the smaller steamers was sent in charge of one of the lowest officers, a lieutenant, to the harbor of Bahia to greet the Brazilian flag in that port as an act of national reparation, which was arranged by diplomacy after the difficulty in regard to our consul at that port. The commander in charge of our fleet sent one of his smaller vessels, I repeat, in charge of a lieutenant to make national amends in the harbor of Bahia. What else? A steamer was sent up the La Plata and the Parana rivers to Paraguay to conduct the American minister there upon one occasion, and then last year another vessel, after a considerable expenditure of diplomatic correspondence, was sent to bring him away again. The salutation of the Brazilian flag in the port of Bahia, and the transportation of the American minister to Paraguay, and his retransportation from Paraguay, constitute the sum total of the service performed by that fleet, which, according to the American minister at Rio Janeiro, has cost us the sum of $5,000,000 during the last three years. Unquestionably the fleet that we have kept there is unnecessarily large. A single steamer upon that eastern coast would be adequate, and it might make occasional visits to the African coast, no doubt, if there was any emergency that called for one of our vessels in that quarter.

I speak of this particular object of outlay by the Navy Department because it is now freshly brought to our notice by one of our own ministers abroad, a man of unquestioned ability and intelligence, however gentlemen may differ with regard to the prudence of his conduct in some leading passages of his life; and this sample of outlay may convey to us a hint of the reason why in the third year after peace the expenditures of our Navy Department were as high as $25,000,000 per annum.

Of course the Committee on Appropriations cannot effectually reach this evil. We are to vote the money for expenditures authorized by existing laws. We are to provide the means by which the obligations of the Government shall be met. It will be for Naval Committees and for committees devoted to retrenchment and reform to reach behind the question of appropriation to the sources of outlay and limit and retrench them. I shall hope that they and the two Houses of Congress, at this session and at the next session, will see to it that the expenditures of the Navy Department are brought down to a sum below $15,000,000 per annum, which I believe will be entirely adequate for any necessities of the public service. Such reduction will be approved, nay, I believe it is demanded, by the public sentiment of the country.

I have said this much, Mr. President, as I consider myself responsible in a certain sense for this bill, having voted to report it in committee, and now intending to vote for it as a member of the Senate.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution in, which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1812) to allow deputy collectors and assistant assessors of internal revenue acting as collectors or assessors the pay of collectors or assessors; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The message also announced the death of Hon. DARWIN A. FINNEY, late a member of the House from the State of Pennsylvania, and communicated the proceedings of the House of Representatives thereon.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CAMERON. I would yield but for the fact that the Senator on my right [Mr. FERRY] will make another motion, and we shall have a discussion as to what shall be taken up.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Do I understand the Senator to object to what I am about to propose?

Mr. CAMERON. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate for reference the bills received from the House of Representatives.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1812) to allow deputy collectors and assistant assessors of internal revenue acting as collectors or assessors the pay of collectors or assessors was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DEATH OF HON. D. A. FINNEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the message of the House of Representatives, communicating intelligence of the death of Hon. DARWIN A. FINNEY, late a member of the House from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I desire to formally announce to the Senate the death of Hon. DARWIN A. FINNEY, a member of the House of Representatives from Pennsylvania. He died in Brussels, Belgium, whither he had traveled in pursuit of health, on the 20th of August last.

Mr. FINNEY was born in Vermont in 1814. He came to Pennsylvania, as I learn, in 1838, receiving that welcome which all meet from that hospitable population. He entered Alleghany College, Meadville, and graduated there, and choosing the law as a profession was admitted to the bar in 1842. His professional attainments I cannot speak of from personal knowledge, but this much may be justly said of him, that his failure to reach the highest rank at the bar of western Pennsylvania did not prove his want of ability by any means. One might be an excellent lawyer, and yet fail to place himself by the side of such men as Thomas Williams, George P. Hamilton, John Scott, and Wilson McCandless, and Mr. FINNEY probably suffered from a comparison which few men could successfully encounter. He was elected to the senate of Pennsylvania in 1854, and served six years in that body. His friends claimed for him that he was a good debater, an intelligent legislator, and a complete master of vituperative eloquence. The last claim has never been called in question. Harshness toward those who differed from him is not too strong a term to employ in describing his legislative career.

Very soon after Mr. FINNEY took his seat in Congress his sadly failing health forced him to leave his home for a foreign land, to return no more alive; and I now announce his death to the Senate, and move the adoption of the customary resolutions of condolence and respect:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. DARWIN A. FINNEY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect for the memory of Hon. DARWIN A. FINNEY the Senate will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I knew Mr. FINNEY at one time very well, having served with him four sessions in the senate of Pennsylvania. But he resided at the opposite extremity of the State from me, and I have little information of his career before he became a State senator or since he retired from that position. I can, however, speak with certainty regarding him so far as he manifested himself in public service in our State and in social intercourse at the same time.

He was a man of considerable intelligence. He was also a man very remarkable for independence of mind and of temper. He formed his own opinions, and he acted an independent part. Mr. FINNEY was a respectable lawyer also, and while he was a member of our senate he contributed valuable service in the transaction of public business in that body.

I may add that in private association with him I found him to be a pleasant companion, and generally he was a man of honorable conduct and of upright purpose.

When he was elected to the lower House of Congress I anticipated with great pleasure a renewal of our former association. He came on to Washington, but he remained here only a short time, when, as has been already stated, he went abroad with a design of reestablishing his health and of afterward resuming his place in Congress. He was accompanied by his wife, an estimable lady, but his expectations from his journey abroad were not realized. He sank under the insidious action of disease and died in a foreign country. Recently his remains were brought to New York, and then, under conduct of a committee of the senate of Pennsylvania, to the city of Philadelphia for interment. The Legislature and people of our State have manifested due sensibility as well as sincere respect both for his public services and for his memory.

If I had anticipated that this subject would come up to-day I should have prepared some remarks giving, so far as I could, an analysis of his character, public and private. I should have endeavored to do greater justice than I am now able to do to my former colleague and friend. I could not, however, permit this occasion to pass, although the subject comes upon me unexpectedly, without submitting these few remarks. They are unstudied but sincere. I heartily add my voice of respect and regret to those of others in the two Houses who have spoken of Mr. FINNEY's services and character and recalled the events of his life.

The resolutions were agreed to nem. con.; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 30, 1869.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. NORMAN McLEOD, of Denver City.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Saturday, private bill day, the first business in order, unless it should be set aside by the House, is the calling of committees for reports of a private nature, commencing with the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that the morning hour of to-day be dispensed with, and that the House now proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The SPEAKER. That is a privileged motion.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to a point of order. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Speaker has just announced that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] has submitted a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. He has.

Mr. ROBINSON. I rise to submit this idea as a point of order: the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] some days since submitted a motion to reconsider the votes by which the House recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary the joint resolution and the bill relating to suffrage. That motion to reconsider, and that motion alone, was a privileged motion. The motion to reconsider having been disposed of, the privilege covering all this business has been exhausted, and this question now stands naked and unprivileged before the House. Therefore the regular order comes up in preference to it, which I now demand, should the Speaker rule in my favor.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the one hundred and twenty-eighth rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Friday and Saturday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills and private business in preference to any other, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House."

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROBINSON.] The House having adjourned while the motion for the previous question and the motion to lay on the table the resolution proposing a constitutional amendment were pending, that subject would come up immediately after the reading of the Journal this morning as unfinished business pending at the adjournment but for the one hundred and twenty-eighth rule, which gives private business on Friday and Saturday priority, unless a majority of the House should otherwise determine. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] moves to dispense with private business on this day.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would like to say—

The SPEAKER. The point of order raised by the gentleman from New York has been decided. The gentleman is out of order, unless he takes an appeal from the decision.

Mr. ROBINSON. I believe, then, I must take an appeal. I desire to explain that I do not deny that private bills take precedence to-day, but I contend that this other subject is not privileged in its present position, and that the regular order, whatever it is, has the preference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule on page 186 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The consideration of the unfinished business which the House may be engaged at an adjournment shall be resumed as soon as the Journal of the next day is read, and at the same time each day thereafter until disposed of; and if from any cause other business shall intervene it shall be resumed as soon as such other business is disposed of."

The SPEAKER. The Chair, under this rule, decides that the constitutional amendment, pending at the adjournment last evening, would come up immediately after the reading of the Journal unless other business having priority to it should interfere. Rule 128, previously read by the Clerk, provides that on Friday and Saturday private business shall have priority unless a majority of the House otherwise determine. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] appeals from this decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the appeal be laid on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON. Being anxious not to consume time, I withdraw the appeal.

DEPUTY REVENUE COLLECTORS, ETC.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to yield to me that I may ask the attention of the House to a matter which will not occupy more than five minutes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield to the gentleman on condition that his business shall not occupy more than five minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill to allow deputy collectors and assistant assessors of internal revenue acting as collectors and assessors the pay of collectors and assessors.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which there will be an opportunity for objection.

The bill, which was read, provides that any deputy collector of internal revenue or assistant assessor of internal revenue who has performed or may hereafter perform, under authority or requirement of law, the duties of collector of internal revenue or assessor of internal revenue, in consequence of any vacancy in the office of such collector or assessor, or on account of the suspension from duty or temporary disability from sickness or other cause of such collector or assessor, shall be entitled to and receive the same pay and compensation as is provided for such collector or assessor in their districts respectively; but no such payment is to be made in any case when the collector or assessor has received or may be paid compensation for services rendered during the same period of time.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] who it is that appoints these assistant collectors and assistant assessors?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will please suspend. The Chair must first ask whether there is objection to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] occupying five minutes in explanation of this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will say, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL], that the assistant assessors are appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the recommendation of the assessors. The deputy collectors are appointed by the collectors, who are responsible upon their bonds for themselves and their deputies also.

Mr. Speaker, my only reason for asking to be heard even for five minutes upon a bill which I know must commend itself to every one, and the passage of which has been asked for on all sides of the House, is that I wish to make some defense of the House of Representatives and of Congress against a systematic attempt to slander and decry and misrepresent those who constitute the legislative body of the United States. Gentlemen will recollect that in the general bill condensing all the internal revenue laws, which has been pending in this House since last summer, and is now in the Committee of the Whole, there is a provision for the pay of these assistant assessors and deputy collectors who perform the duties of their principals. That, however, does not go back to past cases. It was thought not unlikely that when the bill should come up for final action the Committee of Ways and Means might recommend the giving of this relief, even in that general bill, to those who had thus served in the past. But it seems now that this general bill is not likely to be acted on at this session. I hope it will be, but perhaps it may not be. Under these circumstances the committee conclude to report a special bill for the purpose of paying these officers, to meet these meritorious cases in the past and for the future. It has long been known by many persons outside of the committee that this was the determination of the committee. Now, acting upon this knowledge, certain claim agents have sent circulars over the country saying they have influence with Congress and can get such a bill passed, and desiring those interested in such bill shall agree to pay fifty per cent. of the amount they will get under the bill to those agents. Let me read one of these circulars:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 1, 1868.

Sir: Certain influential parties, with myself, will undertake at the coming session of Congress to obtain the passage of a law securing for you the payment of the salary and fees you are properly entitled to for the time during which you acted as collector for the eighth district of Kentucky, namely, from the 4th day of March, 1867, to the 27th day of March, 1867, vice Mr. E. L. Cockrill, but which the Treasury Department has now no authority in law to pay you. We shall require as our compensation fifty per cent. of the amount due you, and will thank you to state to me as soon as may be whether you are willing to allow it to us. We desire to preserve this matter as much as possible from notoriety, as otherwise it might hinder our efforts.

Very respectfully, yours.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the name?

Mr. SCHENCK. I shall not disclose the name, because we sent for the gentleman, had him before the committee, interrogated him, found that he had acted, as he admitted himself, very wrongly; that he was penitent for it, and was willing and volunteered to write to every one to whom he had addressed this circular confessing this wrong; and we found that and he had been in other respects a good citizen deserved much from the Government—indeed had received a medal of honor for his services all through the war, showing what his loyalty was. We therefore concluded on the whole to suppress the name; but I give the form of the circular, remarking when I do so that this is an old game. It is not infrequently the case that claim agents, attorneys, lobbyists, and prowlers around Congress find out what is likely to be done by a committee or by Congress, and then speculate upon it under pretense that it is through their influence it is obtained to be done, and thus rob of their just dues those claimants against the Government.

In this case there was a call made to get the names of all persons who, in sums from five to ten dollars up to several hundred, would be entitled to compensation under a bill of this kind; and taking advantage of that document such circulars were addressed by one or more persons to every one of these men, and we have ascertained that some twenty have already agreed to give one half of what Congress would give to them under a bill of this kind for the meritorious and influential services of those gentlemen who were getting Congress to pass the bill, it being known all the time that the Committee of Ways and Means, upon the mere ground of simple justice, had virtually reported such a bill, intending to make it a matter upon which they would ask special action of Congress. I say that it is an old game. I have personal knowledge, in a former Congress, in one instance where a man levied upon a claimant the large sum of $10,000, and actually received it for influencing a member of a committee to obtain a particularly favorable report, when that member of Congress never knew he had heard of the rascal before in his life.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope I may be permitted to have one minute more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCHENCK. Now, sir, I do not assume for members of Congress that we are any better than the rest of the world, and I hope I ought not to confess that we are any worse than the same number of respectable gentlemen in public or in private life anywhere. But there is a systematic, fashionable abuse all through the country, stimulated by letter writers, occasion being given to it by these prowling agents around us, to bring Congress into discredit, and I thought it my duty in behalf not only of my committee, but of members of Congress, to ventilate a case of this kind. Having done it, I want to add to the remarks I have already made a warning to all assistant assessors and deputy collectors who may be entitled to receive anything under this bill, if it should pass, that they are not indebted one cent to any claim agent or lobbyist whatever, but that Congress gives to them what is justly their due, and they should give a kick to any such man who comes to them rather than pence.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 1812) to allow deputy collectors and assistant assessors of internal revenue acting as collectors or assessors the pay of collectors and assessors, was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] moves to dispense with the rule by which there shall be a morning hour to-day for private business, and that the House shall proceed with the business pending at the adjournment last evening.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope he will enlarge the motion, so as to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The motion, as it stands, will effect that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And permit me to make the remark that the Committee on Appropriations have disposed of every bill before them, so that they have nothing before them now; and, if we intend to get through the appropriation bills it is necessary that my colleague [Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts] should be able to get up the Indian appropriation bill to-day and finish it.

The SPEAKER. If private business should be dispensed with to-day it will be dispensing with the morning hour altogether; so that as soon as the pending business is disposed of it will be in order to go into Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bills.

The question being taken on dispensing with the rule, it was agreed to—ayes 86, noes 40.

SUFFRAGE.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the unfinished business pending at the adjournment yesterday, being the joint resolution (H. R. No. 402) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the pending question being on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURN,] to lay the constitutional amendment with the pending amendments on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 41, nays 131, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Axtell, Beck, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Coburn, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Polesley, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Taber, Tilt, Van Auken, Van Trump, John T. Wilson, and Young—41.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broome, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Callis, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dewees, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Heaton, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Hunter, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketchum, Kootz, Lash, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McKee, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Norris, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Plants, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Root, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Stokes, Stover, Sypher, Taft, Taylor, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernum, Bart Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—131.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Barnes, Barnum, Benjamin, Blackburn, Bowen, Roderick R. Butler, Reader, W. Clarke, Cook, Corley, Cornell, Dickey, Dixon, Eli, Farnsworth, Glossbrenner, Halsey, Haughey, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kitchen, Luffin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrissey, Newsham, Pettis, Poland, Pomeroy, Selye, Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, Wood, and Woodward—50.

So the House refused to lay the joint resolution on the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. NIBLACK said: I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. HOLMAN, has been called home by the sickness of a member of his family. If he were here he would vote "ay," being opposed to this whole proposition in all its forms.

Mr. ROBINSON said: I am requested by my colleague, Mr. BARNES, who is absent by leave of the House, to say that he is paired off with Mr. AMES on this subject. If he were here he would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. WELKER said: My colleague, Mr. CLARKE, is detained at his room by sickness. If he were here he would vote "no."

Mr. SCOTFIELD stated that Mr. VIDAL was confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. MARVIN stated that Mr. CORNELL was absent on account of illness. If present he would vote "no."

Mr. GLOSSBRENNER stated that on this and on all other questions upon which parties are divided he was paired until Monday next, including the sessions of that day, with his colleague from the Mercer district, Mr. PETTIS. He [Mr. GLOSSBRENNER] would vote against the proposed amendment to the Constitution in whatever form it might be presented, and Mr. PETTIS would sustain substantially the amendment reported by the Committee on Reconstruction.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question on the pending amendments made by Mr. BOUTWELL last evening.

Leave was granted to Mr. BROOMALL, Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. ARNELL, and Mr. WELKER to print speeches on the pending measure. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I withdraw the modifications of amendment which I offered yesterday, so as to leave the amendment as it was originally printed, and I ask that it may be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall deny or abridge to any male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years or over, and who is of sound mind, an equal vote at all elections in the State in which he shall have such actual residence as shall be prescribed by law, except to such as have engaged or may hereafter engage in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and to such as shall be duly convicted of treason, felony, or other infamous crime.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio if he is not willing to strike out from his amendment that exception in regard to persons convicted of crime or conviction of any other thing which may be considered or made to be crime, so that the bill or joint resolution shall only be prospective in its effect?

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I do not know that I exactly understand the point of the inquiry. If the gentleman means to inquire whether I would not consent to strike out the exception of that class who must be convicted before they could be disfranchised, I reply that I would not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state what I desire.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] yield for that purpose?

Mr. BOUTWELL. As I understand the proposition as modified by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] it is now precisely the proposition which he originally submitted to the House and which was printed, he having withdrawn the modifications which he suggested yesterday.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. That is right.

Mr. BOUTWELL. On the other hand, the proposition reported by the committee stands without any alteration whatsoever, except that the definite article "the" before the word "race" has been stricken out. Therefore the debate which took place yesterday was appropriate to these two propositions precisely as they stand. If we open the subject to-day for debate, I do not know how, if the matter is to be left to me, I can regulate it consistently with the business of the House or with the appeals that are made to me on both sides of the House. I suggest, therefore, that it is better that we should come to a vote upon these propositions, which are probably now understood.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not wish to make a speech or an argument on the subject. I only wish to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] a modification of his amendment which I would desire.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I wish now that we may have it distinctly understood how these propositions stand. Am I right in supposing that the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL], or rather of the Committee on the Judiciary, stands now just as it was reported, with the exception of the change by striking out the word "the" before the word "race"?

Mr. BOUTWELL. There has been no other change.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. And the provisions suggested yesterday in relation to qualifications grounded on intelligence, &c., are now out of the case?

Mr. BOUTWELL. They were voted down yesterday by the House two to one.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to make a suggestion.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If I yield it will open the matter to debate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not desire to debate, but to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] a modification of the amendment he has proposed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very well; let the suggestion be made without debate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to say that every feeling and sentiment of my nature is against ex post facto laws and the conviction by act of Congress of any person for a crime which he may have committed heretofore. I desire, therefore, that the gentleman from Ohio shall so modify his amendment as to make it apply to future offenses, to crimes hereafter to be committed only, that we shall not by act of Congress convict men of crime and inflict penalties not provided for when the act was committed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I must insist upon my demand for the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does that apply to the joint resolution as well as to the amendments which have been offered, so that the House will be brought to a vote upon all the pending propositions?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. And we shall be obliged to vote upon the amendments which have already been offered, and then upon the joint resolution itself, without opportunity to move further amendments?

The SPEAKER. That will be the effect of the previous question, as moved by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL], if the House shall sustain the call and order the main question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to allow me to make some verbal changes in my amendment before the previous question is ordered.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right under the rules of the House to modify his amendment before the previous question is seconded.

Mr. BINGHAM. The changes I have made in my amendment are merely verbal, not in any manner changing the substance of the proposition which I presented on yesterday. I ask the Clerk to read it as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge or deny to any male citizen of the United States of sound mind and twenty-one years of age or upward the exercise of the elective franchise at all elections in the State wherein he shall have actually resided for a period of one year next preceding such election, (subject to such registration laws and laws prescribing local residence as the State may enact,) except such of said citizens as shall engage in rebellion or insurrection, or who may have been, or shall be, duly convicted of treason or other infamous crime.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very well.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the proposition of the Committee on the Judiciary to be the same now as it was originally reported, excepting the article "the" before the word "race," has been stricken out.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes.

Mr. SCHENCK. And the proposition now offered by my colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] on behalf of a number of members from Ohio, including myself, is the same as it was first offered. The interlineations and modifications made in the proposition yesterday by my colleague was upon the suggestion of a great number of persons. Upon consultation, however, we have concluded that the proposition had better be restored to its original form; and I wanted four or five minutes in which to express the reasons why I have advised that the modifications proposed yesterday be taken out as being unnecessary. I will confine myself to that simple question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think I must, under the circumstances, yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. Knowing how many of us are represented by my colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] in the substitute he has offered, I need not say I approve the form, that it shall be in the shape of an inhibition to the States. Yesterday, when the proposition was pending, many gentlemen, among them the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] and his colleague, [Mr. BUTLER], objected that unless there was something saving to the States the power to regulate the exercise of the elective franchise this noted proposition would virtually repeal or be repugnant to the passage of any registry law. Now, I conceive there is nothing in that objection. At first it seemed to be plausible, and yielding to that plausibility my colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER], with the consent of others, agreed to modify the proposition. He now withdraws the modification. I think it necessary to have the modification withdrawn, because if there be anything in the argument presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL], that it interferes with the possibility of having registry laws, then upon the same argument we could have no registration laws now.

Look, for instance, at the constitution of Massachusetts. What does it provide? It provides in absolute terms that every male citizen who has attained the age of twenty-one years, who has resided in the Commonwealth one year, and within the district six months, and who has paid certain taxes, shall be permitted to vote; and to this is added by the twentieth article of the amendments an educational requirement. Now, a man in Massachusetts goes to the polls and offers to vote. He shows that he is twenty-one years of age; that he has always resided within the State; that he is a citizen; that he can read the Constitution in the English language and write his name, yet objection is made to the reception of his vote. Why? Because he has not registered. He points to the Constitution and says, "By the Constitution it is provided that every man having these qualifications, which I possess, shall have the right to vote." The reply is, "That Constitution implies the necessity of prescribing by law regulations under which the votes shall be cast." If this were not so, the registry law now in force in Massachusetts would be unconstitutional. But does any gentleman here pretend to say that it is so? A man possessing all the qualifications which by the express terms of the Constitution are requisite to make him an elector, presents himself at the polls, and is told, "Stand back, because you are not registered." This goes to show that these provisions as to the qualifications of electors do not, in the slightest degree, interfere with the power of the Legislature of the State to adopt proper regulations under which the votes shall be cast. Hence, any exception of the kind proposed here for the purpose of saving that right to the States is unnecessary. Besides, sir, the language of this amendment is still stronger, because it contains the word "equal;" it provides for securing to citizens an "equal" right to vote.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask my colleague [Mr. BOUTWELL] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think I had better bring the debate to a close; and I may as well make an example in the case of my colleague by refusing to yield to him.

Mr. Speaker, I only wish to say that the distinctions and differences of opinion which have been evolved by the debate in regard to the effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio afford to my mind conclusive evidence that if we submit the amendment in that form to the country we shall introduce in every State confusion, discord, and contention as to what the effect of the provision will be. But the amendment reported by the Judiciary Committee is directed against those distinctions which have been brought prominently before the country, and on which substantially public opinion, as entertained by the Republican party, has been expressed. We are safe if we stand upon the resolution reported by the committee; and, in my judgment, we are unsafe if we accept what we ourselves confessedly are unable to understand in such a way as to come to an agreement upon it. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; there being—yeas 114, nays 35.

The main question was ordered; which was first upon Mr. SHELLABARGER's amendment to the amendment of Mr. BINGHAM.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out in the amendment of Mr. BINGHAM the provision proposed to be inserted in lieu of section one of the proposed new article of the Constitution, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall deny or abridge to any male citizen of the United States of the age of twenty-one years or over, and who is of sound mind, an equal vote at all elections in the State in which he shall have such actual residence as shall be prescribed by law, except to such as have engaged or may hereafter engage in insurrection or rebellion against the United States, and to such as shall be duly convicted of treason, felony, or other infamous crime.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to inquire whether the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] as now modified, contains in the fifth and sixth lines this language: "Such actual residence as shall be prescribed by law, except to such as have engaged," &c.?

The SPEAKER. The amendment, as it now stands, has been printed, and is printer's No. 678.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order. I submit that no gentleman, not even the gentleman from Ohio, has the right to ingraft upon the instrument framed by Washington, Madison, Hamilton, Franklin, and their contemporaries such bad English as that contained in the clause I have just read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is not the province of the Chair to decide upon points of grammar, or questions as to what is "bad English." Such questions must be determined by the judgment of the House.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] that the phrase "of sound mind" which he has inserted in his amendment will exclude a very large portion of the Republican party. [Laughter.]

Mr. MULLINS. It would exclude all of the party of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order. The House is acting under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 126, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Beaman, Beatty, Benton, Boles, Bowen, Broomall, Buckland, Calkins, Coffey, Cobb, Culum, Dawes, Delano, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, James T. Elliott, French, Gravelly, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hooper, Chester D.

Hubbard, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kelsey, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Maynard, Mullins, Newsham, Norris, Orth, Paine, Plants, Polisy, Price, Prince, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Stokes, Sypher, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, and William Williams—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Archer, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Barnum, Beck, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Boyer, Broomall, Brooks, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Callis, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Corley, Covode, Dawes, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Edwards, Eldridge, Thomas D. Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Fox, Garfield, Getz, Golladay, Goss, Grover, Griswold, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, Knott, Kootz, Ladin, Lash, Lincoln, Loughbridge, Marshall, Marvin, McCormick, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, O'Neill, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Poland, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Ross, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Stewart, Stone, Stover, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Tift, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodward, and Young—126.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Barnes, Blackburn, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Diekey, Dixon, Farnsworth, Glosbrenner, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kellogg, Kitchen, Lynch, Mallory, McCarthy, Moorhead, Morrissey, Pettis, Pomeroy, Selye, Stevens, Lawrence S. Trimble, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, and Wood—35.

So Mr. SHELLABARGER's amendment to the amendment of Mr. BINGHAM was not agreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. SCHENCK stated that his colleague, Mr. CLARKE, was detained from the House by illness, and if present would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL said: As between the amendments I should be for that of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] but as I am against all amendments, I shall vote no.

Mr. MAYNARD said: I am so much opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] that I do not wish to be put in the attitude of seeming to indorse it, and shall therefore vote ay.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on Mr. BINGHAM's amendment, as follows:

Strike out all of article one and insert as follows: SECTION I. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall deny or abridge to any male citizen of the United States of sound mind and twenty-one years of age or upward the equal exercise of the elective franchise at all elections in the State wherein he shall have actually resided for a period of one year next preceding such election, subject to such registration laws and laws prescribing local residence as the State may enact, except such of said citizens as shall engage in rebellion or insurrection, or who may have been, or shall be, duly convicted of treason or other infamous crime.

Mr. WARD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 24, nays 160, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Axtell, Baker, Bingham, Brooks, Dawes, Dockery, Eldridge, Garfield, Haight, Heaton, Hotchkiss, Alexander H. Jones, McCullough, Phelps, Plants, Robinson, Ross, Spalding, Stewart, Stone, Tift, John T. Wilson, Woodward, and Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Beck, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Calkins, Cary, Chanler, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Covode, Culum, Dawes, Delano, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Fox, French, Getz, Golladay, Goss, Grover, Griswold, Grover, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Jenckes, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kerr, Ketcham, Kootz, Ladin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mallory, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McCormick, McKee, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Mungen, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Niblack, Norris, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Poland, Polisy, Price, Prince, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Stokes, Stover, Sypher, Taber, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—160.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Archer, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Blackburn, Roderick R. Butler, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Diekey, Dixon, Dodge, Edwards, Farnsworth, Glosbrenner, Haughey, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kitchen, Knott, McCarthy, Morrissey, Nicholson, Pettis, Pile, Pomeroy, Stevens, John Trimble, Lawrence S. Trimble, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, James F. Wilson, and Wood—38.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed.

Mr. WOODWARD demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROOKS. I demand a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. There can be no division of a bill or a joint resolution, although there may be of a single resolution. Internal improvement bills are specially excepted by the rules, and there may be a division on the engrossment of each item.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me to have a vote on my amendment for the enfranchisement of women and children over twelve years of age?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman is not serious in that inquiry.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 144, nays 45, not voting 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Broomall, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Calkins, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Corley, Covode, Culum, Dawes, Delano, Dawes, Dockery, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Grover, Griswold, Hamilton, Harding, Heaton, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Kootz, Ladin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Starkweather, Stewart, Stokes, Stover, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodward—144.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Axtell, Baker, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Polisy, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stone, Taber, Tift, Van Auker, Van Trump, John T. Wilson, Woodward, and Young—45.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Barnes, Blackburn, Roderick R. Butler, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Cornell, Diekey, Dixon, Donnelly, Glosbrenner, Halsey, Haughey, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kitchen, Mallory, McCarthy, McCullough, Morrissey, Pettis, Pomeroy, Schenck, Stevens, Lawrence S. Trimble, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, and Wood—33.

So the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BLAINE said: At the request of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. WASHBURN, I desire to say that he was compelled to leave the House by ill health, but if present he would have voted for the resolution of the committee.

Mr. BENTON. I am requested on behalf of my colleague, Mr. STEVENS, to say that he is absent in consequence of sickness. If here he would no doubt vote "ay."

Mr. NIBLACK. I am authorized to say in behalf of my colleague, Mr. HOLMAN, that if present he would vote against the resolution.

The result having been announced as above, the joint resolution, being engrossed, was read the third time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move the previous question on the passage, and demand the yeas and nays.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SHENCK. Mr. Speaker, does not the Constitution require the vote to be taken by yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The only imperative requirement of the yeas and nays under the Constitution is in regard to a veto, where a concurrent vote of two thirds of each House by yeas and nays is required. On all other questions requiring a two-thirds vote, such as proposed amendments to the Constitution and relief from political disabilities, the Constitution does not command the vote to be taken by yeas and nays any more than on bills which only require a majority vote. On bills relieving from disability under the fourteenth amendment the Chair has ruled, with the assent of the House, that the Constitution does not require the yeas and nays, but that the result must be arrived at by a two-thirds vote, to be declared by the Chair. On constitutional amendments, however, on account of their gravity and the value of the record, the usage has been to take the vote by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, is it intended to fill the blank with the number of the article of amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary. In regard to the history of the adoption of constitutional amendments, the amendment numbered as the seventh was rejected and the one that was adopted as the eighth amendment was afterward incorporated in the Constitution as article seven, the Secretary of State taking the responsibility of changing the numbering, as was evidently proper, and as the engrossing clerks of both Houses of Congress do in regard to the numbering of sections where intervening ones are stricken out.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 150, nays 42, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Beatty, Benjamin, Benton, Blackburn, Blaine, Blair, Botes, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Callis, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Clift, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corley, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Deweese, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edwards, Eggleston, Ela, Thomas D. Eliot, James T. Elliott, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gove, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jonckes, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Ladin, Lash, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Plitt, Plants, Poland, Price, Prince, Raum, Robertson, Roots, Sawyer, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Stewart, Stokes, Storer, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernum, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and the Speaker—150.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Axtell, Baker, Barnum, Beck, Bingham, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Chanler, Fox, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hawkins, Hotchkiss, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCormick, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Polesley, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Tift, Van Auker, Van Trump, Woodward, and Young—42.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Barnes, Roderick R. Butler, Reader W. Clarke, Cornell, Diekey, Dixon, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Hill, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Kitchen, Mallory, McCarthy, McCallough, Morrissey, Pettis, Pomeroy, Schenck, Stevens, Synphur, Lawrence S. Trimble, Vidal, Elihu B. Washburne, Wood, and Woodbridge—81.

So (two thirds having voted in favor thereof) the joint resolution was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ROBINSON said: My colleague, Mr.

BARNES, is paired with Mr. AMES. My colleague would have voted "no."

Mr. NIBLACK. I repeat the statement that if my colleague, Mr. HOLMAN, were here he would vote "no."

The result having been announced as above, Mr. BOUTWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF DISABILITIES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of South Carolina for the removal of political disabilities from James F. Green and several others; which were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

BANKRUPT LAW.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a resolution of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce against the extension of the fifty per cent. clause of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. WILSON, of Ohio, who by unanimous consent introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1813) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Ohio river; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

EVENING SESSION FOR PENSION BILLS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER.]

Mr. MILLER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be on Tuesday next an evening session to hear and act upon reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. MILLER. I will say that there is a vast amount of business before that committee relating to soldiers and soldiers' widows and orphan children that it is important to have acted on and sent to the Senate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. I object to the gentleman from Massachusetts yielding any further.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1738) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1870.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill for amendment.

The following clause was read:

For interest on $390,257 92, at five per cent. per annum, for education, support of the government, and other beneficial purposes, under the direction of the general council of the Choctaws, in conformity with the provisions contained in the tenth and thirteenth articles of the treaty of 22d June, 1855, $19,512 89.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I move to add to that clause the following proviso:

Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to sell a sufficient amount of the bonds of the United States held in trust for the Choctaw Indians to enable him to pay the amount of the awards heretofore approved by him in favor of Joseph G. Heald and Reuben Wright under the provisions of the fiftieth article of the treaty concluded with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians on the 20th day of April, 1866.

This is a claim which received full consideration at the last session in the Committee on Indian Affairs, and of which I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] entirely approves. I hope he will make no objection to it. This claim, arising under the fiftieth article of the treaty with the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians of April 28, 1866, was put into the Indian appropriation bill by the Senate last year, but in some way it was struck out, I believe, by the committee of conference. I have here in my hand papers which give a full explanation of the justice and propriety of this claim, and I have been instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, if it had been called, to report the claim to the House and recommend its passage.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Eighty thousand dollars, $10,000 having been already paid out of available funds of the Choctaws in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior. Let me say, also, that the only reason why any legislation at all is necessary at this time to carry out the provisions of the fiftieth article of this treaty is because the Secretary of the Interior does not feel authorized to pay this sum, although he is instructed to pay it by the treaty, because the word "funds" was used in the treaty instead of moneys.

As I said before, this matter has been fully investigated by the Committees on Indian Affairs of the House and of the Senate, and I am under instructions, whenever the Committee on Indian Affairs is called, to report it to the House for its favorable action. The gentleman from Massachusetts, I believe, is familiar with the matter, and I hope, considering the justice of this claim and considering the fact that it arises under treaty stipulations, he will make no objection to it.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I had the honor to serve on the Committee on Indian Affairs, and heard the arguments in this case. I know we went very fully into it, and I approve of it and think it ought to be put into some bill. But I would like to know of the gentleman, for we had some difficulty about the peculiar form and phraseology of the provision, if the amendment which he now offers is in the particular form that was finally agreed upon by the committee last session?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I will state that it is in the precise form of the resolution which we agreed upon last session.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then I have no objection to it. I think it ought to go in here; it takes no money out of the Treasury.

Mr. ROSS. I believe I must oppose this amendment. I would like to have here our chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. WINDOM.] I think it better be in an independent bill.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Then it will never be passed, for the Committee on Indian Affairs will not be again called this session.

Mr. PRUYN. Is this the way to pay a claim which has been refused payment heretofore for some good reason?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. As I have already stated, the Secretary of the Interior would pay this claim promptly if he felt authorized to sell the bonds held by him to obtain funds for the purpose. This takes no money out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. PRUYN. That may be.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to sell the bonds referred to for the purpose of obtaining the necessary funds to pay this award.

Mr. PRUYN. That does not meet the point I made at all. I know it takes no money out of the Treasury of the United States, but it does take money away from these Indians. Is this a claim which we ought to undertake to provide the payment of in this way?

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. In answer to that, I will state that I hold in my hand a communication from the representatives of these Indians withdrawing any opposition to this claim, and asking for it the favorable action of Congress.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a question of order. Is not this a kind of legislation which, under the rule, cannot be attached to an appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order as being taken too late, the amendment having been received and discussed.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas; and upon a division there were—ayes 50, noes 7; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, and Mr. ROSS were appointed.

Mr. PRUYN. I am assured by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. WINDOM] that this claim is right.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 90, noes 24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Crows:

For third of twenty installments for pay of nineteen half-breeds, in goods or money, at the discretion of the President, fifty dollars each, in accordance with seventh article of treaty of July 16, 1866, $950.

For this amount to be paid Pierre Chien for friendly services rendered by him to the Crow Indians, $200.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Since this bill was reported another treaty with the Crow Indians has come in, which requires other items of appropriation. I ask leave to recur to this paragraph hereafter rather than to detain the committee now while I prepare the amendments rendered necessary by the new treaty.

No objection was made.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Flatheads and other confederated tribes:

For the first of five installments on $120,000, being the third series, for beneficial objects, at the discretion of the President, per fourth article treaty 16th July, 1855, $4,000.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$4,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$6,000." I desire to occupy the attention of the committee a moment in relation to this amendment. I hold in my hand a letter from Captain McCauley, the agent of the Flathead Indians. And I will say here that if there be an honest Indian agent on earth I believe that the writer of this communication is one. He writes:

"In hopes of receiving some relief for this place, I have distributed a large amount of provisions, clothing, &c., which will very nearly amount to the sum appropriated for beneficial objects. And unless I can obtain a special appropriation of $1,500 to pay for one hundred blankets purchased and distributed I shall be very much embarrassed indeed. I purchased the above amount for the Kootenays, who, as I had the honor to inform you before, received no blankets on distribution day."

I presume it is just and right that I should state to the committee that some party or parties in the Territory of Montana, some employed of the Government, or some official thereof, committed the crime of larceny by stealing from these Indians something like two hundred and thirteen pairs of blankets before they had arrived at the agency while being transported from Fort Benton to the reservation in Bitter Root valley. The writer goes on to say:

"I do not envy those who could tamely witness the sights that are daily presented to me. Few if any could calmly look at a lot of miserable beings huddled together in lodges composed of a few poles, thatched with straw, without covering of any kind save a few filthy rags, in a climate where the thermometer stands at zero, sometimes below, and seldom over ten degrees above, during the long winter season. In addition some are disabled, some cripples, and many entirely blind. There are three families, ten in all, who are entirely blind. There are many partially so; and I trust, for the sake of our common humanity, that there are few who could witness this unmoved."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I trust that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will assent to this amendment. I admit that under the strict letter of the law this agent had, perhaps, no right to incur this indebtedness; that under the strict letter of the law he had no right to purchase one hundred blankets for these shivering Indians; but I will say that the gentleman who did this without regard to the consequences to himself at the department deserves the thanks of every man who has a Christian heart within his bosom. I know this Captain McCauley well, and I know him to be a truthful, honest man, a sincere Christian, taking the warmest interest in the work of civilizing and christianizing the Indians: and that there is not in any department of the Government a more conscientious and faithful officer. I trust, therefore, that the gentleman from Massachusetts will not object to this amendment, and that it will be adopted by the committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I can only say that the appropriation proposed to be increased by this amendment is in exact accordance with the estimates of the department, and in exact accordance with the treaty. It is the same appropriation which for some years has been made for the fulfillment of the treaty. The whole amount appropriated for these Indians by this bill for the next fiscal year is $22,200, and the deductions which have been made by the committee are not upon this item, which is fixed by treaty.

The amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes five, noes not counted.

The Clerk read the following:

For tenth of twenty installments for the pay of each of the head chiefs of the Flathead, Kootenay, and Upper Pend d'Oreilles tribes, per fifth article treaty 16th July, 1855, $1,500.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I send to the Clerk an amendment which I propose to add after the paragraph just read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby instructed to cause to be paid to the said chiefs the sums due them under said treaty and which have not been heretofore paid.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that under the treaty made by Commissioner Stevens in, I think, 1855, each of these chiefs was to receive $500 per annum. I understand that from that hour to the present only one of those chiefs has received this annuity.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What is the amendment?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Let the Clerk read it again.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I make a point of order on this amendment, that it proposes new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, because it is made too late. The amendment has been read at the Clerk's desk, entertained, and discussed.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I desire to say to the committee that the Indians in every part of the United States, from the foundation of our Government—nay, from the very settlement of New England—to the present hour, have been swindled by the civilized rulers of the land.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree to that.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Sir, from the time when the Pilgrim Fathers first stole the Indian's corn in the town of Lynn, Massachusetts, until the present hour the whole system of Indian affairs has been conducted upon a principle of robbery. I believe that that corn-stealing from the Indians was the first recorded case of grand larceny upon the continent of America, and the system thus initiated has been kept up from that hour to the present.

Mr. WOODWARD. I insist that while the gentleman is condemning the manner in which the Indians of this country have been treated he should except from his remarks William Penn and the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I do except William Penn. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] for calling my attention to that matter. I except from my remarks the whole Quaker community of America. They have been actuated by only one feeling, the feeling of Christian men; and they have treated the Indians as though they were a part of God's children. I repeat the language uttered the other day by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM], and say that the only denomination of Christians, except the Quakers, who have had any influence with the Indians and who have treated them as though they had souls to be saved, are the Catholics—the Jesuits, if you please. Their labors upon the frontiers of the country in behalf of the Indians have been most devoted and self-sacrificing. Look at the case of Father De Smet. If there be any man wearing the image of his God who ought to be enrolled by any church among its patron saints, that man is Father de Smet—a true Christian of the noblest type, loving his fellow-men next to his God.

Mr. MULLINS. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the Catholic teaches the Indian that he is to be saved by faith in Christ, or that he is to be saved by the intercession of the priest?

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I will answer the question. The fanaticism of the gentleman from Tennessee crops out on this occasion just as it does on all other occasions.

Mr. MULLINS. Answer the question.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I was about answering it when the gentleman interrupted me. Catholic priests teach the Indians precisely as Protestant ministers ought to teach them—to love God and obey his commandments; and let me tell the gentleman that if he had been trained by a good Catholic priest he would to-day have been a better, purer, and more forgiving Christian than he is.

Mr. MULLINS. I have been trained by the Bible, by the revealed law of God, and not by the revealed law of man.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I did not think that this amendment of mine would call for any remark or question or discussion of a sectarian character. History has vindicated the noble, self-sacrificing, and Christian efforts of the early Jesuits to civilize and christianize the Indians, who were actuated by only one thought, the glory of God and the conversion of souls. They need no eulogy. I am not discussing any question of theology, but I am discussing a question in reference to the Indians and the course which ought to be adopted toward them so long as the Government recognizes their right to make treaties. Here is a solemn treaty made by the commissioners of the United States with the Flathead, Kootenay, and other tribes of Indians. Shall it also remain unexecuted? I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, I ask every man of this committee; to point to one treaty with the Indians that has been faithfully kept by the United States. It is well known that the Indians are no pets of mine, but I do say, either carry out in strict good faith every treaty stipulation made of wiper them from the face of the land forever. Send honest men, not thieves, to manage them, and there will be less trouble.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, Massachusetts, God bless her! and the Pilgrim Fathers can stand all such attacks. They require no defense at my hands. They took corn when they were hungry, I have no doubt. They differed from the men of the West who, when full themselves, take everything from the Indians.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. They came from New England, principally.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I shall not go into any defense, and I should not have said a word on the subject if it had not been for the interference of my friend from Pennsylvania, who insists that William Penn was the only man and Pennsylvanians the only men who treated the Indians with equity. If I remember history, one of William Penn's men walked nearly five hundred miles in one day, as he was to take all the land he was to cover in one day, and thousands of acres were taken from the Indians.

Mr. WOODWARD. A few years ago the gentleman from Massachusetts could have seen an elm tree in Kensington, Philadelphia, under which the only treaty was made which was made without an oath and without an armed force, and which was not violated. That treaty was made by William Penn with the Indians, and was observed religiously in all of its provisions. I am sorry that the gentleman from Massachusetts is ignorant of that example of William Penn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree that was religiously observed. One of the provisions of that treaty was that he should have as much land as a man could walk over in one day, and a Quaker was found who walked over four hundred miles in one day. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODWARD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must move an amendment to the amendment, as discussion is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. WOODWARD. I move to strike out the last word. William Penn in his intercourse with the Indian tribes treated them with entire integrity. What he bought he paid for. Various metes and bounds were used to designate the interior country, which was but little known, and if any mistake was made it was corrected as soon as detected. Wherever land was purchased it was paid for to the entire satisfaction of the Indians. They received all that he agreed to give them, and the Indians never found better friends or men in whom they had more confidence than the governors he sent out.

Mr. Chairman, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania was founded on the policy of peace with the Indians, and if the nation had been wise enough to take the hint we would not have had miserable Indian wars on our borders.

Mr. BURLEIGH. What did the Indians in Pennsylvania get but blankets and beads?

Mr. WOODWARD. Penn's family never made anything out of Pennsylvania. After the Revolution the estate was turned over to the State. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question being put on the amendment of Mr. CAVANAUGH, there were—ayes 8, noes 34; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WOODWARD, and BUTLER of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 27, noes 54.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I withdraw the amendment. I will ask a vote on it in the House.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. WOODWARD. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will state to the committee that at four o'clock I will move to lay aside this bill for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOODWARD] to address the House.

Mr. WOODWARD. The House is very thin now; it is half past three o'clock Saturday afternoon. I am obliged to be away during the first part of next week, and I would like very much to be able to address the House half an hour now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will move, then, that the bill be laid aside, and that the committee proceed to the consideration of the President's message of 1867.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. Does the gentleman intend to resume the consideration of this bill to day?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not. The motion was agreed to; and the committee accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the President's annual message of 1867.

CIVIL SERVICE BILL.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Chairman, when I observed with what favor the civil service bill of the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] was received by the public, how it was commended by leading newspapers, reviews, and magazines, and what numerous and emphatic endorsements he had obtained for it by interrogatories addressed to the whole corps of officials, I supposed its passage in this House was a matter of course. I confess, too, I feared the Republican party would adopt it as a policy, for it was quite apparent that it could be so worked as to exclude everybody from the civil service except the devotees of that party. Besides, the occasion seemed to demand legislation, and the honorable gentleman had spared no pains or labor to adapt his bill to the demands of the occasion. In view of all these circumstances, I feared the passage of the bill was a foregone conclusion, and hence the manly and heavy blows directed against it by the honorable gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] surprised and gratified me. It was impossible that it was to become a party measure, else so strict a partisan as the gentleman from Illinois would not oppose it; and though he was the only man who made a full speech against it when it was last up, yet enough transpired to show that very many Republicans sympathized in his opposition. Indeed, from all indications it is almost certain that the bill cannot command a considerable vote in the House, and perhaps all that ought to be done further in respect of it would be to give it decent burial. Still, the powerful influences which the gentleman from Rhode Island has shown he can wield in behalf of his bill may reanimate it, and, at any rate, the occasion invites, as naturally as any one that is likely to occur, an expression of opinion upon several topics suggested by the bill.

In expressing myself freely in opposition to the bill I wish to do full justice to the honorable mover. The industry and zeal he has manifested in its behalf are worthy of all commendation. It would be well for the people if all great measures were as carefully scrutinized and considered before they are rushed through the forms of legislation. If the vulnerable points of his measure are easily discerned, it is because of the flood of light the honorable gentleman has himself poured over the whole subject.

The bill assumes that great abuses exist in the civil service by appointing incompetent and dishonest men to office and retaining them in place, and that these abuses are to be remedied by subjecting every applicant for office to a competitive examination to be conducted by a board of five officers, of whom the Vice President is to be the chairman. The country is to be divided into districts by this board, and either by themselves or by such assistants as they have power to appoint, without limit, each applicant is to be examined, lists are to be made out, probations are to be prescribed, the order of merit is to be fixed, and all appointments to civil offices, excepting only postmasters and such officers as are by law required to be appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate, "shall be made from those who have passed the required examinations and probations" in a certain prescribed order. (See section four of the bill.)

The board are to establish rules for examinations and rules for the advancement, one or more points, of any persons exhibiting particular merit in any branch of the civil service, and one fourth of promotions may be made on account of merit irrespective of seniority in service. The board shall also prescribe by general rules what misconduct or inefficiency shall be sufficient for the removal or suspension of all officers who come within the act, and they are to hear and determine any case of alleged misconduct or inefficiency, and the head of the Department is to suspend or dismiss according to the finding of the board.

Any officer in the civil service at the date of this act other than those in the excepted classes may be required by the head of his Department to appear before the board, and if found not qualified shall be reported for dismissal and be dismissed. Finally, the President and Senate may require any person applying for office which requires confirmation by the Senate to appear before said board and be examined as to his qualifications before or after being commissioned, and the result of such examination shall be reported to the President and Senate. This twelfth section will draw all the excepted classes of the second section within the jurisdiction of the board, and thus practically the board will become the appointing power throughout the civil service.

The board of commissioners is made a department of the Government, the head of which shall be the Vice President of the United States, or, in case of a vacancy in said office, the President of the Senate for the time being. I share the doubts intimated by the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] as to the constitutionality of this "department." The Constitution manifestly contemplated governmental Departments, which the acts of the First Congress under the Constitution in 1789 and subsequent statutes have supplied as the business of the Government demanded. To the State Department the foreign relations of the country have been committed; financial affairs to the Treasury Department; everything pertaining to the Army to the War Department; naval affairs to the Navy; postal affairs to the Post Office Department; lands, Indians, pensions, patents and the like to the Department of the Interior, and law to the Attorney General, who is made the legal adviser of the President and of all the heads of Departments.

These are all Executive Departments, designed to assist the President in execution of his constitutional duty to see that the laws are faithfully executed. Subordinates and clerks were necessary incidents of these Departments, as clerks of courts were necessarily incident to the judiciary department; and hence the Constitution, while vesting the whole executive power in the President, provided that Congress may vest the appointment of "inferior officers" in the President alone, in the courts, or in the heads of Departments. These inferior officers evidently include the numerous clerks which the Departments were certain to require, and who constitute a very large part of the civil service intended to be regulated by this bill.

Now, sir, to raise up another department, not to do any of the business of the Government, but to control executive appointments, strikes me as plainly in conflict with the plan of the Constitution. Appointments to office are executive duties. The Constitution vests the whole executive power in the President, and though the selection of inferior officers may be given to the Departments or the courts they are given as incidents of each separate Department. The Constitution never meant that the Department of State, for instance, was to select officers for the Treasury Department, nor, vice versa. Courts were to select officers incidental to them but not for other Departments. A department to select officers for another department, is a scheme that has no root in the Constitution. But it is said the board provided for by this bill is not to make appointments. True, but it is to designate from whom appointments are to be made. It is to run a line through the mass of citizens and set off the favored classes from whom alone the executive power may select Governmental agents. Is this according to the theory of the Constitution? I think not. The Constitution established popular government, and in vesting the executive power in the President it expected him to represent the whole people, to look with a paternal eye upon all his fellow-citizens as equally entitled to share in the honors and emoluments of office. It never meant that he should be shut up to choose from a select few whom a board of politicians had segregated from the mass of citizens and anointed for succession to place and power. If selection of officeholders be a separate function it belongs to the President as the immediate representative of the whole people, and therefore your civil service department is a palpable violation of the Constitution.

Again, the Constitution makes the Vice President part of the Senate. (Section three, article one.) And section six declares that no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office. The Constitution says the Vice President shall preside over the Senate and may vote on a tie. A member of the Senate, acting in the absence of the Vice President as President pro tempore, is in every sense a member of the Senate; yet this bill makes both the Vice President, or in his absence the President pro tempore, the president of this board. How can this be reconciled to the inhibition of the sixth section of article one? Until I hear a satisfactory reply I shall consider this an insuperable objection to the bill.

I next invite the attention of the House to the expensiveness of this scheme. The bill comes from a committee on retrenchment—a select committee on retrenchment. And to do the work which the people now pay the President and heads of Departments for doing they are to be taxed for annual salaries to the—

Five commissioners, $5,000 each.....	$25,000
For clerk hire.....	2,500
For messenger.....	900
	<hr/> $28,400

This is the cost of constituting the board. Then there is to be stationery, traveling expenses, and payments to assistants, who are to be men of "learning and high character," and who must therefore be well paid. The whole duty of competitive examinations may be and probably will be turned over to these assistants, whose charges and allowances cannot be estimated. It is not unreasonable to anticipate that they will cost more than the board itself, and $60,000 may fairly be estimated as the annual charge which this bill will impose upon the Treasury. That is the interest on $1,000,000. This select retrenchment committee propose, therefore, to add $1,000,000 to our public debt in order to exclude the great mass of their fellow-citizens and tax-payers from all possible participation in the honors and emoluments of public office.

This is worse than the ship-canal around Niagara, or the Sutro tunnel, or the Rocky mountain railroads. These objects have the good of the whole people in view; but this bill is to tax the many for the benefit of the few, to establish a bureaucracy in a constitutional republic. Where is the warning voice of the honorable member from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] against such misuse of the public money? I call his attention to this specimen of retrenchment.

The magic power of the bill, which is to reform all abuses in the civil service, is the "competitive examination." Competition is the act of seeking the same object that another is seeking, and the competitive examination is, I suppose, to try the metal and bottom of the several racers for office. Emulous young men from New England colleges will no doubt present themselves to the board in great numbers, but on what shall they be examined? What shall be the point of competition? Congress does not decide by this bill, but leaves it to the board to prescribe subjects, rules, &c. If they are to be put through the intricacies of Greek verbs or the higher mathematics, this board of politicians, with the amiable Vice President at its head, will have been so long from school and will be so steeped in party politics that they will be likely to need assistants who are men of "learning and character." And when A has won precedence over B what does it prove—that he is fit to be a book-keeper in the Treasury or a detective for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue? Many a young man who never saw a college would perform these duties better than he who wins in your competitive examination. But if the examination is not to relate to academic learning, but to the practical duties of the Departments, what does the board know of them? Who has examined the examiners, and tested their fitness for the work in hand? If parliamentary law were the subject, the Vice President-elect, who is our accomplished Speaker, would be a very competent examiner; but I would doubt his skill in passing upon several competitors for whisky gaug-ers and tobacco inspectors. Perhaps he would be more at a loss here than he would be in conic sections and Greek verbs.

Now, hear a little common sense on this subject of competitive examinations from some of the witnesses whom the honorable gentleman [Mr. JENCKES] has summoned to the stand. Mr. Hartley, the accomplished Assistant Secretary of the Treasury says, (see page 19 of the report of committee:)

"In my judgment no preliminary examination will afford the requisite assurance of qualifications for the special duties to which clerks are to be assigned. It is doubtless true that general intelligence and scholarship may be satisfactorily ascertained in that way. The more important duties in this office are however, in the main, so purely arbitrary and technical, depending so much on specific statutes, judicial decisions, and departmental regulations, that no previous training can materially aid in their performance. Nothing, in my judgment, but an actual trial will exhibit or develop the fitness of candidates for offices in this branch of the Treasury Department. Upon satisfactory evidence of character, capacity and general acquisitions will be best ascertained by such trial under temporary appointment. This procedure is the more important if the tenure of office is to be permanent and the incumbent displaced only on the establishment of charges of neglect of duty or other misbehavior in office. Under such a system not only could a 'higher grade of talent and a better quality of persons be induced to enter the Government service,' as suggested in the thirty-fifth interrogatory now before me, but the suggestion made by the thirty-fourth question would also apply, namely, 'that an equal amount of work could probably be accomplished by a less number of persons than are now employed.'"

Mr. Hartley, though a well educated man, has been so long from school that he probably could not pass a competitive examination with any stripling fresh from academic shades, yet he can comprehend and guide the financial operations of a great country, and it would be the ecstasy of folly to displace him for one whom the competitive examination had approved. As a specimen of an examination, I read from the report, page 30, Mr. Clark's statement.

S. M. Clark, chief of printing division National Currency Bureau:

"No. 3. Chief clerk of the office of construction in the Treasury Department nearly four years; subsequently engineer in charge of that office for about two years; and for the past five years have been the disbursing agent of the Treasury extension."

"6. I was referred for examination in August, 1856, in this Department, to a board of examiners appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, consisting of Mr. Rodman, then chief clerk, and Major Barker, and Mr. McKean, two prominent fourth-class clerks. The 'particulars of such examination' were as follows: I was instructed by the then Secretary to appear before this board at a given time and place to be examined. I put in my appearance at the time and place stated in my instructions. Major Barker commenced the 'examination' by saying: 'You are from New York, I believe, Mr. Clark?' I replied that I was. He then commenced a detailed narrative of his first visit to New York, and gave me an interesting and graphic account of the disturbance created in his mind by the 'noise and confusion' of the great city. The delivery of this narrative occupied, as nearly as I remember, about half an hour. I listened to it attentively, endeavoring to discover some point in his discourse which had reference to my (then present) 'examination.' I failed to discover any relevancy, and therefore made no reply. At the close of his narrative, without any further question, he said to his associate examiners, 'Well, gentlemen, I presume there is no doubt but that Mr. Clark is qualified.' Whereupon they all signed the certificate, and my 'examination' closed."

And, on page 75, Mr. J. M. Connel, of the twelfth congressional district, Ohio, utters some truths which I wish to quote at length:

"If it be desirable that those who execute the laws should be prepared for that service by a course of study and experimental labors required by law, it is also essential that those who make the laws should 'pass rigid test examinations' to give evidence of their fitness for their duties before being allowed to discharge them. The imperfections of the internal revenue system and errors in its workings are mainly attributable to defects in the law and the cumbersome and unwieldy machinery prescribed by law for its execution. I have no hesitation in saying that so far as I have knowledge or information in regard to the character, experience, and ability of the officers of the internal revenue service they not only compare favorably with the lawgivers of the nation, but have merit and ability above the average standard required for the making of a respectable Congressman."

As you have called for my 'comments on the condition of the civil service and the best method of making it more effectual,' I will very frankly state that, in my judgment, nothing could be more disastrous than an attempt to create a civil service system in analogy to military service in the regular Army, and borrowed from the Governments of Europe least popular and most antagonistic to republicanism.

"The theory is totally opposed to our system of responsibility to the people, is exceedingly unpopular, and its adoption would be temporary. It would only tend to derange our executive system for a time, and could not last two years before it would be made a political test question, and it would be buried with the party which advocated it by a popular majority that would be overwhelming. A permanent army of civil-service men, nearly as large as our armed forces during the war, fastened upon our Government, irresponsible to the people, and creating a distinct caste separated from and independent of the people, would become so offensive in this free Government as not only to arouse a great political storm, but to cover with popular odium all connected with it."

"The tendency of the popular will and judgment is toward making all offices elective; even the judiciary in, perhaps, all of the States has been made elective through this tendency; and so jealous are the people that it has long been difficult to maintain a small regular army, and a military establishment as large as the proposed civil establishment would never be permitted. Our people learned to appreciate the great efficiency of the volunteer service during the war, and were taught that from the farm, the office, and the workshop could be furnished soldiers and officers superior often to the hot-bed growths of a permanent military service establishment."

Even, therefore, if the proposed civil-service system would be more efficient for the execution of our laws than the present, its unpopularity would be an insuperable objection to its adoption. It would be too ephemeral to be of any benefit, and the derangement of the public business by its brief use should prevent its adoption.

I cannot, however, believe that the system proposed would secure more competent officers or better and more prompt and faithful discharge of public duties. It is the people's business that is to be done, their interests to be cared for, and any removal of the people's agents from direct responsibility to their principals would be unwise and improper."

While in the Comptroller's office at Washington I had good opportunities for testing your proposed system, for up to that time it was acted upon in the Departments. A majority of the clerical force of the Treasury Department were old clerks with assured positions, trained for years in the Department, and rising in grade by promotion for seniority and merit. In the bureau of which I was at the head of the clerical force were some clerks who had been in the service for from twenty to fifty years. I found it true that few died, none resigned, and removals seldom occurred. The old clerks, the 'civil-service men,' were numerous enough to control and shape the business of the Department. I saw daily the effects of such a system in the creation of a 'circumlocution office,' such as was satirized by Dickens; 'red tape' circumscribed everything; dreary routine wore out all energy and life in performance of duty; the civil-service men walked the treadmill of daily duty as patiently and lifelessly as blind old horses, 'assured of their positions.' They put in so many hours of each day in feeble, slow efforts 'how not to do it.' Arrangements accumulated, ancient precedents clogged all rapid action and served as pretexts for needless delays, unjust settlements, and unintelligent rulings. I can imagine no worse fate for a young, vigorous, energetic man of brains than the stifling life of a Department clerk under this circumlocutory system of service, and no more inefficient way of doing the public business."

"In the Comptroller's office I had the assistance of three or four clerks newly appointed and fresh from active life, with hopes of return to the outer world of life and action, who looked upon rotation in office as safety to themselves, and as beneficial to the service in frequently infusing new blood and vigor into the executive offices. I can remember well one John Bedel, a young lawyer from New Hampshire, fresh, active, and hopeful, whose official duties were performed with zeal and intelligence, who was not satisfied merely to sit six hours a day at his desk, but who averaged ten or twelve hours a day of hard, exciting, official labor, who almost terrified the dreary, sleepy old clerks by his energy, and who in a day would get through more actual work than any two of the old civil-service men could do in a week. I noticed many such cases, and all satisfied me that the civil-service in the Department needed reform by adopting a system of frequent changes, and bringing the employees of the Government more directly under the control of the people."

"In all popular governments short prescribed terms of service in civil office is an unvarying rule. Experience, justice, and sound judgment all justify it. Life tenures of office are odious in all Republics; they are corrupting and paralyzing, and no State constitution now exists which recognizes them. In no constitutional convention in the last thirty years have there been found politicians or statesmen who had the hardihood to defend the life tenure-of-office theory. Experience, therefore, certainly shows that the innovation proposed in the civil-service bill is unpopular, dangerous, and without precedent."

You will excuse the freedom and extent of my comments. I understood them to be invited, and I felt glad of the opportunity of stating freely and at length my views. I now give them without personal or political bias. Politically I am without party affiliation, and personally I cannot in any way suffer by the adoption or rejection of the proposed civil-service system."

"I have only to add, in response to the thirty-seventh question and last, that my experience and observation have led me to believe that in the execution and administration of the internal revenue laws it would be well to abolish the offices of district assessors and collectors, and substitute a deputy commissioner of internal revenue for each State, with his office at the capital of the State, and with the same powers within his jurisdiction that are conferred upon the chief Commissioner at Washington, though subordinate to him. The clerical force of his office would not be more costly than the allowance for clerk hire to the district assessors now is. There should be one inspector or police agent for each State, subordinate to the deputy commissioner, and one United States assistant treasurer under his control and orders. With this system adopted there would need to be but one collector in each county in the State paid by salary, (or the county treasurer might be authorized to receive United States taxes,) and but one assessor for each county where the total internal revenue taxes would not exceed $100,000 per year, (the number proportionally increased in counties where larger assessments would be made,) to be paid by commissions not to exceed $2,000 each per year."

But the most remarkable witness the committee has found is the North American Review, reprinted, I suppose, at Government expense expressly for the benefit of this bill.

Mr. WELKER. I would be glad to know what the gentleman alludes to when he speaks of that pamphlet as being published at the expense of the Government.

Mr. WOODWARD. I say I found this in one of the committee-rooms of the Capitol, where there was a quantity of them. It is an extract from the North American Review. I suppose it was reprinted for the use of the House.

Mr. WELKER. I make the inquiry because I have the honor of being a member of the Committee on Retrenchment, and so far as I have any knowledge of the action of that committee they have not, as a committee, taken any means by which any such document as that shall be circulated in the country in favor of this bill or any other articles that may have appeared in the newspapers of the country.

Mr. WOODWARD. I allege nothing in regard to it. I am not informed about it. I simply stated the inference I drew from finding it among other public documents designed for the use of members.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman is aware that his insinuation may have some weight; I wish, therefore, to state to the House that there is no evidence whatever to warrant the insinuation.

Mr. WOODWARD. I found this pamphlet in the room of the Committee on Patents, of which I believe the gentleman is chairman, among public documents printed apparently for the use of the House, one copy of which I took because I wanted to refer to it. I supposed, from that circumstance, it had been reprinted from the North American Review for the use of the House; and now I would thank the gentleman to say if that was not the fact?

Mr. JENCKES. Not at all.

Mr. WOODWARD. At whose expense was it reprinted?

Mr. JENCKES. It was purchased at the expense of the gentleman who now addresses the House, and if the copy which the gentleman holds in his hand was received under my frank it was sent to him as a free gift.

Mr. WOODWARD. I accept the gentleman's statement, but the copy I hold in my hand was not received under the gentleman's frank, but was obtained in the room of the Committee on Patents. I read from the article as follows:

"The very air of New England and New York and the West is big with tacit rebukes against sluggishness; but there are no such admonishing voices in Washington. A lazy listlessness pervades the very aspect of the thinly populated streets. Hence, the Departments have become in many respects mental dormitories, and, in order to make up at least by the routine and force of discipline for what they lack in intellectual vitality, it has become necessary to establish semi-schoolhouse, semi-penitentiary regulations relative to the discipline of the various offices."

Now, if I understand this writer, men bred in the invigorating air of New England are alone fit for the civil service. New York or the West are thrown in as mere make-weights. It cannot be possible that the reviewer would take anybody from such an infected district as the city of New York, and as to the old Keystone State, she has no air like that of New England which "is big with tacit rebukes against sluggishness"—no mountains or valleys to breed men who can stand the "competitive examination." When the war bugle awoke the echo of her hills and summoned her sons to arms they were foremost in the fray, and proved themselves quite equal to the competitions of the battle-field, but before the "civil-service examination board" they will have to give place to the literary quacks whom the wonderful air of New England has invigorated. Considering how bad a place Washington is, according to this reviewer, it is strange he should wish to cramp the genius of New England by the "semi-schoolhouse, semi-penitentiary regulations" of the Departments. "Receiving its tone from the South," says the reviewer, "society at Washington possessed no intellectual activity, and afforded no stimulus to exertion. It held out no encouragement to cultivated minds, and its moral standard was as low as its intellectual. Only the most vigorous natures escaped from its baneful influence."

Abuse of the South is the staple of almost all New England literature, and all the sins or vices of this city, past and present, are of course of southern origin. But the New England reformers have infused "intellectual activity" and afforded stimuli to exertion and encouragement to cultivated minds, and improved the "tone" of society at Washington by delivering it over to ignorant and lazy negroes, while they have set up a "moral standard" by their legislation that has become so abominable as to make the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island cry out for reform. The more vigorous natures and the cultivated minds of New England will find plenty of congenial elements in the modern régime, and as to moral standards the king of Dahomey will supply them.

The great argument which this reviewer urges in favor of the bill, the clincher which is to silence all gainsayers, is on page 6:

"In the early days of the Republic, public officers were generally selected from well-known families. This was not only the case with the President and the Cabinet, but also to a great extent with subordinate officers. At the present day all this is changed, owing to various circumstances, and chiefly to the vast extent of country from which public officers are recruited. Indeed it may be safely asserted that the ignorance of the community regarding the moral and mental qualifications of the highest officers of the State finds only a parallel in the ignorance of these officers in regard to their subordinates. With the adoption of the principle of competitive examination as a test of qualification, the community will not be any longer ignorant in regard to the competency of public officers; and though Mr. JENCKES's bill regards as specially only the officers appointed without advice or consent of the Senate, it empowers that body to refer any appointee whose nomination requires confirmation, to the examination commissioners previous to the vote on his nomination. Few will deny that if such a principle had been in force for several years past, the country might have been saved from the consequences of the nomination of Mr. Andrew Johnson to the Vice Presidency of the United States; for such is the comprehensive character of Mr. JENCKES's bill, that although it deals primarily with subordinate officers only, its moral effect will be to give to the principle of qualification an all-pervading popular prestige and sanction, so that the character of candidates will be submitted to the most stringent scrutiny. If such a scrutiny had been applied to Mr. Johnson's case it would not have required a profound psychological knowledge to arrive at the conclusion that a man may rise from the tailor-shop to the alderman's gown, and from thence to the senatorial ermine and the gubernatorial chair, and yet be morally and intellectually incapable of presiding with dignity, justice, and ability over the destinies of a great nation."

If an intellect not bred in New England air can comprehend the meaning of these driveling puerilities, it is that the moral effect of Mr. JENCKES's bill in its "all-pervading popular prestige" would have saved the Republican party from the great mistake of putting Mr. Hamlin off and Mr. Johnson on for Vice President. But the reviewer should remember that while the bill might have averted that catastrophe, the effect of not putting Johnson in place of Hamlin would have been the election of McClellan and Pendleton; and this would have been more deplorable still. Does he not know that the Republican doctors took Johnson to save Lincoln? There was a very serious competitive examination at Baltimore which resulted in throwing the New England Jonah overboard, and with all deference to the reviewer's better judgment, I think it was a shrewd and cunning swap—one that New England ought to be proud of and grateful for, because it has brought her large profits.

I wonder whether General Grant could have stood a competitive examination any better than President Johnson? If Johnson was a tailor, Grant was a tanner; and when this bill shall become a law and the psychological knowledge of the people everywhere shall be what it is in New England, let no tailor or tanner presume to rise, provided always he be a white man. Then the board of competitive examiners will see to it that the "tone" of Washington society be not corrupted by the South, that intellectual activity be stimulated, that cultivated minds be encouraged, and that moral standards be set up that the lowest negroes can reach; for then officers will be selected, as the reviewer tells us they were in the early days of the Republic, "from well-known families." I have no doubt that under the operation of this bill, if it ever becomes a law, the families that furnish the officeholders will be "well known." Like grocers' packages, they will be carefully selected and assorted.

This is a specimen, sir, of most of the literary supports which the gentleman's bill has attracted. I have heard that something else than the merits of the bill was the magnet that operated on the sensitive natures of the journals and magazines; but having no certain knowledge on the subject, I am bound to presume that they have been brought to piping on a common key by the force of reason and evidence, and this is what makes their arguments worth weighing. Placed in the opposite scale to the common-sense utterances of Mr. Connel and some of the other witnesses, these literary commendations of the bill kick the beam. Indeed, they are lighter than the small dust of the balance.

So with the examples which the honorable gentleman has drawn from despotic and monarchical governments, they never can or ought to become a rule for our free Republic. A landed aristocracy founded on primogeniture can afford to leave the Church, the Army, and the civil service open to younger sons, and the competitive examination may be well enough in selecting among them. But all such systems of government are founded on privileged classes and aristocratic ranks. There is no sympathy with the common masses in them. The Church, the Army, and the civil service become as aristocratic as the landed nobility, while with us government is founded on a basis that is truly popular. Every native-born citizen has an equal right to rise to the highest office in the Government, and as to all other offices our Constitution rejects even this distinction between native and foreign-born citizens. It starts all the people even in the race of life, and recognizes no distinctions except such as they create themselves. It is one of the great vices of this bill that it is not built upon the American ideas of government, but upon those of the Old World.

While I freely acknowledge the indebtedness of the House to the honorable gentleman for much of the matter in his report, I must express my regret that he should have thought it worth while to introduce such copious extracts from the ill-natured libels on General Jackson in Parton's life of that great and good man. The purpose of the honorable gentleman was to discredit the maxim for which, according to my recollection, Senator Marcy, and not General Jackson, was responsible, that "to the victors belong the spoils." But why should the honorable gentleman wish to discredit that maxim? Has not his party acted upon it with an idolatrous devotion? Do they not boast, ad nauseam, that they are victors, and have they not appropriated the spoils with all a miser's greed? I am told by those who know more than I do that about ninety-five per cent. of the officeholders now are Republicans. There never was a time under Democratic administrations, not even during General Jackson's, when much more than five per cent. of opponents were not in office.

Judge Marcy's maxim was never so ruthlessly applied as by the Lincoln administration. Not only were men turned out of office, but Union Leagues and other conspiracies were formed to blast their reputations as enemies of the Government, disloyal copperheads, and sympathizers with rebellion, and every opprobrious epithet which a hireling press could invent was profusely bestowed. If General Jackson removed men from office he left their business and reputations to them and their families; but since the party of great moral ideas has been at the helm, it has become fashionable to strip character and business as well as office from men as true to their country as the needle to the pole, and whose only offense consisted in believing in the Constitution instead of Lincoln.

Why, then, at this late day should the Republican party repudiate Judge Marcy's maxim? From what I have heard I do not believe the party is inclined to repudiate it now on the eve of an incoming administration, when the five per cent. of copperheads are expected to be cleaned out. But why should the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, who is a bright and shining light of that party, repudiate a maxim that is so favorite a policy of his party? Why should he go out of his way to defame General Jackson? Let me tell him that we have never had a more pure or able administration than that of the old hero. He came in after a long, violent, and bitter struggle, and the money power, entrenched then in only one bank, instead of seventeen hundred as now, warred on him from the start, but the people sustained him in his removals and appointments as in all his policy, and he went down to his grave amid the plaudits of his united and prosperous countrymen.

But the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, shocked by the unparalleled corruption that has crept into our civil service in the last eight years, exclaims, "What is to be done?" Like an honest man and true patriot he looks at the ghastly condition of public affairs, and cries out in agony of soul, "Who shall deliver us from the body of this death?" He has told us on this floor, what he said in his New York lecture, that one hundred millions of the people's revenues are annually diverted into the pockets of fraudulent officers and their confederates. Think of it, one hundred millions a year! If this were collected it would pay the national debt within the time in which it is payable. And the people who are thus robbed pay over thirty millions a year to support sixty thousand officeholders, among whom the robbers are to be looked for. What proportion of the thirty millions goes to the robbers and how much of it to honest and faithful officers I have no means of determining, and the honorable gentleman has not found out. But the case is bad enough as presented. As the gentleman has said, the payments to the civil service are not niggardly. They are larger than those paid in France or Germany, or, except in the higher offices, in England.

The case made out, then, is that the people who pay their civil service agents reasonably well are robbed by them of three times the amount the whole civil service costs. Disgraceful, alarming, and humiliating as the fact is, I believe it is truly stated. Nay, I fear the whole truth would make it still worse. But let us never forget that justice is discriminating. It was a notion of the heathen mythology that Justice is a blind deity. It belongs not to our Christian civilization. With us the maxim is, "Let justice be done though the heavens fall."

Now, sir, I believe it is simple justice to say that the heads of Departments and of the bureaus are faithful, honest, and competent men. Considering how rapidly our country has grown, and how multifarious the duties thrown upon the Departments and the bureaus, it is wonderful with what order and precision the public business is transacted. Defalcations, peculations, and frauds are rare, and I see no great occasion, so far as this class of civil officers are concerned, for any change in the mode of selecting and appointing them.

Then, as to the clerical force employed in the respective Departments and throughout the country I have heard but little complaint. No great blunders or frauds have been perpetrated by the clerks. There may be too many employed, and none of them are perhaps fully worked, but speaking of them in the general I believe they are honest servants of the public, and for the most part attentive, obliging, and competent. In my judgment their numbers ought to be reduced and their salaries increased. If one third were discharged and the aggregate of salaries were divided among the remaining two thirds the public service would be benefited, individual suffering alleviated, and the cost to the Government not increased a dollar.

These heads of Departments and clerks have been selected for their respective places with that power of discrimination which the Constitution and laws have vested in the President and heads of Departments, and if we are to judge the tree by its fruits this system requires no legislative tinkering. We can afford to let well enough alone, remembering always that perfection is not to be looked for in human affairs, and trusting to time and experience to correct the errors and abuses of the past.

Where, then, do the great abuses exist? Undoubtedly in the collection of the revenues of the Government. These revenues are derived principally from duties upon foreign imports and from excise duties upon domestic production and labor. Now the question is, whether the competitive examination is likely to furnish us with more honest officers for the collection of these revenues?

Observe, the gentleman from Rhode Island cannot complain of a want of skill in these officials, but only of a lack of honesty. While there are many conscientious men among them, there are dexterous rogues, generally excessively loyal, who could pass any competitive examination you will be likely to institute, but who are destitute of that common honesty which it is no credit to possess but a great disgrace to lack. Will your competitive examination keep such fellows out of the civil service? Will your board descend into the hearts of the competitors and so try the reins of men as to decide who can and who cannot resist the fascinations of the whisky ring? What the gentleman from Rhode Island is after is an honest man. This was the search of old Diogenes when he went about the streets of Athens at mid-day with a lantern, but though I think he chose his means of discovery more wisely than the gentleman from Rhode Island—that is, the lantern is better than the competitive examination—yet he miserably failed, for he declared he had found children in Sparta and women in Athens but men nowhere. To be honest, as this world goes, is to be one man picked out of ten thousand, says Hamlet.

Sir, if I believed the gentleman's bill would take out of the civil service the Joseph Surfaces, the sleek hypocrites whose mouths are ever full of glozing speeches and moral sentiments and frothy professions of loyalty, and in their stead would introduce men of the hardy, homely honesty of the olden time, I would support it with all my might. Ay, I would go with him who would go the furthest to effect such a reform. For, questionless, the great want of our time is honest men. Merchants and bankers, manufacturers and corporations, can find plenty of competent clerks without an expensive board of examiners. So can the Government. But honest men, men who are in the secret recesses of the official closet just what they appear to be in public, men who unconsciously exalt their manhood by cultivating reverence and humility, who habitually render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and unto God the things that are God's—men who would feel a stain more keenly than a wound—men of this stamp and type—alas, alas, how rare they are! If we had an Aristides "the just" in our revenue service I fear we should imitate the Athenians and banish him. The noble Theban, Epaminondas, lived a life of purity in the midst of temptations, and it is said never told a lie even in jest. All down the track of time such occasional instances of inflexible honesty are to be seen, like light-houses along a barren and dreary coast, and our own history is resplendent with names that were not born to die. But in the times upon which we are fallen virtuous examples command no respect. We are a fast people. We boast of progress. Nothing but steam and lightning can serve us. The almighty dollar is the god of our idolatry, and though we set up as many lesser deities as were ever found in the Pantheon, the supremest devotion of too many officeholders is to that wonder-working deity who can make a moderate official salary issue in a few years into a princely fortune. And as a token of our extreme degradation it is worth noticing that we no longer fashion our idol out of gold and silver, but form him out of nasty rags; and whoever heard lately the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARY] will bear me witness there are not wanting priests on this floor to raise the shameful cry, "These be our gods."

Now, sir, fully admitting the deplorable state of official morals alleged by the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, I beg him to notice that he has not adapted his remedy to the disease. His diagnosis is better than his therapeutics. Instead of a board of examiners who can do no more than find out mental acquirements and capacities for political chicanery, I would suggest that the evils complained of spring from a huge public debt and a depreciated paper currency, and the true remedy will consist in reducing that debt and improving that currency.

Why, sir, in Democratic times, when the Government collected and disbursed only from sixty to ninety millions of revenue, we had no such scandalous exhibitions of official corruption as the honorable gentleman has now pressed upon our attention. Occasional delinquencies undoubtedly occurred, and are always to be looked for in widely extended operations where great numbers of agents are necessarily employed, but they were not so frequent or gross as materially to affect the revenues or our general character. But with the accession of the Republican party came disunion and war and debt and a redundant paper currency, and with these "all our woes."

The war is ended—passed and gone, I hope, forever. The Union would have been restored heartily and prosperously had it not been for the evil genius of reconstruction. The debt is unprovided for. No comprehensive system of finance is suggested from controlling quarters; no reduction of military expenses, no systematic retrenchment, no lightening of taxes. On the contrary, the debt increases, the lobby clamors for subsidies, and the people must bow their patient backs while we pile on more taxes. The Special Commissioner of the Revenue, who is set to watch the operation of causes and effects, tells us that the immediate cause of our present anomalous condition of affairs is the increased cost of nearly all forms of labor and commodities as compared with the price of the same that prevailed in the decade immediately preceding the war, and this increased cost has resulted from three agencies, which he specifies as "irredeemable paper currency, unequal and heavy taxation, and a limited supply of skilled labor."

Here is the fountain of our bitter waters, the poisoned spring into which I would that the gentleman from Rhode Island could fling a sweet bough from the tree whose leaves are for the healing of the nations. Let us begin by repealing that most odious statute that made a lying promise to pay, a legal tender. One year ago, on this floor, I proposed a gradual repeal of that enactment, and others have suggested various schemes for a resumption of specie payments; but so far from progressing in that direction, the tendency is to perpetuate the reign of paper money. Unless the Supreme Court gives back to the people their constitutional currency this stupendous fraud of the money power will continue to verify the conclusion of Commissioner Wells, that the rich are to become richer and the poor poorer.

To be more specific—when the Government issues promises to pay money which it does not mean to pay, how can it expect its citizens to be any more honest and sincere than itself? When the Government wastes in railroad subsidies, Army supplies, and Freedmen's Bureaus millions of the people's money, how natural that dishonest officers should say, "This money which is to be wasted if it reach the Treasury may as well be kept by us as to be given to jobbers and favorites." And when the manufacturers of whisky and tobacco see the Government singling out their occupations for excessive taxation, thereby charging an undue share of the public debt upon them, what is more natural than that they should buy up your inspectors and cheat your detectives if they can? Protective duties tempt to smuggling, false invoices, and all manner of frauds. Excessive taxes unequally imposed provoke retaliation. Prodigal squandering of our revenue upon pet schemes of legislation instead of a faithful application of them to our national debt invite and encourage malversation and speculation.

And thus it comes to pass that our own legislation makes rogues to cheat us out of $1,000,000 a year. Let not honorable gentlemen lay the flattering unction to their souls that the competitive examination of applicants for office will remedy this evil. It is two deep-seated for any such nostrum to reach. It has struck down to the roots of our social life. In destroying the standard of values we have unsettled the foundations of public morals.

If we would reform abuses let us reform our legislation. Let us get back to the one only standard of values the world knows. Let us make our paper promises mean what they say. Let us impose taxes by some rule of uniformity, instead of punishing fellow-citizens who choose one branch of industry instead of another. Let us have a revenue tariff with incidental protection, instead of a tariff for the protection of select classes at the expense of all consumers. Let us stop subsidies, retrench expenses, and begin to pay our debts. Let us do these things, sir, and you shall see the tone of public morals instantly improved. You shall see that honest men can then be found, even with our present modes of selection, to collect our revenues and execute our laws.

Mr. ELA obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. McKEE, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 1738) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1870, and had come to no conclusion thereon; also, that the committee had had under consideration the President's annual message for 1867, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

PRINTING OF AN AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] wishes to have printed an amendment which he proposes to offer in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the Indian appropriation bill. If there is no objection it will be ordered to be printed.

There was no objection; and the order to print was made.

S. M. STOCKSLAGER.

Mr. KERR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1814) for the relief of S. M. Stockslager; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LAND TITLES IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. TAFTE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 730) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Nebraska." The bill is purely local in its application, and there can be no objection to it.

The bill was read for information. It proposes to extend the provisions and benefits under the act entitled "An act to confirm the title to certain lands in Nebraska," approved July 25, 1868, to the east half of the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section nine, township fifteen, range thirteen east, sixth principal meridian, in Douglas county, Nebraska, and to confirm the title to the same to the parties holding by deed from the patentee.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. TAFTE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JONATHAN NUTT.

Mr. WOODWARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1815) granting a pension to Jonathan Nutt, a soldier of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and of the War of 1812.

CLAIM OF OWEN THORN, ET ALS.

Mr. MUGEN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to this House copies of the papers filed in the Department of State October 9, 1866, relative to the claim of Owen Thorn and others, for indemnity for losses sustained by the destruction of the steamer Congress by the Canadian authorities.

Mr. McKEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to furnish to this House a copy of the report of the president of the Union Pacific railroad, of December, 1868, relative to the report of the special commission, of which General G. K. Warren was president.

HEALD AND WRIGHT.

Mr. MUGEN. I desire to make a brief explanation in regard to an amendment offered in Committee of the Whole to-day by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the Indian appropriation bill, in relation to paying the claim of Mr. Heald and Mr. Wright out of the funds of the Choctaw nation. I know the gentleman was instructed by four members of the Committee on Indian Affairs—a majority of those present—to report a bill for their relief. But I never saw the bill, and was not prepared to consider the matter when it was brought forward so unexpectedly to-day. I hold in my hand a minority report on that claim, signed by three members of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which I ask may now be received and ordered to be printed for the use of the House.

No objection was made; and the report was accordingly received, and ordered to be printed.

BLANTON DUNCAN.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent of the House that leave be granted to Blanton Duncan, a bill for whose relief was laid on the table yesterday, to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in his case.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Leaving copies on file. Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well. No objection was made; and leave was granted accordingly.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. ROSS. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the naturalization laws as to enable foreigners coming to this country with the intention of making a permanent residence therein to become naturalized and enjoy all the rights and privileges of citizens of the United States in one year after arriving in the United States; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would inform the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] that that subject has been referred to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States, and is not now before the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States.

No objection was made; and the resolution was referred accordingly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask to have entered upon the Journal a motion-I now make to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Ross,] in relation to naturalization, was referred to the Committee on Revision of Laws of the United States.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McKEE. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. EGGLESTON: A resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, protesting against the extension of the provisions of the bankrupt law.

By Mr. HALSEY: The petition of Jacob L. Briggs and Nabor B. Ford, asking Congress to remove their disabilities.

By Mr. HUNTER: The petition of M. R. Edmonds, sixty-seventh Indiana volunteers, for pay as second lieutenant while acting as such but not mustered.

By Mr. JUDD: The petition of Arnold Damer, asking that an organ built for the Church of the Holy Name be admitted free of duty.

By Mr. KOONTZ: The petition of Mrs. A. M. Criswell and 71 others, of Franklin county, Pennsylvania, asking for an amendment of the Constitution of the United States so as to acknowledge Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil government, &c.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: The petition of Mrs. Matilda Carney, of Beaver county, Pennsylvania, for a pension.

By Mr. MOORE: The petition of William H. Howard, of Accomack county, Virginia, praying the intervention of Congress for protection from illegal oyster tonnage tax by the authorities of Virginia.

Also, the petition of B. H. Newcomb, of Willflet, Cape Cod, Massachusetts, praying protection by Congress from illegal taxes on the oyster trade by the authorities of Virginia.

By Mr. MORRELL: The petition of Hon. George Taylor and 40 others, citizens of the seventeenth congressional district of Pennsylvania, praying that an appropriation be made in aid of the national homestead at Gettysburg for the orphans of soldiers and sailors of the United States.

By Mr. PAINE: The petition of Harold Thoreson and others, citizens of Northfield, Minnesota, for a modification of the tobacco tax.

Also, the petition of A. B. Hawley and others, of Red Wing, Minnesota, for a modification of the tobacco tax.

Also, the petition of Hermann Reinold & Co., citizens of Kenosha, Wisconsin, for a modification of the tobacco tax.

Also, the petition of Clark & Rich and others, citizens of McGregor, Iowa, for a modification of the law imposing tax on tobacco.

Also, the petition of Amos Kendall & Co., of Black River Falls, Wisconsin, for a modification of the tobacco tax.

Also, the petition of C. L. La Grove & Co., citizens of Faribault, Minnesota, for a modification of the income tax.

Also, the petition of Charles Nebel and others, citizens of Sauk City, Wisconsin, for a modification of the income tax law relating to tobacco.

Also, the petition of E. Wagner and others, citizens of Manitowoc, Wisconsin, relating to the tax on tobacco.

Also, the petition of J. Cardeza and others, of Sparta, Wisconsin, for a modification of the tobacco tax.

Also, the petition of L. H. Buck and others, citizens of Lake City, Minnesota, for a modification of the tobacco tax.

Also, the petition of F. Klanmann and others, citizens of St. Peter, Minnesota, for a modification of the tobacco tax.

Also, the petition of S. J. Hobart and others, citizens of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for the modification of the law imposing tobacco tax.

Also, the petition of Spofford H. Compton and others, citizens of Grand Rapids, Wisconsin, for the modification of the law taxing tobacco.

Also, the petition of A. Gray and others, citizens of Green Bay and Fort Howard, Wisconsin, for a modification of the tobacco tax.

By Mr. POLAND: A letter from J. C. C. Winch, of Texas, an applicant for relief from disabilities, indorsed by Mr. POLAND.

By Mr. ROBERTSON: The petition of J. L. Gifford, and others citizens of southern New York, for an appropriation for the removal of obstructions at Hell Gate.

By Mr. VAN HORN, of New York: The petition of William Taylor, of Richmond, Virginia, asking to be relieved from disabilities imposed by the fourteenth article of the Constitution.

By Mr. WHITEMORE: The petition of John M. Norris, a citizen of Edgefield county, South Carolina, praying to be relieved of political disabilities.

By Mr. WINDOM: The petition of Major M. A. Daily and 90 others, citizens of Owatonna, Minnesota, asking Congress to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, asking for aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 1, 1869.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday last was dispensed with.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. HOWE. On Saturday last I presented a memorial from the Legislature of Wisconsin in reference to the improvement of the Wisconsin river, which was ordered, as I understood it, to be printed together with the memorial of a convention recently held at Prairie du Chien to consider the same subject. I move that both memorials be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the order.

Mr. HOWE. That was the order; but the Journal does not so state it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal will be corrected in that particular.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of the United States, praying that suffrage be granted to women in the District of Columbia and in the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the passage of laws for the protection of bona fide settlers on the Cherokee neutral lands; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to present some resolutions passed by the Legislature of Indiana. The first reads as follows:

"Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully requested to make such an appropriation as may be necessary to complete the harbor of Michigan City, in this State."

I move that these resolutions be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to present joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, relating to and asking for an appropriation to pay the expenses of that State incurred in repelling the invasion of the rebel General Price; but as a bill on that subject has been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, and has passed the Senate twice, and is still in the House of Representatives unacted upon, I move that these resolutions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, against the ratification of the treaty with the Osage Indians; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the passage of laws for the protection of bona fide settlers on the Cherokee neutral lands; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the passage of a law authorizing and permitting all persons who have taken less than one hundred and sixty acre homesteads under provisions of the laws of the United States to extend their privileges so as to permit them to claim, take, prove up, and hold enough more to make their homesteads one hundred and sixty acres; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of Kansas, in favor of the payment of claims for depredations committed by the Indians in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented petitions of citizens of Massachusetts, Ohio, and New York, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented the petition of John A. Stephens, of Mississippi, praying the removal of political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of A. W. Smith, of Russell county, Virginia, praying the removal of the political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WARNER presented a memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, in favor of a grant of land to aid in the construction of the New Orleans and Selma railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama, in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of the Tennessee river; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Alabama, in favor of a grant of land to the Eureka Mining and Transportation Company of Alabama, for the purpose of opening and improving the navigation of the Cahawba river and its tributaries; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FOWLER presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Memphis, Tennessee, praying aid for the rebuilding of the levees of the Mississippi river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, presented a petition of citizens of New Hampshire, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Connecticut, praying that women be granted the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, praying the extension of the Sioux City and Pacific railroad to Yanoton, Dakota Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of A. Wood, John Smith, and W. D. Pasdouch, soldiers of the war of 1812, praying for pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, praying an appropriation of $100,000 to preserve the falls of St. Anthony, and thus protect the navigation of the Mississippi river above the falls; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, in favor of an appropriation to aid in the construction of the Northern Pacific railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. CONKLING. I present the petition of one hundred and nine merchants and citizens of New York, in behalf of the Commercial Navigation Company. They set forth the objections to the state of things in which the mails of the United States are carried by foreigners and under contracts with foreigners, and pray that a contract may be made with this company for that service. I move its reference to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN presented the petition of George L. Neville, of Portsmouth, Virginia, praying to be relieved from political disabilities imposed on him by acts of Congress; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Thomas Niles, of Gloucester, Massachusetts, praying payment for losses sustained on account of the action of the Government in taking his property during the war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the petition of a large number of citizens of Georgia, in which they set forth their grievous condition, and what they call the organic outrage upon their legal rights as citizens of the United States, and they ask a remedy from Congress. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON presented additional papers in support of the claim of O. P. Cobb, Christy & Co., for relief; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the petition of R. Cruikshank, praying compensation for property taken from him by troops of the United States during the late rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

KENTUCKY UNIVERSITY.

Mr. COLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the regents and curators of the Kentucky University, to report a joint resolution on the subject, which I ask to have considered at this time. I think there can be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 218) to refer the claim of the regents and curators of the Kentucky University to the Court of Claims was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs that the claim of the regents and curators of the Kentucky University for damages to their